WILLIAM A. JOWITT.

Prohibition of imports into United Kingdom: treaty position.

[7190]

c 2

[T 15272/691/378/1931]

No. 2ⁿ

[Home Office.]

[November 6, 1931.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, as amended in 1918 and 1922.

THE Law Officers are requested to advise the Secretary of State for the Home Department and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on the following questions:—

(I) Is a posthumous legitimate child born anywhere out of His Majesty's Dominions to be deemed to be a natural-born British subject, if his father was at the time of his death a British subject and one or more of the conditions specified in paragraphs (i)–(v) of section 1 (1) (b) of the Act were fulfilled?

(II)—(a) If the answer to question (I) is in the negative, is a posthumous legitimate child born out of His Majesty's Dominions, but in a place where His Majesty exercised extra-territorial jurisdiction, to be deemed to be a British subject by virtue of the first proviso to section 1 (1) of the Act, if his father was at the time of his death a British subject?

(b) If the answers to questions (I) and (II) (a) are in the negative, is a posthumous legitimate child born out of His Majesty's Dominions, but in a place where His Majesty exercised extra-territorial jurisdiction, to be deemed to be a British subject by virtue of the first proviso to section 1 (1) of the Act if his mother, being the widow of a British subject, was still, at the time of the child's birth, a British subject?

(c) Is an illegitimate child, born in a place where His Majesty exercises extra-territorial jurisdiction, to be deemed to be a British subject by virtue of the first proviso to section 1 (1) of the Act, if his mother was at the time of the child's birth a British subject?

(III) Is the power conferred on a wife by the first proviso to section 10 of the Act to make a declaration of her desire to retain British nationality exercisable (a) at any time, or (b) only at the date when the husband ceases to be a British subject, or (c) within any reasonable time after that date?

Question (I).

2. The relevant words of section 1 (1) (b) are "whose father was, at the time of that person's birth, a British subject, and . . ."

The view has been taken that in cases where the father has died before the birth of the child, he cannot be said to have been a British subject at that moment, and therefore the posthumous child does not fulfil the requirements of the Act. This view is expressed in Dicey's "Conflict of Laws" (4th edition, p. 166, note (e), and p. 172), where it is pointed out that the same point may arise in the interpretation of the older statute, 4 Geo. II, c. 21, section 1. The point has never, so far as either the Home Office or the Foreign Office are aware, been decided judicially, although the statement made in Shedden v. Patrick, and quoted in the note on p. 166 of Dicey referred to above, may be relevant. In the limited number of cases which have arisen administratively, the view expressed by Dicey has been followed, but it is doubtful whether the point was present to the minds of the framers of the Act and whether, if it had been, the posthumous children of British fathers would have been deliberately excluded.

Questions (II) (a), (b), and (c).

3. Questions (II) (a), (b), and (c) all turn upon the interpretation of the first proviso to section 1 (1) of the Act, which reads as follows:—

"Provided that the child of a British subject, whether that child was born before or after the passing of this Act, shall be deemed to have been born within His Majesty's allegiance, if born in a place where by treaty, capitulation, grant, usage, sufferance, or other lawful means, His Majesty exercises jurisdiction over British subjects."

It is desirable in the first instance to make some reference to the history and subject matter of the above proviso.

Under the common law birth "within His Majesty's allegiance" was the only principle recognised for the purpose of determining whether a person was a natural-born subject (see Calvin's Case 7 Co. Rep. 18ⁿ). Generally speaking, the result of applying this principle was that British nationality was always acquired by birth within His Majesty's dominions and could only be acquired in that way, since, apart from the exceptional cases of the children of foreign ambassadors and the children of an invading enemy born on British territory, all persons born in His Majesty's dominions were by virtue of that fact born within His Majesty's allegiance. Cases where at common law a person whose birth took place outside the realm or dominions of His Majesty might, nevertheless, be born within the allegiance and thus become a natural-born British subject occur, for instance, whenever the child of a British ambassador is born in the foreign state to which the father is accredited (see Calvin's Case 7 Co. Rep. 16ⁿ).

Before the Act of 1914 was passed, it was open to question whether the children of British parents born in a foreign country where the capitulatory régime existed, or in any other place where His Majesty exercised jurisdiction under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, could be regarded as born "within His Majesty's allegiance," so as to give such children the status of natural-born British subjects at common law. Clearly such children, if of the third or later generation born abroad, had no statutory claim to British nationality by descent under the enactments providing for the acquisition of British nationality in the cases of persons born abroad, since these enactments were limited to the children and grandchildren in the paternal line of natural-born British subjects (British Nationality Act, 1730, 4 Geo. II, c. 21: British Nationality Act, 1772, 13 Geo. III, c. 21). Accordingly, the advice of the Law Officers was sought in 1903 on the question "whether persons of British descent in the paternal line born in Turkey, but not within the Acts of 1730 and 1772, are or are not British subjects." In their opinion, dated the 18th August, 1904, the Law Officers (Sir Robert Finlay and Sir Edward Carson) advised that such persons are British subjects at common law on the ground that they were persons born within His Majesty's allegiance. The submission to the Law Officers and their opinion thereon is contained in the print* annexed hereto; the Law Officers expressed the view that, in order to dispose of doubts, the question should be settled by the enactment of a clause in the Nationality Bill then in preparation on the lines of the provision which now appears as the proviso to section 1 (1) of the Act of 1914. The clause was drafted in 1903, and was submitted to the Law Officers in draft. It will be seen that they advised that it should not be presented to Parliament as a special Bill, but should await and be incorporated in a general Bill with regard to British nationality, with the result that it was not enacted until 1914. At the time this clause was drafted the remainder of section 1 of the Act as it now stands was not in existence, and this clause was later inserted in the section in the form in which it had been approved by the Law Officers in 1903. It would seem, however, that insufficient attention was paid to the assimilation of the language of the new section and the proviso.

As already indicated, the object of inserting this proviso was to declare in effect that all children born in the circumstances therein described are natural-born British subjects at common law. Unfortunately, for the reason already explained, the language chosen to produce this result was not clear, and doubts have been expressed whether the proviso has the effect which it was the undoubted intention of those who framed it to secure. As an example of such doubts, reference may be made to the view expressed in Dicey, "Conflict of Laws," 4th edition, p. 855, to the effect that the proviso cannot be interpreted as a substantive enactment conferring British nationality on the children of a British subject by reason of birth in a place where the Crown exercises extra-territorial jurisdiction, and that the effect of the proviso is merely to extend the application of the expression "born within His Majesty's allegiance" in paragraph (i) of section 1 (1) (b) of the Act. The result of such an interpretation would be to confine the scope of the proviso within very narrow limits, and its effect would be merely to confer on persons born in extra-territorial countries, who, under the relevant provisions of the Acts, acquire British nationality at birth, the capacity to transmit such nationality to their children, so that the latter, although born out of His Majesty's dominions, would become British subjects under paragraph (i) of section 1 (1) (b). This interpretation is, of course, based on the use of the words "His Majesty's dominions and allegiance" in section 1 (1) (a), and the absence of the words "dominions and" in the corresponding expression in section 1 (1) (b) (i), and in this proviso, and, though some justification may be found for it on the principle of construction that all differences of terminology imply differences of meaning, it produces a result which is clearly contrary to that which was intended.

* Confidential 8493, p. 152.

This interpretation has never been adopted administratively, and the British nationality of a very large number of persons who have been recognised and treated as British subjects from 1903 to the present day depends on its rejection.

The proviso has been interpreted administratively as giving statutory effect to the opinion of the Law Officers in 1904 as to the position under the common law of children born in extra-territorial countries of British subjects. This opinion is based on the view that the children of British subjects born in a country where His Majesty has extra-territorial jurisdiction are born within His Majesty's allegiance, and persons born within His Majesty's allegiance are British subjects.

4. Question (II) (a).

This question (relating to the posthumous legitimate children born in extra-territorial countries of British fathers) only arises if the answer to Question (I) is in the negative.

The attention of the Law Officers is invited to the difference between the language employed in paragraph (b) of section 1 (1), which deals with the acquisition of British nationality by persons born out of His Majesty's Dominions, and the language of the proviso. Under paragraph (b) the acquisition of British nationality by any person is expressly confined to cases where the father was, at the time of that person's birth, a British subject, and is in substance a reproduction of section 1 of the British Nationality Act, 1730, which provided that "all children born out of the ligeance of the Crown of England or of Great Britain, whose fathers were or shall be natural-born subjects of the Crown of England or of Great Britain at the time of the birth of such children respectively . . . are hereby declared to be natural-born subjects of the Crown of Great Britain." In the case of the proviso under consideration, the expression is merely "the child of a British subject," without any words implying the requirement that the father must have been alive at the time of the child's birth. If it is held that it follows from the language of paragraph (b) of section 1 (1) that a posthumous child, born abroad of a father who was a British subject, is excluded under that paragraph, it does not necessarily follow that the expression "the child of a British subject" in the proviso excludes posthumous children.

It is submitted that the language of the proviso in its natural and ordinary meaning is not only capable of being construed as inclusive of posthumous children, but that it ought to be construed in that sense unless it is clear that the subject matter or the context of the section otherwise requires. So far as the subject matter is concerned, this construction is quite consistent with the object of the proviso, which is, in substance, to confer British nationality on the children of persons who are British subjects under British jurisdiction in a foreign country. For that purpose, there appears to be no ground for withholding the acquisition of British nationality from the child of a British subject merely because the British subject died before the child was born. Further, the difference in the language used may be invoked as a reason for giving one provision a different sense from that given to the other. On the other hand, upon the hypothesis that question (I) is answered in the negative, it may be contended that this view of the proviso is inconsistent with the principle preserved throughout all the enactments relating to the acquisition of British nationality by descent, that the father must be a British subject at the time of the child's birth. It seems doubtful if the proviso should be considered exclusively as a case of nationality by descent; it appears to be as much an extension of paragraph (a) of section 1 (1) as of paragraph (b).

Question (II) (b).

5. This question differs from Question (II) (a) in raising the point whether, in the case of a posthumous legitimate child born in an extra-territorial country of a British father, British nationality can be acquired under the proviso by reason of the fact that the mother was still a British subject at the time of the birth. In other words, it raises the question whether the expression "the child of a British subject" in the proviso should be read as meaning exclusively the child of a British father, or whether it should be construed as including the child of a British mother. In this connexion, the first point to which it is desired to invite the attention of the Law Officers is the difference between the expression "child of a British subject" in the proviso and the language used in the body of the section dealing with British nationality by descent. Under section 1 (1) (b), which deals with nationality by descent, any person is a natural-born British subject though born out of His Majesty's Dominions if his "father was at the time of that person's birth a British subject." As has already been stated above, the acquisition of British nationality by descent was not recognised at common law. The statutory enactments, to which reference is made above, expressly apply the principle of descent or transmission of British nationality through the male line only; and, as pointed out in paragraph 4, the words quoted above merely reproduce in substance the phraseology of the Act of 1730.

It may, however, be contended with some force that Parliament deliberately adopted the more general language used in the proviso with special regard to the circumstances in which it applies. The basis of, and justification for, the acquisition of British nationality in an extra-territorial country is that persons born there of British parents are subject to British jurisdiction and are, therefore, persons living "within His Majesty's allegiance." His Majesty exercises jurisdiction in these countries equally over women who are British subjects as over men; and the words "British subjects" at the end of the proviso include women. It might be argued that, in principle, if His Majesty's jurisdiction over the parents and their subjection in the extra-territorial country to British law (instead of the local law) are the grounds on which the child born there is to be held to be born with His Majesty's allegiance, the same grounds apply with equal force to posthumous children of British fathers whose widows are still British at the time of the birth. It may further be contended that as the legislature has deliberately refrained from repeating in the proviso the language used in the body of the section and has adopted words which are wide enough to include children of British mothers, it is a fair inference that it was the intention that British nationality should be conferred on the posthumous legitimate child born of a British mother in an extra-territorial country.

Question (II) (c).

6. This question (II) (c) raises the point whether, on the assumption that the words "child of a British subject" in the proviso include the children of British mothers, these words can be construed so as to cover the illegitimate children as well as legitimate children of British mothers. The considerations mentioned in paragraph 5 above in favour of the more extended interpretation of the words "British subject" apply to some extent in this connexion in favour of the wider interpretation of the word "child." On the other hand, it cannot be denied that British nationality law does not, when it comes to deal with nationality by descent, recognise birth other than birth in lawful wedlock. If judicial authority is needed in support of this proposition, it is to be found in the well-known case of Shedden v. Patrick, 1, McQueen 535. In that case it was held by the House of Lords that an illegitimate child born abroad, whose father was a British subject, could not acquire British nationality by the subsequent marriage of his parents because the child was at birth filius nullius. To this argument the observation already made in paragraph 4 applies; namely, that the cases covered by the proviso are not cases exclusively of nationality by descent, and the proviso is as much an extension of paragraph (a) of section 1 (1) as of paragraph (b).

Another argument against this interpretation is the general principle of construction that the word "child" in an Act of Parliament always applies exclusively to a legitimate child (per Pollock, C.B., Dickinson v. N.E. Ry., 12 W.R. 52; 33 L.J. Ex. 91; 2 H. & C. 735; Vf. R. v. Maude, 6 Jur. 646; 2 Dowl. N.S. 58; R. v. Totley, 7 Q.B. 598; Sv. R. v. Hodnett, 1 T.R. 96; judgment of Cotton L.J., Northwich v. St. Pancras, 58 L.J., M.C. 73; 22 Q.B.D. 164).

Although it does not affect the legal position, it may be desirable to add, for the information of the Law Officers, that the position of illegitimate children born in extra-territorial countries of British mothers is one of some difficulty if they are not to be held to be British subjects under this proviso. The British consular courts have jurisdiction over British subjects only. Upon this hypothesis, the mothers, who would normally be the guardians of the children, would be subject to the British consular courts, but the children would not be so subject, except in so far as it may be possible to treat them as British protected persons. Consequently, the jurisdiction of the court in proceedings relating to the guardianship of the child is doubtful. On the other hand, no other court would have jurisdiction in such matters over the mother. The children born in these circumstances, if not British subjects, will often be stateless. Similar questions of difficulty arise with reference to the application of Acts like the Legitimacy Act, 1926, under the Orders in Council regulating the exercise of His Majesty's jurisdiction in these countries. It not infrequently happens that the father of an illegitimate child is also a British subject and marries the British mother after the birth. If, however, the child is not a British subject, the Acts as applied under the Order in Council would not effect the legitimization of the child. Similar questions arise with regard to the application of the Adoption of Children Act, 1926. These two Acts are made applicable to British subjects in Egypt under articles 102 and 103 of the Egypt Order in Council, 1930.

Question (III).

7. Section 10 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, is as follows:—

"(10) The wife of a British subject shall be deemed to be a British subject, and the wife of an alien shall be deemed to be an alien: Provided that, where a man ceases during the continuance of his marriage to be a British subject, it shall be lawful for his wife to make a declaration that she desires to retain British nationality, and thereupon she shall be deemed to remain a British subject, and provided that where an alien is a subject of a State at war with His Majesty, it shall be lawful for his wife, if she was at birth a British subject, to make a declaration that she desires to resume British nationality, and thereupon the Secretary of State, if he is satisfied that it is desirable that she be permitted to do so, may grant her a certificate of naturalisation."

The point on which it is desired to obtain the opinion of the Law Officers is whether the power given to the wife to make a declaration pursuant to the first proviso to this section is exercisable (1) at any time after the date when her husband ceased to be a British subject, or (2) only at the date when the husband ceases to be a British subject, or (3) only within a reasonable time after that date.

In accordance with regulations made by the Secretary of State under section 19 (1) of the Act of 1914, every declaration of alienage and declaration of retention or resumption of British nationality, wherever made, shall be registered in London at the Home Office (see Regulation 16 (1) in the annexed copy of the Naturalisation Regulations, 1931, which reproduces verbatim Regulation 10 (1) of the Regulations made on the 30th December, 1914). There is nothing in the Act to render invalid any declaration merely by reason of the fact that it has not been registered. The primary function of registration is to provide an authentic record of the fact that the declaration registered has been made, but, in addition to this, registration, of course, is regarded as an official recognition of the validity of the declaration. It has been the practice of the Home Office ever since the passing of the Act of 1914 to refuse registration of declarations made under section 10 more than six months after the date when the husband ceased to be a British subject, though exceptions from this rule have occasionally been made in cases where the Secretary of State has been satisfied that the wife had no opportunity of making the declaration within the six months' period. This practice is based on the view that the proviso contemplates that the declaration is to be substantially contemporaneous with the husband's loss of British nationality. In the view of the Home Office, the language of the proviso justifies this interpretation, since the words "where a man ceases during the continuance of his marriage to be a British subject," followed by the words enabling the wife to make a declaration that she desired to retain British nationality, appear to contemplate that the declaration shall be made, if not actually at the date of the husband's loss of British nationality, at least within a reasonable time after that date, and shall have the effect of enabling the wife to continue to be a British subject without any substantial break in the continuity of her British nationality. This view of the proviso is further supported by the operative words "and thereupon she shall be deemed to remain a British subject."

On the other hand, it has been suggested that the view on which the Home Office practice is based is tantamount to inserting a temporal limitation into the Act which is not provided for in the Act; and that if any temporal limitation could be implied from the words "retain" and "remain" in the Act, it would mean that the declaration must be made actually at the moment when the husband ceases to be a British subject by obtaining a certificate of naturalisation in a foreign State or otherwise. It would, therefore, in many cases, be quite impracticable for the wife to make any declaration. In particular, she would not be in a position to make the declaration in any case where, for any reason, she did not know that her husband was about to become naturalised abroad. Consequently, since the only temporal limitation which can be implied from the words of the Act must be rejected as being impracticable and the Act has laid down no other, the section must be interpreted as being without any such limitation at all.

It is submitted that, while the language of this proviso does not expressly require that the declaration should be simultaneous with the loss of the husband's nationality, the practice of the Home Office since the commencement of the Act of 1914 corresponds with what must have been the intention of Parliament in inserting this proviso. Under this practice the registration of a considerable number of declarations has been refused on the ground that they were made too late. Further, it would appear that, apart from legislation specifying the period within which such a declaration may be made, the only alternative to the existing Home Office practice would be to accept for registration declarations irrespective of the period, however long, which may have elapsed since the date when the husband ceased to be a British subject. For example, it would be necessary to register a declaration made as long as ten years after that date. The result would be that a woman who had been in fact an alien for a period of ten years might merely by making a declaration put herself into the position of being deemed to have "remained" a British subject during those ten years.

Enclosures.

Law Officers, August 18, 1904 (Confidential 8498, p. 152)
Naturalisation Regulations, 1931.

Opinion.

1. No. The words of the Act "whose father was at the time of that person's birth a British subject" are clear and decisive.
2. (a), (b) and (c). We feel driven to take the view that the first proviso deals with the status of the father of the person whose nationality is in question and not with the status of that person. The history of the proviso and indeed its language if considered apart from its setting in Section 1 (1) (b) are in favour of the view that the proviso applies directly to the child and has the effect of conferring British nationality upon the child of a British subject, if such child is born in a place where His Majesty exercises extra-territorial jurisdiction. In favour of this view (which would give rise to the questions we are asked) it may be said that the statute does not in terms abrogate the common law rule that a person born within the allegiance of His Majesty is a natural-born

British subject, and that the proviso merely enlarges what is ordinarily meant by the phrase "within His Majesty's allegiance." This argument, however, in our opinion, breaks down upon the language of Section 1. The proviso cannot be read as an enactment having no reference to Section 1 (1) (b), but as bearing upon the status of a separate class of natural-born British subjects, namely, those born outside His Majesty's dominions but within His Majesty's allegiance.

For the above reasons we answer these three questions in the negative. On the construction of the proviso which we think is the right one, the questions do not really arise.

3. In our opinion a declaration must be made as soon as a wife is aware of the fact that her husband has ceased to be a British subject. It may be difficult in practice to ascertain the true facts as to the wife's knowledge, but that is a difficulty in administration which only legislation can remove. Moreover, the onus will always be upon the wife. There is nothing in the section to lead to the conclusion that a wife loses her right of option when she is in fact wholly ignorant of her husband's change of nationality. On the other hand, it seems to us equally unreasonable to hold on the words of the section that a wife may lie by for years or even months and then claim the right to exercise an option which in fact has been already exercised by her omission to make any declaration as to her retention of her British nationality.

WM. A. JOWITT.
T. W. H. INSKIP.

*Law Officers' Department,
November 6, 1931.*

PORTUGAL.

[W 5614/856/36/1931]

No. 3.

[May 13, 1931.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 22, 1931.

Anglo-
Portuguese
Commercial Treaty of 1914: interpretation as regards discrimination in favour of Portuguese
shipping.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Mr. Secretary Henderson, to transmit to you the papers noted in the attached list and to request the favour of your advice on a question in relation to the Anglo-Portuguese Commercial Treaty of the 12th August, 1914 (Paper A). The point which arises is stated in the enclosed letter, dated the 18th February, 1931, from the Board of Trade, and its enclosures (Paper B).

2. For some years past the Portuguese Government have adopted a policy of discrimination in favour of Portuguese as against foreign shipping. The methods adopted in pursuance of this policy are many and varied; they are briefly described in a despatch from His Majesty's Ambassador at Lisbon, dated the 16th January, 1930 (Paper C), but the only one which it is now necessary to consider is the system (described in paragraph 5 of Sir F. Lindley's despatch) under which goods imported in Portuguese bottoms receive a remission (in most cases amounting to 10 per cent.) of the ordinary customs duties, which are paid in full by goods imported in foreign vessels. The question which arises is whether this system constitutes a violation of the provisions of the Anglo-Portuguese Commercial Treaty.

3. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, in common with other interested Governments, have during recent years addressed to the Portuguese Government a series of protests against the policy of discrimination adopted by them. But it has not so far been suggested in this correspondence, either by His Majesty's Government or, so far as Mr. Henderson is aware, by any other Government, that the discriminatory system in general, or this particular matter of the 10 per cent. remission of customs duties, was inconsistent with Portugal's obligations under her commercial treaties. As regards the Anglo-Portuguese Commercial Treaty, it has hitherto been considered that the relevant provision was article 11, and that, as that article gives only most-favoured-nation, and not national, treatment, Portugal retains the right to discriminate in favour of cargoes imported in Portuguese bottoms. As will be seen later, there can be little doubt that this was the intention of the parties at the time when the treaty was concluded.

4. It will be seen, however, from the enclosures to the Board of Trade letter (Paper B), that the Association of British Chambers of Commerce has now been advised by Sir John Simon and Sir Robert Aske that the fact of goods imported in a British ship not receiving the remission of customs duties accorded to goods imported in Portuguese bottoms constitutes (1) in the case of British goods imported in a British ship, a violation of article 5, and (2) in the case of foreign goods imported in a British ship, a violation of article 1, of the treaty. The arguments by which such a contention would be supported will be found in the opinion in question.

5. In the first of the two cases referred to above, Mr. Henderson conceives that the reply of the Portuguese Government to such arguments (so far as it was based on the wording of the treaty alone) would run somewhat as follows: The subject-matter of articles 5 and 11 is quite different, and in the present case the latter is alone relevant. Article 5 is a provision in favour of goods; article 11 is one in favour of ships. Article 5 prevents discrimination between British and any other foreign goods on the ground of their origin. Article 11, so far as it deals with goods, regards them merely in the capacity of cargo of ships, and prevents discrimination against goods (whatever their origin) based on the nationality of the ship on which they are carried; this is really a provision in favour of the ship. If article 5 were by itself sufficient to protect goods against discrimination based on the nationality of the ship on which they were imported, the reference to cargoes in article 11 would (at any rate so far as British goods are concerned) be surplusage. Since the existing discrimination is dependent exclusively on the nationality of the ship, article 11 is the article applicable to the present case, and as this article gives only most-favoured-nation and not national treatment, discrimination in favour of goods carried in Portuguese bottoms is in terms permitted by this article.

6. The Board of Trade point out in their letter that the application of different customs tariffs on different frontiers has not been regarded as inconsistent with treaty provisions securing most-favoured-nation treatment for British goods. It may perhaps be added that, on the arguments adduced by Sir John Simon and Sir Robert Aske, it would not be open to the Portuguese Government (e.g.) to encourage the development of air routes to Portugal by granting a rebate on goods imported by air, since that would result in German goods imported by air paying a lower rate of duty than British goods imported by land or sea.

7. As regards the second case (that of foreign goods imported in a British ship), Mr. Henderson is inclined to share the doubts expressed by the Board of Trade as to the validity of the suggested contention. The only provision in the treaty on which it would be possible to rely is the sentence in article 1 which says that "The subjects or citizens of each of the two contracting parties shall have liberty freely to come with their ships and cargoes to all places, ports and rivers in the territories of the other to which natives subjects or citizens are or may be permitted to come"; coupled with the immediately preceding sentence, which provides for "full and complete freedom of commerce and navigation" between the territories of the two parties. These provisions are, however, of the most general character, and it appears to Mr. Henderson that on the principle that Generalia particularibus non derogant, it is difficult to rely on such provisions in order to over-ride the specific terms of article 11. It seems impossible to contend that these provisions are in themselves sufficient to secure most-favoured-nation treatment to British goods, and, indeed, if the provisions of article 1 really govern matters such as that now in question, a considerable portion of the treaty would become unnecessary.

8. But whatever may be the effect of a strict construction of the treaty, there can be little doubt that, as is stated in the Board of Trade letter (Paper B), the intention of the parties to the treaty was that it should not prevent discrimination of this nature in favour of Portuguese shipping. The text of article 11, as originally proposed by His Majesty's Government, was on the lines of that which then usually figured in our commercial treaties, and ran as follows:—

"Each of the contracting parties shall permit the importation or exportation on the vessels of the other of all merchandise which may be legally imported or exported, and also the carriage of passengers from or to their respective territories on the vessels of the other; and such vessels and their cargoes and passengers shall enjoy the same privileges, and shall not be subjected to any other or higher duties or charges than national vessels and their cargoes and passengers."

This provision, which, as it will be seen, gives national treatment, would clearly have prevented the Portuguese Government from granting the present rebates to cargoes carried in Portuguese bottoms without extending the same privilege to goods imported in British ships. The Portuguese Government, however, refused to accept a provision in that form, and insisted that they could not give anything more than most-favoured-nation treatment in matters of navigation, on the ground, according to a verbal statement made by the Minister for Foreign Affairs to the British Minister, that "a differential treatment was necessary for the protection of the Portuguese mercantile marine." In order to secure the conclusion of the treaty, the Board of Trade were prepared, though with great reluctance, to agree to the original draft being replaced by the provision which now figures as article 11 and gives only most-favoured-nation treatment. It seems to follow that it cannot have been the intention of the parties that article 5 of the treaty should have the effect of depriving the Portuguese Government, so far as cargoes are concerned, of the right to discriminate which they had secured by the alteration in the text originally proposed for article 11.

9. The point raised in the preceding paragraph may be material, since, in the event of the question being taken to arbitration, the Portuguese Government would no doubt seek to rely in support of their contention on the alterations made in the text originally proposed for article 11; and since it could hardly be contended that the text of the treaty was only consistent with the contention which His Majesty's Government would be putting forward, so that there was, in fact, no doubt as to its meaning, Mr. Henderson regards it as almost certain that the court would be prepared to take the "travaux préparatoires" of the treaty into consideration if the Portuguese Government requested it to do so. In this connexion it may be material to refer to the discussion of the practice of the Permanent Court of International Justice on this point which will be found at pp. 50, 107-108 and 186-187 of the "British Year Book of International Law" for 1930.

10. I am accordingly to request you to take the enclosed papers into your consideration and to favour Mr. Henderson with your opinion as to whether, in the circumstances, it could be successfully contended before an international tribunal that the refusal to goods imported in British bottoms of the remission of customs duty which is accorded to goods imported in Portuguese ships constitutes a violation of the Anglo-Portuguese Commercial treaty—

- (1) In the case where the goods imported in the British vessel are British produce or manufacture.
- (2) In the case where they are of foreign origin.

11. Mr. Henderson would also be grateful for any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.

C. HOWARD SMITH.

List of Papers.

Paper A: Anglo-Portuguese Commercial Treaty, August 12, 1914 [Treaty 1539].

Paper B: Board of Trade to Foreign Office, February 18, 1931 [W 1940/856/36].

Paper C: Despatch from His Majesty's Ambassador at Lisbon, January 16, 1930 [W 800/105/36].

Report.

(1) The articles mentioned in the first sentence of article 5 are not co-extensive with the cargoes referred to in article 11. The articles mentioned in article 5 are only the produce or manufacture of one of the contracting parties, whereas the cargoes referred to in article 11 may include articles which are not the produce or manufacture of either of the contracting parties. We think there is no need to depart from the natural and literal meaning of either of these provisions in order to reconcile them, and that the meaning of the two articles taken together (so far as relevant) is that—

- (a) Portugal shall not subject any cargo of a British ship, wherever produced or manufactured, to higher duties than those imposed upon the cargoes of other foreign ships.
- (b) Portugal shall not subject articles of British produce or manufacture (whatever the nationality of the importing vessel) to higher duties than those imposed on articles produced or manufactured in any foreign country (whatever the nationality of the importing vessel).

The effect is that—

- (i) British produce or manufacture imported in a British ship is protected by both articles.
- (ii) British produce or manufacture imported in a non-British ship is protected by article 5 only.
- (iii) Non-British produce or manufacture imported in a British ship is protected by article 11 only.

(2) We think that evidence of the "travaux préparatoires" mentioned in paragraphs 8 and 9 of the Foreign Office letter of the 22nd April, 1931, would not affect the interpretation of article 5. The text of article 11, as originally proposed by His Majesty's Government, gave national treatment to all cargoes of British ships, whether or not of British produce or manufacture. The revised text gave most-favoured-nation treatment to the same cargoes. In our opinion the change does not involve any change in the interpretation of article 5, which relates to a different class of goods. The classes of goods are different, although particular goods may happen to belong to both classes.

(3) We think that article 1 should be read subject to article 11, and should not be read as securing to the cargoes of British ships treatment better than the most-favoured-nation treatment expressly accorded by article 11.

(4) Accordingly, with reference to the specific questions asked in paragraph 10 of the Foreign Office letter of the 22nd April, 1931, we are of opinion that in Case (1) the suggested contention would probably be successful, but in Case (2) it would probably be unsuccessful.

WILLIAM A. JOWITT.

R. STAFFORD CRIPPS.

*Law Officers' Department,
May 13, 1931.*

1931

22

RUSSIA.

[T 8719/161/373/1931]

No. 4.

[July 2 and 8, 1931.]

(1)

Sir William Malkin to the Attorney-General.

Diplomatic privilege of officials of Trade
Delegation of the U.S.S.R. in London.

My dear Attorney,

Foreign Office, July 2, 1931.

I SHOULD be grateful if we might consult you informally on a matter as to which we should very much like to know your views, but which is hardly one which we can refer to you formally at the present moment.

2. I enclose a letter⁽¹⁾ from Messrs. Field, Roscoe and Co. and its enclosures, and also the draft⁽²⁾ of a reply from the Foreign Office to this letter, together with a copy of the Temporary Commercial Agreement with the U.S.S.R. of April 1930.⁽³⁾

3. May I ask you to be so good as to look particularly at paragraphs 4, 5, 6 and 7 of the draft reply, which has been prepared after discussions with the Treasury Solicitor and the Solicitor to the Board of Trade?

4. So far as the present case is concerned, we feel fairly confident here that it does not come within the class of cases with respect to which in the Commercial Agreement the U.S.S.R. undertook not to claim immunity from the jurisdiction (paragraph 5). The question mentioned in paragraph 4 (b) of the draft reply does appear to be a somewhat important one, and the question whether the courts can give effect to the protocol of the Commercial Agreement is one with respect to which it is not unlikely that questions may be sometime asked in the House.

5. There seem to be three possible views which might be taken on this question, namely—

- (a) That the provisions of article 2, paragraph 6, and the additional protocol to the agreement merely constitute undertakings having effect only in international law as between the Government of the U.S.S.R. and His Majesty's Government, under which the Government of the U.S.S.R. are under an obligation, whenever a case coming within their scope arises, not to claim immunity from process in the English courts; i.e., an obligation which could only be made the subject of diplomatic representations if it were not fulfilled, and which in no way qualifies or affects the diplomatic immunity of the Soviet trade representative and his deputy under English statute and Common Law, as members of the staff of the Soviet Embassy, received and recognised by His Majesty's Government as having diplomatic status.
- (b) That these provisions constitute, as regards a case which came within their scope, a general waiver of immunity or submission to the jurisdiction to which the English courts could give effect, even if in the particular case there was no waiver or submission to the jurisdiction.
- (c) That the acceptance by His Majesty's Government of the trade representative and his deputy in a diplomatic capacity after the conclusion of the agreement should be regarded as conditional only, and as subject to the qualification that no diplomatic immunity should exist as regards cases coming within the scope of these provisions of the agreement.

6. Of these three views we are inclined to think that (a) is the right one, but if the opinion given in paragraph 5 of the draft reply is correct, this case need not necessitate any decision on this more important point, and we are inclined to think that it would be desirable to secure, if possible, that the case should be decided on the more limited ground of paragraph 5 of the draft reply.

(1) See (2).

(2) See (3).

(3) Cmd. 3552 [Treaty 1985].

RUSSIA.

23

7. Field, Roscoe, of course, state in their letter that the court desired a statement from you, but we think that this may be a mistake. In any case, we think that the normal procedure is that if the court desires information on some point such as this, it writes to the Department concerned and asks for it, the information being given in a reply to the court, written by, or on behalf of, the Secretary of State, and that the Attorney-General does not give statements in writing, but appears in (or is represented before) the court in proper cases, and presents arguments to assist the court.

8. The awkward possibility about this case is that if the court were to hold that the protocol to the agreement is a waiver or submission upon which it could act, and to interpret it as covering cases which it was not meant to cover, the plaintiff might get judgment by default and then proceed to execute his judgment against the property of the U.S.S.R. under paragraph 7 of article 2, and in this case we should probably be faced by representations from the Soviet Ambassador, which would be distinctly awkward. It is for this reason that we are inclined to think that it would be desirable that you should be represented at the hearing of this summons, and argue, if you share our view on this point, that in the present case the protocol to the Commercial Agreement does not cover the matter which is the subject of this action. Subject to your views, we are disposed to think that it would be best to endeavour to get the case decided on this point, and to avoid a decision on the more important point mentioned in paragraph 4 (b) of the draft reply, though we should, of course, be very glad to know what your opinion upon this point is, and, in particular, whether you think that any view should be expressed in the reply on the alternative enumerated in paragraph 5 above, as, for instance, by suggesting that of those alternatives (a) is the right one.

9. In view of the possibility of your taking part in the proceedings, we do not like to reply to Field, Roscoe's letter without consulting you, and we should therefore be very grateful if you would let us know whether you approve of our sending the draft letter, or what modifications you would wish made.

Yours very sincerely,

WILLIAM MALKIN.

(2)

Messrs. Field, Roscoe and Co. to Foreign Office.

36, Lincoln's Inn Fields,

London, June 15, 1931.

Dear Sir,

SHENKMAN v. Trade Delegation of the U.S.S.R. in Great Britain.

We are the solicitors for the plaintiff in this action, Mr. I. M. Shenkman, who on the 8th May, 1931, commenced proceedings against the defendants for damages for wrongful dismissal from their employment as financial adviser.

Certain steps were taken by us in an endeavour to effect service of the writ, and, failing in this respect, an affidavit was lodged at the central office for an order for substituted service of the writ upon the defendants.

In view of the circumstances, the court have requested us to instruct you to obtain a statement by the Attorney-General as to the status of the defendants, and as to whether they can rightfully claim immunity from judicial process on the ground of diplomatic privilege.

We cannot do better than send you herewith a copy of the affidavit and the correspondence⁽¹⁾ exhibited thereto, which we think will give you all the necessary details, and we shall be glad to hear from you upon the matter in due course.

Yours truly,

FIELD, ROSCOE AND CO.

(1) Correspondence will be found in [T 7669/161/373/1931].

1931

Enclosure in (2).

Affidavit in Support of Application for Substituted Service of Writ of Summons.

1931 S. No. 1962.

In the High Court of Justice, King's Bench Division, between Ilia Michailovitch Shenkman (plaintiff) and the Trade Delegation of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in Great Britain (defendants).

I, JOHN HODGES, of 36, Lincoln's Inn Fields, in the County of London, managing clerk with Messrs. Field, Roscoe and Co. of the same address, solicitors for the above-named plaintiff, make oath and say as follows:—

1. This is an action commenced by the plaintiff for damages for his wrongful dismissal by the defendants from their employment as financial adviser. There is now produced and shown to me and marked "A" a print of the temporary commercial agreement of the 16th April, 1930, made between His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, this agreement (inter alia) giving leave for the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to establish in London a trade delegation consisting of the trade representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and his two deputies. I refer this honourable court to clause 2 of article 2, which states that the trade representative and his two deputies shall be accorded all diplomatic privileges and immunities . . . , but that no member of the staff of the trade delegation other than the trade representative and his two deputies shall enjoy any privileges or immunities.

I also refer this honourable court to the additional protocol forming part of the agreement aforesaid, which provides that the privileges and immunities conferred by paragraph 2 of article 2 of the said agreement shall not be claimed in connexion with any proceedings before the courts of the United Kingdom arising out of commercial transactions entered into in the United Kingdom by the defendants.

2. The plaintiff was for many years past in the employ of the Russian Government in various forms in this country. When the trade delegation arrived in this country pursuant to the agreement hereinbefore referred to, the plaintiff was in the employ of Arcos (Limited) in this country. Upon the arrival of the trade delegation it was arranged that the plaintiff should leave the direct service of Arcos (Limited) and be employed by the delegation. On the 18th December, 1930, he was dismissed from the service of the delegation by M. Saul Bron, the chairman, without any notice, without any complaint, and without any reason being given for such dismissal.

Following this dismissal, my firm had certain correspondence on the plaintiff's behalf with the defendants and their solicitors. No attempt was made in such correspondence to defend the plaintiff's dismissal, and apparently the real defence to this action is a claim to diplomatic privilege.

3. My firm has been advised by counsel that, in his view, this claim to diplomatic privilege is an arguable question, and he has advised that these proceedings should be commenced.

4. A writ was therefore issued on the 8th May, 1931, and on the same day my said firm wrote the defendants' solicitors, Messrs. Wynne, Baxter and Keeble, sending them the original writ and a copy, and enquiring whether they would accept service thereof on behalf of the defendants. A reply was received by my said firm to this letter, which, omitting formal parts, was as follows:—

"May 9, 1931.

"We have your letter of yesterday's date with the writ and copy, which we return herewith. We have no instructions to authorise us to accept service. Should we obtain them we will let you know."

5. In view of this letter, and paragraph 5 of article 2 of the agreement hereinbefore referred to, I attended at the office of the Board of Trade on the 12th May, 1931, to ascertain the names at that date of the trade representative and of the persons empowered to represent him. I was informed that at that time M. Saul Bron was still chairman of the delegation, and that M. V. Karpoff was his deputy.

6. Thereafter steps were taken by me to effect service of the writ upon the defendants, and there is now produced and shown to me, marked "B," a true copy of the correspondence evidencing such efforts. I say that I, on behalf of the said Messrs. Field, Roscoe and Co., wrote the letters numbered 1, 2, 4, 6 and 7 in Exhibit "B" to this my affidavit, that I made the attendances as therein set out, and that the results of such attendances are accurately set out in such letters. As to letter 7, I duly attended on the 1st June, 1931, at 12 o'clock at the defendants' office, as mentioned therein, but was informed by a clerk that the secretary was not in and that his movements were unknown. None of the said letters have been returned to the said Messrs. Field, Roscoe and Co. through the Dead Letter Office.

7. In my respectful submission, the question whether the contract between the plaintiff and the defendants is of a commercial nature or not is a matter for the decision of this honourable court, and leave is asked that the writ may be served upon the defendants by service upon their secretary by pre-paid post at Bush House, Aldwych, London, W.C. 2.

Sworn at 37, Lincoln's Inn Fields, in the County of London, the 9th day of June, 1931.

JOHN HODGES.

Before me,

ADOLPHUS TOOTH,

A Commissioner for Oaths.

(3)

Draft of Letter from Foreign Office to Messrs. Field, Roscoe and Co.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, July , 1931.

WITH reference to your letter of the 15th ultimo in connexion with the proceedings brought by your client, Mr. I. M. Shenkman, as plaintiff, against the trade delegation of the U.S.S.R., as defendant, to obtain damages for alleged wrongful dismissal from the employment of the trade delegation as financial adviser, in which you state that the court have requested you to obtain a statement by the Attorney-General as to the status of the defendants, and as to whether they can rightfully claim immunity from judicial process on the ground of diplomatic privilege, I am directed by Mr. Secretary Henderson to inform you that he observes, from the correspondence enclosed in your letter, that the trade representative of the U.S.S.R., M. Bron, has declined to accept service of the writ on the ground that he is entitled to diplomatic privilege in non-commercial matters, and has referred to the agreement between His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and the Government of the U.S.S.R. of the 16th April, 1930, and that attempts to effect service upon M. Bron's deputy, M. Karpoff, and upon the secretary of the delegation have not been successful, and that an application has now been made to the court for an order for substituted service.

2. With regard to the questions raised in your letter, I am to inform you that if a statement is desired by the court, it will be furnished by the Secretary of State on receipt of a letter in the ordinary way addressed to him by the court requesting information.

3. I am to state, however, for your information, that the trade delegation of the U.S.S.R. in London, which was established in virtue of the Temporary Commercial Agreement of the 16th April, 1930, consists of the trade representative of the U.S.S.R. and his deputy, and forms part of the Embassy of the U.S.S.R. M. Bron, the trade representative of the U.S.S.R., and his deputy, M. Karpoff, are members of the staff of the Embassy of the U.S.S.R. and have been received in this capacity. Their names appear in the list compiled under the Diplomatic Privileges Act, and they are entitled to full diplomatic privilege and immunity, including immunity from process.

4. In order to establish that the court shall be entitled to exercise jurisdiction in the action brought by your client in the circumstances of the

[7190]

E

1931

26

RUSSIA.

present case, it appears to Mr. Henderson that it would be necessary to show not only—

- (a) That the contract of employment which forms the subject-matter of the proceedings brought by your client comes within the terms of article 2, paragraph 6, and of the additional protocol of the Temporary Commercial Agreement between His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and the Government of the U.S.S.R., signed on the 16th April, 1930; but also
- (b) That these provisions had the effect of entitling the court to exercise jurisdiction in respect of matters coming within their scope over the trade representative of the U.S.S.R. and his deputy, even if in the particular case the trade representative had declined to submit to the jurisdiction.

5. Mr. Henderson is advised that, in the present case, it would not be possible to establish that the contract which forms the subject-matter of the action instituted by your client comes within the scope of these provisions. He is advised that the meaning of the words "commercial transactions" in the additional protocol and in paragraph 6 of article 2 is shown by a reference to paragraphs 1 and 3 of article 2 of the agreement, and that these words refer to the transactions of the trade delegation conducting the foreign trade of the U.S.S.R. in the United Kingdom, for, and on behalf of, the U.S.S.R., and do not include contracts of employment and service concluded between the trade delegation and persons in their employment.

6. Mr. Henderson considers that, in view of the position on the first point, as set out in the preceding paragraph, it is unnecessary for him to express any opinion on the question indicated in paragraph 4 (b).

7. Mr. Henderson would, however, be grateful if he might be informed of the date and time at which your client's application for substituted service would be heard in order that he may consider whether it is desirable that consult the Attorney-General should appear as to the desirability of his being present at the hearing of your application.

(4)

Attorney-General to Sir William Malkin.

Dear Malkin,

SHENKMAN v. U.S.S.R. Trade Delegation.

July 2, 1931.

I approve your draft answer to Messrs. Field, Roscoe, subject to an alteration in the last three lines so as to make it read: "in order that he may consult the Attorney-General as to the desirability of his being present at the hearing of your application."

I will write you with regard to the further point you mention when I have had further time to consider the question.

In view of the fact that Field Roscoe's letter is dated the 15th June, I thought it better to let you know at once that I approve your letter, so that it may be despatched forthwith.

Yours sincerely,

WILLIAM A. JOWITT.

(5)

Attorney-General to Sir William Malkin.

My dear Malkin,

SHENKMAN v. U.S.S.R. Trade Delegation.

July 8, 1931.

I have now looked further into your letter of the 2nd July relating to diplomatic privilege of the officials of the U.S.S.R.

The real question seems to me to be whether the courts in any given case have the right to decide whether any particular dispute can be said "to arise in respect of a commercial transaction," or whether the true view is that there is merely an honourable undertaking, the legal effect of which is that immunity is only waived in any particular case which the Russian officials acknowledge to be a commercial transaction. Upon the whole, with very great hesitation, I think the view expressed in paragraph 5 (a) of your letter to me is to be preferred.

RUSSIA.

27

I would point out that it seems generally to have been assumed that an Ambassador engaging in trade lost his immunity quoad the commercial transaction; but even on this assumption it would not, I think, have been possible to implead such an Ambassador in our courts to have it determined by the courts whether the particular transaction the subject-matter of the action fell within the description of a commercial transaction. So, at any rate, I understand the Magdalena case, 2 Ellis & Ellis, 94. At p. 114, Lord Campbell says:—

"In countries where there may be a citation by seizure of goods if an Ambassador loses his privilege by engaging in commerce, he not only may be cited but all his goods unconnected with his diplomatic functions may be arrested to force him to appear."

I infer from this that in countries where there could not be a citation by seizure of goods, it would be impossible to implead the Ambassador personally to ask the court to determine without his consent whether or not a transaction was commercial.

I have no doubt that where a question of status was in issue the defendant Ambassador would have to establish his diplomatic status; and to do this in the old days he frequently had to submit himself to the courts. In the recent case of Engelke v. Musmann, 1928 A.C. 432, where the defendant sought to establish his immunity by affidavit, he would have had to submit to cross-examination on this affidavit but for the statement of the Attorney-General. In the present case, however, no question of status can arise, the sole question being whether a man admittedly enjoying diplomatic status has lost it by virtue of the fact that a particular transaction falls within a particular description. I do not think the courts would embark upon a consideration of this question, since this would make the immunity nugatory; but I regard the whole matter as one of great difficulty (see particularly the observations of Lord Warrington in Engelke v. Musmann at the top of p. 457).

I hope that on the lines of your previous letter any discussion of this very difficult point will be unnecessary.

Yours very sincerely,

WILLIAM A. JOWITT.

[7190]

E 2

1931

28

GENERAL.

[W 9425/72/50/1932]

No. 1^b.

Air Ministry.]

[May 20, 1931.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

HEREWITH are sent :—

Power under Air
Navigation
Act, 1920, to declare prohibited areas.

1. Copy Correspondence and Departmental Minutes.
2. Convention for the Regulation of Aerial Navigation.
3. Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order, 1923, as amended to May 1930 [Confidential 13758*].
4. Protocol relating to Amendments to Article 3, &c., of the Convention relating to the Regulation of Air Navigation [Cmd. 3541 (Parly. 5579)].
5. Papers laid before Law Officers in 1920 in relation to the Air Navigation Bill, 1920.

The first question upon which the advice of the Law Officers is desired is whether there is power under the Air Navigation Act, 1920, to declare by Order in Council the precincts of Windsor Castle a prohibited area from which all aircraft are excluded. The Law Officers will see from the copy correspondence and departmental minutes herewith (document 1) that Sir Frederick Ponsonby has communicated with the Secretary of State for Air, enquiring whether it would not be possible to have Windsor Castle and the Home Park Private made a prohibited area during their Majesties' residence at Windsor.

Certain areas have been declared prohibited areas by the Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order, 1923, as amended by subsequent orders, under the powers contained in the Air Navigation Act, 1920, and the Secretary of State desires to be advised whether Windsor Castle and such surrounding area as may be considered necessary could be declared a prohibited area, so as to make such area an area prohibited to aircraft from time to time during such times as Their Majesties may be in residence at Windsor.

As the Law Officers are no doubt aware, the International Convention for the Regulation of Aerial Navigation, which was signed in 1919 and came into force (as respects Great Britain and other signatory States who had notified their adhesion) in 1922, makes provision for the freedom of passage of aircraft of contracting States over the territory of other States, and with regard to the regulation and control of such aircraft.

Certain of the provisions of the original convention have from time to time been modified in manner provided in the convention, that is to say, through a permanent body established by the convention and known as the International Commission for Air Navigation. A print of the convention as now in force is herewith (document 2), and the Law Officers may be referred in particular to the provisions of the following articles of the convention :—

Article 1—which provides that the high contracting parties recognise that every Power has complete and exclusive sovereignty over the air space above its territory.

Article 2—which provides that each contracting State undertakes in time of peace to accord freedom of innocent passage above its territory to the aircraft of other contracting States, provided that the conditions laid down in the convention are observed.

Regulations made by a contracting State as to the admission over its territory of the aircraft of the other contracting States shall be applied without distinction of nationality.

Article 3—which provides that each contracting State is entitled, for military reasons or in the interest of public safety, to prohibit the aircraft of the other contracting States, under the penalties provided by its legislation and subject to no distinction being made in this respect between its private aircraft and those of the other contracting States, from flying over certain areas of its territory.

GENERAL.

29

In that case the locality and extent of the prohibited areas shall be published and notified beforehand to the other contracting States.

Article 4—which provides that every aircraft which finds itself above a prohibited area shall, as soon as aware of the fact, give the signal of distress provided for in paragraph 17 of Annex D, and land as soon as possible outside the prohibited area at one of the nearest aerodromes of the State unlawfully flown over.

Article 15—which provides that every aircraft of a contracting State has the right to cross the air space of another State without landing. In this case it shall follow the route fixed by the State over which the flight takes place. However, for reasons of general security it will be obliged to land if ordered to do so by means of the signals provided in Annex D.

Article 25—which provides that each contracting State undertakes to adopt measures to ensure that every aircraft flying above the limits of its territory, and every aircraft wherever it may be, carrying its nationality mark, shall comply with the regulations contained in Annex D.

Each of the contracting States undertakes to ensure the prosecution and punishment of all persons contravening these regulations.

And article 34—which deals with the constitution and duties of the International Commission for Air Navigation above referred to.

The Air Navigation Act, 1920, which received the Royal assent in December 1920, is described as “An Act to enable effect to be given to a convention for regulating air navigation and to make further provision for the control and regulation of aviation,” and in the preamble (after reference to the convention) it is recited that it is expedient to make further provision for controlling and regulating the navigation of aircraft, whether British or foreign, within the limits of His Majesty's jurisdiction, and that it is also expedient that provision should be made by Parliament for enabling effect to be given to the convention.

Section 1 of the Act provides that His Majesty may make such Orders in Council as appear to him necessary for carrying out the convention, and for giving effect thereto or to any of the provisions thereof, or to any amendments which may be made under article 34 thereof.

Section 2 provides that His Majesty may by Order in Council direct that the provisions of the convention for the time being in force, or any of them, shall apply to or in relation to any aircraft in or over the British islands or the territorial waters adjacent thereto, and may make such consequential and supplementary provisions as appear necessary or expedient for the purpose of such application.

Section 3 provides that, without prejudice to the generality of the powers thereinbefore conferred, an Order in Council under Part I of the Act may make provision for certain specified matters, among which the Law Officers' attention may perhaps be directed in particular to (j) supplementing the convention in such manner as appears necessary or expedient by general safety regulations; and (m) for the imposition of penalties . . . to secure compliance with the order or the convention, . . . and authorising any steps to be taken for preventing aircraft from flying over prohibited areas or entering the British islands in contravention of the order or the convention, which were authorised to be taken under section 2 of the Aerial Navigation Act, 1913, for the purposes of that section.

[NOTE.—Section 2 of the Aerial Navigation Act, 1913, provides that, if an aircraft flies or attempts to fly over any area prescribed under that Act for the purposes of the defence or safety of the realm, . . . it shall be lawful for any officer designated for the purpose by regulations made by the Secretary of State to cause such signal as may be prescribed by those regulations to be given, and if after such signal has been given the aircraft fails to respond to the signal by complying with such regulations as may be made by the Secretary of State prescribing the action to be taken on such a signal being given, it shall be lawful for the officer to fire at or into such aircraft, and to use any and every other means necessary to compel compliance. . . .]

Section 17 of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, should be referred to as containing provisions as to Orders in Council under the Act.

Orders in Council dealing with air navigation under the powers conferred by the Air Navigation Act, 1920, have been made from time to time. The orders at present in force (so far as material) are the Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order, 1923, as amended by further orders. A copy of these orders in consolidated form is herewith (document 3).

The Law Officers' attention is directed to article 6 of the Consolidated Order, which provides that the provisions in Schedules I to VIII inclusive to the order shall have effect as part of the order, and shall be duly observed by all persons concerned in the cases to which they apply; and to Schedule VII of the order, which makes the places named therein prohibited areas, and provides (paragraph 2) that every aircraft which finds itself above a prohibited area in contravention of the order shall, as soon as aware of the fact, give the signal of distress provided in paragraph 17 of Schedule IV, and land as soon as possible outside the prohibited area at one of the nearest aerodromes in Great Britain and Northern Ireland. Provided that it shall not, unless compelled by stress of weather or other unavoidable cause, fly further into the prohibited area, nor commence to descend while still above the prohibited area. And provides (paragraph 3) that to warn an aircraft that it is in the vicinity of a prohibited area . . . the signals prescribed in paragraph 18 of Schedule IV shall be used. And provides (paragraph 4) that the signals which may be given when an aircraft flies or attempts to fly over a prohibited area in contravention of the order shall be those prescribed in paragraph 19 of Schedule IV. And provides (paragraph 5) that upon the signals referred to in paragraph 4 being given, an aircraft shall immediately give the signal referred to in paragraph 2 and land in accordance with that rule. And provides (paragraph 6) that if any aircraft flies or attempts to fly over any prohibited area . . . in contravention of the order, and if after signals referred to in paragraph 4 have been given . . . the aircraft fails to respond thereto by complying . . . the officer may fire at or into such aircraft, and use any and every other means necessary to compel compliance. . . .

[NOTE.—The prohibition contained in the foregoing paragraphs of Schedule VII is apparently limited to flying at lower altitudes than 6,000 feet (see article 4 (1) (iii) of the Consolidated Order).]

The attention of the Law Officers should also be directed to paragraph 7 of Schedule VII, which contains an amendment made by the Air Navigation (Amendment) (No. 2) Order, 1929, and provides that where it is brought to the notice of the Secretary of State (a) that a large number of persons are likely to gather in any district in Great Britain and Northern Ireland for the purpose of witnessing some event of public interest, or (b) that it is intended to hold in any district in Great Britain and Northern Ireland an aircraft race or contest or exhibition of flying, the Secretary of State may, by directions,⁽¹⁾ impose such temporary restrictions on the flying of aircraft within or in the neighbourhood of that district as he may consider expedient in the interest of public safety, and no aircraft shall fly in contravention of any such directions: Provided that any such restrictions . . . shall apply to British aircraft and aircraft registered in any other contracting State without distinction.

And that any directions issued under this paragraph shall specify the area or areas to which the restrictions extend, and the time or times during which the restrictions are to be in force. . . .

And that any area specified in such directions shall during the specified time or times be deemed to be a prohibited area for the purpose of paragraphs 2, 3, 4 and 5 of Schedule VII, but not for the purposes of any other provisions of the order.

Article 27 of the Consolidated Order, which deals generally with penalties for offences under the order, provides (1) that if an aircraft flies in contravention of, or fails to comply with, the order or any provision thereof, or if in or in respect of any aircraft any act is committed which is or is deemed to be a contravention of the order or any provision thereof, the owner or hirer of the aircraft (if other than the Crown) and the pilot or commander thereof shall be deemed to have contravened or, as the case may be, failed to comply with the order.

(1) See article 30 of the Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order.

(3) That if any person contravenes or fails to comply with the order or any provision thereof he shall, on summary conviction, be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or to a fine not exceeding £200, or to both such imprisonment and fine.

And (4) that any aircraft which flies or attempts to fly over a prohibited area or enters Great Britain and Northern Ireland in contravention of the order is liable to be fired on, in accordance with the provisions of Schedule VII to the order.

In view of the express reference to the convention in the heading and preamble of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, and to the fact that Part I of the Act which contains the powers with regard to the making of Orders in Council is headed "power to apply convention", and to the specific reference in terms to the convention in sections 1 and 2, it would seem that an Order in Council made under the powers contained in sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, must not be in opposition to the definite provisions of the convention. If this is so, it would seem to follow that an Order in Council declaring an area to be a prohibited area must conform to the limits imposed by article 3 of the convention. Apart from any actual limitation which may thus be imposed upon the power of declaring a prohibited area by Order in Council under the Air Navigation Act, 1920, international comity would appear to require that the provisions of article 3 should be adhered to. It is assumed, therefore, that any Order in Council declaring a prohibited area must be limited by the provisions of article 3; the Law Officers will, however, no doubt kindly consider this aspect of the matter.

Assuming that this is the case, then the first question which appears to arise in the present case is whether an order declaring an area, such as that now contemplated, to be a prohibited area could be considered to be made "for military reasons or in the interest of public safety" as provided in article 3 of the convention. The Law Officers will observe from the minute of the 8th April, No. 6 in the copy departmental minutes and correspondence herewith (document 1—p. 4) that doubt has been felt by the Air Ministry whether the present purpose could be regarded as coming within the terms of article 3. The expression "for military reasons" must, it is submitted, clearly be taken to mean reasons of a military or defensive nature and it might be contended that the words which follow "in the interest of public safety" were intended to have a corresponding meaning, namely, the defensive security of the State. If reference is made to the French text of the convention, it will be observed that the expression used is "dans l'intérêt de la sécurité publique." The Law Officers will observe, however, from the provisions of paragraph 7 of Schedule VII in the Consolidated Order that the view appears to have been taken that "public safety" includes the safety or security of the "public," that is to say, persons who may be present at, or resort to, the place which is made a prohibited area and is not limited to public safety in the narrower sense of the military security of the State, but is analogous rather to the provision contained in section 3 (j) of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, empowering the making of "general safety regulations."

Even, however, if a narrower sense must be given to the expression "public safety," it does, it is submitted, seem that it might be argued with some force that to prohibit the access of aircraft, which it must be remembered includes not only British aircraft but foreign aircraft from all over Europe, to the Royal residences, where the King may presumably be present at any time and in some cases will be present the greater part of the time, may properly be regarded as a military or defensive purpose, or at any rate in the interest of the public safety within the meaning of those words in article 3.

The question is perhaps one of first impression, with regard to which it is not of much assistance to elaborate arguments, but this appears to be the important point in the present case for the decision of the Law Officers.

Assuming that the Law Officers should be of opinion that the declaration of an area, such as is now proposed, to be a prohibited area is within the powers conferred by the Air Navigation Act, 1920, it would seem to follow that if the area is to be declared to be a prohibited area from which aircraft are excluded from time to time only and not at all times, it will be necessary that the periods at which aircraft are excluded should be definitely fixed, and fixed in such a manner that foreign aircraft arriving from places outside the British islands may be able to know beforehand whether the area is, or is not, closed at any particular time. This might make it inexpedient to use any indefinite expressions, such as "when the Court is in residence," and might make it necessary to fix specific dates for the notification of which machinery would presumably have to be devised and provided for in the Order.

This aspect of the matter has not yet been investigated, but presumably it could be carried out on some such lines as those adopted in paragraph 7 of Schedule VII of the Consolidated Order. In case, however, any difficulty should arise with regard to this or for any other reason it should be desired to declare the area to be a prohibited area permanently and at all times and not only when the Court is in residence at Windsor, it is desired that the Law Officers should extend their opinion, if they will kindly do so, to that state of circumstances also, viz., the making of an Order in Council declaring the area to be a prohibited area at all times (as in the case of the other prohibited areas named in paragraph 1 of Schedule VII of the Consolidated Order).

This is the second question upon which the advice of the Law Officers is desired.

It is perhaps desirable that it should be brought to the notice of the Law Officers that article 3 of the convention is in process of being amended. The proposed amendment has been approved by the International Commission for Air Navigation and is included in a protocol of the 15th June, 1929 (document 4). This protocol has not, however, yet been ratified by all the States concerned, and it is not anticipated that the ratification will be completed very immediately.

The proposed amendment does not involve any alteration in the existing first paragraph of article 3 (which is the material paragraph in the present case), but it provides for the inclusion in article 3 of a further paragraph to the following effect:—

"Each contracting State reserves also the right in exceptional circumstances in time of peace and with immediate effect temporarily to restrict or prohibit flight over its territory or over part of its territory, on condition that such restriction or prohibition shall be applicable without distinction of nationality to the aircraft of all the other States. Such decision shall be published, notified to all the contracting States and communicated to the International Commission for Air Navigation." (A print of the protocol is herewith, in which the amendment is shown on p. 3.)

Inasmuch as this amendment is not yet in force and if and when brought into operation it would apparently be applicable only to temporary restriction or prohibition of flight in exceptional circumstances, it would not seem that it can affect the question now submitted to the Law Officers in any way. It is, however, thought that the Law Officers should be made aware of the existence of and the present position with regard to this amendment of article 3 of the convention.

In the event of the Law Officers being of opinion that there is no power under the Air Navigation Act to declare by Order in Council the precincts of Windsor Castle a prohibited area from which all aircraft are excluded, it is desired by the Secretary of State that the Law Officers should, if they will kindly do so, also advise on the further question of what remedy (if any) there is to prevent airmen from flying over the land in question. In particular, the land in question being the property of the Crown, whether the Air Navigation Act, 1920, and the International Convention for the Regulation of Aerial Navigation, or either of them, affect such Crown land or authorise airmen to fly over it, and if not, what summary remedy exists to prevent airmen from flying over such Crown land without permission from the Crown. If there is no summary remedy available, whether a notice such as that issued by the Air Council on the 2nd April, 1931, is the best effective way of preventing airmen from flying over the land in question, or, alternatively, whether it would be within the power of the Secretary of State or the Air Council to issue some more effective warning or notice other than the declaration of a prohibited area under an Order in Council.

The points above referred to constitute the third question upon which the advice of the Law Officers is desired.

In reference to the third question, it may be stated that, as the Law Officers will observe from the copy correspondence and departmental minutes herewith (document 1), immediately on the receipt of Sir Frederick Ponsonby's letter of the 30th March, 1931, a notice to airmen was issued on the 2nd April in the name of the Air Council, requesting pilots to refrain from flying, during the residence of the Crown at Windsor Castle, above an area named in the notice (see copy correspondence and departmental minutes, document 1, p. 13).

As the Law Officers will observe, this notice is issued as one of a series. It is the practice of the Air Ministry from time to time to issue notices to airmen dealing with matters which it is material for airmen to know. Such notices are not issued in pursuance of any specific authority or provision of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, or the regulations made by Order in Council thereunder, and do not therefore appear to have of themselves the effect of imposing any binding obligation upon airmen to obey or have regard to the matters with which they deal, except in so far as they may (as the Treasury Solicitor understands they sometimes do) refer to regulations or directions made or given under the provisions of the Air Navigation Act and the regulations made thereunder, which are binding.

By section 6 of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, it is provided that the purposes of the Air Council established under the Air Force (Constitution) Act, 1917, shall extend so as to include all matters connected with Air Navigation, and the Treasury Solicitor understands that notices to airmen are regarded as issued under the general authority of the Air Council so to supervise air navigation.

The area which it is desired should be made a prohibited area for aircraft, consisting of Windsor Castle and the Home Park Private, is the property of the Crown under the management and control of the Commissioners of Crown Lands. The first point which arises for consideration in connexion with the third question appears to be how far the flight of aircraft thereover would be a trespass which could be restrained by virtue of the Crown's ownership in the land in the same way as trespass to land can be restrained by the Crown or any other landowner in ordinary circumstances.

As the Law Officers may be aware, in the early part of 1920, in connexion with the preparation of the Bill which subsequently became the Air Navigation Act, 1920, the Law Officers of the day were asked to advise upon the question of trespass and nuisance arising from the flight of aircraft over land in the ordinary law and as between subject and subject.

The Law Officers advised that the principle that ownership of the soil carried with it ownership of the space above it to an undefined distance upward was so well established that it would, in their opinion, be applied to cases of aircraft, with the result that the flight of aircraft over land in private ownership would be held to constitute a trespass irrespective of the height at which the flight took place. That no means existed of restraining such a trespass except an injunction, and that the granting of an injunction was discretionary. To obtain an injunction the owner or tenant of the land would have to satisfy the court that the defendant purposed, unless restrained, to fly over the plaintiff's land, and that an injunction should properly be granted. The height at which the threatened flight was likely to be made, therefore, became material. The court might refuse to restrain by injunction flight at such a height as to constitute a purely technical invasion of the plaintiff's rights. That an action would lie for nuisance in respect of the flight of aircraft, if either by reason of the danger or of the annoyance caused by their flight or by the crowds they collected or otherwise by their use any occupier of property has his convenience unreasonably curtailed.

The Law Officers added that they doubted whether it was intended to do more by articles 2 and 15 of the International Air Navigation Convention than to undertake that the State should impose no restriction on the innocent passage of the foreign aircraft in question above its territory. But the language of the article was open to the wider interpretation, and it would obviously be undesirable that aircraft belonging to contracting Powers passing over the country with the assent of the Crown should be liable even technically to actions for trespass at the suit of individuals, and, generally, that in their view it was desirable that the question of law involved should be dealt with by legislation (see opinion of the Law Officers of the 31st March, 1920—papers herewith) (document 5).

As a result of this opinion provision was made in the Air Navigation Act, 1920, to deal with the matter.

Section 9 (1) of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, provides "that no action shall lie in respect of trespass or in respect of nuisance, by reason only of the flight of aircraft over any property at a height above the ground which, having regard to wind, weather, and all the circumstances of the case, is reasonable, or the ordinary incidents of such flight, so long as the provisions of the Act and any order made thereunder and of the convention are duly complied with; but where material damage or loss is caused by an aircraft in flight, taking off, or landing, or by any person in any such aircraft, or by any article falling from any such aircraft, to any person or property on land or water, damages shall be recoverable from the owner of the aircraft.

Attention should perhaps be directed to the provisions of section 10, which provide for the imposition of fine or imprisonment on summary conviction where an aircraft is flown in such a manner as to be the cause of unnecessary danger to any person or property on land or water.

By section 18 (1) of the Act it is provided that the Act shall not apply to aircraft belonging to or exclusively employed in the service of His Majesty: Provided that His Majesty may, by Order in Council, apply to any such aircraft, with or without modification, any of the provisions of the Act, or of any orders or regulations made thereunder.

As indicated in the minute of the 20th April of Parliamentary Counsel (copy correspondence and departmental minutes, document 1, p. 11), while the position of Crown aircraft, and, in particular, aircraft of the Royal Air Force, was discussed during the preparation and passage of the Bill, so far as the Treasury Solicitor is aware the question whether section 9 might in any way affect the rights of the Crown in respect of the flight of aircraft over Crown land was not considered. Nor so far as the Treasury Solicitor is aware has the question hitherto received consideration since the passing of the Act.

Some consideration has been given to the position of Royal Air Force aircraft in relation to section 9, and in this connexion it may be convenient to state that in 1922 the Law Officers of the day were asked to advise, and advised very fully, as to the position of the pilots of R.A.F. aircraft against whom (in the particular case) complaints had been made of low flying over private property adjoining the aerodrome of the Royal Aircraft establishment at Farnborough (opinions of the Law Officers of the 18th and the 10th May, 1922, in the case of Mrs. Jessep's claim).

It is not thought necessary to trouble the Law Officers by including the papers relating to Mrs. Jessep's claim herewith, in view of the questions with which these opinions deal, but the case is mentioned because among the papers placed before the Law Officers with the case was the minute by Sir John Mellor which is referred to in Mr. Stainton's minute of the 20th April, and other minutes and memoranda with reference to the consideration which was given to the position of Crown aircraft in relation to clauses (now sections 9 and 10) during the passage of the Air Navigation Bill in 1920.

Although, as the Law Officers may recollect, from papers which have been recently before them with regard to the form of an Order in Council applying section 9 of the Act to Crown aircraft, while the question of so applying section 9 has been under consideration, no Order in Council has yet been made so applying this section, except to the limited extent to which it is applied by article 26 of the Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order, 1923, which does not include "military aircraft" as defined in article 31 (1).

Turning to the provisions of section 9 (1) of the Air Navigation Act, the section does not purport to alter the law by providing that flight of aircraft shall no longer constitute a trespass (or nuisance), but it provides that no action shall lie in respect of trespass (or nuisance) by reason only of the flight at a height which is reasonable, provided the provisions of the Act, any Order in Council and the convention are complied with. In return for this limitation upon the enforcement of the common law right of the landowner, a special remedy is given against the owner of the aircraft in respect of damage or loss caused by the aircraft.

The question seems to be whether this limitation upon the common law right of action applies to the Crown in the case of Crown land being flown over.

The general rule with regard to statutes binding the Crown has been stated in the text books to be that the Crown is not bound unless named either expressly or by necessary implication.

The Law Officers may, perhaps, be referred to a statement of the rule in Bacon's Abridgement: "That where an Act of Parliament is made for the public good, the advancement of religion and justice or to prevent injury and wrong, the King shall be bound by such Act, though not particularly named therein. But where a statute is general and thereby any prerogative, right, title or interest is divested or taken from the King, in such case the King shall not be bound unless the statute is made by express words to extend to him." (See Bacon's Abridgement, "Prerogative" E (5), 7th Ed., Vol. VI, p. 461. Reference may also be made to Comyns's Digest "Parliament" (R. 8), and Chitty on the Prerogatives of the Crown, pp. 382 and 383.)

It is submitted that the Air Navigation Act is clearly not a statute of the class of statutes for the advancement of religion and justice or the suppression of wrong referred to in Bacon's Abridgement, by which the Crown may be bound though not named, but that the statute is a statute of a general character, which can only bind the Crown if named expressly or referred to by necessary implication to be derived from the provisions of the statute itself.

The Crown is not named expressly in section 9 of the Act or elsewhere in the Act otherwise than in section 18. Section 18 (1) provides that the Act shall not apply to aircraft belonging to or exclusively employed in the service of His Majesty. Can it be said that it is to be implied from this express saving as respects Crown aircraft that the Crown is intended to be bound by the Act except in so far as the saving extends?

It is submitted that the consideration of the Law Officers that no such implication arises from the provisions of section 18. The real purpose of the section appears to be that which is to be found in the proviso, viz., that His Majesty may by Order in Council apply, with or without modification, to Crown aircraft any of the provisions of the Act or of any orders or regulations made thereunder. On this basis the provision contained in the first paragraph of sub-section (1) may, it is suggested, be regarded rather as a declaratory statement than as a substantive provision making a specific exception of Crown aircraft from provisions of the Act within which they would otherwise come.

Moreover, the provisions of section 9 (1) appear to be in the nature of a limitation upon the bringing of actions, and the Crown would not appear to be bound by such statutes as, e.g., the Statute of Frauds (see Bacon's Abridgement, p. 464; Chitty on the Prerogatives of the Crown, p. 383).

The attention of the Law Officers should also perhaps be drawn to the use in section 9 (1) of the expression "no action shall lie," inasmuch as this expression does not appear to be appropriate to proceedings by or on behalf of the Crown in respect of trespass to Crown lands, which would presumably have to be by information by the Attorney-General.

The point is raised in Parliamentary Counsel's minute of the 20th April in regard to the difficulty which might arise if aircraft are to be excluded from the large areas of Crown land in the country, and that the position that the Crown is not bound by section 9 (1) of the Act might be inconsistent with article 2 of the convention. Section 9 does not, however, legalise trespass by aircraft; it only prevents proceedings from being taken in respect of flight of aircraft at a reasonable height and subject to the observance of the provisions of the Act, any Order in Council and the convention. In the case of the Crown, however, if and so far as it may be necessary in order to implement and observe the convention, and in particular the freedom of innocent passage accorded to aircraft of other contracting States by article 2, it would be open to the Crown to submit so far as necessary to the technical trespass without objection. There would seem to be no necessity to legislate to enable the Crown to do this, nor does there seem, it is submitted, to be any necessity on this ground that the Crown should strip itself by legislation of the right to restrain flights over Crown land. The reason for legislation such as that contained in section 9 (1) of the Act which exists in the case of subjects, viz., to prevent action by subjects which would be inconsistent with what the Crown had undertaken to do by the convention, does not exist in the case of the Crown itself.

The fact that the Crown raises no objection in respect to technical trespass to Crown land by flight of aircraft in the case, e.g., of foreshore, and the large areas of land owned by the Crown in various parts of the country, would not, it is submitted, prevent the Crown from forbidding flight over certain special areas of Crown property which the Crown wished to reserve. The exercise of the right to forbid flight over such areas to a reasonable extent would, it is suggested, not be inconsistent with the convention, as it would leave the general right of innocent passage quite unaffected in substance and in practical effect, though this is perhaps rather a matter of policy and international comity than law.

It is further submitted that unless the Crown is bound by section 9 of the Act, and that section affords legal justification to any airman who trespasses upon Crown land by flying over it, no airman so trespassing could justify the trespass before the courts of this country administering the municipal law of this country by reference to the provisions of the International Convention. The provisions of the convention may be relevant (with other factors) to the consideration of the question whether or not there is any implication that the Crown is bound by section 9 of the Act, but, if the Crown is not so bound, the provisions of the convention cease, it is submitted, to be any further relevant to the question whether or not the flight has amounted to a trespass under the law of this country.

Assuming, as is submitted is the case, that the Crown is not bound by section 9 (1) of the Act, the next point which appears to require consideration in connexion with the third question appears to be with regard to the nature of the remedy which the Crown would have in respect of trespass by aircraft over the land in question.

Windsor Castle and the Home Park is vested in the Crown and is under the management and control of the Commissioners of Crown Lands. It has not been thought necessary at the present stage, having regard to the urgency of the matter, to consult the Commissioners of Crown Lands with regard to the matter. The Treasury Solicitor believes, however, that in the event of trespass to Crown Lands in the charge of the Commissioners of Crown Lands, proceedings against the trespasser would usually be by information by the Attorney-General, as has already been indicated.

No damages would presumably be recoverable in a case such as that under consideration, inasmuch as no damage in the legal sense would have been suffered; the only remedy which the court would be able to afford would therefore appear to be an injunction restraining the offending pilot or any persons under whose directions he was acting from any further acts of trespass.

It would hardly seem that proceedings of this nature would afford a remedy such as could be regarded as a "summary" remedy, since the ordinary procedure of the issue and service of a subpoena would have to be followed, and some time might elapse before the matter could be brought before the court.

The attention of the Law Officers should perhaps be drawn to the provisions of section 14 (2) of the Air Navigation Act, which provides that His Majesty may by Order in Council make provision as to the courts in which proceedings may be taken for enforcing any claim under the Act or any other claim in respect of aircraft, and in particular may provide for conferring jurisdiction in any such proceedings on any court exercising Admiralty jurisdiction. This power has been exercised by Order in Council of the 10th August, 1921, but this order appears to relate only to claims in respect of wreck and salvage under section 11 of the Air Navigation Act, and it does not appear to affect procedure with regard to claims in respect of trespass by aircraft. A copy of this Order in Council will be found with the copy of the Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order herewith.

Proceedings under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts (see Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, section 51) can be taken under section 10 (1) of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, in respect of dangerous flying, and under article 27 of the Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order, 1923, in respect of contravention of or non-compliance with any of the provisions of the order, and under section 14 (1) of the Act any offence under the Act or an Order in Council or regulations made thereunder, and any offence whatever committed on a British aircraft, shall for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction be deemed to have been committed in any place where the offender may for the time being be, but the Treasury Solicitor is not aware of any statutory provision which would enable summary proceedings to be taken in respect of trespass to land.

With regard to the query raised alternatively in the final portion of the third question with regard to the issue of some more effective warning or notice than that which has already been issued (but other than the declaration of a prohibited area), there does not appear to be any provision of the Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order, 1923, which provides for the issue of any such warning or notice, and the breach of which could consequently be regarded as a contravention or non-observance of the order. Nor would the issue of such a warning or notice seem to come within the objects indicated in (a) to (m) of section 3 of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, as objects or purposes in respect of which regulations may be made by Order in Council. The Law Officers will, however, no doubt kindly take into consideration the provisions of sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Air Navigation Act, and of section 6 of the Air Navigation Act (which extends the purposes of the Air Council to include all matters connected with air navigation), so far as they may consider relevant in connexion with this question.

The Law Officers are requested to advise the Secretary of State—

1. Whether or not there is power under the provisions of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, to declare by Order in Council or otherwise Windsor Castle and the Home Park Private or other the required area in the vicinity of Windsor Castle to be a prohibited area during their Majesties' residence at Windsor, as desired in Sir Frederick Ponsonby's letter of the 30th March, 1931, and to prohibit under penalties prescribed or to be prescribed the flight of aircraft thereover.
2. If the answer to question 1 should be in the affirmative, whether such area can equally (if so desired) be declared to be a prohibited area permanently and at all times.
3. If the answer to question 1 is in the negative, what remedy (if any) is there to prevent airmen from flying over the land in question?
The land in question being the property of the Crown, does the Act of 1920, and the convention of 1922, or either of them, affect it or authorise airmen to fly over it?
If not, what summary remedy is there to prevent airmen from flying over such land without permission from the Crown?
If there is no summary remedy, is a notice such as that issued by the Air Council on the 2nd April, 1931, the best effective way of warding off airmen? or, alternatively, is it within the power of the Secretary of State or the Air Council to issue some more effective warning or notice other than the declaration of a prohibited area under an Order in Council? and
4. Generally upon the case.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

1. No. In our opinion, any Order in Council issued under the Air Navigation Act, 1920, Part I, must be such as to give effect to the convention. Article 3 of the convention provides for the creation of prohibited areas "for military reasons or in the interest of public safety." In our view, the suggested prohibition cannot properly be said to be either "for military reasons" or "in the interest of public safety."

We have considered the possibility of using the power of the Secretary of State to issue directions under paragraph 7 of Schedule VII, and also that given by paragraph 30 of the Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order, but are of opinion that these powers cannot be used to deal with the question under consideration.

The proposed amendment to article 3 of the convention, if and when it comes into operation, will not alter the position, as this case does not fall within the words of the new provisions: "in exceptional circumstances."

2. In view of our answer to question 1, this does not arise.

3. We feel considerable doubt as to whether or not the Act of 1920 is binding on the Crown, even though not expressly mentioned. The argument that the Crown must be bound by necessary implication by the statute giving effect to a convention of such a nature as this is of such force, particularly in view of the Crown's rights over the foreshore, that we feel it would be unsafe to base any line of conduct on the assumption that the Crown is not bound.

If the declaration of Windsor Castle as a prohibited area were to be justified upon such grounds, it would necessarily involve the enunciation of the proposition that no Crown land, whether in its nature public or private, had been subjected to the convention. Such a proposition might be regarded by foreign Powers as a breach of faith. Therefore we are of opinion that the present problem is one which ought to be dealt with by the convention itself, and that steps should be taken to secure amendment of the convention and the insertion in article 3 of a power to prohibit aircraft from flying over the residence of the Sovereign or other head of a State. This would, of course, have to be followed by an amendment to the Act of 1920.

1931

38

GENERAL.

Until that can be done, we are of opinion that a notice such as that issued by the Air Council on the 2nd April, 1931, is the most effective way of warding off airmen, and we do not think it is within the power of the Secretary of State or the Air Council to issue any other more effective warning or notice.

4. We have nothing to add.

WM. A. JOWITT.
STAFFORD CRIPPS.

*Law Officers' Department,
May 20, 1931.*

1932

THIS DOCUMENT IS THE PROPERTY OF HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office

CONFIDENTIAL

(14251)

REPORTS BY THE
LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1932

1932

(ii)

LIST OF REPORTS

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked 1^A, &c.

BELGIUM.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
1	Law Officers ..	July 15, 1932	Belgian claims for expenditure in part of former German East Africa transferred from Belgian to British administration ..	1

FINLAND.

1 ^A	Law Officers and Mr. Bowstead [Board of Trade]	April 20, 1932	Claim of Finnish Government against His Majesty's Government in respect of Finnish ships requisitioned during the war ..	13
----------------	---	----------------	--	----

FRANCE.

2	Law Officers ..	July 29, 1932	Sovereignty over uninhabited islands. Spratley Island and Amboyna Cay ..	16
---	-----------------	---------------	--	----

GENERAL.

2 ^A	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Mar. 8, 1932	Grants to mandated territories from Colonial Development Fund ..	24
2 ^B	Law Officers and Counsel [Air Ministry]	June 9, 1932	Power to make Orders in Council to give effect to Air Navigation Convention ..	25
2 ^C	Law Officers .. [Dominions Office]	July 29, 1932	Assertion of British title to part of Antarctic Continent ..	37
2 ^D	Law Officers and Counsel [Treasury Solicitor]	July 29, 1932	Jurisdiction of British courts to try foreigners committing acts of violence on high seas. Whether actual robbery is essential element of piracy ..	43

ITALY.

2 ^E	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Oct. 19, 1932	Malta: teaching of Italian and other languages ..	48
----------------	--------------------------------------	---------------	---	----

PALESTINE.

2 ^F	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Feb. 11, 1932	Imperial Preference for Palestine: whether infringement of most-favoured-nation clauses ..	52
2 ^G	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	Mar. 16, 1932	Imperial Preference for Palestine: as to bringing case before Permanent Court of International Justice. Measure of damages ..	55

(iii)

PERSIA.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
3	Law Officers ..	Dec. 7, 1932	Dispute between His Majesty's Government and Persian Government respecting Anglo-Persian Oil Company's concession: jurisdiction of Permanent Court of International Justice ..	58

SUDAN.

4	Law Officers ..	July 4, 1932	Imperial Preference for Sudan: effect of most-favoured-nation obligations ..	59
---	-----------------	--------------	--	----

[8717]

a

(iv)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS)

1932

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.

Cases cited are indicated by italics.

ACT—COL.

A.

- Act. See Air Navigation Act.
See British Settlements Act.
 Air Navigation Act: issue of Orders in Council under, to give effect to provisions of Air Navigation Convention, 25-37.
 Air Navigation Convention: issue of Orders in Council to give effect to provisions of, 25-37.
 Amboyna Cay: 16-24.
 Anglo-Persian Oil Company: concession; unilateral cancellation by Persian Government, 58, 59.
 Annexation: formal act of, unnecessary, for assertion of British title to Antarctic territory, 42.
 Antarctic: assertion of British title to territory in, 37-42.
 " ditto; formal act of annexation unnecessary, 42.
 " ditto; issue of Order in Council to provide for administration of, 40-42.
 Arbitration: necessity of exhausting municipal remedies before claiming, 13-16.
 " as to referring extension of Imperial preference to Palestine to, 55, 58.
 Arctic: "sector" principle, 39, 40.

B.

- Belgium: claim against Great Britain for expenses of military occupation of former German East Africa, 1-12.
 British Settlements Act: provisions of, inappropriate in case of Antarctic territory, 41, 42.

C.

- Claims: Belgian, against Great Britain, for expenses during Belgian occupation of part of former German East Africa, subsequently transferred to Great Britain, 1-12.
 " Finnish shipowners, against His Majesty's Government, 13-16.
 " ditto; whether municipal remedies in United Kingdom exhausted, 14-16.
 Clipperton Island: French sovereignty over, 22, 24.
 Colonial Development Fund: grants from, to mandated territories, 24, 25.
 Colonies: not foreign countries within meaning of British commercial treaty articles, 60.

COM—IMP.

- Compensation: for permanent improvements effected by Power in military occupation of territory subsequently transferred to another Power, 12.
 " measure of damages, for breach of most-favoured-nation clause in commercial treaty, 57, 58, 63-65.
 Concession: of Anglo-Persian Oil Company; unilateral cancellation by Persian Government, 58, 59.
 " ditto: jurisdiction of Permanent Court of International Justice, 58, 59.
 Conferences: international, position of Sudan, 61, 71, 72.
 Convention. See Treaties.
 Courts: necessity of exhausting recourse to, in claim against His Majesty's Government, 13-16.
 " jurisdiction over foreigners for crimes on high seas, 45, 46, 48.
 " ditto; case of piracy jure gentium, 43-48.

D.

- Damages: measure of, for breach of international engagement, 57, 58, 63-65.
 Dominions: not foreign countries within meaning of British commercial treaty articles, 60.

E.

- Exchange: rate, for payment of debts, 9, 12.
 " ditto; case of compensation to Belgium for permanent improvements in former German East Africa, 9, 12.

H.

- High seas: offences committed on; jurisdiction of British courts, 45-48.

I.

- Imperial Preference: extension to Palestine, 52-54.
 " " ditto; whether breach of most-favoured-nation clauses of commercial treaties, 52-54.

IMP—MUN

- Imperial Preference: right of United Kingdom to accord to Dominions, colonies, &c., 56-58, 60.
 " for Sudan, 59-65.
 Interest: on Belgian claim against His Majesty's Government, 10, 12.
 Islands: sovereignty over uninhabited, 16-24.
 " desirability of administrative attachment to British colony or protectorate, 24.

J.

- Jurisdiction. See also Permanent Court of International Justice.
 " of British courts over crimes committed by foreigners on high seas, 43-48.
 " ditto; acts of piracy jure gentium, 43-48.

L.

- Language: teaching of Italian in Malta schools, 48-52.
 Letters Patent: whether appropriate, to place Antarctic territory under Commonwealth of Australia, 40-42.
 Loans: to mandated territories from Colonial Development Fund, 24, 25.

M.

- Malta: teaching of Italian and other languages in schools, 48-52.
 " ditto; powers under Malta constitution to control, 48-52.
 Mandated territories: grants from Colonial Development Fund, 24, 25.
 " ditto; attaching of condition as to purchase of materials in United Kingdom, 24, 25.
 Military occupation. See Occupation.
 Most-favoured-nation clause: Palestine as "foreign country" within meaning of, 53, 54.
 " form of wording of, to allow extension of Imperial Preference to Palestine, 54.
 " consequences of non-compliance with, 54.
 " as to application of, to cases of preferential treatment between parts of British Empire, 56-58, 60.
 " breach of; measure of damages, 57, 58, 63-65.
 " in British commercial treaties; position of Sudan, 60-62, 64.
 " ditto; grant of Imperial Preference to Sudan a breach of, 64.

Municipal remedies. See Claims.

6921 [8717]

OCC—SHI

O.

- Occupation: Belgian military, of German East Africa; Belgian claim for expenses against Great Britain, to whom territory was subsequently entrusted, 1-12.
 " ditto, ditto; admissibility in respect of permanent improvements, 12.
 Optional clause. See Permanent Court of International Justice.
 Order in Council: power under Air Navigation Act to issue, to give effect to provisions of Air Navigation Convention, 25-37.
 " to place certain Antarctic territory under authority of Commonwealth of Australia, 41-42.

P.

- Palestine: extension of Imperial Preference to, 52-54.
 Permanent Court of International Justice: as to referring question of extension of Imperial Preference to Palestine to, 55, 58.
 " optional clause; scope of Persian acceptance, 58, 59.
 " ditto, ditto; jurisdiction of court in Anglo-Persian dispute as to Persian cancellation of Anglo-Persian Oil Company's concession, 58, 59.
 Persia: scope of acceptance of optional clause of statute of Permanent Court of International Justice, 58, 59.
 " cancellation of Anglo-Persian Oil Company's concession, 58, 59.
 Piracy: definition, 47.
 " whether actual robbery an essential element, 47, 48.
 " offences outside 3-mile limit, 45, 46.
 Preferential treatment. See also Imperial Preference.
 " right of United Kingdom Government to accord, to Dominions, colonies, &c., 56-58, 60.
 Protectorates: not foreign countries within meaning of British commercial treaty articles, 60.

R.

- R. v. Dawson*, 47.
 Rate of Exchange. See Exchange.
Reg. v. Keyn, 45, 46.
 Reparation. See Damages.
 Requisitions: of Finnish ships, by His Majesty's Government, 13-16.
Rea v. Chung Tam Kwong, 43, 44.

S.

- Schools: Malta, teaching of Italian and other languages in, 48-52.
 Ships. See Vessels.

b

(vi)

SOV—TER

Sovereignty: acquisition of, over uninhabited islands, 16-24.
" over Spratley Island and Amboyna Cay, 16-24.
" assertion of, over Antarctic territory, 37-42.
Spratley Island, 16-24.
Storm Island. See Spratley Island.
Sudan: status, 61, 62, 64.
" grant of Imperial Preference to, 59-65.
" ditto; breach of treaty obligations, 64.
" participation in international conventions and conferences, 61, 62.

T.

Territory: acquisition of title to, 16-24, 38, 39, 42.
" Antarctic, assertion of British title, 37-42.

TER—VES

Territory: claimed in Arctic and Antarctic; "sector" principle, 39, 40.
Treaties: Air Navigation Convention; power to issue Orders in Council to give effect to, 25-37.
" commercial, measure of damages for breach of most-favoured-nation clause, 57, 58, 63-65.
" international, position of Sudan, 61, 62.
" commercial; Dominions, colonies, protectorates not foreign countries within meaning of, 60.
" see also Most-favoured-nation clause.

V.

Vessels: Finnish ships requisitioned by His Majesty's Government, 13-16.

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL

REPORTS BY THE
LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.: 1932

BELGIUM.

[W 8194/265/4/1932]

No. 1.

[July 15, 1932.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, February 25, 1932.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir John Simon, to request the favour of your advice on a question which has formed the subject of prolonged correspondence between His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and the Belgian Government, as to the amount of compensation to be paid by the former to the latter under an agreement resulting from correspondence which took place between them in the year 1919. The facts of the case are set out in the following paragraphs, and the documents therein referred to, with one exception, will be found in Colonial Office print "African 1127," of which copies are sent herewith (Paper A).

2. During the campaign in German East Africa a force of Belgian troops from the Congo acted in co-operation with the British forces, and, by the end of the war, had occupied a stretch of country extending roughly from Tabora to the eastern shores of Lake Tanganyika. After hostilities were concluded, however, the Supreme Council of Allied Powers decided that the mandate for the whole of the former German territory in East Africa should be entrusted to Great Britain. The Belgian Government protested against this decision, but no formal answer was made to their protest. Subsequently, however, the matter was discussed between the British and Belgian Governments, and an arrangement was reached, and ratified by the Supreme Council, under which Belgium gave up all the portion of German East Africa which she was occupying, except for the greater portion of Ruanda and Urundi, for which territories in due course she received a mandate.

3. The discussions leading up to this arrangement were conducted between Lord Milner (then Secretary of State for the Colonies) and M. Orts. In the course of these discussions the Belgians raised the question of a money indemnity to compensate them for giving up the territory which their troops had occupied.

4. In a letter of the 19th May, 1919, M. Orts proposed that, in view of the fact that Great Britain was to acquire the greater part of the former German territory—

"La renonciation de la Belgique doit être compensée. . . . Une Afr. 1127, indemnité pécuniaire à déterminer de commun accord par des experts choisis p 5. en nombre égal par la Belgique et la Grande-Bretagne sera attribuée à la Belgique. . . ."

6921 [8717]

B

Belgian claims in respect of expenditure incurred in part of former German East Africa transferred from Belgian to British administration. Questions of rate of exchange and of interest.

In a note which accompanied this letter it was stated, in support of this proposal, that—

Afr. 1127,
p. 6.

"Il conviendrait de faire rentrer aussi dans l'indemnité à payer à la Belgique le remboursement de la quote-part des frais d'administration des territoires définitivement acquis à la Grande-Bretagne du fait de l'action militaire belge, pour autant que ces dépenses n'aient pas été imputées sur les avances des alliés dont quitus a été donné à la Belgique en vertu de l'accord financier conclu il y a quelques jours" (i.e., the decision of the Supreme War Council as to Belgian treatment in connexion with inter-Allied debts).

5. In his reply of the 26th May Lord Milner said:—

Afr. 1127,
p. 6.

"I am afraid I do not understand how any question of pecuniary compensation can arise in this matter. . . . I do not think that your withdrawal from portions of East Africa at present occupied by you, outside Ruanda and Urundi, would entitle you to compensation. . . . I contend that Belgium in receiving Ruanda and Urundi would be amply rewarded for her share in the East African campaign. It is true that in geographical extent these districts are only a small part of German East Africa, but their economic importance is out of all proportion to their size. They are healthy and fertile highlands, they contain something more than one-third of the population of the whole colony, and, according to my information, more than two-thirds of its chief economic asset—cattle. Therefore, they represent a very important share of the former German possession. It is true that they are only a part of the country actually occupied by Belgians and a still smaller part of the country at one time overrun by the Belgian forces, but, on the other hand, I may remind you that the Belgian conquest of this portion of the country, however valuable in itself (and I should be the last to belittle the importance of Belgian assistance), was only rendered possible by the fact that the transport and the greater part of the supplies were provided by Great Britain. It was, in fact, an Allied, and not a purely Belgian expedition, though I do not wish in the least to deprive Belgium of any military credit which is due to her. From a financial point of view, I am quite sure that the value of Ruanda and Urundi goes much further to indemnify Belgium for any expenses incurred by her in that expedition than the value of all the rest of East Africa ever can to indemnify Great Britain for the enormous cost of our East African campaign, not to mention what we spent in assistance to the Belgian forces co-operating with us."

6. To this letter M. Orts replied on the 30th May:—

Afr. 1127,
p. 8.

"Je regrette de n'avoir pu vous amener à reconnaître la légitimité de la demande d'indemnité pécuniaire faite par la Belgique. En présence du refus formel que vous avez opposé à cette demande, la délégation belge renonce à insister. Mais l'Administration belge a effectué au cours des trois dernières années à Kigoma et ailleurs des dépenses qui se sont traduites en améliorations permanentes. Le profit en restera à l'Administration britannique, c'est pourquoi il n'est que juste que ces dépenses soient remboursées à la Belgique."

"Cependant, je suis prêt à recommander à mon Gouvernement qu'aucun compte ne soit présenté à ce sujet ni aucun autre compte, non encore liquidé, pour des services d'ordre militaire rendus aux autorités britanniques dans l'Est-Africain si du côté anglais l'on renonce à exiger le paiement des comptes non liquidés pour des services d'ordre militaire rendus à la Belgique à l'occasion des campagnes de l'Est-Africain."

7. To this Lord Milner replied on the 31st May:—

"I note with satisfaction that you withdraw the demand for a pecuniary compensation to Belgium in respect of that part of the territory at present occupied by her which you will have to evacuate. It would have been quite impossible for me to consent to such a proposal."

"On the other hand, I have always recognised that Belgium might claim to be indemnified for the cost of any permanent improvements effected in the territory hitherto occupied by her, but now to be transferred to Great Britain. You say, however, that you are willing to advise your Government not to make any claim on this score or for any military expenses incurred by you in East Africa on British account, which have not yet been settled, provided we make no claim for similar expenses still unsettled incurred by us on your account. Personally, I think it most desirable to get rid of all these claims and counter-claims, none of which can be of great amount, and, while I cannot commit myself on the point without consulting the British Treasury and War Office, I will do my best to bring about an arrangement on the lines you suggest."

8. This concluded the correspondence between Lord Milner and M. Orts, which constitutes the so-called "Milner-Orts Agreement," and invokes an undertaking by His Majesty's Government to "indemnify" Belgium "for the cost of any permanent improvements effected in the territory" in question. A few days later the British and Belgian Governments made a joint recommendation to the Supreme Council for the partition of German East Africa in the manner agreed between Lord Milner and M. Orts, and the Council approved it. In 1920 a Belgian delegation arrived in London to implement the arrangements come to with regard to the division of the territory. This resulted in due course in the signature, on the 15th March, 1921, of an Anglo-Belgian Traffic Convention giving the Belgians special facilities at Dar-es-Salaam and Kigoma for through Belgian traffic on the central railway, and, on the same day, the transfer of Kigoma and the adjacent territory to the control of the Tanganyika Government.

9. In the course of these negotiations it was discovered that the War Office claim against the Belgian Government in respect of East African military expenditure had already been settled, and it was therefore impossible to give effect to the suggestion of M. Orts, in his letter of the 30th May, 1919, that this claim should cancel out the Belgian claim for "permanent improvements." It was therefore agreed that this question of compensation for permanent improvements was still outstanding and should be settled as soon as possible.

10. On the 17th December, 1920, the Belgian Foreign Minister addressed a note to the British Ambassador at Brussels, stating that the Belgian Government were ready to hand over the territories which they were to transfer. The note added that it would be necessary, however, as a preliminary, for delegates of the two Governments to draw up an inventory showing the expenditure of the Belgian Government in the territories to be ceded, the benefit of which expenditure would remain to the British authorities; Lord Milner and M. Orts had undertaken to recommend to their respective Governments that they should produce vouchers for expenditure which they had a right to recover in connexion with the African campaign and the provisional occupation of East Africa.

11. On the 26th February, 1921, the Governor of Tanganyika was informed by telegram that it would be necessary for delegates of the two Governments to draw up an inventory jointly showing the expenditure incurred by Belgium on works of permanent improvement in the transferred territory, and was requested to arrange accordingly with the local Belgian authorities. Afr. 1127, p. 13.

12. On the 19th December, 1922, the Governor reported that claims had been received from the Belgian authorities in respect of the works of permanent improvement, and forwarded copies. The claims amounted to 323,617·95 fr. in respect of non-railway works, and 1,026,960·18 fr. in respect of improvements to the railway. The letters from the Belgian Commissaire Royal enclosing these claims were dated the 17th October, 1921, and the 30th November, 1921, respectively. Afr. 1127, p. 23.

13. The Governor explained in his despatch that for various reasons he was unable to accept either figure, and he drew attention to the fact that the Commissaire Royal had added 100 per cent. to the second claim to compensate for the depreciation of the Congo currency since the date when the expenditure was incurred. The despatch stated: "While it may not be possible to withhold some compensation on this account, I have considered it wise to reject the proposal in the first instance, and thereafter to leave the question for settlement by arrangement between the British and Belgian Governments."

14. In reply to this telegram, the Secretary of State pointed out (the 29th January, 1923) to the Governor that the arrangement made with the Belgian Government was that delegates of the two Governments should draw up an inventory jointly, and asked that this should be done with a view to the revision

Afr. 1127, p. 32. of claims already furnished and the submission of a more agreed figure. This was followed by a despatch to the Governor, dated the 28th February, 1923, in which the view was expressed that the intention underlying the agreement reached by the British and Belgian Governments was that the payment to be made to Belgium should represent the actual value at the time of transfer to British administration of the works and permanent improvements, as agreed by local British and Belgian delegates. From this aspect the amounts spent originally on the works, on which the Belgian claims had been based, were immaterial. The Secretary of State also considered that the valuation should be made in francs, and payment made to the Belgian Government in francs at the current rate of exchange.

Afr. 1127, p. 36. 15. On the 30th June, 1923, the Governor forwarded a memorandum setting out the history of the Belgian claim, the reasons for which he was unable to accept it as it stood, and details of the revision proposed. This memorandum formed the basis of a note which was addressed to the Belgian Ambassador on the 31st August, and in which it is to be noted it was definitely stated (following the line taken in the despatch to the Governor of the 28th February, 1923) that the basis of the compensation payable was to be the actual value of the improvements at the time of the transfer of the territory to British administration.

Afr. 1127, p. 46. 16. The Belgian claim (details of which will be found on pp. 38-41 of Afr. 1127), as summarised in the note, and the attitude of His Majesty's Government upon it, were as follows:—

Claim A.—Works and Improvements other than Railway.

	Fr.
A (1)	130,000
A (2)	143,500
A (3)	6,500
A (4)	43,617-95
	323,617-95

His Majesty's Government were unable to accept Claims A (2) and A (3) in their entirety, and considered that the total of Claim A should be reduced to 220,367-95 fr.

Claim B.—Claims in respect of Railways.

	Fr.
B (1). Works and improvements ...	673,035-88
B (2). Materials and implements handed over ...	353,924-30

Claim B (1) was disputed on certain points of detail, while Claim B (2) was rejected in its entirety, except for 60,000 fr., on the ground that the stores, &c., in question were largely the property of contractors or of the old German East African Railway Company, and would be dealt with in accordance with article 297 of the Treaty of Versailles. In addition, part of the material claimed for in B (2) was included in the Kigoma workshops, for which a claim was made in B (1). His Majesty's Government were therefore only able to agree to claims under B as follows:—

	Fr.
B (1)	394,931-85
B (2)	60,000-00
	454,931-85

Total accepted by His Majesty's Government:—

	Fr.
A	220,367-95
B	454,931-85
	675,299-80

17. As regards the question of exchange compensation, the Belgians, in submitting Claim A, proposed payment on the basis of 25-50 fr. to the pound, on the ground that the money claimed had been spent when the franc was "au pair avec la livre sterling." In submitting Claim B, they had added 100 per cent. to the claim for exchange compensation. His Majesty's Government now pointed out that the expenditure was incurred in francs, and they saw no reason why reimbursement should be made on any other basis than that of franc for franc. His Majesty's Government accordingly urged that the Belgian Government should accept a round sum of 680,000 fr. in full in final settlement of the claims.

18. In the meantime, the Governor had cabled to say that the Belgian authorities had amended their claim, and now demanded 851,800 fr. only, as against 1,350,578-13 fr. previously demanded. In forwarding, in a despatch dated the 28th August, 1923, particulars of the amendments, the Governor pointed out that the reduction considerably strengthened the case for offering only 680,000 fr. Though the telegram was received before the issue of the Foreign Office note of the 31st August, 1923, it was decided not to complicate matters by referring in the note to this new point.

19. Though reminders were addressed to the Belgian Government from time to time, no reply was received to the Foreign Office note until on the 3rd January, 1928, the Belgian Ambassador in London addressed a note (dated in error the 3rd January, 1927) to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, enclosing a memorandum containing the reply of the Belgian Foreign Office to the British Government's proposals. This reply may be summarised as follows:—

I.—Original Claim.

Claim A—	Fr.
A (1). Accepted by both sides ...	130,000
A (2). Reduction proposed by Great Britain now accepted by Belgium ...	45,000
A (3). Belgian Government now agree to reduced figure of ...	5,150
A (4). Accepted by both sides (included 11,064-08 fr. for "approvisionnement- ments"). See African 1127, p. 28 at foot ...	43,617-95
	223,767-95

Payment was claimed in sterling at 25-50 fr. to the pound, except for the item for "approvisionnements," which was claimed at 50 fr. to the pound.

Claim B—	Fr.
B (1). Belgium adheres to the original claim ...	673,035-88
B (2). Belgium agrees to the British reduction to ...	60,000
	733,035-88

This was claimed as to B (1) at 25-50 fr. to the pound, and as to B (2) at 50 fr.

No mention was made of the modified claim received by the Governor of Tanganyika in 1923 for 851,000 fr. in respect of A and B.

Claim C.

The Belgians added a further claim in respect of three houses at Kigoma handed over in 1925: 67,059-50 fr. at 25-50 fr. to the pound.

NEW CLAIMS PUT FORWARD BY BELGIUM IN 1928.

II.—Administrative Deficits ("Déficits de Gestion").

The Belgians claimed that, in equity Great Britain should reimburse them for losses incurred in the administration of the occupied territory, on the ground that, had we administered the territory from the start, we should have had to

Afr. 1127, p. 45.

Afr. 1127, p. 48.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

Afr. 1127, p. 55.

bear the same deficits, which "corresponded, in a way," to works of improvement. They said, "Les dépenses faites sont le résultat d'une espèce de gestion d'affaires."

The claim was:—

	Fr.
(A) Tanganyika Marine	865,887.72
Kigoma-Tabora Railway	2,309,424.80
Kigoma Hospital	278,752.32
	3,454,064.84
(B) Losses on the occupied territory up to the 31st December, 1920	4,923,605.48

At 25.50 fr. to the pound, this claim amounted to £328,536 0s. 10d.

III.—Compensation to Individuals for War Damage.

The Belgians also claimed the reimbursement of sums paid by the Commission de Liquidation to individuals in the transferred territory whose property was damaged in the war. The commission was said to have been instituted at the request of the British authorities.

20. The total Belgian demand was thus largely swollen by these "new claims" and now stood at:—

Old claim—	Fr.	£	s.	d.
A (at 25.50 fr., except for 11,064.08 fr. at 50 fr.)	223,767.95	8,562	12	1
B (1) (at 25.50 fr.)	673,035.88	26,393	11	3
B (2) (at 50 fr.)	60,000	1,200	0	0
C	67,059.50	2,629	15	8
II.—Administrative deficits	8,377,670.32	328,536	0	10
III.—Compensation for War Damage	796,178.55	39,761	19	10
Total claim	10,415,464.47	407,084	0	8

As against this, Belgium allowed £1,883 3s. in respect of works of permanent improvement by Great Britain at Kisaka, which was handed back to Belgium. The net claim was, therefore, for £405,202 17s. 8d.

Afr. 1127,
p. 60.

21. On the exchange question, the Belgian memorandum rejected the principle that payment should be made in francs at the rate current at the time of payment. The rates of conversion proposed (25.50 fr. and in two cases 50 fr.) by the Belgian Commissaire Royal were intended to take account of the depreciation of the franc between the time when the expenses claimed for were incurred, and the time of making the claim. The Belgian Government had now, however, decided to present the claim in sterling only, a method which "corresponded with law and equity." (This was, of course, before the depreciation of sterling in terms of gold.)

Afr. 1127,
p. 68.

22. In a note addressed to the Belgian Ambassador on the 2nd March, 1928, His Majesty's Government categorically rejected both the new claims, on the ground that in the Milner-Orts correspondence in 1919 it had been decided to exclude any question of compensation other than for "works of permanent improvement." As regards the "old claim," it was stated that His Majesty's Government would examine this once again. The "old claim" was referred to the Governor for further enquiry in a despatch dated the 16th March, 1928.

23. In a note dated the 2nd August, 1928, the Belgian Government adduced further arguments in support of their "new claims." They contended:—

- (i) That the Orts-Milner correspondence related only to charges existing at the time, and could not be held to exclude consideration of charges which did not exist at that time, e.g., the payments made, in compensation for war damage. (Claim III.)

- (ii) That the effect of the Orts-Milner correspondence was that M. Orts had demanded monetary compensation for the value of the transferred territories; that this had been rejected, and that the two plenipotentiaries had then agreed that the two Governments should set off against each other their claims arising out of the campaign in East Africa; but as the claim of the War Office against Belgium had already been settled, the Belgian claim remained unimpaired. The promise to pay for "works of permanent improvement" was not connected with the question of compensation; it constituted one element only in the account.
- (iii) That the files of the Belgian Government showed that M. Orts had understood the term "works of permanent improvement" in a wider sense than the British Government now gave to it, and had regarded it as including "administrative deficits." In claiming reimbursement of these, the Belgian Government was acting in conformity with general principles of law. They regarded the case as similar to that of a person who administers the estate of another party, and who is entitled to be indemnified for all expenses incurred. It was difficult to imagine that Belgium should have to bear expenses incurred in the temporary occupation of territory subsequently transferred to British authority.

24. After further correspondence between the Colonial Office, the Foreign Office, and the Governor of the Tanganyika Territory, a further note was addressed to the Belgian Ambassador on the 13th March, 1929, setting out at length the reasons for which His Majesty's Government was unable to accept the contentions of the Belgian Government. The note reviewed the history of the negotiations between M. Orts and Lord Milner, and pointed out that, until the territory was handed over to Great Britain, the Belgian Government was in the position of a Power in military occupation of enemy territory. His Majesty's Government knew of no principle of international law under which, apart from agreement, a Power so situated could claim repayment of expenses incurred by it from the Power to whom the territory was eventually entrusted. The suggestion that the occupying Power was in the position of bonorum gestor was opposed to all principles laid down in regard to military occupation. Any obligation on the Power finally succeeding to the territory could arise, if at all, only from some agreement forming part of the final settlement between the two Governments. In that final settlement, the Belgians had expected to obtain (1) territorial concessions in Ruanda-Urundi; (2) a pecuniary indemnity; and (3) certain transit facilities for Belgian goods. (1) and (3) had been obtained, but (2) had been definitely rejected by Lord Milner, and M. Orts, in a letter dated the 30th May, 1919, had renounced the insistence of Belgium on this point. Lord Milner, on the 31st May, recognised the justice of a claim in respect of permanent improvements, but recognised no other ground of claim. The terms of M. Orts's letter of the 30th May, 1919, seemed to show that he had decided, in view of Lord Milner's attitude, to abandon his original standpoint, and to concentrate on the question of compensation for improvements. This assumption was borne out by the fact that no claim other than for such improvements was made in 1921, nor, in fact, until the Belgian note of the 3rd January, 1928. So far, therefore, from the Orts-Milner correspondence supporting the Belgian claim for reimbursement of administrative deficits, His Majesty's Government considered that it showed clearly that, in agreeing to the claim for permanent improvements, and the proposals mentioned under (1) and (3) above, they were completely liquidating all claims which Belgium might have. His Majesty's Government also refused to admit the Belgian contention that the Orts-Milner correspondence only dealt with claims then existing, and did not exclude claims or payments made subsequently, in particular, the payments made in respect of war damages. (Claim III.) In short, His Majesty's Government were unable to admit any claim for compensation other than for permanent improvements (i.e., the "old claim"), since (1) no obligation in international law rested upon them, and they had not voluntarily accepted any obligation except in respect of the "old claim," and (2) the "old claim" was the only category not debarred by the terms of the Milner-Orts correspondence, which they regarded as definitely settling all outstanding questions.

Afr. 1127,
p. 84.

BELGIUM.

25. As regards the "old claim," His Majesty's Government dealt with the matters on which the Belgians had been unable to accept the modifications made by the Tanganyika Government in the original claim. Their observations, in the course of which they referred to the fact that they had consistently maintained that the assessment of the works must be based upon their actual value at the time of transfer, will be found in paragraph 13 of the note. His Majesty's Government offered to pay the following sum:—

Old claim—	Claim in Belgian Note of January 3, 1928.		Now offered by His Majesty's Government.
	Fr.		Fr.
A ...	...	223,767·95	...	220,267·95
B ...	...	733,035·88	...	460,000·00
C ...	...	67,059·50	...	67,059·50
		1,023,863·33		747,327·45

In accordance with their view that the proper criterion in assessing the claim was the actual value of the works at the time of transfer, His Majesty's Government offered to pay this sum of 747,327·45 fr. in sterling at the rate of exchange ruling at the time of transfer, viz., 55 fr. to the pound (£13,587 15s. 6d.).

26. The Belgian Government replied in a note dated the 25th March, 1930 (Paper B), saying that, after careful consideration of His Majesty's Government's views, they regretted that they were unable to accept them, and that, in view of the amount at stake and of their responsibility to public opinion, they must continue to press their views. In the circumstances, they suggested that the question should be referred to a Conciliation Commission, which could examine the whole question and suggest an amicable solution. The commission might be composed of one representative of each Government, with a third jointly selected. No reply has yet been returned to this note.

27. In these circumstances, the questions now outstanding between the two Governments are as follows:—

28.—(A) The so-called "new claims," i.e., the claims made by the Belgian Government for the first time in their communication of the 3rd January, 1928, in respect of administrative deficits resulting from their administration of the occupied territory and the sums paid by the Commission de Liquidation to individuals in the transferred territory whose property was damaged in the war.—The legal arguments employed on both sides in respect of this claim are set out in the correspondence which has passed (the Belgian notes of the 3rd January, 1928, and the 2nd August, 1928, and the replies dated the 2nd March, 1928, and the 13th March, 1929), and reference may also be made to a further argument suggested in the first paragraph of a minute by the legal adviser to the Foreign Office, dated the 4th July, 1931 (Paper C). The views of the Departments concerned as to these claims are that they should be definitely rejected and that we should not agree to submit them to any form of judicial settlement; in their view, any claim of this description was categorically rejected by Lord Milner, and its rejection was accepted by M. Orts, during the negotiations which took place in 1919, and no further suggestion of any such claim was made by the Belgian Government until it was put forward in their note of the 3rd January, 1928. If, therefore, the legal arguments which have been put forward against the claim are sound, it cannot be regarded as possessing any merits in equity, and His Majesty's Government have so far successfully refused to submit to arbitration any claims arising out of the operations of the war, while the terms of their acceptance of the Optional Clause of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice, which were specifically intended to exclude war claims, would prevent the Belgian Government from bringing this claim before the Permanent Court under that clause. It should perhaps be mentioned, however, that there is some reason to believe that the Belgian Government has a more comprehensive record of the conversations in 1919 between Lord Milner and M. Orts than is in the possession of His Majesty's Government. (See the Belgian note of the 8th August, 1928, on p. 73 of African 1127.)

29.—(B) The difference in amount between the "old claim" (i.e., the claim in respect of permanent improvements, for which His Majesty's Government admit liability in principle) and the amount which His Majesty's Government are at present prepared to pay.—The Governor of Tanganyika has now recommended that the Belgian figure in respect of Claim A of the "old claim" should be accepted. The position as regards the "old claim" is, therefore, as follows:—

BELGIUM.

Claim A—	Belgian Claim. Fr.	His Majesty's Government's Figure. Fr.
Permanent improvements, non-railway ...	223,767·95	223,767·95
Claim B—
Permanent improvements, railway ...	733,035·88	460,000·00
Claim C—
Houses at Kigoma ...	67,059·50	67,059·50
	1,023,863·33	750,827·45

30. In this connexion you will observe that throughout the correspondence with the Belgian Government His Majesty's Government have maintained the contention that their obligation under the Milner-Orts Agreement was only to pay the actual value of the works of improvement at the time of the transfer. As the result, however, of subsequent consideration of the matter (see Papers D and E), the Departments concerned are now disposed to think that this contention cannot be reconciled with the terms of the Milner-Orts Agreement, and that the Belgian Government are entitled to claim the actual expenditure incurred by them on the construction of the works in question. Should you agree with this view, the difference between the Belgian and British figures will probably be reduced in so far as the Belgian Government may be able to produce evidence of their actual expenditure, and it is not thought necessary to trouble you with the details of particular items, though, from the point of view of the possibility of another attempt to reach a settlement by agreement (to which reference is made later), it may be material to observe that the difference between the contentions of the two Governments on this point may not be so great as would appear from the figures.

31.—(C) The question of the rate of exchange at which the compensation payable to the Belgian Government should be paid.—The contention which it is desired to put forward if this can be done with reasonable prospects of success is that what the Belgians are entitled to is the amount of Congo francs which they actually expended on the works in question. On this view the debt is one payable in Congo francs, and no question of conversion really arises. The Belgian claim, on the other hand, is now put forward in sterling (see paragraph 21 above), conversion being effected for the most part at the rate of 25·50 fr., and in two cases at 50 fr. It will be observed, however, that, in their note of the 13th March, 1929, His Majesty's Government offered to pay the sum of 747,327·45 fr., at the rate of exchange ruling at the time when the works in question were transferred to them, viz., 55 fr. to the pound.

32. As the result of inter-departmental discussion on this point (see the memorandum by the Second Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office enclosed in Paper D and Paper E), it was decided to obtain information as to the state of the law in France, Germany, Italy, Belgium and Holland on the question whether profits or losses resulting from fluctuations in the value of money fall upon the creditor, or whether a creditor is entitled to be indemnified by the debtor for losses suffered by reason of the depreciation of the currency in which the debt is expressed, and for this purpose a memorandum, copies of which are sent herewith (Paper F), was forwarded to His Majesty's representatives in those countries, with a request that they would obtain an opinion on the point. The opinions which have been received are annexed (Papers G, H, I, J and K). The legal position of this aspect of the claim is further discussed in the light of these opinions in the minute by the Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office (Paper C). A statement prepared by the Treasury, showing the quarterly quotations for the Belgian franc—the Congo franc has since the war been consistently maintained at the same rate as that of the Belgian franc—from October 1919 to October 1931 is sent herewith (Paper L).

33.—(D) The question of interest.—This question has as yet not been raised by the Belgian Government, but will no doubt arise in the event of its being necessary to submit the case to a judicial tribunal. While His Majesty's Government cannot fairly be held responsible for most of the delay which has occurred in settling this claim, it would seem probable that a tribunal would award interest for at any rate part of the time which has elapsed since the territory in question was handed over. This question is discussed in the minute by the Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office (Paper C), and a list of the material dates in the case is sent herewith (Paper M).

34. You will observe that in their note of the 25th March, 1930, the Belgian Government suggest that the questions at issue should be referred to a conciliation commission, which should propose a "solution amicale." Such a method of procedure would not seem appropriate in a case where the issues involved, except in so far as they relate to questions of amount, are entirely of a legal character, and its adoption would probably result in the payment by this country of a larger sum than would have been awarded by a judicial tribunal. So far, however, as the "old claim" is concerned, it is felt that, should it prove impossible to arrive at an agreed settlement, it would be difficult to refuse a request for the reference of the case to a judicial body, which it is thought would most conveniently be the Permanent Court of International Justice. It is not thought that such a reference would be inconsistent with the principle, referred to in paragraph 28, of refusing to submit to arbitration claims arising out of the operations of the war, since the present claim is based exclusively on the agreement reached by Lord Milner and M. Orts, and the question at issue is only that of the amount to be paid in respect of a claim which in principle has never been disputed. It is thought, however, that, in view of the facts that, (a) apart from the question of the rate of exchange, the difference between the amount claimed by the Belgian Government in respect of the "old claim" and that which His Majesty's Government are prepared to pay is not very great; (b) on the question of the rate of exchange the case of His Majesty's Government may not be as strong as could be wished; and (c) the probability that a reference to a judicial tribunal would result in an award of interest, for which no claim has at present been made, it might be desirable to make an attempt, by means of oral negotiations, conducted, of course, on a "without prejudice" basis, to reach a settlement of the case on the lines of the abandonment by Belgium of the "new claims," and the payment by His Majesty's Government of a sum between £13,587 15s. 6d., which they have offered to pay, and (1) £38,785 19s., which is the amount at present put forward by Belgium in respect of the "old claim," or (2) a correspondingly higher figure if an adjustment is claimed for depreciation of sterling in terms of gold.

35. I am accordingly to request you to take the enclosed papers into your consideration and to favour Secretary Sir John Simon with your opinion on the following questions:—

- (a) Whether His Majesty's Government are on strong ground in rejecting the "new claims" and refusing to submit them to any form of judicial settlement.
- (b) Whether the Belgian Government are entitled to claim the actual expenditure incurred by them on the construction of the permanent works handed over by them to the British authorities, and not merely the actual value of those works at the time of transfer.
- (c) Whether His Majesty's Government could successfully contend that their obligation is merely to pay the amount of Congo francs expended by Belgium on the works in question (or the actual value at the time of transfer, being a lesser number of Congo francs) or whether alternatively their obligation is to make in addition a supplementary payment in respect of the depreciation of the Congo franc; and in the latter case (1) whether the depreciation of the Congo franc should be measured by reference to (a) gold, (b) sterling, or (c) some other factor, and (2) at what point of time should the depreciation be measured. (It will be realised that the value of gold in terms of commodities fluctuates, and that the value of sterling in terms of gold fluctuates when sterling, as now, is off the gold standard.)
- (d) Whether in the event of the case being referred to a judicial tribunal, the Belgian Government would be likely to obtain an award of interest, and if so, for what period?

- (e) Whether (in the light of your answers to the above questions) it would be desirable that a further attempt should be made to reach a settlement of the case by negotiation on the lines suggested in paragraph 34 above?

36. Sir John Simon would also be grateful for any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.

C. HOWARD SMITH.

List of Papers.

- Paper A.—Colonial Office Print "African 1127." [W 7898/665/4/1931.]
 Paper B.—Note from the Belgian Ambassador, March 25, 1930. [W 3085/3085/4/1930.]
 Paper C.—Minute by the Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office, July 4, 1931. [W 7897/665/4/1931.]
 Paper D.—Foreign Office letter to Colonial Office, December 29, 1930, enclosing memorandum by the Second Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office. [W 13207/3085/4/1930.]
 Paper E.—Colonial Office letter to Foreign Office, January 28, 1931. [W 1107/665/4/1931.]
 Paper F.—Memorandum sent by the Foreign Office to His Majesty's representatives at Paris, Berlin, Rome, Brussels and The Hague on February 16, 1931. [W 13207/3085/4/1930.]
 Paper G.—Memorandum by the Legal Adviser to His Majesty's Embassy at Paris as to French law concerning rate of exchange for payment of debts. [W 3504/665/4/1931.]
 Paper H.—Opinion of Dr. Rudolf E. Kahn as to German law concerning rate of exchange for payment of debts. [W 3319/665/4/1931.]
 Paper I.—Opinion by the Legal Adviser to His Majesty's Embassy at Rome concerning Italian law as to rate of exchange for payment of debts. [W 3542 and W 4850/665/4/1931.]
 Paper J.—Opinion by Maître Gilon as to Belgian law concerning rate of exchange for payment of debts. [W 3411/665/4/1931.]
 Paper K.—Opinion of Legal Adviser to His Majesty's Legation at The Hague as to Dutch law concerning rate of exchange for payment of debts. [W 4672/665/4/1931.]
 Paper L.—Treasury statement showing quarterly quotations for the Belgian franc from 1919 to 1931. [W 11939/665/4/1931.]
 Paper M.—List of material dates in the case. [W 7898/665/4/1931.]

Report.

(a) The ground on which the "new claims" are put forward by the Belgian Government is not very clear. At one point the new claims seem to be regarded as covered in principle by the Orts-Milner Agreement that Great Britain should pay the cost of works of permanent improvements; at another point the contention of the Belgian Government is that the new claims represent outlays made for and on behalf of Great Britain. We have considered these and any other possible ways of putting the claim of the Belgian Government to be repaid the administration deficits and war-damage reparation payments, and we are of opinion that His Majesty's Government are on strong ground in rejecting these claims.

So far as the Orts-Milner correspondence is concerned, there may be some doubt as to what was included in the claim that was given up. On the other hand it may be said with great force that the correspondence was a binding agreement only to claim for the "permanent improvements." On the whole, though we do not suggest that the argument based on the agreement in the correspondence should be abandoned, we do not regard it as the best answer to the new claims. They may, in our opinion, be properly resisted on general principles. The Belgian Government cannot now assume the character of a bonorum gestor or quasi-agent for Great Britain for which there is no foundation of fact. Such a relationship depends upon contract, either express or to be implied from all the circumstances. These claims do not appear to have been conceived until long after the monies were expended, and at that time the ultimate disposal of the territory was, so far as we can ascertain, wholly uncertain. Nor is there any rule of international law by which an occupying Power can collect revenues and administer the territory on the footing of a right to recover administration expenses or deficits from an ultimate sovereign Power.

Notwithstanding our view, as to which we feel no doubt, that the new claims cannot be substantiated, we are impressed with the difficulty from a diplomatic point of view of declining indefinitely to submit any claims to any form of judicial settlement, but unless His Majesty's Government feel compelled for such reasons to agree to some reference to a judicial tribunal, they are, in our opinion, having regard to the lack of substance in the claims, entirely justified in resisting such a proposal.

(b) The Belgian Government are, in our opinion, entitled to be paid the actual expenditure on the permanent works handed over by them and not merely the value of the works at the time of transfer. This seems to us to have been the intention of the parties as expressed in the Orts-Milner correspondence and, apart from the letters, we think this claim is correct in law and would be upheld.

(c) On the footing that His Majesty's Government are willing, as we think they should be, in accordance with Lord Milner's offer, to indemnify Belgium for the cost of any permanent improvements effected on the territory transferred to Great Britain, we are of opinion that payment should be made of such an amount as will put Belgium in the same position as if the works had not been executed. The case would be different if there was an agreement which imposed on Great Britain an obligation to pay an ascertained sum of money on a definite date; in that event the loss resulting from the depreciation of the Congo franc during delay in liquidation of the debt would, in accordance with principles applied in the courts of Great Britain and so far as we have information of all other countries, fall on the creditor, namely, Belgium. But that is not, in our opinion, the true position. Whether the claim depends on the Orts-Milner correspondence or on its own merits, it is a claim for an indemnity, and we think the depreciation of the Congo franc should be measured by reference to sterling as from the time the expenses were incurred.

(d) There has undoubtedly been a great deal of delay on the part of Belgium, and we do not think any interest ought to be, or would be, awarded in respect of the period covered by that delay. But for the same reason as that mentioned in our answer to the last question, namely, the right of Belgium to be indemnified, we think a judicial tribunal would award some interest to cover the delay in settlement not attributable to Belgium.

(e) It is desirable that a further effort should be made to reach a settlement on the lines suggested. Any settlement for an amount substantially less than the sum required to confer complete reimbursement on Belgium in respect of the works in question, including sums to provide for depreciation in the value of the franc and for delay, would in our opinion be advantageous.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.

Law Officers' Department, July 15, 1932.

[N 2541/321/56/1932]

No. 1^d.

[Board of Trade.]

[April 20, 1932.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. Bowstead.

Herewith are sent:—

- (1) Statement of Facts. [N 5627/1259/56/1931.]
- (2) Copy Judgment of the Admiralty Transport Arbitration Board. [N 5627/1259/56/1931.]
- (3) Extract from the Minutes of League of Nations Council, 14th September, 1931. [N 6336/1259/56/1931.]
- (4) Copy of British Memorandum dated 17th September, 1931. [N 6359/1259/56/1931.]
- (5) Copy of Finnish Memorandum dated 30th December, 1931. [N 659/321/56/1932.]
- (6) Copy of British Memorandum dated 25th January, 1932. [N 849/321/56/1932.]
- (7) Copy of the Report of the Committee of Three. [N 660/321/56/1932.]
- (8) Extract from the Minutes of the League of Nations Council dated 30th January, 1932. [N 732/321/56/1932.]

THE Board of Trade desire to have the opinion of the Law Officers and Mr. Bowstead upon a question which has arisen in connexion with a claim made by the Government of Finland against His Majesty's Government.

The question is whether, in the circumstances hereinafter appearing, certain Finnish shipowners have exhausted the remedies open to them under English municipal law. The facts of the dispute are somewhat voluminous, but it is thought that they sufficiently appear from the statement herewith (No. 1), which was recently made for other purposes, and from the judgment of the Admiralty Transport Arbitration Board sent herewith (No. 2).

Put very shortly, the facts are that during the late war, towards the end of 1915, an arrangement was made to constitute an Allied pool of shipping, in the management of which Great Britain took the predominant part. It was found that there were a number of Russian ships which were free of Government control at that time, and accordingly arrangements were made between His Majesty's Government and the Imperial Russian Government, that the Russian Government should charter or requisition vessels flying the Russian flag, which included certain Finnish-owned vessels, Finland then being part of the Russian Empire, and put them into the Allied pool. This was done, the arrangement between the two Governments being that, as between each Government and its nationals, the terms on which vessels were requisitioned or chartered were no concern of the other Government, the agreement being that His Majesty's Government should pay the Russian Government Blue Book rates for Russian vessels employed on British service, and, vice versa, the Russian Government should pay His Majesty's Government Blue Book rates for British vessels employed on Russian service.

The arrangement worked very well, as between the Governments, up till the time of the Soviet revolution in Russia. The Finnish owners looked, and were content to look, to the Russian Government for their hire, and there was never any suggestion that the British Government were under any financial liability to the owners of the steamships taken by the Russian Government and put into the pool. When, however, the revolution in Russia became effective, the owners of the Finnish steamships found that they had no hope of obtaining payment of what was due from the revolutionary Russian Government, and they therefore conceived the ingenious idea of making a claim on the British Government. As might be expected in the circumstances, the British Government repudiated any liability in the matter, with the result that the Finnish shipowners lodged a claim with the Admiralty Transport Arbitration Board, demanding compensation on the ground that their vessels had been requisitioned by the British Government.

The claim was heard by a court consisting of Lord Trevethin, Sir James Warrack and Sir Francis Danson, and, after a hearing which lasted eight days, during which every possible point which could be put forward on behalf of the claimants was most strenuously pressed by Mr. G. P. Langton, K.C.—as he then was—the court delivered a considered judgment on the 9th January, 1926, dismissing the Finnish shipowners' claim, which was, quite obviously, without any merits whatever.

Claim of Finnish Government against His Majesty's Government in respect of requisitioned Finnish ships. Question whether municipal remedies in United Kingdom have been exhausted.

Counsel will recollect that, under the provisions of the Indemnity Act, 1920, the claimants were entitled, as of right, to appeal to the Court of Appeal, and, with the leave of that court, to the House of Lords; but they did not take advantage of this right, acting, no doubt, on the advice of the eminent English lawyers whom they had consulted.

Having failed in their claim before the Admiralty Transport Arbitration Board, and having decided not to appeal from the decision of that tribunal, they took no other steps to attempt to enforce their claim, either in the English courts of law or before the War Compensation Court.

They appear, however, to have brought great pressure upon the Government of Finland, with the result that they persuaded that Government to espouse their cause, and to put forward, through diplomatic channels, a request to the British Government that the dispute should be referred to international arbitration.

The matter was very carefully considered by the Government Departments concerned, but they could find nothing in the arguments which were put forward by the Finnish Government which justified their consenting to submit a claim, which had already been rejected by the British municipal court concerned, to any form of international arbitration.

When the Finnish Government appreciated that nothing could be obtained from the British Government through diplomatic action, they brought the matter before the Council of the League of Nations in September last.

It has not been thought necessary to trouble counsel with the earliest Finnish and British memoranda which were presented to the Council of the League of Nations. These documents dealt in the main with the facts of the case, and the bearing which those facts had upon the question whether the Finnish Government were entitled to demand that His Majesty's Government should consent to submit the dispute to international arbitration.

A copy of the minutes of the discussion which took place is sent herewith (No. 3), from which counsel will see that one of the points taken by the United Kingdom delegate was that the Finnish Government were not entitled to demand international arbitration, because the Finnish shipowners had not exhausted the municipal remedies which were available to them in the United Kingdom.

The discussion took place on the 14th September, 1931, and on the 17th September, the United Kingdom delegate presented to the Council a memorandum (No. 4), a copy of which is sent herewith, dealing with this point at length.

At the meeting of the Council on the 19th September, after some discussion, the representative of Spain was appointed rapporteur to report on the questions which had been raised, and he was authorised to obtain the help of the Italian and Norwegian representatives.

On the 30th December, 1931, the Finnish Government presented a memorandum (No. 5) in reply to the British memorandum of the 17th September, and on the 25th January, 1932, the United Kingdom delegate presented a further memorandum (No. 6) in reply to the Finnish memorandum of the 30th December.

On the 30th January, 1932, the representative of Spain presented to the Council of the League the report of the committee of three, and a discussion took place upon it.

Copies of the report and of the minutes of the discussion are sent herewith (Nos. 7 and 8).

It will be seen that the report was on the whole in favour of His Majesty's Government, in that it upheld their view that they could not be taken to arbitration under articles 12 and 15 of the Covenant of the League, but, on the other hand, they reported that the League had power to conciliate under article 11, subject to the preliminary point as to whether the Finns had exhausted their municipal rights under British law.

The committee state in their report that they think it would be expedient to examine the following two questions:—

- (a) Have the Finnish shipowners, or have they not, exhausted the means of recourse placed at their disposal by British law?
- (b) Did the fact that those shipowners had not exhausted the means of recourse in question constitute an obstacle such as to prevent the Finnish Government from claiming compensation from the British Government?

The report went on to suggest that if, after discussion between the parties, any point relating to these two questions should still remain unsettled, the Council might ask the Permanent Court of International Justice for an advisory opinion.

The first of these questions, (a), raises an important and difficult point of English law on which the Board desire to have the advice of the Law Officers and Mr. Bowstead before they proceed to discuss it with the Finnish representative. The second question, (b), is a point of international law which it is unnecessary to consider at present.

As will be seen from the memoranda which have been presented to the Council by the United Kingdom delegate, the position taken up by the British Government is that the Finnish shipowners did not exhaust their municipal remedies in the United Kingdom for two reasons:—

- (1) In the first place, having gone to the Admiralty Transport Arbitration Board, they could have appealed from the judgment of that tribunal to the Court of Appeal, and, with the leave of the latter court, to the House of Lords, but they did not do so.
- (2) If they were satisfied that the decision of the Admiralty Transport Arbitration Board, that the Finnish steamers were not requisitioned by His Majesty's Government, could not be successfully attacked, it was open to them under the provisions of the Indemnity Act, 1920, to proceed either by petition of right, if they alleged that there was an implied contract on the part of His Majesty's Government arising out of the user of the ships to pay compensation for such user, or, if they were of opinion that what was done by His Majesty's Government amounted to an interference with their property or business in the United Kingdom, they could have claimed compensation for such interference from the War Compensation Court. They did neither.

Having regard to the very full manner in which the contentions of His Majesty's Government on this point are set out in the two memoranda, it is not thought necessary to do more than summarise them here.

In view of the attitude adopted by the Council of the League in the discussion on the 30th January last, it may be that if the Finns cannot be satisfied at the proposed discussion, it will be very difficult for His Majesty's Government to refuse to submit the question whether the Finnish shipowners have exhausted the means of recourse placed at their disposal by British law to some form of tribunal for an advisory opinion.

If His Majesty's Government are driven into this position, they propose to suggest to the Finns that, as the matter is entirely one of British law, it would be more satisfactory to submit it to an English jurist; but, before doing this, they would be glad to have the opinion of the Law Officers and Mr. Bowstead as to whether the attitude hitherto adopted by His Majesty's Government is the correct one.

The Law Officers and counsel are therefore requested to advise whether, in their opinion, the Finnish shipowners have, or have not, exhausted the means of recourse placed at their disposal by British law.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. Bowstead.

IT is suggested (see the contention of the British delegates set out in Memorandum No. 6) that the owners of the Finnish steamers have not exhausted their right of recourse to the British courts in the following respects:—

- (1) By appeal from the decision of the Admiralty Transport Arbitration Board.
- (2) By making a claim under section 2 (1) (b) of the Indemnity Act, 1920, based upon interference with their property in the United Kingdom.
- (3) By petition of right.

With regard to (1), we are of opinion that there was a right of appeal from the decision of the Admiralty Transport Arbitration Board, as this decision clearly raised questions of law. In our opinion, however, this decision was right, and the chances of an appeal being successful would have been remote.

With regard to (2), in any claim under section 2 (1) (b) it would have been necessary to show that the interference was through the exercise, or purported exercise, of a prerogative right of His Majesty, or of some power under an enactment relating to the defence of the realm, or of some regulation or order made or purporting to be made thereunder.

The War Compensation Court would, in our opinion, have reached the same decision as the Board on this point, and for the same reasons; and, if the matter could have been brought before that court after the Board's decision, would have been obliged to regard the matter as res judicata.

With regard to (3), it being conceded rightly, in our opinion, that there was no contract, express or implied, between the owners and the British Government, we do not think that any claim by petition of right was open to the owners.

In effect, therefore, in our opinion, the owners have only failed to take proceedings open to them, in the sense that they have refrained from taking proceedings which, in our opinion, were bound to be unsuccessful.

TH. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.
W. BOWSTEAD

Law Officers' Department,
April 20, 1932.

FRANCE.

[W 8753/178/17/1932]

No. 2.

[July 29, 1932.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Sovereignty over uninhabited islands.
Cases of Spratley Island and Amboyna
Cay.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 16, 1932.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir John Simon, to lay the annexed papers before you, and to request the favour of your opinion upon certain legal questions arising out of a dispute with the French Government as to the sovereignty over certain uninhabited islands in the China Sea, which have been for many years past regarded by His Majesty's Government as British territory, but which the French Government claim to have annexed in 1930.

2. Spratley (or Storm Island) is a bare flat island about 8 feet high, $2\frac{1}{2}$ cables in length and $1\frac{1}{2}$ cables in breadth, situated in the South China Sea about 280 miles away from the coast of Sarawak and British North Borneo, and 240 miles away from French Indo-China.

Amboyna Cay (or the Ilôt Amboine) is situated 75 miles to the south-east of Spratley Island, and is 150 yards long and about 8 feet high.

Both islands apparently possess deposits of potash and guano. Spratley Island has been suggested by the director of the Royal Observatory, Hong Kong, as a desirable site for a meteorological observing station. The Admiralty and Air Ministry attach importance to the British sovereignty over these islands.

3. Spratley Island and Amboyna Cay were visited in 1864 by Commander Ward, R.N., who surveyed the seas in the neighbourhood in H.M.S. "Rifleman." The ship's log stated that he placed a beacon upon both islands and also planted cocoanut trees and vegetables.

In September 1877 Mr. G. F. Graham (an United States citizen) and Mr. H. Simpson (a British subject), in conjunction with Mr. H. G. James (a British subject, and a merchant at Hong Kong), having visited Spratley Island and Amboyna Cay, and discovered that they were entirely uninhabited, and that they contained considerable deposits of guano, proceeded to Labuan for the purpose of seeking the permission of the authorities there to hoist the British flag over the island and cay, and of registering their claim against all comers to the land and products of the island and cay.

Mr. Treacher (who held simultaneously the office of Acting Governor of Labuan and Acting Consul-General in Borneo, accordingly signed a document (Paper No. 1), dated the 25th October, 1877, in which it was recorded that the claim was registered in the Colony of Labuan, and that permission was given to Mr. Graham and Mr. Simpson to hoist the British flag over the said island and cay, subject to the approval of Her Britannic Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The document provided, however, that the claim should lapse if, within ten years from the 25th October, 1877, the said lands and products were not duly worked and turned to account, and if at any time subsequently they should be left unworked for the space of five years.

In reporting the above to the Foreign Office Mr. Treacher mentioned that it would be of advantage to ships navigating in those parts if there were some place at which shipwrecked mariners could obtain shelter and assistance, and it was the intention of Messrs. Graham, Simpson and James to erect some kind of building for their servants on one or both of the islands, should the venture prove practicable. He further stated that Spratley Island was in the main route to China, and Amboyna Cay was near the main route, and both were entirely uninhabited.

4. From investigations made at the Foreign Office at the time, it appeared that no foreign Government had officially claimed the sovereignty over those islands, and that both islands were so far distant from Borneo on the one side, and the Malay Peninsula on the other, that they could not fairly be claimed as dependencies of either of these territories on the ground of contiguity and geographical position.

5. On the Colonial Office being consulted by the Foreign Office they replied that, as far as the Colonies of Hong Kong and Labuan were concerned, there could be no objection to Messrs. Graham and Simpson exploiting guano from the islands in question. (Letter from the Foreign Office of the 7th January, 1878, and reply from the Colonial Office of the 18th January, 1878 (Paper No. 2).)

6. On the 29th January, 1878, the Colonial Office were asked by the Foreign Office to express an opinion as to whether the claim of these persons to Spratley Island and Amboyna Cay should be registered with Mr. Treacher as British Consul-General in Borneo or as Governor of Labuan, and whether permission should be granted to them to hoist the British flag on these islands, and what instructions should be sent to Mr. Treacher on this matter. The Colonial Office replied that the islands in question being beyond the limits of the Colony of Labuan, the matter had not appeared to be one in which that Department was directly interested; they considered that the office of the Consul-General in Borneo seemed to be the proper place for the registration of the claim now made to the ownership of Spratley Island and Amboyna Cay; and were of opinion that there appeared to be no objection to allowing the claimants to hoist the British flag in those localities. (Letter from the Foreign Office of the 29th January, 1878, and reply from the Colonial Office of the 5th February, 1878 (Paper No. 3).)

7. Mr. Treacher was, therefore, accordingly informed on the 13th February, 1878, that there appeared to be no objection to the registration in Her Majesty's Consulate-General in Borneo of the claims of Messrs. James, Graham and Simpson to these islands, nor any objection to their hoisting the British flag on them. (Despatch of the 13th February, 1878, from the Foreign Office (Paper No. 4).)

8. In a despatch of the 30th October, 1879 (Paper No. 5), reporting that operations had been commenced by Messrs. Graham and Simpson at Amboyna Cay in the previous May, Mr. Treacher stated that, there being no means of giving due publicity in Labuan to the claim of these persons to the localities, he had requested the Governors of Hong Kong and the Straits Settlements to publish in the "Government Gazette" of their respective Colonies copies of the documents signed by him in 1877. A copy of the notice which was, in response to this request, inserted in the "Government Gazette" of the Straits Settlement, dated the 19th November, 1879, is attached (Paper No. 6). It appears from this despatch that Mr. Graham did go to Amboyna Cay in 1879, in May and September, and took off two cargoes of guano, and, further, that he and his assistant, Mr. Helme, were attacked on Amboyna Cay by their own Chinese coolies, two of whom they shot dead. The other coolies were tried and sentenced at Labuan by Mr. Treacher for this attack. Minutes in Colonial Office Papers of 1888-89 raise the question of the jurisdiction of Mr. Treacher to try these men for an offence committed on Amboyna Cay, seeing that the papers of 1877-79 indicated that the islands were beyond the limit of the Colony of Labuan. Some work was therefore done on Amboyna Cay in 1879, but none on Spratley Island.

[8717]

D

9. No further development affecting Spratley Island occurred until 1888. In that year the Central Borneo Company gave notice to the Colonial Office of their intention to exploit guano upon Spratley Island and Amboyna Cay, and were informed by the Colonial Office that a prior claim to the islands was registered in 1877 at the consulate-general in Borneo. The company stated, however, that the claim lodged in 1877 having lapsed, a grant of the islands was given in 1887 to a Mr. Everett, of Singapore, who agreed to surrender his claim in favour of the company. On the matter being referred to the Foreign Office, the Colonial Office were informed that if the islands had been duly worked by Messrs. Graham and Simpson, the first period of their lease would have held good until the 25th October, 1887, and if the working had been continued after that date, the grant would have held good until the islands had been left unworked by them for the space of five years. The Colonial Office were informed at the same time that no record existed of Messrs. Graham and Simpson's grant having lapsed and of a grant having, in consequence, been made in 1887 to Mr. Everett, of Singapore. At the suggestion of the Foreign Office, the Colonial Office ascertained that there was no notice in the "Straits Settlements Government Gazette," relating to the two islands since the notification of the grant to Messrs. Simpson and Graham in 1877. The Colonial Office considered that it was also safe to assume that there was nothing in the "Hong Kong Gazette" on the subject beyond what appeared in those of the Straits Settlements.

10. In November 1888 the Colonial Office pointed out that the islands in question not being within the limits of any colony, applications in connexion with their commercial developments did not appear directly to concern that Department and that the application of Messrs. Graham and Simpson in 1877 had been dealt with by the Foreign Office. The Colonial Office also stated that as it seemed possible that the previous occupiers of the islands had abandoned their claims, they did not feel in a position to reply to the Central Borneo Company's application.

11. In November 1888 two despatches were received at the Foreign Office from Mr. Leys, Her Majesty's Consul-General for Brunei (Paper No. 7) from which it appeared that the ten years' grant made to Messrs. Graham and Simpson in 1877 had lapsed; that Mr. Everett, of Singapore, had applied for a lease of the guano on the islands, and that he had subsequently waived his claim in favour of the Central Borneo Company. Although Mr. Leys mentioned that the Acting Consul-General at Labuan had some doubts whether or not Messrs. Graham and Simpson's claim had lapsed, he recommended that the Central Borneo Company should be granted a "lease" for five years on the same terms as were granted in 1877 to Messrs. Graham and Simpson.

12. Upon receipt of these despatches the Foreign Office, in December 1888, transmitted copies of them to the Colonial Office, and stated (Paper No. 8) that provided that satisfactory proof were forthcoming that Messrs. Graham and Simpson had withdrawn from the island and cay in question and had thereby allowed their claim to lapse, and provided that no other parties had put forward a better claim, the Foreign Office had no objection to the issue of a document to the Central Borneo Company similar to that which was given to Messrs. Graham and Simpson, it being understood that such document should be registered by the Administrator of Labuan as such, but not in his capacity as consul-general. The Colonial Office instructed the Acting Governor of Labuan to proceed on the lines suggested by the Foreign Office and informed the Central Borneo Company that they might be granted a lease if satisfactory proof that Messrs. Graham and Simpson had withdrawn was forthcoming.

13. As the company stated that they had no further evidence on the point, the Colonial Office requested the Admiralty to instruct a naval vessel to call at the islands and make a report, and as a result in May 1889 Spratley Island and Amboyna Cay were visited by the Commander of H.M.S. "Wanderer." As regards Spratley Island, the commander reported that it was uninhabited and unoccupied, and that there were no remains of any kind whatever to show that anybody had ever lived upon the island or worked the guano. The commander observed footmarks and heaps of dead birds and he came to the conclusion that whoever had been there had landed from a ship or junk, got some birds' flesh and perhaps eggs, and then gone away again. On Amboyna Cay remains of huts, boxes and bottles were found, but the cay was then uninhabited and was thought to have been so for about five years at least.

14. In July 1889 Mr. Hamilton, the Acting Governor of Labuan, reported (Paper No. 9) having issued a notice, which was published in the "Hong Kong and Straits Settlements Gazette" (Paper No. 10) desiring any person having any claims in respect of Amboyna Cay and Spratley Island to communicate with him before the 30th April, 1889. As no claims were received, the Acting Governor granted authority to the Central Borneo Company to occupy and work the islands subject to the terms set forth in a proclamation (enclosure in Paper No. 9) similar to that issued in 1877. It will be seen that this authority was granted by the Acting Governor of Labuan in his capacity as such.

15. In forwarding to the Foreign Office the Admiralty report on the condition of the islands (paragraph 13) and the report of the Acting Governor of Labuan (paragraph 14), the Colonial Office stated that as the islands, having been formerly licensed by the Crown, remained British territory unless definitely abandoned by the Crown, and as it appeared that the former licensees had completely withdrawn, Lord Knutsford, Secretary of State for the Colonies, proposed to grant a guano lease (to be executed in the usual way by himself and the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury) of the islands to the Central Borneo Company (Limited) "in the form lately adopted, and on conditions as to rent which will be settled after consultation with the Treasury." The lease when issued would take the place of that issued by the Acting Governor of Labuan.

On the 3rd September, 1889, the Foreign Office concurred in the proposal to grant a guano lease of Spratley Island and Amboyna Cay, on the conditions mentioned by the Colonial Office to the Central Borneo Company.

16. A licence for three years as from the 1st July, 1889, and a rent of £15 per annum was granted to the Central Borneo Company (Paper No. 11).

On the 10th December, 1892, the Colonial Office asked the Central Borneo Company if they wished to renew the licence which had expired on the 30th July, 1892, and the company replied that they did not and the British North Borneo Company were asked to notify the Labuan Government of this fact. No further material correspondence on the subject of these islands is in the papers of any Department. There is no evidence that the Central Borneo Company ever took any action under their lease.

17. The Colonial Office list of 1891, an official publication "comprising (inter alia) historical and statistical information respecting the Colonial Dependencies of Great Britain," contained on p. 310 the following statement:—

"Miscellaneous Islands.

"A number of islands and rocks throughout the world are British territory, or under British protection, but are not included in any Colony or separate Protectorate. Among such may be mentioned:—

* * * * *

"Amboyna Cay and Spratley Island (latitude 8° 38' N., 111° 54' E. longitude; latitude 7° 52' N., 112° 55' E. longitude), two uninhabited sandbanks in the middle of the China Sea, lying about 240 miles north-west of Borneo and 100 miles north of Labuan, were annexed in 1877, and leased for guano collection. They are annually visited by Chinese junks for the purpose of collecting turtle. A fresh lease was granted in 1889 to the Central Borneo Company (Limited), Winchester House, Old Broad Street, E.C."

Subsequent Colonial Office lists have each year contained similar references to Amboyna Cay and Spratley Island. The corresponding passage on p. 526 of the Dominions Office and Colonial Office list of 1931 reads as follows:—

"A number of islands and rocks throughout the world are British territory, or under British protection, but are not included in any Colony or separate Protectorate. Many of these have no permanent inhabitants, but are, or have been, leased by the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury for guano collection, or for coconut planting. The rents are paid into the Exchequer. Among such may be mentioned the Ashmore Group (Indian Ocean), Bird Island and Cato Island (in the Norfolk Island Group), Sombrero (West Indies, with a Board of Trade lighthouse, costing £520 annually), Raine Island, Bell Cay and Bramble Cay (near British New Guinea), Caroline Island, Flint Island and Vostoc Island (Pacific Ocean, 9° 56' S. latitude, 150° 6' W. longitude, and 11° 26' latitude, and 151° 48' W. longitude), Malden Island (4° 1' S. latitude, 155° 57' W. longitude), leased to Messrs. Grice, Sumner and Co., and Starbuck Island; also Gough, Nightingale and inaccessible islands (in the South Atlantic); and there are many others.

"The Great and Little Basses and Minicoy are small islets in the Indian Ocean, with lighthouses maintained by the Board of Trade out of shipping dues levied on vessels passing and collected at Ceylon, Mauritius, Straits and Indian ports.

"The Kuria-Muria Islands, five in number, off the south-east coast of Arabia, were ceded by the Imam of Muskat for the purpose of landing the Red Sea telegraph cable.

"Amboyne Cay and Sprattley Islands (latitude 8° 38' N., 111° 54' E. longitude; latitude 7° 52' N., 112° 55' E. longitude), two uninhabited sandbanks in the middle of the China Sea, lying about 240 miles north-west of Borneo and 100 miles north of Labuan, were annexed in 1877, and leased for guano collection. They are annually visited by Chinese junks for the purpose of collecting turtle."

The Colonial Office lists are official publications which may be purchased by any person on application to the publishers.

18. On a map of the Malay Archipelago, published by the London Geographical Institute, Sprattley Island is marked "Br." (British). About thirty modern atlases have been examined, and in no case is any sovereignty attributed to France or to any other nation with the following exceptions:—

In the 1929 (latest) edition of the "Atlante Internationale del Touring Club Italiana," Sprattley Island is clearly marked in red capital letters "BRIT." Amboyne Cay is similarly marked.

Philip's International Atlas of 1931 shows "Storm or Sprattley Island" as "BR."

With these three exceptions, no indication of sovereignty is shown on any map or atlas examined. This, although of negative value, may be of importance in that no mention can be found anywhere of French interests or possessions in that locality.

The Italian atlas mentioned is well known on the Continent as a standard authority.

19. It appears from a despatch of April 1930 from His Majesty's consul-general at Saigon that the authorities in French Indo-China had for some time been desirous of annexing for France a considerable number of the islands, islets and reefs in that portion of the China Sea where Sprattley Island is situated, for the sake (inter alia) of the deposits of potash and guano on these islands. Apparently, however, their action was delayed for some time owing to a doubt as to the extent to which the United States might claim sovereignty over them on the ground that they have been ceded to the United States as part of the archipelago of the Philippines under the treaty of the 10th December, 1898 (Paper No. 12), article 3.

20. By 1930, however, it would appear from a despatch of the 23rd April, 1930, from His Majesty's consul-general at Saigon (see Paper No. 13) that the French authorities had made up their minds with regard to the geographical implications of the treaty of 1898, and had determined to take the action which they had been contemplating. Accordingly, the French sloop "Malicieuse" on about the 13th April, 1930, visited a number of these islands, including Sprattley Island, and claimed sovereignty over them in the name of the French Republic. It is reported that on Sprattley Island the French vessel discovered four marooned Chinese, who were thus saved from starvation. After the visit of this vessel, the communiqué to the press in Saigon mentioned in Mr. Gorton's despatch was issued (see Paper No. 13). According to this communiqué, it appears that the French Government claim sovereignty over all the islands, islets and reefs situated in the zone between the seventh and twelfth degrees of north latitude, and to the west of the triangular zone reserved to American sovereignty under article 3 of the Treaty of the 10th December, 1898. This zone includes Sprattley

Island and certain islets situated close to it, and other islets which are described by the French as follows:—

"Les récifs du Trident, l'île Thi-Thai, l'île Loai Ta, le récif Tizard, le récif de la Découverte, la Croix de Feu, les récifs London, l'îlot Amboine, le banc du Rifleman, le banc Ardoisier, le récif de l'Hirondelle."

The area thus claimed by the French is shown on the annexed sketch map, on which Sprattley Island and the other principal islands mentioned by the French are shown (Paper No. 14).

21. His Majesty's consul-general at Saigon reported by telegram on the 23rd April, 1930, to the Foreign Office that the French authorities had announced the annexation of Sprattley Island and called attention to the fact that it appeared to be the same as the island which was shown in the Colonial and Dominions Office list as having been annexed by this country in 1877. He stated that he had called the attention of the local French authorities to this apparent mistake, but had only received the reply that their action had been taken under the direct instructions of the French Government.

22. On receipt of this telegram, Mr. Campbell, His Majesty's Minister in Paris, acting upon instructions from the Foreign Office, issued after consultation with the Colonial Office, Admiralty and Treasury, presented a note on the 21st May, 1930 (Paper No. 15), to the French Foreign Ministry, claiming that Sprattley Island and Amboyne Cay had been annexed and become British territory in 1877 by virtue of the permission given to Messrs. Graham and Simpson for the hoisting of the British flag on the islands and of the registration in His Majesty's consulate-general in Borneo of their claim—a claim which was confirmed subsequently by a formal licence from the Crown; that no abandonment of British sovereignty over these islands had taken place, and that they accordingly remained British territory. The French Ministry of Foreign Affairs were asked to be so good as to notify the French authorities in Indo-China to this effect. It will be seen that Mr. Campbell's note, which was presented upon instructions issued rather hurriedly and after an unfinished investigation, does not contain a complete or entirely accurate statement of the facts.

23. On the 13th July, 1930, the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs returned an interim reply to His Majesty's Minister's note (Paper No. 16), in which the claim that these islands were British territory was disputed on the grounds (inter alia) that there was no evidence that the British flag had in fact been hoisted on the islands; that Messrs. Graham and Simpson had been officially commissioned to take possession of the islands in the name of Her Britannic Majesty, or that they had in fact ever assumed effective possession of the islands.

This interim reply was followed by a further note of the 28th March, 1931, from the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs (Paper No. 17), in which the British claim to sovereignty over these islands was contested as being ill-founded under international law. In this note reliance was placed inter alia on the fact that these islands had not been placed under the administration of any British Colony or Protectorate,⁽¹⁾ and the claim of Messrs. Graham and Simpson had been registered only in the British consulate-general in Borneo, from which it was argued that His Majesty's Government must be presumed to have considered that these islands did not belong to the British Empire and that the only effect of the registration was to establish a right for the individuals in private law.

The French Government argued that there was no evidence of any exercise of authority by this country over these islands, and that they were therefore terra nullius at the time when the French authorities took formal possession of them.

24. The French Ministry of Foreign Affairs on the 30th November, 1931, informed His Majesty's Embassy in Paris, in reply to a request for information, that they know of no formal proclamation having been issued by the French Government annexing these islands and that they were in communication with the Governor-General of Indo-China requesting him to send copies of any proclamations he had issued. If it was found that no proclamation had been issued, they proposed forthwith to issue one, and send His Majesty's Government an official notification of their annexation.

⁽¹⁾ The note also contains a statement to the effect that there is no British island (even the smallest size) which is not attached to some Colony or Protectorate for administration. This statement is of course incorrect (see paragraph 17 above, quotation from Dominions and Colonial Office lists).

25. No further communication has at present been addressed to the French Government on this subject, and Sir John Simon desires your advice on the questions referred to in the following paragraphs, in order to assist him in deciding what (if any) further action should be taken in this matter.

26. The first question upon which your advice is desired is whether His Majesty possessed valid rights of sovereignty over Spratley Island and Amboyna Cay in April 1930 at the time when the French Government purported to annex them, a question which turns upon the application of certain principles of international law to the facts of this case. In this connexion, I am to invite your attention to the memorandum prepared by the legal advisers of this Department (Paper No. 18) and, in particular, to the Clipperton Island case therein referred to.

27. The facts upon which the British claim to sovereignty over those islands must be based would appear to be the following:—

(a) Visits to the Islands—Actual Use and Occupation.

The visit to both islands in 1864 by Commander Ward (paragraph 3) in H.M.S. "Rifleman"; the visits of Messrs. Graham and Simpson in 1877 to both islands (paragraph 3), and in 1879 to Amboyna Cay, when during a period of six months some work was done on this island, and when it is probable, though not absolutely certain, that the British flag was hoisted; the visit in 1889 by H.M.S. "Wanderer" to both islands. There is no evidence that the British flag was ever hoisted on Spratley Island. It appears that the Central Borneo Company never sent any persons to the islands at all.

(b) Assumption of Sovereignty over the Islands by His Majesty's Government.

The authorisation given to Messrs. Graham and Simpson in 1877 and 1878 to hoist the British flag over the islands, and the registration of their claim in the British consulate-general for Borneo, after a previous provisional registration with the Government of Labuan, and the advertisement of this claim in the "Government Gazettes" of Hong Kong and the Straits Settlements (paragraphs 3 and 8); the registration of the claim of the Central Borneo Company in 1889 with the Government of Labuan, after further advertisements in the "Government Gazettes" of Hong Kong and the Straits Settlements (paragraph 14); the subsequent issue of a formal lease to this company by Lord Knutsford, then Secretary of State for the Colonies; the passages in the Colonial Office lists from 1891 onwards, in which the statement is made that these islands were annexed in 1887.

Reliance might perhaps also be placed upon the exercise of jurisdiction in 1879 by the Acting Governor of Labuan, when he tried and sentenced the Chinese coolies who had assaulted Mr. Graham and Mr. Helme on Amboyna Cay, inasmuch as it would appear that he would have had no jurisdiction over offences committed in Amboyna Cay unless it had been made a dependency of the Colony of Labuan. Against this, however, it must be observed that in 1879 the Colonial Office had clearly disclaimed any intention of including these islands as dependencies of Labuan, and the claim of Messrs. Graham and Simpson had been registered with Mr. Treacher in his capacity as consul-general for Borneo, precisely for this reason, so that Mr. Treacher's action in trying these offenders may have been misconceived.

27A. The fact that neither of these islands had been attached for administrative purposes to any British Colony or Protectorate is relied upon by the French Government as an argument against the validity of any British claim to sovereignty over them. You will no doubt deal with this argument in giving your opinion in answer to the first question, and will observe that the statement in the Colonial Office list referred to in paragraph 17 makes it impossible to contend that these islands had, in fact, been attached for administrative purposes to any British Colony or Protectorate.

I am, however, to invite your attention to certain letters exchanged between the Foreign Office, the Colonial Office and the Admiralty (Paper No. 19 (1), (2) and (3)), and to request you to give your opinion as to the advisability of attaching for administrative purposes to some Colony or Protectorate the various other miscellaneous islands which are claimed as British, in order to avoid the possibility of British sovereignty over them being challenged, on the ground that no provision had been made for their administration. This is the second question on which your advice is requested.

28. I am accordingly to request you to take the enclosed papers into your consideration and to favour Sir John Simon with your opinion:—

- (a) Whether in April 1930 His Majesty possessed under international law a claim to sovereignty over Spratley Island and/or Amboyna Cay which could be laid before the Permanent Court of International Justice with either the certainty or a reasonable prospect of success.
- (b) Whether it is desirable that the various miscellaneous islands over which His Majesty claims sovereignty should be attached for administrative purposes to some Colony or Protectorate in all cases where such action has not already been taken.

29. Sir John Simon would also be grateful for any observations of a general character which you may have to offer on this matter.

I have, &c.

C. HOWARD SMITH.

List of Papers.

1. Document signed by Mr. W. H. Treacher, October 25, 1877. [W 7183/2378/17/1931.]
- 2.—(1) Foreign Office to Colonial Office, January 7, 1878.
(2) Colonial Office to Foreign Office, January 18, 1878.
[W 7183/2378/17/1931.]
- 3.—(1) Foreign Office to Colonial Office, January 29, 1878.
(2) Colonial Office to Foreign Office, February 5, 1878.
[W 7183/2378/17/1931.]
4. Despatch to Acting Consul-General, Borneo, February 13, 1878. [W 4686/2378/17/1931—Annex (B).]
5. Despatch from Acting Consul-General, Borneo, October 30, 1879. [W 7183/2378/17/1931.]
6. Notice in "Straits Settlements Government Gazette," dated November 19, 1879.
[W 4686/2378/17/1931.]
- 7.—(1) Despatch from Mr. Leys, November 24, 1888.
(2) Despatch from Mr. Leys, November 29, 1888.
[Confidential 5769, Nos. 147 and 149.]
8. Foreign Office to Colonial Office, December 15, 1888. [Confidential 5769, No. 156.]
9. Despatch from Acting Governor of Labuan, July 3, 1889. [Confidential 5957, No. 32.]
- 10.—(1) Notice in "Hong Kong Government Gazette," April 5, 1889.
(2) Notice in "Straits Settlements Government Gazette," March 28, 1889.
[W 4686/2378/17/1931—Annex (C).]
11. Licence granted to Central Borneo Company, October 28, 1889. [W 13065/2378/17/1931.]
12. Treaty of December 10, 1898, between United States and Spain. [Confidential 7262.]
13. Despatch from His Majesty's Consul-General, Saigon, April 23, 1930. [W 5470/4099/17/1930.]
14. Map showing Spratley Island and neighbouring islands.
15. Note sent by His Majesty's Embassy in Paris to French Government, May 21, 1930.
[W 5305/4099/17/1930.]
16. Reply from French Government, July 13, 1930. [W 7274/4099/17/1930.]
17. Further reply from French Government, March 28, 1931. [W 3703/2378/17/1931.]
18. Memorandum by Foreign Office Legal Advisers, November 10, 1931. [Confidential 14102.]
- 19.—(1) Foreign Office to Colonial Office, May 12, 1931. [W 4951/2378/17/1931.]
(2) Colonial Office to Foreign Office, June 16, 1931. [W 7183/2378/17/1931.]
(3) Admiralty to Foreign Office, June 16, 1931. [W 7241/2378/17/1931.]

Report.

(a) In our opinion His Majesty's claim to sovereignty over Spratley Island and Amboyna Cay in April 1930 was of so doubtful a nature that it could only be laid before the Permanent Court of International Justice with a faint prospect of success.

It is now well settled in general that an inchoate title to sovereignty may be acquired either by discovery or by reason of circumstances having an effect similar to discovery, but that the inchoate title thus acquired must be perfected within a reasonable time by an open and continuous exercise of sovereignty, of which the most common form is occupation in fact.

In the present case, however, we are not able to infer from the events which took place in 1877-79 any acquisition of even an inchoate title to sovereignty, still less of a title perfected either by actual occupation or by some other open display of State authority. The visit of H.M.S. "Wanderer" in 1889, coupled with the lease granted in that year to the Central Borneo Company, and followed by the statements published from 1891 onwards in the Colonial Office list, would, having regard to the fact that the islands are uninhabited, probably have been held to be sufficient evidence of the continuous display of State authority to negative any suggestion of loss of sovereignty by abandonment, but the necessary foundation is, in our opinion, lacking.

We do not in the facts of this case regard the contention of the French Government, which is based upon the absence of any administrative attachment to a British Colony or Protectorate, as being at all conclusive. The circumstances of the islands, and especially the fact that they have no inhabitants, justify and explain the absence of administrative machinery.

(b) Notwithstanding our opinion as to the effect in this case of the absence of any attachment for administrative purposes to a British Colony or Protectorate, we regard it as most desirable that wherever it is possible in the cases of the various miscellaneous islands in question such an attachment should be formed. Such a connexion will afford good evidence of the continuous exercise of State authority.

(c) We have not overlooked the decision in the Clipperton Island case and the reasoning on which it was based. In that case there had been an act of unequivocal annexation by France. That fact being established, it was not difficult to hold in a case of an uninhabited island that the rights acquired by such annexation were perfected and were never lost.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.

Law Officers' Department,
July 29, 1932.

GENERAL.

[W 3033/22/98/1932]

No. 2^A.

[Colonial Office.]

[March 8, 1932.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Colonial Office, September 24, 1931.

Grants to Mandated Territories from Colonial Development
Fund:
attaching of conditions as to purchase of materials,
&c.

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Thomas to refer to the Opinion,⁽¹⁾ dated the 19th January, 1931, given by the Law Officers in reply to Colonial Office letter of the 23rd December, 1930, in regard to the propriety of attaching to loans or grants made to mandated territories from the Colonial Development Fund conditions as to the purchase of materials, &c., in this country. That Opinion has been the subject of discussion with the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, and their Lordships are in some doubt as to the precise application of the Opinion of the Law Officers on the third of the three questions mentioned in the seventh paragraph of Colonial Office letter of the 23rd December last.

2. The cases to which reference was made in that question may be classified as follows:—

- (i) A free grant or a loan of a portion of the total cost of the scheme; the portion may be either a definite sum or a percentage. Ordinarily, the free grant or loan is not given in respect of any particular items of expenditure, but in respect of the expenditure as a whole.
- (ii) A free grant to cover the interest charges for a period of years on a loan to be raised by the mandated territory on its own account (not from the fund) to meet the whole cost of the scheme.

⁽¹⁾ Confidential 14105, p. 6.

In all cases, the assistance, whatever form it takes, is given on the understanding that it will enable the mandated territory to undertake a scheme advantageous to the territory, which it would not have been able without assistance to carry out at all, or at any rate for some years.

3. I am accordingly to enquire whether, in your opinion, the condition as to purchase of materials, &c., in this country may properly be attached to the grant of assistance from the fund in cases where the assistance represents only a portion of the total cost of the scheme of development and takes the form of a free grant, whether of a definite sum, a percentage of the total cost, or to cover interest charges on a loan to be raised by the territory, if it is to the pecuniary advantage of the territory to obtain the assistance with the condition attached to it

I am, &c.

R. V. VERNON.

Report.

We are informed that in all cases the assistance given to the mandated territory, whatever form it takes, is given on the understanding that it will enable the mandated territory to undertake an advantageous scheme which would have been impracticable without such assistance. We draw the inference from this statement that the assistance would form in the cases under consideration a substantial part of the moneys to be expended and not a mere colourable contribution. We are further asked to assume that it will be to the pecuniary advantage of the territory to obtain the assistance with the proposed condition attached to it.

We are of opinion that in such circumstances the proposed condition as to purchase of materials may properly be attached to the grant of assistance.

F. W. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.

Law Officers' Department,
March 8, 1932.

[W 8920/72/50/1932]

No. 2^B.

[Air Ministry.]

[June 9, 1932.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers and Counsel.

HEREWITH are sent:—

1. Convention relating to the Regulation of Aerial Navigation, dated 13th October, 1919.
2. Air Navigation Act, 1920.
3. Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order, 1923, as subsequently amended.
4. Case and Opinion of Law Officers of 7th December, 1925.
5. Case and Opinion of Law Officers of 20th May, 1931.
6. Merchant Shipping (Safety and Load Line Conventions) Act, 1932.
7. Supplementary Memorandum and Minute by Secretary, Air Ministry, with regard to the position from the Administrative standpoint in respect of the Air Navigation Act and Air Navigation Order.

Power to make Orders in Council
under "The Air Navigation Act, 1920," to give effect to provisions of Air
Navigation
Convention.

1. The questions on which the advice of the Law Officers and Counsel is desired in this case are with regard to the scope and extent of the powers of making Orders in Council for carrying out, giving effect to or applying the International Convention for the Regulation of Air Navigation or for making special provisions in relation to Air Navigation which are conferred by Sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Air Navigation Act, 1920.

2. The Law Officers have already advised in two cases as to the power to give effect by Order in Council under the Air Navigation Act to specific restrictions on Air Navigation which it was then desired to impose, but it has now become necessary to revise and remake the Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order, 1923, which was made under the powers conferred by the Air Navigation Act, and for this purpose and in this connexion it is desired to obtain the opinion of the Law Officers and Counsel with regard to certain general questions which have arisen as to the application of the opinions above referred to.

[8717]

E

3. As the Law Officers and Counsel are aware, the International Convention for the Regulation of Air Navigation, which was signed in 1919 and came into force (as respects Great Britain and other signatory States who had notified their adherence) in 1922, makes provision for the freedom of passage of aircraft of contracting States over the territory of other States, and with regard to the regulation and control of such traffic.

4. Certain of the provisions of the original Convention have from time to time been modified in manner provided in the Convention, that is to say by or through a permanent body established by the Convention (see Article 34) and known as "The International Commission for Air Navigation." A print of the Convention as now in force is herewith.

5. The Convention provides that contracting States undertake in time of peace to accord freedom of innocent passage to aircraft of other contracting States, provided that the conditions laid down in the Convention are observed and that regulations made by a contracting State as to admission over its territory of the aircraft of other contracting States are to be applied without distinction of nationality (Article 2).

6. It deals with the nationality, registration and marking of Aircraft (Articles 6, 7 and 10), and requires aircraft engaged in international navigation to be provided with a Certificate of Airworthiness (Article 11) and the Commanding Officer and operating crew of every aircraft to be provided with Certificates of Competency and licences (Article 12). It requires every aircraft engaged in International Navigation to be provided with Certificates of Registration and Airworthiness, Certificates and Licences of the Commanding Officer and Crew, passenger lists and bills of lading and log books and (if equipped with wireless) a wireless licence (Article 19). It prohibits the carriage by aircraft of explosives, arms and munitions of war (Article 26), and permits contracting States to prohibit or regulate the carriage of photographic apparatus or other objects (Articles 27 and 29). It enables contracting States to require aircraft passing from one State to another to land at an aerodrome fixed by the latter State, to visit aircraft upon departure or landing and to verify documents (Articles 15 and 21), and empowers contracting States to establish reservations and restrictions in favour of their national aircraft in connexion with carriage of persons and goods for hire between points on their own territory (Article 16).

7. Each contracting State undertakes (Article 25) to adopt measures to ensure that every aircraft flying above the limits of its territory and that every aircraft wherever it may be carrying its nationality mark shall comply with the Regulations contained in Annex D to the Convention. (These Regulations consist of rules as to lights, rules as to signals and rules for air traffic).

The provisions of the Convention are completed by the Annexes A to H.

8. It will be observed that while in most cases the provisions of the Convention are framed in mandatory form, so as to cast on each contracting State concerned a definite obligation to see that they are complied with, some provisions are framed in an optional form, so as to allow each contracting State a discretion as to whether any, and if so what, effect is to be given to them. Articles 11, 12 and 19 of the Convention (which are referred to above) are examples of the "mandatory" provisions; each of these Articles provides that something "shall" be done. Article 3, on the other hand (which provides that each contracting State is to be "entitled" for military reasons or in the interest of public safety to prohibit the aircraft of other contracting States from flying over certain areas of its territory under the penalties provided by its legislation, and subject to no distinction being made in this respect between its private aircraft and those of the other contracting States), is an example of the "optional" provisions. Further examples of the "optional" type of provision are to be found in Article 13 (second paragraph), Articles 16, 21, 27 and 28, Annex E, Section 1, and Annex H, paragraphs 6, 8 and 15.

9. Moreover, it will be observed that in two cases at least the words of the Convention imply that each contracting State may make regulations with respect to certain matters affecting air navigation for which no specific provision is made by the Convention, see, for instance, Article 2 (which implies that each contracting State may make regulations as to the admission over its territory of the aircraft of other States), and Article 15 (which implies that each contracting State may make regulations as to the aerodromes at which aircraft coming from another State are to land).

10. The Air Navigation Act, 1920, is described as "An Act to enable effect to be given to a Convention for regulating Air Navigation and to make further provision for the control and regulation of Aviation" and in the preamble (after reference to the Convention) it is recited that it is expedient to make further provision for controlling and regulating the navigation of aircraft whether British or foreign within the limits of His Majesty's jurisdiction, and in the case of British aircraft, for regulating the navigation thereof both within such jurisdiction and elsewhere, and also that it is expedient that provision should be made by Parliament for enabling effect to be given to the Convention.

11. Section 1 of the Act provides that His Majesty may make such Orders in Council as appear to him necessary for carrying out the Convention and for giving effect thereto or to any of the provisions thereof or to any amendment which may be made under Article 34 thereof.

12. Section 2 provides that His Majesty may by Order in Council direct that the provisions of the Convention for the time being in force or any of them and whether or not those provisions are limited to aircraft of any special description or engaged in any special kind of navigation shall apply to or in relation to any aircraft in or over the British Islands or the territorial waters adjacent thereto, and may make such consequential and supplementary provisions as appear necessary or expedient for the purpose of such application.

13. Section 3 provides that, without prejudice to the generality of the powers thereinbefore conferred, an Order in Council under Part I of the Act may make provision for certain specified matters which are set out in the Section under the letters (a) to (m).

Section 17 of the Act contains provisions as to the making of Orders in Council under the Act.

14. Orders in Council dealing with Air Navigation under the powers conferred by the Air Navigation Act, 1920, have been made from time to time. The Order at present in force in relation to air navigation generally in this country is the Air Navigation (Consolidation) Order, 1923, as amended by further Orders. A copy of such Order in consolidated form is herewith together with copies of three further Orders of 12th February, 1931, 12th February, 1931, and 19th May, 1931, respectively which contain amendments made subsequently to the printing of the consolidated form of Order but which do not materially affect the questions dealt with in this Case.

15. Article 2 of the Order deals with the aircraft to which the Order applies.

Other Articles may be divided generally into the following groups:—

Conditions of flying—Articles 3, 4, 5, 13(A), 14, 14(A), 15 and 18, which contain requirements as to registration, certificates of airworthiness, certificates of competency and licences for personnel, equipment and documents to be carried and articles not to be carried.

Safety—Articles 9, 12 and 13.

Article 6 includes in the Order the provisions of the Schedules to the Order numbered from I to VIII, which deal in detail with the following matters:—

Schedule I. Registration and marking. Schedule II. Certificates of airworthiness. Schedule III. Log Books. Schedule IV. Section 1. Rules as to lights. Section 2. Rules as to signals. Section 3. General rules for air traffic. Section 5. Special rules for air traffic on and in the vicinity of aerodromes open to public use. Schedule V. Licensing of personnel. Schedule VI. Fees. Schedule VII. Prohibited areas. Schedule VIII. Customs.

Enforcement of the Order—Article 27, which prescribes penalties for contraventions of the Order, and Articles 16, 17, 24 and 28, which contain provisions the object of which appears to be to enable the Air Ministry to enforce compliance with the provisions of the Order.

16. The Order also contains a certain number of isolated provisions of an ancillary nature, such as Article 11 as to photography from aircraft, Articles 19 and 20 dealing with aerial lighthouses and the exhibition of false lights, Article 21 as to the method of making and receiving signals, and Article 22 as to points of entrance and departure for aircraft, and route to be followed.

Article 30 provides that the Secretary of State may issue such directions as he thinks fit for the purpose of supplementing or giving full effect to the provisions of the Order including the Schedules thereto and directions dealing with matters expressed in the Order in Council to be subject to such directions have from time to time been issued.

17. It will be observed that while the provisions of the Order in Council may be said to be based generally upon the provisions of the Convention it has been necessary to expand and add to these provisions in some cases in matters of detail and of substance. For instance no provision will be found in the Convention corresponding to the provisions of the Order contained in the provisions to Article 3(1), Articles 4(2), 5(1), 7(1), 8, 9, 10, 12, 19, 20, 21(2), 24, 27 or 28, or in paras. 2 to 6 of Schedule I or Schedule VI; and although Schedule II of the Order is to a certain extent based on paragraphs 1 to 3 of Annex B of the Convention, the provisions of the Convention have been considerably amplified in that Schedule (as is plainly contemplated by paragraph 5 of Annex B of the Convention itself); and moreover there is nothing in the Convention corresponding to paragraphs 8 and 9 of Schedule II of the Order.

18. The Law Officers and Counsel will gather from what is stated above that it has been found necessary in practice and for the purpose of constituting what is in effect a code governing civil aviation in this country to include restrictions and obligations in the Order in Council which, while not inconsistent with the provisions of the Convention are not in fact in terms provided for or in some instances even indicated in the Convention. The Convention suggests the scheme in broad outline but it has been necessary to fill in the details in some parts.

19. The Treasury Solicitor understands that it was considered when the Order in Council was originally framed that the powers conferred by Sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, were sufficiently wide to enable this to be done. Section 1 of the Act was interpreted as conferring power to make such Orders in Council as might appear to be necessary for carrying out and giving effect to the Convention or any provision of the Convention, including the "optional" provisions (i.e., the provisions of Article 3 and other Articles to which attention has been drawn on page 2, paragraph 8). Having regard, however, to the fact that the Convention is an international agreement, Section 1 was regarded as dealing primarily with the international aspect of air navigation; and Section 2 was regarded as dealing primarily with the regulation of air navigation within the territorial jurisdiction of the British Islands. As respects navigation within those territorial limits, Section 2 was regarded as empowering the Orders in Council to make such consequential and supplementary provisions as might appear necessary or expedient for the purpose of the application of the Convention within those limits. Section 3, on the other hand, was regarded as empowering Orders in Council to make provision with respect to thirteen different heads of subject matter, whether the subject matter under any of the thirteen heads was dealt with in the Convention or not: it was thought that the only limit to the power of making provisions as to the matters dealt with in Section 3 was possibly this—that in cases where any of these matters are dealt with by the Convention, the provision made by the Order in Council with respect to that matter must not be in breach of the Convention.

20. In two instances, however, since the original Order in Council was framed a question has arisen as to the power to prohibit by Order in Council under the Act of 1920 the doing of certain things which has involved some consideration of the scope and extent of the powers exercisable by Order in Council under Sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Act of 1920.

The first question arose in 1925 as respects the power to prohibit or restrict photography from aircraft. This question was considered by the Law Officers of the day and the Law Officers and Counsel may be referred to the Case and Opinion of 7th December, 1925, which is sent herewith.

The second question arose in May 1931, as respects the existence of power to declare by Order in Council the precincts of Windsor Castle, a prohibited area from which all aircraft would be excluded. The Law Officers and Counsel are referred to the Case and Opinion of the Law Officers of the day of 20th May, 1931, herewith.

21. Certain difficulties have arisen with regard to the general application of these opinions and as to the scope and extent within which Orders in Council may be made under Sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Act of 1920 with regard to which it is now desired to obtain the further advice of the Law Officers.

22. In both of the cases above referred to the Law Officers were asked to advise upon a question whether or not specific proposals of a definite nature could be given effect to by Order in Council under the Air Navigation Act, 1920—no general question was in either of these cases raised as to the scope and extent of the powers to be exercised by Orders in Council under the Act in the different circumstances which might arise and it is felt that there may be difficulty in applying as a matter of general application advice given in reference to the particular circumstances of the special case actually under consideration.

23. In the case of the first of the two questions above referred to (power to prohibit photography) Article 27 of the Convention provides that each State may prohibit or regulate the carriage or use of photographic apparatus but whether or not any steps are taken to do so is left entirely optional to the State concerned. The Law Officers advised that an Order in Council could be made under the provisions of Section 3 (e) of the Act of 1920 (which provides that an Order in Council may be made making provision as to the conditions under which aircraft may be used for carrying goods, mails or passengers), but that apart from this special provision there was nothing in the Air Navigation Act to enable an Order in Council to be made prohibiting aerial photography. They added that in their Opinion an Order in Council containing a prohibition which is not found in the Convention cannot to that extent be said to carry out or give effect to or apply the provisions of the Convention.

24. The general propositions implicit in the opinion of 7th December, 1925, appear to be as follows:—that there is no power under Section 1 or 2 of the Act to give effect by Order in Council to the provisions of the Convention which; like Article 27, are optional and not mandatory; under Section 3 of the Act, on the other hand, the Order in Council may make provision for any of the matters specifically enumerated in that section, whether that provision gives effect to a corresponding provision of the Convention or not.

The Air Ministry have experienced some difficulty in applying these general propositions to all cases where a similar question arises, more especially in view of the second opinion referred to above.

25. It is thought that it may be of assistance to indicate by way of illustration the sort of difficulties which have presented themselves on a consideration of the consolidated Order as it at present stands in connexion with the drafting and preparation of the new Order, which is now contemplated.

26. Article 3 of the Convention, which deals with prohibited areas, is a provision of the same type as Article 27, in that it merely entitles each Contracting State to take certain action if it chooses. If the propositions set out above correctly represent the effect of the opinion of 1925 and are of general application, there is apparently no power under Sections 1 or 2 of the Act to give effect to Article 3 of the Convention. The only power to prohibit aircraft from flying over certain areas must be found, if it exists at all, in Section 3. The only one of the paragraphs of Section 3 which deals with the matter is paragraph (m). The last words of that paragraph authorise any steps to be taken for preventing aircraft from flying over prohibited areas, which were authorised to be taken under Section 2 of the Aerial Navigation Act, 1913. The steps so authorised are shooting down the defaulting aircraft. It appears to follow that the only provisions which can be inserted in the Order with respect to prohibited areas is that aircraft which fly over them can be shot down; they cannot be fined under the first words of paragraph (m) because, ex hypothesi, there can be no provision in the Order in Council prohibiting aircraft from flying over the areas in question except by virtue of the last words of paragraph (m). As a matter of fact, the existing Air Navigation Order, by the combined effect of Articles 4 (i) (iii) and 27 and Schedule VII, provides that the owners and pilots of aircraft which fly over prohibited areas at a lower altitude than 6,000 feet may be penalised by fine and imprisonment. For the foregoing reasons, however, it is doubted, in view of the opinion of 1925, whether this provision is intra vires.

27. The second paragraph of Article 13 of the Convention is again a provision of the same type as Article 27. It gives each State a right to refuse to recognise for the purpose of flights within its own territory certificates granted to one of its own nationals by another contracting State. Effect has in fact been given to this Article by Article 4(1) (iv) of the Air Navigation Order. Here again, it may be doubted whether this provision of the Order is intra vires, if the propositions implicit in the Law Officers' opinion of 1925 are to be applied generally. For on those propositions there is no power to give effect to the second paragraph of Article 13 under Sections 1 or 2 of the Act, and it is difficult to find any provision of Section 3 of the Act which will meet the case: Section 3(c) seems to be directed entirely to the manner and conditions of the issue of certificates and licences by the Secretary of State, relying apparently on Article 13 of the Convention combined with Sections 1 and 2 of the Act to regulate the recognition of certificates and licences issued by other States.

28. Article 16 of the Convention is another provision of the same type, empowering each State to establish reservations and restrictions in favour of its national aircraft. The Air Navigation Order has not as yet given effect to this provision: but, in view of certain recent amendments of the Convention, it is contemplated that effect may have to be given to it. If so, the same questions arise again. On the basis of the Law Officers' opinion, there is apparently no power to give effect to Article 16 of the Convention under Sections 1 or 2 of the Act; but apparently there is power to give effect to it under Section 3(e) of the Act, since the Air Ministry were advised by the Law Officers' opinion that there was power to give effect to Article 27 of the Convention under Section 3(c) of the Act.

29. Article 21 of the Convention is another provision of the same type: it empowers the proper authorities of each contracting State to demand the production of documents with which an aircraft must be provided. Effect is given to Article 21 of the Convention by Article 17 of the Air Navigation Order. Here, again, on the basis of the Law Officers' opinion, there is apparently no power to give effect to Article 21 of the Convention under Sections 1 or 2 of the Act. Under Section 3(c) of the Act, there is apparently power to make provision as to the production of certificate and licences: but under Article 19 of the Convention (to which effect is given in Article 15 of the Order in Council) aircraft have to be provided not only with certificates and licences but also with log-books and, in the case of aircraft carrying passengers, a list of names, and, in the case of aircraft carrying freight, bills of lading and manifest. Presumably, in the case of aircraft carrying goods or passengers, a provision in the Order in Council requiring the production of log-books, lists of passengers, bills of lading and manifest can be justified as a condition of the use of the aircraft under Section 3(e) of the Act; but it is difficult to find any paragraph of Section 3 which would justify a provision requiring the production of log-books by other aircraft.

30. Article 28 (another "optional" provision) is so similar in form and subject matter to Article 27, on which the Law Officers' opinion of 1925 was written, that it is thought that the opinion must clearly govern both Articles; the result being that there is no power under Sections 1 or 2 of the Act to give effect to Article 28 of the Convention, and effect can only be given to that Article, if at all, under Section 3(e), or possibly Section 3(j) of the Act. No effect has yet been given by Order in Council to Article 28 of the Convention, but it is possible that occasion may arise making it desirable to give effect to it.

31. Annex E, Section 1 of the Convention, contains another "optional" provision, in that it empowers each contracting State to impose conditions for obtaining pilots' licences more stringent than those laid down in the Convention (or in the case of licences only valid for internal traffic less stringent). Here again, it appears to follow from the Law Officers' opinion that there is no power to give effect to these provisions of Annex E of the Convention under Sections 1 or 2 of the Act. It is thought, however, that there is power to give effect to them under Section 3(c) of the Act, which specifically enables the Order in Council to prescribe the conditions of the issue and renewal of any certificate or licence required by the Order or by the Convention. Section 3(c) of the Act, therefore, appears to allow the Order to prescribe whatever conditions appear expedient for the issue of pilots' licences, so long as the conditions are not in breach of the Convention; and in fact conditions more stringent than those laid down in the Convention have in the case of certain licences been prescribed by the Secretary of State under paragraph 4 of Schedule V of the Order in Council.

32. Paragraphs 6 and 8 of Annex H of the Convention are provisions of the same type, but are of such minor importance that it is unnecessary to discuss them.

Paragraph 15, however, of Annex H, is of considerable importance in that it entitles each contracting State to forbid the throwing of articles out of aircraft while in flight. Effect has in fact been given to this provision by Article 13 of the Air Navigation Order. It would appear doubtful, however, on the basis of the Law Officers' opinion of 1925, whether this article of the Air Navigation Order is intra vires. The provision, being an "optional" provision, cannot be carried into effect (on the basis of the Law Officers' opinion) under Sections 1 or 2 of the Act. Presumably, under Section 3(e) of the Act, it could be made a condition of carrying goods, mails and passengers that Article 13 of the Air Navigation Order should be observed. That Article, however, is not confined to aircraft carrying goods, mails and passengers, but is of general application, as indeed is obviously desirable. The only provision of Section 3 which could justify the application of Article 13 of the Order to all aircraft is apparently paragraph (j), which allows the Order in Council to supplement the Convention by general safety regulations. The trouble, however, is that the provision in question in the Convention appears not among the provisions dealing with safety, but among the provisions dealing with customs, thus implying that the prohibition of dropping articles from aircraft in flight is to be confined to the purpose of preventing the aircraft from evading Customs duties, and is not to be extended to the purpose of preventing them from endangering persons or property on the ground. It is thought, however, that to draw this inference from the presence of this provision in Annex H is to put too strict a construction on the Convention.

33. The attention of the Law Officers and Counsel should perhaps be drawn in this connexion to Section 68(2) of the Merchant Shipping (Safety and Load Line Conventions) Act 1932. The Treasury Solicitor is informed that this subsection was drafted on the basis of the Law Officers' opinion of 1925 referred to in this case. The shipping Conventions to which this Act gives effect are analogous in many respects to the Aerial Navigation Convention: they deal with load lines and other matters affecting safety of life at sea. The Shipping Conventions contain a very large number of "optional" provisions, i.e., provisions which leave it to the discretion of the contracting Governments whether any and what effect is to be given to them. Many sections of this Act are similar to Section 1 of the Air Navigation Act in empowering the Board of Trade to make such regulations as appear to them "necessary to give effect to the Convention," see e.g., Section 16(2), 24(2) and 42(1). In the circumstances it was considered desirable, in view of the Law Officers' opinion of 1925 given with respect to the Air Navigation Act, to include Section 68(2) in the Act in order to make it clear that the Board had power to give effect to the "optional" provisions of the Convention.

34. In the case of the second of the two Opinions above referred to the question was whether by Order in Council under the Air Navigation Act, 1920, there was power to declare the precincts of Windsor Castle a prohibited area over which aircraft were not to fly. Article 3 of the Convention provides that a contracting State may for military reasons or in the interests of public safety prohibit aircraft from flying over certain areas of its territory. The advice given in this case was that there was not power to declare by Order in Council the required area to be a prohibited area the view being taken that the suggested prohibition could not properly be said to be either "for military reasons" or "in the interest of public safety." The Law Officers added that in their Opinion any Order in Council issued under the Air Navigation Act, 1920, Part I, must be such as to give effect to the Convention. From this it would appear to follow that not only must an Order in Council under Sections 1 and 2 of the Act be such as to give effect to the Convention, but also an Order in Council under Section 3.

35. The Air Ministry find some difficulty in reconciling this proposition with the opinion of 1925. In the opinion of 1925 they were advised that although the prohibition of the carriage of photographic apparatus could not be justified under Section 1 or 2 of the Act, because such a provision was not necessary to give effect to the Convention, it could be justified under Section 3: and they interpreted this opinion as meaning that it was unnecessary, in exercising the powers conferred by Section 3 of the Act, to consider whether or not effect was being given to the Convention. The later opinion of 1931, however, appears to imply that this interpretation of the former opinion of 1925 was incorrect.

But it is not clear that the statement in the Opinion of 1931 to the effect that any Order in Council made under the Air Navigation Act, 1920, Part I, must be such as "to give effect to the Convention" was intended by the use of that expression in that Opinion to imply that the only cases in which effect is given to the Convention are cases in which the Order in Council imposes a restriction required by the Convention. In the case before the Law Officers in 1931 the Law Officers were expressing the opinion that the prohibition which was proposed was not a prohibition of the nature contemplated by the Convention where the Convention definitely dealt with certain prohibitions.

36. The Air Ministry, therefore, desire to be advised to what extent their former interpretation of the opinion of 1925 was wrong, particularly having regard to the "optional" provisions of the Convention, which have been dealt with earlier in this case. It has been previously suggested in this case that, on the basis of the Law Officers' opinion of 1925, it is possible that certain provisions of the Order giving effect to the "optional" provisions of the Convention can be justified under Section 3 of the Act. On the basis of the second opinion, however, this would appear to be doubtful.

37. If it be the case that a provision made by Order in Council by virtue of Section 3 must be such as to give effect to the Convention, the Air Ministry experience great practical difficulty in the general application of that proposition. Several of the matters specifically dealt with in Section 3 are not dealt with at all in the Convention. For instance, Section 3 (i) enables the Order to prescribe the fees to be paid for certificates or licences, but there is no provision in the Convention whatever as respects fees, presumably for the reason that this was regarded as a matter for the domestic legislation of each Government. Again, there is nothing in the Convention as to the matters dealt with in Section 3 (g) of the Act, and little or nothing as to the matters dealt with in Section 3 (b) or 3 (k).

38. In this connexion attention should be drawn again to the provisions of the Air Navigation Order referred to in paragraph 17 on page 4 above, to which there is no counterpart in the Convention. It is conceived that these provisions were inserted in the Order on the supposition that they were partly justified by Section 3 of the Act and partly by the provisions of Section 2 empowering the making of consequential and supplementary provisions, as shown in the following table:—

Provision of Order.	Provision of Act.
The provisoes to Article 3 (i) ...	Section 3 (g).
Article 4 (2) ...	Section 3 (j).
Articles 5 (i) and 7 (i) ...	Section 3 (b) and (e)
Article 8 ...	Section 3 (b).
Articles 9, 10 and 12 ...	Section 3 (j).
Articles 19 and 20 ...	Section 3 (k).
Article 21 (2) ...	Section 3 (i).
Article 24 ...	Partly Section 3 (c), partly consequential and supplementary provisions under Section 2.
Article 27 ...	Section 3 (m).
Article 28 ...	Section 3 (c).
Schedule I, paras. 2 to 6 ...	Partly Section 3 (d), partly consequential and supplementary provisions under Section 2.
Schedule II, paras. 8 and 9 ...	Section 3 (e) and (j).
Schedule VI ...	Section 3 (i).

39. In the circumstances the Air Ministry wish to be advised how far the proposition that Orders in Council made by virtue of Section 3 of the Act must be such as to give effect to the Convention is to extend.

40. It is desired by the Air Ministry to submit to the Law Officers and Counsel for their consideration the following general observations with regard to provisions of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, as respects Orders in Council made under the Act.

The long title of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, describes the Act as "An Act to enable effect to be given to a Convention for regulating Air Navigation and to make further provision for the control and regulation of Aviation." Similarly in the preamble to the Act, after referring to the Convention, it is recited that it is expedient to make further provision for controlling and regulating the navigation of aircraft whether British or foreign within the limits of His Majesty's jurisdiction (as defined in the preamble), and in the case of British aircraft for regulating the navigation thereof both within such jurisdiction and elsewhere. This recital is followed by a recital that it is also expedient that provision should be made by Parliament for enabling effect to be given to the Convention.

It seems clear therefore that the Act is intended to do more than to give effect to the Convention and the Convention in fact seems to be given rather the second place in the preamble.

It may be said, it is true, that Part II of the Act contains the "further provision" which in accordance with the preamble is to be made for controlling and regulating the navigation of aircraft, and that Part I is limited to giving effect to the Convention. In support of this construction it may further be said that regard must be had to the fact that Part I of the Act (in which Sections 1, 2, and 3 are contained) is headed "Power to apply Convention," and this construction moreover may be thought to derive support from the statement in the Law Officers' opinion of the 20th May, 1931, that "any Order in Council issued under the Air Navigation Act, 1920, Part I, must be such as to give effect to the Convention."

It is not clear however that the existence of the heading "Power to apply Convention" was a ground of the Opinion of the 20th May, 1931, and it is submitted for the consideration of the Law Officers and Counsel that the existence of the heading "Power to apply Convention" in Part I of the Act cannot control the express terms of the enactments which follow in Sections 1, 2 and 3, and particularly Section 3. Moreover Section 4 in Part I (which enables the provisions of the Act to be extended to British Possessions other than self-governing Dominions and India) applies to the whole Act and can hardly be appropriately found in Part I if Part I is intended to be definitely confined to giving effect to the Convention.

41. It is further submitted that the same considerations are material to the due interpretation of the scope of Section 3 of the Act, and that even if it be thought that the provisions of Sections 1 and 2 must be limited to matters necessary for carrying out the Convention and for giving effect thereto or to directing that the provisions of the Convention shall apply to or in relation to aircraft in or over the British Islands, &c., Section 3 is not subject to any such limitation, and an Order in Council under Section 3 may make provision for any matter or thing referred to in sub-para. (a) to (m) of Section 3 without regard to the relevance of such matter or thing to the carrying out or giving effect to the Convention, though it may be that in cases where any of these matters are dealt with by the Convention the provisions made by the Order in Council with respect to that matter must not be in breach of the Convention.

The contention that this is so receives, it is submitted, additional support, if the provisions of Section 3 itself are examined. It is to be observed that sub-para. (b) of Section 3 provides (inter alia) for the licensing, &c., of aerodromes. No provision is made in the Convention with regard to this, but the subject is nevertheless one which it seems clear is intended to be dealt with by Order in Council under Section 3. Again sub-para. (c) of Section 3 refers to Certificates or licences "required by the Order or by the Convention," and may therefore be said to extend to certificates and licences not required by the Convention and a similar observation may be made with regard to the provisions of sub-para. (i). Sub-para. (g) of Section 3 provides expressly for exemption from the provisions of the Order or of the Convention being made in certain cases, and sub-para. (j) of Section 3 provides for "supplementing the Convention . . . by general safety regulations" which would appear to contemplate the doing of something which goes further than carrying out or giving effect to the Convention (as in Section 1), or even applying it (as in Section 2), and seems to indicate the provision in the Order in Council of something not included in the Convention, but extraneous and additional to the provisions thereof, viz., general safety regulations.

This sub-paragraph may perhaps be suggested to be of special relevance in this connexion because it seems to indicate, it is suggested, an intention of providing by means of Section 3 (j) for something which is definitely omitted from the Convention.

42. Attention may perhaps also be drawn to the provisions of Section 2 which makes provision for the application of the provisions of the Convention to or in relation to any aircraft in or over the British Islands or the territorial waters adjacent thereto, and provides in particular that such consequential and supplementary provisions may be made as appear necessary or expedient for the purpose of such application. This Section seems clearly therefore to contemplate the application of the Convention not simpliciter as it stands, but with consequential and supplementary provisions (which expression it is submitted is a wide one and might cover a considerable area of variation from the original).

These consequential and supplementary provisions must, it is true, be made for the purpose of the application of the provisions of the Convention, but the provisions of the Convention are nevertheless to that extent clearly intended to be added to or even modified so far as appears "necessary or expedient."

43. In reference to the point referred to above as to the effect to be given to the heading "Power to apply Convention" in the construction of the Sections of the Act which are contained in Part I of the Act and particularly Sections 1, 2 and 3, it is desired to draw the attention of the Law Officers and Counsel to the Cases dealing with the effect to be given to marginal notes and cross-headings in statutes which are collected and commented upon in Craies on Statutes, 3rd Ed., pp. 177-8 and pp. 186-190. The decisions in these cases do not appear to be wholly consistent, and the views put forward by Craies appear to be open to question in some respects and at variance with the views advanced in Roscoe's Nisi Prius 18th Ed., p. 104.

The following observations with reference to marginal notes and cross-headings which have been furnished to the Treasury Solicitor by the Parliamentary Counsel to the Treasury and which it is thought may be of assistance to the Law Officers and Counsel are submitted for their consideration.

As regards marginal notes, there are three early authorities in support of the view that these notes are in some circumstances part of the Act, and that effect should be given to them in construing the Act (see R. v. Milverton 5 A. & E. 841 at p. 854; Sheffield Waterworks v. Bennett L.R. 7 Ex. 409 at p. 421; Venour v. Sellon 2 Ch. D. 522 at p. 525). But the preponderance of opinion in the later cases is in favour of the view that these notes form no part of the Act and cannot be considered for purposes of construction (see Claydon v. Green L.R. 3 C.P. 511 per Willes J. at p. 522; A. G. v. Great Eastern Railway 11 Ch. D. 449 at pp. 460, 461 and 465; in Re Woking Urban Council [1914] 1 Ch. 300 per Phillimore L.J. at p. 322; Wilkes v. Goodwin [1923] 2 K.B. 86 per Scrutton L.J. at p. 100). This modern view of the effect of marginal notes seems to be based on the fact that these notes are not considered by Parliament, and no amendment can be moved to them in Parliament (see per Baggallay L.J. in A.G. v. Great Eastern Railway supra at p. 461, and per Scrutton L.J. in Wilkes v. Goodwin supra): so that they are inserted "not by Parliament nor under the authority of Parliament, but by irresponsible persons" (see per Phillimore L.J. in Re Woking Urban Council supra at p. 322).

As regards cross-headings, on the other hand, there are several clear decisions that these headings are not on the same footing as marginal notes, but are to be treated as part of the Act (see Eastern Counties &c. v. Marriage 9 H.L.C. 32 per Channel B. at p. 41; R. v. Local Government Board 10 Q.B.D. 309 per Brett L.J. at p. 321; Inglis v. Robertson [1898] A.C. 616 per Lord Herschell at p. 630). Again, in Hammersmith Railway Co. v. Brand (L.R. 4 Eng. & Ir. App. 171), both Lord Chelmsford at p. 203 and Lord Colonsay at pp. 209-10 clearly construed a section in the light of the heading to the group of sections in which it was found. On the other hand, Lord Cairns, in a dissenting judgment in the last-mentioned case, at p. 217, was of opinion that headings of groups of sections are "not to be relied on" and that in general they should be treated in much the same way as marginal notes: and again, in Union Steamship Co. v. Melbourne Harbour Trust, 9 A.C. 365, the Judicial Committee held, at p. 369, that a cross-heading in an Australian Act was "inserted for the purpose of convenience of reference and was not intended to control the interpretation of the clauses which follow." It may also be noted that in Lang v. Kerr Anderson & Co. 3 A.C. 529, Lord Cairns held, at p. 536, that the cross-headings in a local Glasgow Act were not to be treated as mere marginal notes only because they were referred to in the body of the Act itself; this passage in Lord Cairns' judgment may be related to the observation of Phillimore L.J. in Re Woking Urban Council [1914] 1 Ch. 300 at p. 322, that where a marginal note is referred to in the Act itself it may well be that it does form part of the Act.

It may be observed that in none of these cases dealing with cross-headings has it ever been brought to the notice of the Court that for the purposes of Parliamentary procedure cross-headings are on exactly the same footing as marginal notes (see May's Parliamentary Practice 13th Ed., p. 404, note 5): cross-headings are no more regarded as part of a Bill than marginal notes, and no amendment can be moved to them. If, therefore, the reason for not recognising the existence of marginal notes in the construction of a statute is that they are not inserted by the authority of Parliament and cannot be amended by Parliament, the same reasoning should apply to cross-headings.

The reason why no attention has been drawn to this point in the courts is, presumably, that the Parliamentary ruling as to marginal notes was laid down and generally accepted many years ago; whereas the corresponding ruling as to cross-headings became generally accepted only in recent years, after all the cases cited above had been decided. It is true that so early as 1875 the Chairman of Committees ruled that no amendment could be moved to a cross-heading, because it was on the same footing as a marginal note (see Parl. Debs. 3rd Series, vol. 225, p. 1759). This ruling as to cross-headings, however, was not generally observed, until a similar ruling was again given by the Chairman of Committees in 1918 (H.C. Debs. 5th Series, vol. 105, p. 1995), and it is believed that amendments to cross-headings were allowed to be moved as recently as 1911. The ruling of 1918, however, has been regarded as conclusive for the purpose of Parliamentary procedure, and has been invariably observed: with the result that cross-headings are now sometimes altered by the Clerk of the Parliaments after a Bill has been through all its stages and before it receives the Royal Assent, in order to make the cross-headings of the Bill as introduced correspond with the clauses as amended in the course of the proceedings in Parliament.

The attention of the Law Officers and Counsel should, however, be drawn to Section 14 of the Army and Air Force (Annual) Act, 1925, which expressly authorises the Clerk of the Parliaments to alter the cross-headings in the Army Act. That section appears to indicate that, without express statutory authority, the cross-headings could not have been altered. In the light of the Chairman's ruling in 1918, the only explanation which can be offered on this section is that the Army (Annual) Act was originally enacted in 1883 at a time when, not withstanding the ruling in 1875, cross-headings were often regarded as part of an Act and susceptible of amendment in Parliament. It may, therefore, have been felt by the draughtsman that the ratio decidendi of the marginal notes cases was not applicable to cross-headings in statutes passed before the ruling in 1918. The Air Navigation Act, 1920, was, of course, passed after the ruling of 1918.

In any case it is submitted that there is abundant authority for saying that a cross-heading, like a preamble, can only be looked to for purposes of construction in cases of doubt, and cannot be treated as over-riding clear and express words in the sections which follow. On this point, see Union Steamship Co. v. Melbourne Harbour Trust 9 A.C. 365; Latham v. Lafone L.R. 2 Ex. 115 per Kelly C.B. at p. 119; Toronto Corporation v. Toronto Railway [1907] A.C. 315 at p. 324; Fletcher v. Birkenhead Corporation [1907] 1 K.B. 205 per Collins M.R. at p. 213-4 and per Farwell L.J. at p. 218; R. v. Local Government Board 10 Q.B.D. 309 per Brett L.J. at p. 321. If, therefore (as is submitted above), it is clear from the words of Section 3 of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, that that section enables Orders in Council to provide for matters outside the Convention, the express words of that section should not be over-ridden by the cross-heading of the part of the Act in which it appears.

44. A supplementary memorandum dealing with the general position from the administrative point of view as respects the Air Navigation Act, 1920, and the Air Navigation Order has been prepared by the Air Ministry, and it is desired that such memorandum, consisting of the minutes written by Mr. Ross and the Secretary of the Air Ministry (Document 7 herewith), should be submitted to the Law Officers and Counsel with this case.

It is desired by the Air Ministry that it should be stated that the Air Ministry endorse the case, but desire to add the notes contained in the supplementary memorandum to which the attention of the Law Officers and Counsel is accordingly directed, and in particular to the observations contained in the Secretary's minute of the 29th March, 1932.

The Law Officers and Counsel are requested to advise the Air Ministry—

1. Whether or not there is power by virtue of Section 1 of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, to bring into operation by Order in Council made under the Act the provisions of the Convention which are framed in an "optional" form (that is to say provisions framed in a form which allows to each contracting State discretion as to giving effect and as to the effect to be given thereto, as, e.g., the provisions of Article 3 of the Convention and of the second paragraph of Article 13, Articles 16, 21 and 28, Section 1 of Annex E, and paragraph 15 of Annex H of the Convention), or to bring into operation by Order in Council so made any class or classes of such "optional" provisions, and if so to what extent.
2. Whether or not there is power by virtue of Section 2 of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, to bring into operation by Order in Council made under the Act the provisions of the Convention which are framed in an "optional" form (as referred to in Question 1 above), or to bring into operation by Order in Council so made any class or classes of such "optional" provisions, and if so to what extent.
3. Whether or not and to what extent the power conferred by Section 2 of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, of making such consequential and supplementary provisions as appear necessary or expedient for the purpose of applying the provisions of the Convention to or in relation to any aircraft in or over the British Islands or the territorial waters adjacent thereto, as provided by that Section, enables provisions to be brought into operation by Order in Council made under the Act which, although not included in the provisions of the Convention, can be regarded as being consequential upon or supplementary to such provisions (a) in the case of "mandatory" provisions of the Convention, and (b) in the case of "optional" provisions of the Convention.
4. Whether or not there is power by virtue of Section 3 of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, to bring into operation by Order in Council made under the Act the provisions of the Convention which are framed in an "optional" form (as referred to in Question 1 above), or to bring into operation by Order in Council so made any class or classes of such "optional" provisions, and if so to what extent.
5. To what extent it is necessary that the provisions of any Order in Council made under the Act, with respect to the specific matters enumerated in Section 3, Sub-sections (a) to (m), of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, should be such as to carry out or to give effect to or to apply the Convention, or should otherwise relate to the provisions of the Convention.
6. Generally upon the case.

The Air Ministry have informed the Treasury Solicitor that they would desire a Consultation with the Law Officers and Counsel in this Case, at which Parliamentary Counsel and representatives of the Air Ministry could be present if the Law Officers would kindly accord a Consultation.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel.

1. Upon consideration of the full discussion contained in the case submitted for our opinion of the Convention and Air Navigation Act, 1920, we are of opinion that the words of Section 1 of the Air Navigation Act, 1920, are sufficiently wide to permit His Majesty by Order in Council to give effect to the option contained in those provisions of the Convention, which allow each contracting State discretion to do or refrain from doing certain things. Notwithstanding the opinion given on the 7th December, 1925, by the Law Officers with regard to restrictions upon photography, we have come to the conclusion that to limit the words of the Section merely to the making of Orders in Council giving effect to those provisions of the Convention, which are described in our instructions as the mandatory provisions of the Convention, is to narrow unduly the general language of the Section.

2. We are of opinion that, similarly, His Majesty may by Order in Council under Section 2 of the Act give effect to those options as applied to national air navigation as opposed to international air navigation. The extent to which this power goes must be limited to the express or implied intention of the Convention. Orders in Council cannot be made which violate or contradict such express or implied intention.

3. We are of opinion that so long as the matters dealt with in an Order in Council are consequential upon or supplemental to the provisions of the Convention, whether mandatory or optional, for the purpose of applying these provisions, the Order in Council would be intra vires in so far as it applies to national air navigation. It is impossible to lay down any more definite proposition; and each proposed Order in Council must be considered on its merits, having regard to the circumstances of each case.

4 and 5. We are of opinion that under Section 3 Orders in Council may validly be made dealing with the specific matters set out in subsections (a) to (m). Here again such Orders in Council, though dealing with such specific matters, must not violate or contradict the express or implied intention of the Convention.

6. Generally we have nothing to add.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.
WILFRID LEWIS.

*Law Officers' Department,
June 9, 1932.*

[W 9197/192/50]

No. 2^c.

[Dominions Office.]

[July 29, 1932.]

Dominions Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

December 31, 1931

Gentlemen,

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Thomas to state that he desires to submit to you certain questions with regard to the steps to be taken to assert His Majesty's sovereignty over, and to provide for the administration of, a part of the Antarctic Continent which it has for some time been contemplated should be placed under the authority of His Majesty's Government in the Commonwealth of Australia, viz., that part of the continent (with the exception of Adélie Land) which lies between the 45th and 160th meridians of east longitude. An explanatory map is annexed to the enclosed memorandum E (30) 20, to which reference is made subsequently.

2. The origin of the present policy in the Antarctic is explained in a secret memorandum Dominions, No. 78 (a copy of which is forwarded herewith) which was enclosed in the letter from the Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the 27th November, 1922. It will be seen that it is suggested in this memorandum that the methods of placing portions of the Antarctic under Australia and New Zealand which would be most in accordance with past procedure would be (a) in the case of Australia to follow the Papua precedent and to issue Letters Patent placing the territory under the Commonwealth in the manner contemplated in section 122 of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act; (b) in the case of New Zealand to follow the precedent of the Kermadec and Cook Islands and to issue an Order in Council under the Colonial Boundaries Act, 1895. It was pointed out, however, that under either of the above two methods resolutions of both Houses of the Dominion Parliaments would be necessary and it was suggested that the object desired might equally well be obtained by the less elaborate method of issuing Letters Patent appointing the Governor-General for the time being of the Dominion concerned to be Governor for the portion of the Steps to be taken to assert His Majesty's sovereignty over, and to provide for administration of, part of the Antarctic Continent.

Antarctic territory in question and instructing him only to exercise his powers on the advice of his Ministers for the Dominion.

3. It will be seen from the Colonial Office letter above referred to that in the case of the Ross Dependency the New Zealand Government indicated their preference for the latter method, but it appeared from the Law Officers' report of the 3rd January, 1923, that while it was considered possible to confer upon the Governor-General of New Zealand powers of the nature desired, it was thought that this could only be done under the British Settlements Act and not by way of Letters Patent of the nature of those set out in Annexure C to the memorandum, Dominions, No. 78. This opinion was based upon the view that the territory in question must be regarded as a "British Settlement" within the meaning of the definition in the British Settlements Act, 1887. The Law Officers would also appear to have taken the view that, notwithstanding the provisions of section 3, section 2 of the British Settlements Act gave power to delegate by Order in Council to one person (who was to be outside the territory) the powers conferred by the Act on His Majesty in Council. A copy of the Order in Council relating to the Ross Dependency which was accordingly issued on the 30th July, 1923, is enclosed.

4. The further steps which have been taken since that date to establish British control in the Antarctic are described in some detail in the enclosed memorandum E (30) 20 prepared for the use of the last Imperial Conference, but for present purposes it is sufficient to invite your special attention to paragraphs 6-8 and paragraphs 55-64 of the annex to this memorandum. The work of the expedition under Sir Douglas Mawson, which was undertaken to carry out the second stage of the measures recommended at the Imperial Conference of 1926, has now been completed, and a copy of a despatch from the Commonwealth Government forwarding Sir D. Mawson's report on his work is enclosed. As stated in this despatch "the greater portion of the sector" (by which the coastline forming the base of the sector is presumably meant) "between 160°E. and 45°E. has been discovered or revisited. British sovereignty has been formally proclaimed on five occasions extending over the whole area from 160° to 142°E. and 138°E. to 45°E."

5. It appears desirable that steps should now be taken, in pursuance of the policy recommended at the time of the Imperial Conference of 1926 and reaffirmed by the conference of 1930, to provide for the administration of the area in question by placing it under the control of His Majesty's Government in the Commonwealth of Australia. In this connexion the following main questions arise: (1) Whether the action already taken to assert British title to the territory in question may, in the peculiar circumstances appertaining to Antarctic discovery, be regarded as sufficient or whether any formal act of annexation is now desirable; (2) whether in the particular circumstances the territory in question may properly be defined by means of meridians of longitude meeting at the South Pole; (3) whether any reference is required in the instrument to be issued to the ground on which title is based.

6. As to the first question it will be observed from p. 6 of the memorandum E (30) 20 that the Committee of the Imperial Conference of 1926 stated that the third and final stage should be "the issue of Letters Patent annexing the area and making provision for its government." The phrase "annexing the area" was probably not used in a very technical sense and the question whether, from the point of view of establishing a title to the area on as secure a basis as possible, a formal act of annexation is now desirable appears to require careful consideration.

7. The Law Officers' opinion of the 3rd January, 1923, stated that it was no longer the law that the discovery of previously unknown territory conferred an absolute title upon the State by whom the discovery was made, and that such discovery offered only an inchoate title which was perfected by occupation or by acts of ownership exercised over a long period and acquiesced in by other Powers. The opinion proceeded to state "that it would be unwise to proceed by way of annexation in the Antarctic, and that the Government is right to assert existing British sovereignty in the region now in question." Accordingly, the action which was then taken in connexion with the Ross Dependency proceeded on the basis that a British title by occupation to the area in question already existed.

8. The foundations for similar action in the present case have already been laid. As will be seen from paragraph 8 of the memorandum E (30) 20, action was taken at the Imperial Conference of 1926 to assert British title by discovery to six territories in the area in question. A further advance was made as a result of the Imperial Conference of 1930, when the following passage was inserted in the published summary of proceedings:—

The question of Antarctic exploration was discussed between representatives of the Governments interested. They took note of the fact that, in the exercise of the British title to that part of the Antarctic Continent which lies between Enderby Land and the Ross Dependency, with the exception of the territory of Adélie Land, an expedition organised by His Majesty's Government in the Commonwealth of Australia and led by Sir Douglas Mawson, was despatched to these regions in 1929. The valuable exploratory and scientific work accomplished by this expedition during the season of 1929-30, was reviewed by the representatives of the Governments concerned, who also discussed the arrangements proposed for the continuation of the work during the season of 1930-31.

The whole of that part of the continent (with the exception of the French territory of Adélie Land) which lies between the 45th and 160th meridians of east longitude was thus claimed as British. No protest has been received from any foreign Government, and in these circumstances, and in view also of the additional work since accomplished by the expedition, and the proclamations issued by Sir D. Mawson, it would seem that the action already taken to assert British title to the territory may not unreasonably be regarded as sufficient.

9. With regard to the second question, viz., whether the area claimed may properly be regarded as stretching to the South Pole, it will be observed that in the case of both the Ross Dependency and the Falkland Islands Dependencies, the eastern and western boundaries were defined as lines of longitude which meet at the Pole, and it is contemplated that a similar course should be adopted in the present instance. It is true that some slight distinction can be drawn between the present case and that of the Ross Dependency, in that before the Order in Council in the latter case was issued, the interior had been penetrated, and the Pole itself reached, by British and other explorers; whereas the hinterland of the proposed Commonwealth sector remains wholly unexplored. In this respect, however, the present case is on the same footing as that of the Falkland Islands Dependencies which were extended by Letters Patent in 1917 to the South Pole, although no attempt had ever been made to explore the interior.

10. The policy adopted in the case of the Ross and Falkland Islands Dependencies of claiming sectors of the Antarctic Continent, stretching from the coast line to the Pole itself, seems to have owed its origin to the practice, known as the "sector principle," which has been established during the last century in the Arctic. A note on the "sector principle" in relation to the Arctic is enclosed, from which it will be seen that it is now generally recognised by the interested Powers, with the exception of Norway, that each Power whose mainland territory borders the Arctic circle is entitled to claim any land which may exist, either known or unknown, within the triangle formed by two meridians of longitude, starting from the eastern and western boundaries of its mainland territory and continuing until they meet at the Pole. There is, however, this difference between the Arctic and Antarctic regions. There is no land mass in the Arctic regions, which consist for the most part of numerous islands in frozen seas contiguous to inhabited territory. Surrounding the South Pole, however, there is the vast Antarctic Continent, separated from the nearest inhabited territories by considerable spaces of open and navigable sea. For this reason it was not possible to apply to the Antarctic the "sector principle" as understood in the Arctic, but only a modified form of it, the difference being that whereas in the Arctic the base of each sector is taken to be the eastern and western boundaries of the nearest mainland territory, in the Antarctic the base adopted is that portion of the outlying part of the Antarctic Continent to which title has been established by the Power concerned.

11. It would, however, in any case seem inexpedient to justify the claiming of sectors of the Antarctic Continent by reference to the "sector principle" applied in the Arctic. The only Power which has shown any desire of recent years to acquire territory in the Antarctic is Norway, the very Power which resists the application of the "sector principle" in the Arctic. As is explained in the enclosed note, great pains have been taken to forestall any opposition on the part of the Norwegian Government to the action now contemplated in connexion with the proposed Australian sector, and a friendly understanding has been reached under which an adjoining sector is regarded as open to Norwegian occupation. A Norwegian expedition has already taken advantage of this understanding to claim for Norway areas in this "free" sector, and, if only on this account, it is considered improbable that they would wish to challenge the southward limit of the proposed Australian sector. It is important, however, that they should be given no provocation which might lead them to depart from the understanding reached, and, from this point of view, it would seem very desirable to avoid any reference to the "sector principle" in the Arctic, which they have hitherto felt bound to contest.

12. A further and perhaps even more cogent argument against any reference to conditions in the Arctic lies in the fact that an opportunity would thereby be given to any Power, which wished to do so, to challenge the modified "sector principle," on which British action in the Antarctic has hitherto proceeded, and to press for the application to the Antarctic of the principle already applied in the Arctic. Any development of this kind would be seriously embarrassing, since if the "sector principle" as applied in the Arctic were to be applied to the Antarctic, considerable portions of the Antarctic Continent and adjacent islands now included in the Falkland Islands Dependencies, would fall within the sphere of sovereignty of Argentina and Chile. It is suggested, in these circumstances, that while the Ross and Falkland Islands Dependencies afford good precedents for defining the proposed Commonwealth sector by means of meridians of longitude meeting at the South Pole (and, indeed, it would be difficult to define the Commonwealth sector in any other manner without casting doubt on the validity of those precedents), no attempt should be made to justify such action by reference to practice in the Arctic.

13. There remains the third question, viz., whether it is necessary to make any reference whatever to the grounds on which title is based. On the assumption that you share the opinion expressed in the Law Officers report of 1923, that it would be unwise to proceed by way of annexation in the Antarctic, and provided that the conclusion reached in paragraph 12 above commends itself to you, it would not appear that any such reference is required, and to specify the grounds on which title is based might provoke criticism from foreign Powers which would not otherwise be forthcoming.

14. There is, however, one minor point to which your attention should perhaps be drawn. Sir Douglas Mawson's commission authorised him to take possession (in addition to any territories which he might discover) of seven specified territories, which were identical with the list contained in the published report of the Imperial Conference of 1926 as being areas "to which a British title already exists by virtue of discovery" (see paragraph 8 of the annex to memorandum E (30) 20). Neither the report nor the commission contained any express reference to the region lying between these discovered territories and the South Pole, but you will observe that in the case of six of the seven territories Sir Douglas Mawson's later proclamations in terms covered that region. (The seventh territory, viz., the outlying part of Coats Land, lies outside the proposed Australian sector, and was not visited by the expedition.) There is, of course, no doubt that it was the intention of those concerned with both the report and the commission to cover the whole sector of which the base was the territories referred to, but inasmuch as Sir Douglas Mawson's commission did not in terms authorise him to take possession of anything beyond the main territories, the question whether his action requires something in the nature of ratification by His Majesty in order to render it fully effective may require consideration. For the reasons given above, however, it is hoped that it may be permissible to proceed on the basis that each of the mentioned territories included the hinterland behind it up to the Pole, which basis the Imperial Conference of 1926 agreed should be accepted in the case of the French territory of Adélie Land.

15. When the above questions have been decided, the question will arise whether the instrument itself should take the form of a Statutory Order in Council on the lines of the Ross Dependency Order in Council of the 30th July, 1923, or whether it would be better to adopt the procedure referred to under (a) in paragraph 2 above, and place the territory under the authority of the Commonwealth of Australia by means of Letters Patent or a Prerogative Order in Council. Precedents for the two latter courses exist in the Letters Patent of the 18th March, 1902, relating to British New Guinea, the Norfolk Island Order in Council of the 30th March, 1914, and the Order in Council of the 23rd July last, relating to the Ashmore and Cartier Islands. Copies of these instruments are enclosed. If, however, procedure by way of Letters Patent or Prerogative Order in Council were followed, legislation by the Commonwealth Government would be necessary, and from this point of view the Commonwealth Government might possibly prefer the simpler process adopted in the case of the Ross Dependency, under which legislation by the Dominion Government is not required.

16. On the other hand, while it would apparently be in order, on the view expressed by the Law Officers in 1923, to issue an Order in Council following the lines of the Ross Dependency Order, Mr. Thomas is somewhat doubtful whether in the case of the territory now in question it would be entirely appropriate to make use of provisions of the British Settlements Act, if it can be avoided, since it must be admitted that this territory is ice-bound and less habitable even than the Ross Dependency, and that the description of it as a "British Settlement" involves an artificial interpretation of the phrase, particularly having regard to the wording of the preamble of the Act. Further, the view has always been held by the legal advisers to this Department that there is no power to delegate the powers conferred by the British Settlements Act on His Majesty in Council to less than three persons, who must be persons within the settlement, and this was the view taken by the Law Officers in their report of the 29th February, 1912, to the Colonial Office. Reference was made to this report in the letter from the Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the 27th November, 1922, and Mr. Thomas assumes, therefore, that this aspect of the matter had been carefully considered when the Law Officers reported on the 3rd January, 1923, that it was possible, under the British Settlements Act, to confer the desired powers on the Governor-General of New Zealand by Order in Council. Nevertheless, if there is any possible doubt as to the validity of this course, an additional argument would be provided for following a different procedure in the present case.

17. It will be necessary to consult the Commonwealth Government as to the steps to be taken, but it is thought that it would expedite matters if the actual draft of the instrument to be issued could be submitted to them for concurrence. On the assumption that title may be regarded as already existing, and that it will not be considered necessary to specify the grounds on which title is based, the enclosed alternative draft instruments have been prepared, viz., (a) an Order under the British Settlements Act following the precedent of the Ross Dependency Order in Council; (b) (i) a prerogative Order on the lines of the Order in Council relating to the Ashmore and Cartier Islands; (b) (ii) Letters Patent placing the territory under the Commonwealth of Australia in the manner contemplated in Section 122 of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act (on the lines of the Letters Patent dated the 18th March, 1902, relating to British New Guinea).

18. Mr. Thomas would be glad if you could take these papers into consideration at an early date and advise him—

- (1) Whether the action already taken to assert British title to the territory in question may, in the peculiar circumstances appertaining to Antarctic discovery, be regarded as sufficient, or whether any formal act of annexation is now desirable.
- (2) Whether, in the particular circumstances, the territory in question may properly be defined by meridians of longitude meeting at the South Pole.
- (3) Whether any reference is required in the instrument to be issued to the grounds on which title is based.
- (4) If the answers to the first and second questions are in the affirmative, which of the two alternative methods of procedure is considered the more appropriate, viz., the issue of a Statutory Order in Council under the British Settlements Act in the terms of draft (a), or the issue of an instrument invoking the provisions of Section 122 of the Commonwealth Constitution Act, and, if the latter, whether such instrument should take the form of a Prerogative Order in Council in the terms of draft (b) (i) or of Letters Patent in the terms of draft (b) (ii).

1932

42

GENERAL.

- (5) If none of the enclosed drafts is considered suitable, what other form of instrument could properly be issued.
- (6) Whether, before issuing such an Order in Council or similar instrument, any preliminary action is considered necessary with a view to confirming the proclamations already issued asserting His Majesty's sovereignty over the territory in question.
- (7) If the answer to either the first or second question, or both, is in the negative, what procedure should be adopted to meet the object in view.
- (8) Generally.

I am, &c.
H. N. TAIT.

List of Papers.

1. Imperial Conference Paper E (30) 20.
2. Memorandum, Dominions, No. 78.
3. Ross Dependency Order in Council, 1923 [S.P., Vol. 117, p. 91].
4. Commonwealth of Australia despatch, July 13, 1931 (report of Sir D. Mawson's work in Antarctic [W 11079/29/50 (1931)]).
5. Note on Sector Principle [W 399/192/50 (1932)].
6. Letters Patent, British New Guinea, March 18, 1902 [S.P., Vol. 110, p. 66].
7. Order in Council, Norfolk Islands, March 30, 1914 [S.P., Vol. 107, p. 300].
8. Order in Council, Ashmore and Cartier Islands, July 23, 1931 [U 572/517/750 (1931)].
9. Draft Order in Council (a) [W 399/192/50 (1932)].
10. Draft Order in Council (b) (i) [see Annex].
11. Draft Letters Patent (b) (ii) [W 399/192/50 (1932)].

Report.

1. We are of opinion that the action already taken to assert British title to the territory in question is amply sufficient, and no formal act of annexation is now desirable, still less necessary.

2. Yes. The circumstances are peculiar, and the ordinary principles governing the limitation of the territory to which a title to sovereignty extends when such title is acquired by discovery followed by occupation are scarcely applicable. The precedents afforded by the Falkland Islands and the Ross Sea Dependencies should be followed.

3. No. All that is required is an unequivocal assertion of sovereignty.

4. We agree with the Report of our predecessors of the 29th February, 1912, as to the effect of Sections 2 and 3 of the British Settlements Act, 1887, and, having regard to the practical inconvenience of an exercise of the power of delegation to three or more persons under Section 3, we consider the better and appropriate course is to proceed by way of an Order in Council in the terms of draft (b) (i) with a view to the exercise of the powers conferred by Article 122 of the Constitution of the Commonwealth.

5. This does not arise.

6. No further preliminary action is needed. The step proposed will be an assertion of sovereignty and will of necessity confirm and ratify the Proclamation already made.

7. This does not arise.

8. We have nothing to add.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
B. F. MERRIMAN.

*Law Officers' Department,
July 29 1932.*

GENERAL.

43

ANNEX.

Draft Order in Council, (b) (i).

Whereas that part of the territory in the Antarctic Seas which comprises all the islands and territories other than Adélie Land which are situated south of the 60th degree of south latitude and lying between the 160th degree of east longitude and the 45th degree of east longitude is territory over which His Majesty has sovereign rights;

And whereas by the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act it is provided that the Parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia may make laws for the government of any territory placed by the King under the authority of and accepted by the Commonwealth;

And whereas it is expedient that the aforesaid territory should be placed under the authority of the Commonwealth of Australia:

Now, therefore, His Majesty, by virtue and in exercise of the power in that behalf in His Majesty vested, is pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered as follows:—

- (1) That part of His Majesty's dominions in the Antarctic which comprises all the islands and territories other than Adélie Land which are situated south of the 60th degree of south latitude and lying between the 160th degree of east longitude and the 45th degree of east longitude is hereby placed under the authority of the Commonwealth of Australia.
- (2) This Order shall come into operation on such date, after legislation shall have been passed by the Parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia providing for the acceptance of the said territory and the Government therefor, as may be fixed by proclamation by the Governor-General of the Commonwealth of Australia.

[F 6094/308/10]

No. 2^d.

[Treasury Solicitor.]

[July 29, 1932.]

Case for the Law Officers of the Crown and Counsel.

THE following papers are sent:—

- (1) Copy Judgment of the Full Court at Hong Kong, Rex v. Chung Tam Kwong and others [see F 3628/308/10 (1932)].
- (2) Copy Despatches and Departmental correspondence [see F 3628/308/10 (1932)].
- (3) Copy Memorandum by the 3rd Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office [see F 3628/308/10 (1932)].

The opinion of the Law Officers is desired on certain questions arising out of a decision of the Full Court at Hong Kong in the case of Rex v. Chung Tam Kwong and others, who had been indicted for the crime of piracy, to the effect that actual robbery is necessary to support a conviction for piracy.

The facts are set out in the transcript of the Judgments of the Court which accompanies this Case, but the salient feature of the case was that the accused had been arrested before they were able to perfect their manifest intention of committing a robbery on the high seas, and it was doubted whether, in these circumstances, the necessary elements of the crime of piracy existed.

As the Law Officers will observe from the correspondence, of which a copy accompanies this Case, the decision of the Court at Hong Kong has given rise to somewhat serious problems, viz., whether there is, under existing legislation, any power in the Courts of this country, and consequently in the Colonial Courts also, to try foreigners committing on the high seas acts of violence which do not include

[8717]

G 2

Whether Acts of Violence committed on the High Seas by Foreigners are justiciable in His Majesty's Courts without Proof of actual Robbery on Board.

actual robbery; if this question should be answered in the negative, the further problem then arises whether it would be competent for the Imperial Parliament to pass legislation conferring the necessary jurisdiction.

The questions raised by these two problems are discussed in the Judgments of the Court and in the correspondence and memorandum to which the Law Officers are respectfully referred. In these circumstances it is not thought that any useful purpose would be served by repeating here the arguments therein set forth. It may, however, be observed that the questions appear to turn to a large extent on whether the definition of piracy given by Sir C. Hedges in R. v. Dawson (13 State Trials) is, as the Court at Hong Kong appear to have assumed, to be taken as a comprehensive definition, in the sense that no act which does not fall within its terms can properly be regarded as amounting to the crime of piracy, or whether, as the Treasury Solicitor, in his minute of the 9th March, 1932, suggests, that definition was merely a definition for the purpose of the particular case under consideration, and is in no sense to be taken as exhaustive.⁽¹⁾

A further question also arises whether the presumption that an English Act creating a criminal offence is intended to be limited to matters done within the territory of the United Kingdom, necessarily applies to Acts dealing with the offence of piracy.

The Law Officers will observe that it has been suggested that it may be desirable (should they take a certain view of the law) that there should be a special reference to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council under Section 3 of the Judicial Committee Act, 1834, for the purpose of eliciting their opinion on the matter. In this connection the Law Officers are referred to the remarks contained in the three concluding paragraphs of the Treasury Solicitor's minute of the 9th March, 1932.

The Law Officers are accordingly requested to advise:—

- (1) Whether the case of Rex v. Chung Tam Kwong was, in their opinion, rightly decided; if so
- (2) Whether, assuming that satisfactory proof of intent to commit piracy is forthcoming, a foreigner who on the high seas assaults with intent to murder any person on board a vessel, could be convicted in the Courts of this country under 1 Vic., c. 88, or in the Colonial Courts under 12 & 13 Vic., c. 96.
- (3) Whether the Imperial Parliament could properly be invited to pass legislation conferring jurisdiction to try foreigners in the circumstances indicated in (2).
- (4) Whether it is expedient to refer to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council any question arising out of the matters discussed in this case, and, if so, to settle the suggested terms of reference.
- (5) Generally on the case.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. Wilfrid Lewis.

In our opinion the question whether or not the full court of Hong Kong arrived at a correct decision in quashing the conviction in the above case can only be satisfactorily answered by approaching the matter de novo.

It is thus necessary to decide at the outset what jurisdiction the Hong Kong Court had to try the twelve prisoners. They were Chinese subjects in a Chinese vessel upon the high seas. Although it is not expressly so stated, we feel entitled to assume that the acts with which the prisoners were charged were not committed inter fauces terrae, and took place more than 3 miles from the coast of Hong Kong so as to be outside the zone provided by the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act, 1878. From the above circumstances it results that these prisoners, in the absence of any relevant statute applying to foreigners when outside that zone and in foreign ships, were for no purpose subject to Imperial municipal law. These prisoners, however, were liable to be tried and punished for offences committed outside the 3-mile zone if amounting to piracy jure gentium. Reference should be made to the exhaustive judgment of Cockburn C. J. in Reg. v. Keyn (1876 2 Exch. D. 63 at pp. 159 to 238), where the history and scope of English criminal jurisdiction over foreigners upon the seas was traced and examined.

⁽¹⁾ Hawkins Pleas of the Crown, Vol. I, Chapter 20, of Piracy: the wider definition in section 1 of this chapter seems to have been accepted in the judgments of Lawrence and Slesser L.L.J. in the recent case of the China Navigation Company against the Attorney-General, but see the subsequent narrower descriptions of the crime in sections 3 and 14.

It will be convenient to postpone dealing with the questions whether actual robbery is an essential element in the crime of piracy jure gentium or whether a frustrated attempt to commit a piratical robbery is not equally piracy and justiciable as such, and to deal first with the question whether Imperial Courts have jurisdiction over foreigners in foreign ships who commit outside the 3-mile zone offences made punishable as piracy by British or Imperial Statutes.

In this connection the propositions of Cockburn C. J. in Reg. v. Keyn can be stated broadly as follows: Up to the 16th century the jurisdiction of English criminal courts was confined to crimes committed "within the body of a county," while crimes at sea were subject to the jurisdiction of the Admiral (pp. 162, 167). Thus piracy jure gentium was never a felony at common law. Subsequently, in the reign of Richard II the respective jurisdictions were allowed to overlap, to the extent that in murder and mayhem done in great ships in the mouths of great rivers the Admiral was accorded concurrent jurisdiction with the common law (p. 168). And so English criminal law remained until 1878. Cockburn C. J. examined the statute 28 Henry VIII, c. 15, and reached the conclusion (pp. 169 and 209) that it created no new offence and did not render foreigners liable to any English Court when they were not previously so liable: the statute merely transferred the existing jurisdiction of the Admiral to commissioners appointed by the King, and the only jurisdiction over foreigners for crimes committed on the high seas being derived from the civil law the commissioners received no further or greater jurisdiction under the statute of Henry VIII than the Admiral possessed and no power to apply English criminal law to foreigners in circumstances where the Admiral could not apply it (p. 169). And this position was not altered by the statute 4 & 5 William IV, c. 36 (which gave the Central Criminal Court jurisdiction) or 7 & 8 Vict., c. 2, which gave power to ordinary Courts of Assize to try offences committed on the high seas and within the jurisdiction of the Admiral.

Admittedly piracy jure gentium was within the jurisdiction of the Admiral, and to this extent the Commissioners (subsequently the Central Criminal Court and Assize Courts) obtained jurisdiction over foreigners committing crimes in foreign ships on the high seas, though Cockburn C. J. admitted that if Parliament had expressly asserted a more extended jurisdiction it would have been the duty of the Courts to recognise and endeavour to enforce such jurisdiction (pp. 160 and 207). At p. 208 he examined the question whether English municipal law either expressly or by implication had been extended to foreigners in foreign ships on the high seas. After approving the doctrine laid down by Turner L. J. in Cope v. Doherty (1858 2 De G. & J. 614 at 624 affirming 4 K. & J. 367) that Parliament must not be presumed to have legislated for foreigners and that to warrant such a conclusion the words of an Act ought to be express or its context very clear, Cockburn C. J. reached the conclusion that, up to 1876, no provision had been made by Parliament for trying foreigners for crimes committed generally upon the seas in foreign ships (p. 213), while such legislation as had been applied either expressly or impliedly to foreigners within what may for convenience be termed territorial waters had dealt with the revenue, customs, the protection of fisheries and kindred matters.

We feel satisfied that Cockburn C. J. in his exhaustive analysis of the law would have commented on such acts as the Suppression of Piracy Act, 1698 (Halsbury's Statutes IV, p. 334), the Piracy Act, 1821 (p. 343 op. cit.), the Offences at Sea Acts, 1799 and 1806 (pp. 401 and 417), the Murders Abroad Act, 1817 (p. 440), the Piracy Act, 1837 (p. 461), the Admiralty Offences Act, 1844 (p. 476), and the Piracy Act, 1850 (p. 520), had he considered that the provisions of any of those Acts either expressly or impliedly referred to foreigners, for, although the crime charged in Reg. v. Keyn was manslaughter, the principle at issue was sufficiently wide to render relevant the various municipal Acts dealing with piracy had the advocates in the case or other members of the Court cited them as conferring statutory criminal jurisdiction over foreigners in foreign ships.

Up to 1878, therefore, we think that, while for the purpose of regulating national defence and such matters as customs and revenue, municipal law had in certain cases been applied to foreigners in foreign ships at sea, there was no statute which had extended the jurisdiction of our criminal courts in respect of crimes committed by foreigners at sea, unless committed on board a British ship or falling under the definition of piracy jure gentium. The ratio decidendi of Cockburn C. J. and the majority of the Court was responsible for the drafting of the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act of 1878. The effect of that Act was to declare and enact (see the preamble and per Coleridge C. J. in R. v. Dudley and Stephen, 14 Q.B.D. at 281), that the jurisdiction of our courts extended to all offences committed within 3 miles of the coast; but, subject to that extension, we think that the law of the high seas remains to-day as it was stated by Cockburn C. J. (see Harris v. steamship "Franconia", 1877, 2 C.P.D. 173, and the Fagernes, 1927 P. 311).

Thus, in our opinion, Section 2 of the Piracy Act, 1837, does not assist, except in so far as it affects the question of punishment.

We think that the object of this Act was not the definition of the crime of piracy, but the regulation of its punishment. It must be remembered that at this time statutory revisions of punishments, and more particularly capital punishment, was occupying the attention of the Legislature—see, for instance, the Criminal Law Act, 1827, Section 7, the Forgery Act, 1837, and the Punishment of Offences Act, 1837. We think the object of the Piracy Act, 1837, was to retain the death penalty in cases of piracy with violence, but in other cases of statutory or municipal piracy to substitute transportation for death (Section 3). Moreover, if actual robbery is an essential ingredient in piracy, the Section carries the matter no further; if it is not, it is unnecessary to invoke the section.

Accordingly, in our opinion, it would not have been correct to indict these twelve prisoners under the Piracy Act, 1837, Section 2, or any other provision of English municipal law relating to piracy.

On the other hand, we do not agree with what we understand to be the view of the Hong Kong Court, that they were not competent to try a charge of piracy jure gentium. We entertain no doubt that the Hong Kong Court possesses jurisdiction over foreigners accused of piracy jure gentium. We think such jurisdiction was inherent under international law, upon the doctrine that the pirate is hostis humani generis, and his crimes are justiciable anywhere (per Cockburn C. J. in Reg. v. Keyn at pp. 163, 168-9; Hawkin's Pleas of the Crown, Volume 1, Chapter 20, Section 1; Halsbury's Laws of England, Volume 9, p. 524; Archbold's Criminal Pleading, Evidence and Practice, 28th edition, pp. 670-1; Hall's International Law, 8th edition, pp. 311, 317). That view was held by the Privy Council in A.G. for Hong Kong v. Kwok a Sing (1873 L.R. 5 P.C. 179 at 199, 200), and the jurisdiction specifically recognised in the Courts of that Colony. In this respect, we think the acting Chief Justice was wrong when he expressed the opinion that such jurisdiction in order to exist would probably require to be founded on an express Statute of the Imperial Parliament. But even so, it seems to us that the Admiralty Offences (Colonial) Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 96) coupled if necessary with the earlier Acts—11 William III, c. 7, and 46 Geo. III, c. 54—have effectively invested the Hong Kong Courts with jurisdiction to try foreigners charged with piracy jure gentium upon the high seas. But such jurisdiction is confined to acts falling within the conception of piracy jure gentium under international law. Any extension—and, conversely, any restriction—in the definition of that crime in English municipal law has not affected that jurisdiction.

Thus it remains to examine whether actual robbery is a necessary ingredient in the commission of piracy jure gentium, or whether an unsuccessful attempt to rob upon the high seas fulfils that crime. Up to the present case, this question seems to have been treated academically, for no direct answer has been given judicially, facts apparently not having arisen to require it.

For the purpose of answering such question we think the opinions of the leading writers on International Law are entitled to rank with more authority than was allowed in Reg. v. Keyn, when the application of municipal law was involved; or in Republic of Bolivia v. Indemnity Mutual (1909 1 K.B. 785), where the question was one of the construction of a policy of insurance (see pp. 790 and 802 ibid).

While there is no absolute consensus on the subject, it seems to us that modern opinion supports the contention that attempted or unsuccessful attack or attempt to rob at sea amounts to piracy jure gentium. Thus Hall, at p. 314 of his work on International Law, 8th edition, says: "... piracy may be said to consist in acts of violence done upon the ocean ... by a body of men acting independently of any politically organised society," and among "acts which are recognised or alleged to be piratical," the writer includes "robbery or attempt at robbery of a vessel by force or intimidation, either by way of attack from without or by way of revolt of the crew and conversion of the vessel and cargo to their own use." Phillimore's International Law, 2nd edition, Vol. 1, p. 411, contains the passage, "piracy is an assault upon vessels navigated on the high seas, committed animo furandi, whether the robbery or forcible depredation be effected or not, and whether or not it be accompanied by murder or personal injury." Oppenheim, 4th edition, Vol. 1, 500, is to a similar effect, while Lord Birkenhead, 5th edition, pp. 139-140, goes further, in stating that an animus furandi is not essential, and robbery is not necessarily an ingredient in the offence. On the other hand, in Archbold's Criminal Pleading, robbery is treated as being of the essence of piracy jure gentium (p. 670); while in Hawkin's Pleas of the Crown (Ch. XX, 8th edition, p. 251) there appears to be a conflict between Sections 1 and 3 as to whether actual robbery is essential. It is worth noting, however, that statutes such as the Suppression of Piracy Act, 1698, Section 11, and 6 Geo. IV, c. 49 (an Act for encouraging the capture or destruction of piratical ships and vessels) suggest that Parliament recognised that piracy, though frustrated, was nevertheless piracy. See also the judgment of Dr. Lushington on the latter Statute in Serhassan (2 W.Rob. 354).

The chief argument to the contrary is founded on the charge to the Grand Jury by Sir Charles Hedges in R. v. Dawson (1696 13 State Trials 451 at 454) (approved in Kwok a Sing's case), but the conclusiveness and authority of his definition appear to us to be capable of being discounted by two factors (1) he was dealing with charges where robbery of the clearest kind had occurred; (2) he was charging a Grand Jury at the second trial of the same prisoners, and it is tolerably clear from the circumstances that the occasion was not one when Sir Charles Hedges would have deemed it either necessary or expedient to embark on the niceties of technical definition. For such reasons, notwithstanding the Privy Council's adoption of Sir Charles's words in Kwok a Sing's case, and the statements which are to be found in such works as Carver's "Carriage of Goods by Sea" (7th Edition, p. 142), or Russell on Crimes (7th Edition, Vol. 1, p. 256), we consider that what Sir Charles Hedges said in R. v. Dawson need not be accepted as a precise definition to-day of piracy jure gentium. Nevertheless, it must be recognised that, until comparatively recently, piracy was regarded as practically another term for sea robbery (see the trial of Captain Kidd, reported in 14 State Trials, p. 123, and of Bonnet and others, 15 State Trials, p. 2341, where the several indictments laid are set out in full; see also per Lord Abinger C. J. in R. v. Macgregor, 1 Car & Kirwin at 431). But, weighing the various opinions, judicial and otherwise, as well as we can, we are of the view that the old definition expressed by Sir Charles Hedges and approved by the Privy Council in Kwok a Sing's case, is not conclusive to the effect that actual robbery is an essential ingredient in piracy jure gentium. It is to be observed, also, that Sir Robert Phillimore, in the Chapter already referred to, cites several of these authorities without, apparently, regarding them as being in conflict with his definition of piracy quoted above.

In our opinion, therefore, the full Court of Hong Kong was wrong when it decided to quash the conviction of these twelve prisoners. We think the indictment, verdict, and conviction were proper upon the facts, and if, on a future occasion, a similar case arises of an unsuccessful attack by pirates, the Hong Kong Court is entitled to, and should, convict. But it seems to us that, before convicting in such circumstances, the Court should have clear evidence of the attack being made with intent to rob, or, in other words, made piratically. Under the present law homicide by a foreigner when not in a British ship and outside Hong Kong territorial waters (and a fortiori lesser offences, such as assaults) are not cognisable by Imperial Courts. It is of obvious importance that the scope of judicial treatment by any State of piracy jure gentium should not be extended so as to trespass unduly upon the municipal jurisdiction which every civilised State is assumed to exercise over its subjects. In the interests of international amity, any unwarranted extension of Imperial jurisdiction over the high seas is sincerely to be avoided.

1932

Our answers to the questions put to us are as follows:—

- (1) The conviction was correct and should not have been quashed.
- (2) A foreigner, when not in a British ship and outside the 3-mile zone, cannot be proceeded against under 1 Vic. c. 88, or in Colonial Courts by virtue of 12 and 13 Vic. c. 96.
- (3) It is unnecessary, in our opinion, to answer this, but we conceive great objection to legislation extending Imperial Municipal jurisdiction beyond the limits at present laid down.
- (4) Having regard to the importance of the question to the community at Hong Kong, we think that this is a proper case for special reference to the Judicial Committee under Section 4 of the Judicial Committee Act, 1833, if His Majesty should think fit. As the judgment was one quashing the conviction, we do not think that an appeal would have lain under Section 3. We are aware of the decisions in R. v. Bertrand (L.R. 1 P.C. 520) and R. v. Murphy (L.R. 2 P.C. 535). These, however, were cases in which a new trial had been ordered without jurisdiction. In the present case, in spite of power to order a new trial under Section 78 of the Hong Kong Criminal Procedure Ordinance, the Court quashed the conviction, and we know of no case in which the Privy Council has entertained an appeal against a judgment of acquittal. In our opinion, the Hong Kong Order in Council (1909 S.R.O., p. 805) does not affect the matter.

We think that the reference should be in the following terms:—

“Whether actual robbery is an essential element in the crime of piracy jure gentium, or whether a frustrated attempt to commit a piratical robbery is not equally piracy jure gentium and justiciable as such.”

T. W. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.
WILFRID LEWIS.

Law Officers' Department,
July 29, 1932.

ITALY.

[C 8961/1027/22/1932]

No. 2^e.

[Colonial Office.]

[October 19, 1932.]

(1)

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

October 3, 1932.

Malta:
teaching of Italian and other languages.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister, to request the favour of your opinion upon the question whether certain action taken by Maltese Ministers constitutes an infringement of the provisions of the Malta Constitution (Amendment) Letters Patent, 1932. A list of relevant documents is attached, and the Governor reported on the 24th September that there was no other relevant document so far as he was aware.

2. The circumstances under which the present situation has arisen are as follows:—

3. In accordance with the recommendation of the Malta Royal Commission, 1931, the Constitution of Malta, which had been suspended in June 1930 owing to political difficulties arising from the action of the Roman Catholic ecclesiastical authorities, was restored on the 21st June, 1932, with certain modifications. One of these modifications affected the system of language teaching in the elementary schools.

4. Under the system in force at the time of the Royal Commission's investigations, English and Maltese were the only languages taught up to the third standard in the elementary schools, but in the four higher standards of the schools Italian was also taught; the same number of hours' instruction a week being given to Italian as to English. The Commissioners were satisfied that this system was not in the educational interest of the children, and suggested that the teaching of Italian in the elementary schools should be abolished, although they advised that local opinion should be consulted before the change was effected.

5. His Majesty's Government accepted the Commission's suggestion, but decided that, in order to ensure that the suggestion should not be ignored in the event of the return of the next elections of a Maltese Government pledged to the encouragement of the Italian language, and to prevent the question from becoming a contentious party issue in the next Maltese elections, the suggestion should be carried into effect before the restoration of responsible government.

6. Section 57 (2) of the Malta Constitution Letters Patent, 1921 (Paper A), which provided that the English and Italian languages should be recognised as equal languages of culture in Malta at the university, in secondary schools and in the higher classes of the elementary schools as subjects of study, was accordingly repealed by Section 1 of the Malta Constitution (Amendment) Letters Patent, 1932 (Paper F) and replaced by the following new sub-section:—

“(2) (a) The English and Italian languages shall be recognised as equal languages of culture in Malta at the university and in secondary schools.

“(b) The English and Maltese languages shall be the only languages taught as subjects of study in the elementary schools, and the Maltese language shall also be used as a medium for teaching the English language in so far as it may be necessary in the infant schools and the inferior classes of the elementary schools. In the examination for admission to the secondary schools, the students of the elementary schools and other candidates shall have to be approved in the English but not in any other language.

“(c) No alteration, without our consent first had and obtained through the Secretary of State, shall be made either by legislation or by administrative action in the constitution and system of the secondary schools or the elementary schools as at present established, so as in any way to affect the preceding provisions of this sub-section with regard to the languages to be taught or used in the said schools.

“(d) Any provision contained in any Act, Ordinance or other law, statute or regulation now in force or hereafter passed or made in Malta which shall be repugnant to or inconsistent with the provisions of this sub-section shall be read subject thereto, and shall to the extent of such repugnancy or inconsistency, but not otherwise, be and remain absolutely void and inoperative.”

7. At the elections held in connexion with the restoration, on the 21st June, 1932, of the Malta Constitution, the Nationalist party, which has always stood for the maintenance of the position of the Italian language in Malta, obtained a large majority in both Houses of the Legislature over the Constitutional and Labour parties, which had been in power before the suspension of the Constitution. The Nationalist Government at once showed strong opposition to the provisions of the new Letters Patent quoted above, and in July a deputation came to interview the Secretary of State and press for the repeal of these provisions. The deputation was informed that there was no possibility of His Majesty's Government reversing their decision.

8. For a short time nothing was heard of the matter, but on the 6th September a circular, of which a copy is annexed (Paper I), was issued by the Director of Elementary Schools on the instructions of the Maltese Ministry. This circular directs that Italian shall be taught on a voluntary basis in all the classes of the elementary schools outside the normal school hours. Special prizes are to be awarded in connexion with the classes in Italian, and the circular appears to contemplate that the teachers should receive extra remuneration dependent upon the number of students who qualify and the number who attend the classes. It is to be presumed that it is the intention that the expenses should be defrayed out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

9. At the same time directions were given (Paper J) for the establishment of a new sub-standard at the Malta Lyceum (a secondary school), in which Italian is to be taught, for the benefit of those who fail to pass the ordinary entrance examination into the Lyceum.

[8717]

H

10. The Legal Adviser to the Government of Malta, in an opinion, of which a copy is annexed (Paper K), expresses the view that the instructions contained in the circular by the Director of Elementary Schools do not infringe the letter, if they infringe the spirit, of the new Letters Patent (Paper F). Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister is, however, advised that there is some doubt whether this view should be accepted.

11. It will be observed that the Legal Adviser to the Governor appears to regard the words "subject of study" in section 1 (2) (b) of the Letters Patent (Paper F) as meaning a subject of the ordinary curriculum compulsorily taught in school hours.

While the Secretary of State realises that your opinion will be based upon the proper construction of the section, and not upon the intention of the draftsman, he nevertheless thinks it right to point out—in order that it may be seen that there is another possible construction—that the words were not intended to convey any such meaning as has been placed upon them, but were simply used in contradistinction to the expression "medium of teaching," which almost immediately follows them (Papers K and M).

Reference is also invited to section 57 (2) of the Letters Patent of 1921 (Paper A) where the expression "subject of study" is also used again, it is suggested in contradistinction to the words "medium of instruction," which appear as the last words of the sub-section.

12. The Legal Adviser to the Governor has also expressed the opinion (Paper K) that the proposed new class at the Lyceum, referred to in paragraph 8 above, will not infringe the provisions of the new Letters Patent, since the class will only be for those who have passed through the elementary schools, and will be a Lyceum class and not an elementary school class. The Secretary of State is advised that it would be difficult to contest this view.

13. Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister would be glad to be favoured with your opinion on the following points:—

- (1) Whether the establishment of voluntary classes in Italian after school hours, but in elementary school buildings, with elementary school teachers and at Government expense upon the lines proposed, would infringe the provisions of section 1, sub-section (2) (b) and (c) of the Malta Constitution (Amendment) Letters Patent, 1932.
- (2) Whether the formation of the new sub-standard at the Lyceum is an infringement of section 1, sub-section (2) (c) of the said Letters Patent.

I have, &c.

J. E. SHUCKBURGH.

LIST OF DOCUMENTS.

- Paper A. The Malta Constitution Letters Patent, 1921. ("State Papers," Vol. 121, p. 1.)
 Paper B. Proclamation of the 15th September, 1921.
 Paper C. The Malta Constitution (Amendment) Letters Patent, 1927. ("State Papers," Vol. 126, p. 116.)
 Paper D. The Malta Constitution (Amendment) Letters Patent, 1928. (S.R. and O., 1928, p. 1399.)
 Paper E. The Malta Constitution (Amendment) Letters Patent, 1930. (S.R. and O., 1930, p. 1983.)
 Paper F. The Malta Constitution (Amendment) Letters Patent, 1932.
 Paper G. The Malta Constitution (Amendment No. 2) Letters Patent, 1932.
 Paper H. The Malta Constitution Act, 1932.
 Paper I. A Circular by the Director of Elementary Schools in Malta dated the 6th September, 1932.
 Paper J. Government Notice No. 321 dated the 3rd September, 1932, regarding the formation of a new Class in the Malta Lyceum.
 Paper K. Opinion by the Legal Adviser to the Governor of Malta on Papers I and J dated the 13th September, 1932.
 Paper L. Letter from the Deputy Leader of the Constitutional Party in Malta commenting on Papers H and I.
 Paper M. Observations by the Legal Adviser to the Governor of Malta on Paper L dated the 17th September, 1932.
 (Papers F to M are contained in C 8960/1027/22/1932.)

(2)

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

October 4, 1932.

WITH reference to the letter from this Office of the 3rd October relating to the language question in Malta, I am directed by Secretary Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister to inform you that he anticipates that a situation may arise in which it would be expedient that the subjects of language and public instruction in the island should be withdrawn from the province of the Legislature of Malta, and should be constituted reserved matters within the meaning of section 41 (1) of the Malta Constitution Letters Patent, 1921.

2. When the withdrawal of certain other subjects, such as police and the appointment of judges, from the province of the Legislature of Malta was contemplated, it was thought best to proceed by means of a Bill in Parliament. Provision for effecting these withdrawals, in one case forthwith and in the other case by Letters Patent if and when occasion arose, was made in Section 1 and the second schedule of the Malta Constitution Act, 1932. It has, however, been suggested that an alternative procedure was available, and that power existed to effect these withdrawals by means of amending Letters Patent.

3. In this connexion, I am to invite your attention to the documents dealing with the Constitution of Malta, copies of which accompanied the letter under reference, and, in particular, to sections 68, 41 and 54 of the Malta Constitution Letters Patent, 1921, and to the amendments of section 41 by the Letters Patent of 1928 and 1930 and the Act of 1932.

4. I am also to invite your attention to section 1 (2) of the Act of 1932, which provided that it should be lawful for His Majesty from time to time by means of Letters Patent to provide that the Legislature of Malta should not have power to pass laws with respect to various police matters. The existence of this sub-section would appear to imply at least that there was a doubt whether the contemplated procedure by means of Letters Patent would have been lawful before the Act was passed.

5. It may be pointed out, however, that power to amend section 57 of Malta Constitution Letters Patent, 1921, relating to language is expressly reserved in section 68 of those Letters Patent.

6. I am to request that you will advise Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister whether, having regard to the documents under reference, it is competent for His Majesty, by means of further Letters Patent, to provide that the Legislature of Malta shall not have power to pass laws with respect to—

- (1) The use of the Maltese, English, Italian and other languages, and
- (2) The subject of public instruction or any part thereof, and to provide that either or both of these matters shall become "reserved matters."

7. I am also to request advice as to whether it would be competent to provide in the same manner that the Department of Public Instruction or any part thereof should be taken over and administered by the Maltese Imperial Government and that the necessary funds should be obtained by means of an addition to the Reserved Civil List.

I am, &c.

G. JONES.

Report of the Law Officers of the Crown.

1. The Letters Patent of the 25th April, 1932, provide that the English and Maltese languages shall be the only languages taught as subjects of study in the elementary schools. The Director's circular of the 6th September, 1932, states that Italian is to be taught on a voluntary basis in all the classes of the elementary schools outside the school hours laid down in the Governor's minute. We are of opinion that the establishment in accordance with the terms of the circular of voluntary classes at which Italian is to be taught by elementary school teachers at Government expense is an infringement of the provisions of section 57 (2) (b) and (c) of the Letters Patent, 1921, as amended by the Letters Patent, 1932.

[8717]

H 2

1932

52

PALESTINE.

2. The formation of the new class at the Lyceum is not, in our opinion, an infringement of the said Letters Patent.

3. We are further of opinion that, provided the Secretary of State is satisfied that the course proposed is necessitated by a grave emergency within the meaning of section 41 of the Letters Patent of 1921 as amended by the Malta Constitution (Amendment) Letters Patent, 1930, it is competent for His Majesty by Letters Patent to provide that the Legislature of Malta shall not have power to pass laws with respect to the use of languages and the subject of Public Instruction, and to provide that these matters, or either of them, shall be included in the category of reserved matters, and to provide for the taking over by the Maltese Imperial Government of the Department of Public Instruction and for the provision of the necessary funds out of the Reserved Civil List.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.

Law Officers' Department,
October 19, 1932.

PALESTINE.

[E 744/606/31/1932]

No. 2^e.

[Colonial Office.]

[February 11, 1932.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, February 4, 1932.

I AM directed by Secretary Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister to refer to the Report⁽¹⁾ of your predecessors in office of the 7th February, 1929, and previous Reports on the question of the extension of Imperial preference to Palestine.

2. In a Report⁽²⁾ of the 7th April, 1925, your predecessors had expressed the opinion that the position of Palestine in relation to His Majesty was the same as that of other Governments established by Order-in-Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act; in other words that the Government of Palestine is His Majesty. In the letter,⁽³⁾ which Mr. Amery caused to be addressed to the Law Officers on the 27th May, 1925, the usual wording of the "most-favoured-nation" clauses of commercial treaties was described, and your predecessors were asked whether, in view of the fact that His Majesty's Government had arranged for Palestine to be administered under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, and in view of the opinions expressed in the Report⁽²⁾ of the 7th April, 1925, they were still of opinion that the extension to Palestine of Imperial preference would infringe the obligations arising from such clauses.

3. In their Report⁽⁴⁾ of the 19th June, 1925, your predecessors stated that they still considered that the extension of Imperial preference to Palestine would be a breach of the "most-favoured-nation" clauses of British commercial treaties, on the ground that, as Palestine falls within the category of States included in the fourth paragraph of article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, it necessarily follows that, internationally, Palestine is an independent nation although the administration of its affairs is mandated to His Britannic Majesty.

4. I am now to transmit to you, for your consideration, a copy of an opinion⁽⁵⁾ on this subject furnished in July 1924 by Sir John Simon and Viscount Erleigh, which has been brought to the notice of the Secretary of State. Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister will be glad to learn whether, in the light of this opinion, you are able to modify the views expressed in the Reports previously furnished by the Law Officers.

(1) Confidential 13761, p. 8. (2) Confidential 13004, p. 28. (3) Confidential 13004, p. 30.
(4) Confidential 13004, p. 30. (5) See annex.

Extension of Imperial Preference to Palestine:
whether an infringement of most-favoured-nation clauses of commercial treaties.

PALESTINE.

53

5. Should you feel unable to modify the views expressed in previous Reports, Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister is disposed, as at present advised, to invite his colleagues to consider the desirability of framing the "most-favoured-nation" clause of any future commercial treaty in a form which would not preclude the extension of Imperial preference to Palestine. I am accordingly to request you to be good enough to advise him as to the form of words which you would suggest for that purpose.

6. I am to enclose for convenience of reference copies of the Reports mentioned in this letter, the Palestine Order-in-Council, the Mandate and the Commercial Treaty with Roumania, article 11 of which is a typical example of the "most-favoured-nation" clause.

I am, &c.

O. G. R. WILLIAMS.

List of Papers.

- (1) Law Officers to Colonial Office, January 3, 1923. [Confidential 12470, p. 17.]
- (2) Law Officers to Colonial Office, April 7, 1925. [Confidential 13004, p. 28.]
- (3) Law Officers to Colonial Office, June 19, 1925. [Confidential 13004, p. 30.]
- (4) Law Officers to Colonial Office, February 7, 1929. [Confidential 13761, p. 8.]
- (5) Palestine Order-in-Council, 1922. [Confidential 11940*.]
- (6) Mandate for Palestine. [Cmd. 1785 (Parliamentary 5152).]
- (7) Commercial treaty with Roumania. [Cmd. 3945 (Treaty 2067).]
- (8) Opinion of Sir John Simon and Viscount Erleigh, July 28, 1924. [See Annex.]

ANNEX.

Joint Opinion by Sir John Simon and Viscount Erleigh.

(Private and Confidential.)

IN advising whether, in the event of an Order-in-Council being made applying the provisions of Clause 8 of the Finance Act, 1919, to Palestine as a Mandated Territory, any breach of the most-favoured-nation clause contained in various commercial treaties would be involved, it is important to bear in mind that the issue raised is one to be determined by the proper construction of the most-favoured-nation clauses in question. These clauses differ in language, but they resemble one another in conferring upon the foreign State with which the treaty is made as favourable treatment as is or may be granted to any "other" foreign country, or "any third Power" or "any third nation." These different expressions appear to be used as synonymous and interchangeable phrases, and indeed in some treaties two or more different phrases occur in the same text. The broad question seems to be whether Palestine in existing circumstances should be regarded as enjoying a status, internationally speaking, which is analogous to that of the foreign State with which the particular treaty is made, so that the principle of equally-favoured treatment must apply to one as much as the other.

It seems to us that, if the question is thus defined, there are strong reasons for contending that Palestine is not, vis-à-vis this country, in the position of a foreign State. It is quite true that Palestine is not, in the ordinary sense of the term, a British Protectorate, though the conception of a Protectorate in international law varies from time to time and may be said to be in course of development. But, when the Covenant of the League of Nations is considered as a whole, and its application by way of the Mandate given to Britain in respect of Palestine is surveyed, there are a great many respects in which Palestine stands in a relation to this country which is sharply contrasted with the relation between an "other" foreign Power and ourselves. Palestine, indeed, has been treated as in a position analogous to territory of the British Empire and subject to powers of control such as His Majesty exercises in a British Protectorate, in the Palestine Order-in-Council, 1922, and in a wide range of other administrative provisions which will be well known to His Majesty's Government.

This view appears to us to be justified by giving due force to the word "other" in the most-favoured-nation clauses. The word indicates that the favoured nation is, like the nation with which the treaty is made, enjoying independent Sovereignty and free from British authority. It is obvious that this is not true of Palestine, and it is significant that the affairs of Palestine are dealt with through the Colonial Office, whereas the affairs of every foreign State are dealt with through the Foreign Office. Moreover, preference in the case of Palestine would be established by Executive Order; whereas fiscal adjustments with a foreign Power are effected by international negotiations and bargaining.

It is clear that the British Government which was in office in 1919 took the view which we are now urging, for Section 8 of the Finance Act, 1919, expressly contemplated that a Mandated Territory might be brought within that clause by Order-in-Council. In view of the fact that the treaties which contain the most-favoured-nation clause were entered into before the conception of Mandated Territories had arisen, it is, we think, necessary to construe the most-favoured-nation clause as drawing the contrast between countries which really are foreign countries in the full sense, or at any rate live under the protection and supervision of a foreign Power, and countries which are not in this position. Applying this test, no infringement of the most-favoured-nation clause would be involved if the Executive Government took the step in relation to Palestine which the British Legislature, in the very year when the Treaty of Versailles was ratified, contemplated and provided for.

JOHN SIMON.
ERLEIGH.

Temple, July 28, 1924.

Report of the Law Officers of the Crown.

WE are unable to modify the views expressed in the Reports previously furnished by our predecessors and ourselves. The considerations mentioned by Sir John Simon and Viscount Erleigh in their Opinion dated the 28th July, 1924, were substantially brought to the attention of our predecessors in the Colonial Office letter of the 27th May, 1925. The reliance placed on the reference to mandated territories in Section 8 of the Finance Act, 1919, is not in our opinion well founded. At most, the provisions of the section can only be said to contemplate in a proper case the inclusion of a mandated territory in the definition of the British Empire for the purpose of Imperial Preference. This still leaves open the question as to whether Palestine is a "foreign country" within the meaning of a typical most-favoured-nation clause.

We suggest that the difficulty might be overcome by substituting for "any other foreign country" the words "the territory of any other foreign Sovereign Power."

We have been informed that the Secretary of State desires us to consider what the consequences would be of a failure to comply with the provisions of a most-favoured-nation clause. In our opinion it would not be a matter for the consideration of the municipal courts of either country and it could not be made the subject of a claim for damages by any person prejudiced. It would, however, be open to the injured party to the treaty to pursue the remedies provided by articles 13, 14 and 15 of the Covenant, in addition to making diplomatic representations.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.

Law Officers' Department,
February 11, 1932.

[E 1383/606/31/1932]

No. 2^c.

[Colonial Office.]

[March 16, 1932.]

(1)

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, February 19, 1932.

I AM directed by Secretary Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister to refer to your Report⁽¹⁾ of the 11th February in which you stated that you were unable to modify the views expressed in the Reports previously furnished by your predecessors and yourselves on the question of the extension of Imperial preference to Palestine. The possibility of the grant of such preference is engaging the earnest consideration of the Secretary of State, and, on grounds of general policy, he considers that it is very desirable that Imperial preference should be extended to Palestine goods, if the risks in so doing are not such as to outweigh the advantages from the point of view of general policy which it is anticipated would result.

In the light of the opinions expressed by yourselves and your predecessors, it is evident that, should it be decided to extend Imperial preference to Palestine goods, His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom must be prepared for the possibility of a foreign country, whose interests may be affected, regarding such extension as a breach of the most-favoured-nation clause of its Commercial Treaty with this country. In that event, it is presumed that the matter would be referred for arbitration to the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague.

It appears that under article 13 of the Covenant of the League of Nations it would be open to the Permanent Court to decide as to the extent and nature of the reparation to be made for any breach of an international obligation of this kind. So far as the Secretary of State is aware, no exact precedent exists to show whether in a case of this nature a claim for damages would, in fact, lie, or, if such a claim could be maintained, what would be the measure of damages likely to be awarded by the Permanent Court. In this connexion your attention is invited to the passages marked on pp. 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8, and 22, 23 and 24 of the enclosed reprint from the "British Year Book of International Law, 1930" (Paper (1)).

On the assumption that His Majesty's Government decide to extend Imperial preference to Palestine goods, and that the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague give an adverse judgment, you are requested to furnish the Secretary of State with an estimate of the risk involved of damages being awarded by the court against His Majesty's Government for breach of an international obligation of this kind.

If, in your opinion, there is a risk of damages being awarded, it appears desirable, before His Majesty's Government give effect to a decision to extend Imperial preference to Palestine goods, that steps should be taken to bring a case before the Permanent Court with a view to determining the point at issue. I am accordingly to request your advice also as to the best and most expeditious method of bringing such a case before the court. It has been suggested that one method would be for His Majesty's Government to inform the Government of a foreign country with which there exists a commercial treaty containing a clause providing for most-favoured-nation treatment, and whose trade with this country would be directly affected by the grant of Imperial preference to Palestine, that His Majesty's Government intend to grant such Imperial preference, and to ask that Government whether they have any objection to offer in view of the terms of the commercial treaty existing between the two countries. If an objection were raised, it is further suggested that His Majesty's Government should propose to the Government concerned that the matter should be referred for arbitration to the Permanent Court at The Hague with a view to obtaining an early decision on the following points, viz., whether the extension of Imperial preference to Palestine would be a breach of the most-favoured-nation clause of the treaty in question.

(1) No. 2^c.

Imperial preference to Palestine goods: as to referring question to Permanent Court of International Justice. Measure of damages in event of breach of most-favoured-nation clauses of commercial treaties.

Your advice is further desired on the following point. There is some diversity in the phrases used in the most-favoured-nation clauses of commercial treaties to describe the countries to which most-favoured-nation treatment is, or may be, granted. For example: "any other country" (see article 1 of the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with the Netherlands of the 27th October, 1837); "any other foreign country" (see article 4 of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce and Navigation with the Argentine Republic of the 2nd February, 1825); "any third nation whatsoever" (see article 1 of the Commercial and Maritime Relations Convention with France of the 28th February, 1882).

In view of the above diversity, it has been suggested that an adverse judgment of the Permanent Court as regards the grant of Imperial preference to Palestine might conceivably be in such a form as to call in question the right of His Majesty's Government, under international law, to accord existing or future preferential treatment to the Dominions and to the Colonies and other Dependencies, without granting similar treatment to countries whose treaties with the United Kingdom contain most-favoured-nation clauses in which certain of the phrases set out above occur, e.g., "any other country" or "any third nation whatsoever."

It is, however, to be observed that, so far as the Secretary of State is aware, no suggestion has ever been made that His Majesty's Government is not free to grant preferences to any part of the British Empire, though such preferences have been accorded throughout the Empire for many years.

I am, &c.

O. G. R. WILLIAMS.

(2)

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, March 2, 1932.

I AM directed by Secretary Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister to refer to the letter from this Department of the 19th February(?) on the subject of the extension of Imperial preference to Palestine, in the fourth paragraph of which you were asked to furnish an estimate of the risk involved of damages being awarded by the Permanent Court of International Justice against His Majesty's Government if Imperial preference were extended to Palestine goods and the Permanent Court were to give an adverse judgment.

2. Since this question was referred to you, the attention of Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister has been drawn to the enclosed memorandum from the Foreign Office, dated the 23rd February, 1932 (Paper (2)), which contains examples of the form of compensation which has been awarded in international tribunals in cases where it has been held that duties have been imposed in violation of treaty rights. An extract from a letter on the same subject, dated the 24th February, from the legal adviser to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Paper (3)) is also enclosed for your consideration. The Secretary of State considers that the information contained in the enclosed memorandum and letter may be of assistance to you in forming an opinion on the question which has been referred to you.

3. In the last paragraph of the letter from this Department of the 19th February(?) it was stated that, so far as the Secretary of State was aware, no suggestion had ever been made that His Majesty's Government was not free to grant preferences to any part of the British Empire. In this connexion the Secretary of State has now been informed that a similar question of treaty interpretation recently arose between the Government of India and the Governments of France and Japan. In this case the Governments of France and Japan claimed from the Government of India the same reduced rate of import duty on cotton goods as had been accorded to cotton goods of United Kingdom origin, both Governments basing their claim on the ground that the word "foreign" in the relevant commercial treaties included, vis-à-vis India, the United Kingdom. His Majesty's Government declined to accept this contention.

(2) See (1) above.

4. I am to enclose for your information copies of the notes exchanged on this subject with the French and Japanese Governments, together with copies of the Anglo-French Convention of the 19th February, 1903, the Anglo-Japanese Convention of the 29th August, 1904, and article 2 of the Treaty of Commerce between Great Britain and Austria-Hungary of 1876 (Papers (4) to (17)), to which reference is made in the correspondence.

5. I am to add that in 1897 the Governments of Belgium and Germany protested against the grant by Canada of preferential tariff advantages to the United Kingdom on the ground that such treatment was an infringement of their treaties with the United Kingdom. The contention of Belgium and Germany was unanswerable, since the two treaties in question contained clauses explicitly providing that the produce or manufacture of Belgium (or Germany) should not be subject in British Colonies to any higher or other import duties than the produce of the United Kingdom, and it was decided to denounce both treaties without delay.

6. After the denunciation of the treaty with her, Germany continued to grant most-favoured-nation treatment to the United Kingdom, but refused to accord it to Canada, arguing that if British Colonies were to be in a position to follow out their own customs policy, other countries must be allowed to treat them as separate customs territories. Negotiations between Canada and Germany with regard to commercial relations were not finally concluded until 1910, when the German Government abandoned the contention that German imports into Canada should receive the same treatment as was accorded by the Dominion Government to imports from Great Britain.

I am, &c.

H. F. DOWNIE.

List of Papers.

- (1) British Year Book of International Law, 1930. (Reprint.)
- (2) Foreign Office memorandum, February 23, 1932. [E 1135/606/31.]
- (3) Sir W. Malkin to Mr. Duncan, Colonial Office, February 24, 1932. Extract. [E 923/606/31.]
- (4) French Ambassador to Foreign Office, May 23, 1930. [W 5398/5398/17.]
- (5) Foreign Office to French Ambassador, October 21, 1930. [W 10416/5398/17.]
- (6) Memo. of Japanese Ambassador, August 24, 1927. [F 7108/736/23.]
- (7) Foreign Office to Japanese Ambassador, September 14, 1927. [F 7465/736/23.]
- (8) Japanese Ambassador to Foreign Office, March 7, 1930. [F 1310/650/23.]
- (9) Japanese Ambassador to Foreign Office, March 11, 1930. [F 1410/650/23.]
- (10) Foreign Office to Japanese Ambassador, April 8, 1930. [F 1714/650/23.]
- (11) Japanese Ambassador to Foreign Office, May 14, 1930. [F 5582/650/23.]
- (12) Foreign Office to Japanese Ambassador, October 14, 1930. [F 7071/650/23.]
- (13) Japanese Ambassador to Foreign Office, December 16, 1930. [F 3792/296/23.]
- (14) Foreign Office to Japanese Ambassador, July 9, 1931. [Cd. 2455 (Treaty 1187).]
- (15) Anglo-French Convention, February 19, 1903. [Cd. 2489 (Treaty 1191).]
- (16) Anglo-Japanese Convention, August 29, 1904. [Cd. 2489 (Treaty 1191).]
- (17) Article 2 of Treaty between Great Britain and Austria, December 5, 1876. [Hertslet's Treaties, vol. 14, p. 163.]

Opinion.

THE Permanent Court of International Justice has declared it to be a principle of international law that the breach of an engagement involves an obligation to make reparation in an adequate form. The same principle has been applied in earlier conventional arbitrations to which our attention has been called in a memorandum from the Foreign Office. It follows from the above-mentioned declaration that there is a substantial risk of damages being awarded by the Permanent Court against His Majesty's Government in the event of a claim being made by a Government concerned and of a decision by the Court that the extension of Imperial preference to Palestine goods is a breach of a most-favoured-nation clause contained in a relevant commercial treaty. The measure of such damages would, in our opinion, probably be—

- (a) In the case of goods actually imported into the United Kingdom by nationals of the complainant State, a sum not exceeding the amount of the duty imposed upon such goods to the extent to which the excess of such duty over that, if any, imposed on like goods from Palestine falls upon such nationals by actual payment of the duty or by an equivalent reduction of the price; and

[8717]

- (b) In the case of trade in such goods proved to have been lost directly owing to the imposition of the duty, a sum not exceeding the loss of profit calculated on the usual commercial principles.

The test to be applied in the assessment of damages is the injury done to the individuals whose interests have suffered by reason of the illegal act. These damages, however, would not, in our opinion, extend to more remote consequential loss, such loss being incapable of ascertainment according to the principles laid down by the Permanent Court.

2. In our opinion, the course suggested in the Colonial Office letter of the 19th February, 1932, is the best method of obtaining a decision of the Court upon the point in issue without running any risk of a claim for damages. This method is likely to be more expeditious than procedure under the Optional Clause, and more expeditious also and convenient than the procedure under article 14 with a view to obtaining an advisory opinion. We recommend that, if possible, the Government selected for the proposed communication should be one whose Commercial Treaty contains a clause which raises the substantial issue as clearly as possible, e.g., a clause referring to "any other foreign country." It is to be observed that by article 59 of the Court's Statute "the decision of the Court has no binding force except between the parties and in respect of that particular case," but the Court's decisions are authoritative declarations of international law and are followed by the Court itself as precedents, so that a favourable decision would, in effect, be conclusive in pari materia although it would not, as a matter of law, bind third States. A decision under one most-favoured-nation clause obviously would not be conclusive as regards a differently worded clause, but in practice it would probably be an important step in determining the legal position under most-favoured-nation clauses generally.

3. In our opinion, there is no practical danger that an adverse judgment of the Court would be in such a form as to call in question the right of His Majesty's Government, under international law, to accord preferential treatment to the Dominions and to the Colonies and other Dependencies without granting similar treatment to countries whose treaties with the United Kingdom contain most-favoured-nation clauses. The Court has always been careful in giving its decisions to limit itself strictly to the points submitted to it, and even if such a question were mooted we should regard an adverse decision as exceedingly improbable.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.

Law Officers' Department,
March 16, 1932.

PERSIA.

[E 6489/3880/34/1932]

No. 3.

[December 7, 1932.]

Opinion by the Law Officers of the Crown.

THREE questions have been submitted to us:—

1. Whether His Majesty's Government are on safe ground in claiming that the Permanent Court of International Justice has jurisdiction under the optional clause to decide the dispute which has arisen between His Majesty's Government and Persia?
2. Whether a decision by the Permanent Court upholding an objection to the jurisdiction would prejudice the position of His Majesty's Government in relation to their claim to enforce the rights of the Anglo-Persian Company under the concession?
3. Whether His Majesty's Government are right on the merits?

In answer to the first question, we are of opinion that the terms of the Persian acceptance of the optional clause are so limited as to make it very doubtful

Unilateral cancellation
by Persian Government of Anglo-
Persian Oil Company's concession: jurisdiction
of Permanent Court of International Justice.

whether the present dispute is within the jurisdiction of the court, notwithstanding that we are of opinion that article 36 (2) of the statute of the court covers the present dispute. The acceptance by Persia seems to us only to cover disputes as to facts and situations referring directly or indirectly to the application of treaties or conventions. We are unable to regard the concession in question as either a treaty or a convention. There may be some treaty or convention which is indirectly affected by the repudiation of this concession, but we have no information on this point.

We do not, however, regard the question of jurisdiction as unarguable, especially in view of the very restricted operation of the acceptance by Persia of the optional clause which would result from our construction of the acceptance.

In answer to the second question, we are of opinion that a decision upholding an objection to the jurisdiction of the court would not prejudice the rights of His Majesty's Government to pursue their remedies either by submission of the dispute to the Council of the League of Nations or in some other way. Indeed, we think that the readiness of His Majesty's Government to submit the case to the Permanent Court would strengthen their position.

In answer to the third question, on our present information we see no reason apart from the question of jurisdiction to think that His Majesty Government would not succeed in their claim.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.

Law Officers' Department,
December 7, 1932.

SUDAN.

[J 821/355/16]

No. 4.

[July 4, 1932.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 12, 1932.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir John Simon, to request the favour of your advice upon the question of the grant of Imperial Preference to goods the product of the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan in relation to the obligations of His Majesty under the most-favoured-nation clauses of commercial treaties concluded in respect of the United Kingdom. The question is whether it is possible to grant Imperial Preference to the Sudan, while refusing it to the foreign countries with whom such commercial treaties have been concluded, without committing any breach of treaty obligations. Some of the considerations which arise have recently been before you in references from the Colonial Office on the question of the extension of Imperial Preference to Palestine, but, as the international position of the Sudan is quite different from that of Palestine, it is thought that it would be convenient to make the present reference self-contained.

2. Most-favoured-nation obligations in respect of customs or import duties have been entered into with a number of foreign countries. The relevant articles in the treaties correspond generally to one or other of the two following types:—

- (a) "There shall be reciprocal liberty of commerce and navigation. . . .
"No duty of customs or other impost shall be charged upon any goods the produce of one country, upon importation by sea or by land from such country into the other, higher than the duty or impost charged upon goods of the same kind, the produce of, or imported from, any other country."
(Treaty with the Netherlands, the 27th October, 1837, article 1, paragraph 2.)

[8717]

Grant of Imperial Preference to the Sudan: effect upon British most-favoured-nation
obligations.

(b) "Articles produced or manufactured in the territories of one of the high contracting parties, imported into the territories of the other, from whatever place arriving, shall not be subjected to other or higher duties or charges than those paid on the like articles produced or manufactured in any other foreign country" (article 14 of the Commercial Treaty with Turkey of the 1st March, 1930, Paper A).

The question is, therefore, whether the Sudan must for this purpose be regarded as either a "country" other than the United Kingdom within the meaning of article 1 (2) of the above-mentioned treaty with the Netherlands, or "another foreign country" within the meaning of article 14 of the treaty with Turkey quoted above, or similar articles in other treaties. Of these two types of articles (b) is by far the more common.

3. His Majesty's Government have consistently acted upon the assumption that the Dominions, Colonies and Protectorates were not "other (foreign) countries" within the meaning of these commercial treaty articles, and, indeed, the whole of the policy of Imperial Preference depends upon this assumption being successfully maintained for so long as any commercial treaties with foreign Powers containing articles upon these lines remain in force. Up to the present the assumption of His Majesty's Government upon this point has not been seriously challenged, though recently both the French and Japanese Governments have shown a disposition to contest it so far as India is concerned. But up to the present His Majesty's Government have successfully maintained their contention, and no point has so far been raised as to the difference between the phrase "any other country" in the one form of provision and "any other foreign country" in the other. The question is, however, at present under consideration of substituting in future commercial treaties a different formula for the words "any other foreign country," in order to safeguard Imperial Preference by an express provision.

4. Most commercial treaties concluded by this country contain articles providing for the extension of the treaties, at the desire of His Majesty, to British Colonies, Protectorates and mandated territories, and for accession thereto by His Majesty in respect of the Dominions and India (see, for example, article 37 and article 38 of the Commercial Treaty with Turkey of March 1930, Paper A). These articles may be relevant for the purposes of the interpretation of the expression "any other (foreign) country" in other articles of the treaty, as leading to the conclusion that territories to which they applied were not intended to be considered as "other (foreign) countries" in their relations to the United Kingdom. These articles have never been used to extend such treaties to the Sudan, nor, for the reasons given in paragraphs 7 and 8 below, is it thought that it could be contended that these articles could be applied to the Sudan. This fact is one amongst other considerations which serves to distinguish the position of the Sudan from that of the Dominions and Colonies for the purposes of the interpretation of these treaties. On the other hand, it may be pointed out that Palestine is a party to a considerable number of the commercial treaties concluded by His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom (for example, to the Anglo-German Commercial Treaty of 1924). Although His Majesty's Government have thus recognised that Palestine may for this purpose be regarded as a territory of one of the high contracting parties, they have none the less, acting on the advice of successive Law Officers, continued to regard Palestine as a foreign country for the purpose of Imperial Preference. Further, it does not necessarily follow that the foreign countries which have agreed to recognise Palestine as a territory of His Majesty's Government for the purpose of the application of the treaty in question would be willing so to regard Palestine for the purpose of Imperial Preference. It is possible that even if it were practicable to regard the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan as a territory of His Majesty's Government, similar considerations might apply.

5. If Imperial Preference were granted to the Sudan, and any foreign Government were to claim, by virtue of its most-favoured-nation rights, the extension of Imperial Preference to its own products, in most cases the foreign Government would, if it so desired, be in a position to demand that the question in dispute should be submitted for decision to the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague, either by reason of an arbitration article in the commercial treaty concerned or by reason of the acceptance by both parties of the optional clause of the statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice. Though the position of the Sudan is different from that of the Dominions, Colonies or Protectorates in its relations to this country, the possibility that the Permanent Court, in deciding the question in relation to the Sudan, might base its judgment upon reasoning which might be embarrassing in relation to the contention of His Majesty's Government with regard to the grant of Imperial Preference to the Dominions and Colonies cannot be altogether overlooked. Further, if the Permanent Court were called upon to decide a dispute relating to the grant of Imperial Preference to the Sudan, the question clearly would turn on the nature of the relations between the Sudan and this country, and political disadvantages might attend the pronouncement of the Permanent Court of International Justice on the nature of the relations of the Sudan with this country at the present time, particularly in view of the possibility of the Egyptian Government claiming a right to intervene under article 62 of the statute of the court on the ground that the question was one in which the interests of Egypt were directly involved. Egypt is itself one of the countries with whom most-favoured-nation obligations have been entered into, though in this case they are contained only in a temporary agreement. In virtue of this agreement, His Majesty's Government have undertaken to accord to goods the produce or manufacture of Egypt treatment not less favourable than that granted to goods the produce or manufacture of any other foreign country.

6. The international position of the Sudan and the circumstances which have produced it are described in the historical memorandum of which copies are enclosed (Paper B), and copies of the Anglo-Egyptian Agreement of 1899 and of the British declaration of February 1922, which are referred to therein, are sent herewith (Papers C and D). That position is admittedly anomalous. While Egyptian Nationalist opinion professes still to regard the Sudan as an Egyptian province, the agreement of 1899 has generally been regarded as creating a "condominium" under the joint sovereignty of Great Britain and Egypt (see, for instance, Oppenheimer's "International Law," 4th edition, vol. I, pp. 233 and 362-63). In fact, however, Egyptian sovereignty is represented only by the flying of the Egyptian flag along with the British. In practice, the administration of the country is entirely under the ultimate control of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom. The Governor-General is, under article 3 of the 1899 agreement (Paper C), appointed by Egyptian decree on the recommendation of His Majesty's Government, but the holders of the office have always been British subjects, and the Egyptian Government have had no voice in their selection, their function being confined to appointing the nominee of His Majesty's Government. The Governor-General, who has full powers of legislation and administration, acts under the instructions of His Majesty's Government, and in practice the administration of the Sudan is as much under the control of that Government as is that of any colony. It may be added that on more than one occasion the Sudan has raised a loan under the guarantee of the Imperial Parliament. In fact, while the theory of conjoint sovereignty has been preserved by the title of "The Anglo-Egyptian Sudan," by the flying of both flags, by the acceptance of an annual subsidy of £E. 750,000 payable by Egypt to the Sudan and by the fact that, in accordance with article 4 of the 1899 agreement (Paper C), Sudanese legislation is notified both to His Majesty's representative in Cairo and the President of the Egyptian Council of Ministers, the Sudan has in practice been treated as if it were part of the British Empire. Since the Sudan forms one of the "reserved subjects" under the declaration of 1922 (Paper D), the determination of its future status awaits the result of future negotiations with the Egyptian Government.

7. In view, however, of the peculiar status of the Sudan, it was found necessary in 1925 to consider the question as to how the Sudan should participate in international conferences and accept the obligations of international conventions when practical circumstances render such a course desirable. The decision taken on this question was based upon a memorandum by Sir Cecil Hurst (Paper E). It will be seen that it was decided that, in view of the status of the Sudan, it was not possible for international conventions to be extended to the Sudan in the same manner as they are extended to British Colonies and Protectorates, by action taken by His Majesty's Government under the colonial articles of such conventions, on the ground that any such action could only be justified by the view that the Sudan was in the position of a Colony or

Protectorate of His Majesty, and, owing to the existence of the condominium, it was not possible to contend that the Sudan fell into either of these classes. The following is a specimen of the usual form of colonial article in international conventions:—

"Any high contracting party may, at the time of signature, ratification or accession, declare that, in accepting the present convention, he does not assume any obligations in respect of all or any of his colonies, protectorates, overseas territories or territories under suzerainty or mandate; and the present convention shall not apply to any territories named in such declaration.

"Any high contracting party may give notice to the Secretary-General of the League of Nations at any time subsequently that he desires that the convention should apply to all or any of his territories which have been made the subject of a declaration under the preceding paragraph, and the convention shall apply to all the territories named in such notice one year after its receipt by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations.

"Any high contracting party may, at any time after the expiration of the five years' period mentioned in article 16, declare that he desires that the present convention shall cease to apply to all or any of his colonies, protectorates, overseas territories or territories under suzerainty or mandate, and the convention shall cease to apply to the territories named in such declaration six months after its receipt by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations.

"The Secretary-General of the League of Nations shall communicate to all the members of the League of Nations and non-member States mentioned in article 12 all declarations and notices received in virtue of this article."

8. Similar reasoning led also to the conclusion that it was not possible for these conventions to be extended to the Sudan as a Colony or Protectorate of Egypt. Consequently the conclusion was arrived at that, for the purposes of participation in international conventions or conferences, the Sudan must be regarded as a separate entity or State, with the Governor-General as a sort of head of the State, in whom all the treaty-making power was vested. Effect has been given to this conclusion in a number of cases. For instance, the General Sanitary Convention of 1926 was signed by delegates acting under full powers issued by the Governor-General of the Sudan, and was ratified by an instrument signed by the Governor-General. In the list of heads of States in the preamble to the convention, "the Governor-General, representing the sovereign authority of the Sudan," appears alongside of His Majesty, the President of the French Republic, &c. The wording employed is significant of the peculiar status of the Sudan, and it may also be material to observe that the Sultan of Morocco and the Bey of Tunis, which are French Protectorates, figure similarly in the preamble to this instrument. (France none the less accords preference to both Morocco and Tunis, and there is a strong movement for the complete incorporation of Tunis into the French customs area.) The Sudan has also acceded to a number of other international conventions by means of an instrument signed by the Governor-General and under the articles appropriate for the accession of separate independent States, as opposed to the articles providing for accession in respect of Colonies.

9. Section 8 of the Finance Act of 1919 provides for the grant of Imperial Preference to "the British Empire," which was defined as including "any territories under His Majesty's protection"; this definition is reproduced in the Import Duties Act. At that time the protectorate over Egypt, declared in 1914, was still in existence, and it was accordingly decided that Egypt and the Sudan should be regarded as coming within this definition. On the termination, under the declaration of 1922 (Paper D), of the British protectorate over Egypt, Imperial Preference ceased to be granted to Egypt, but it was decided to continue it in relation to the Sudan, and an affirmative answer has been given to enquiries from traders whether the Sudan was included within the definition in section 8 of that Act. The point as to the possible effect under the most-favoured-nation obligations of this country of the grant of Imperial Preference to the Sudan has been raised in the past, but up to now it has in practice been an academic one, since it is probable that no goods imported into this country which were products of the Sudan have hitherto come within any of the classes with respect to which Imperial Preference has been given. Consequently the Sudan has never enjoyed any substantial measure of preference, and, indeed, has probably enjoyed no preference at all. The commercial treaty question has therefore never arisen in a practical form. There is no reason, therefore, to suppose that the attention of any foreign Government has ever been directed to the matter, nor that the Egyptian Government have been aware of the opinions expressed to the effect that the Sudan would be entitled to Imperial Preference as a territory under His Majesty's protection if any Sudan exports were goods in respect of which preference was granted.

10. The situation has, however, been modified by the passage of the Import Duties Act. In 1930 Sudanese exports to all countries amounted to £E. 4,953,282, of which £E. 3,289,780 came to the United Kingdom. Of the latter figure, £E. 3,031,398 consisted of raw cotton and cotton seed, which are on the free list under the Bill. Of the balance, £E. 199,588 consisted of gum, which is not on the free list, thus leaving a balance of unclassified goods to the value of £E. 58,794, some of which at any rate would presumably not be on the free list. It will be seen, therefore, that for the first time a proportion of Sudanese exports to this country will be in a position to benefit by the grant of Imperial Preference, and the question has thus assumed a practical importance.

11. The question whether, if Imperial Preference were given to the Sudan, the Sudan would be able to reciprocate by granting any preference to exports from this country is still under consideration. It seems probable, however, that by reason of the provisions of article 7 of the 1899 agreement (Paper C) it would not be possible for the Sudan to grant any reciprocity to the goods of this country, unless an agreement to this effect was made with the Egyptian Government. It is extremely doubtful whether it would be possible to come to any agreement with the Egyptian Government on this point, and whether it would be politically desirable to attempt it. It may be added that Egypt gives exceptionally favourable treatment to Sudanese imports, and has expressly reserved the power to do so in some, if not all, of her commercial arrangements.

12. It is also perhaps relevant to consider what might be the results if Imperial Preference were granted to the Sudan and the matter were taken to the Permanent Court of International Justice, and a decision adverse to His Majesty's Government resulted. Clearly as a result, His Majesty's Government would have to cease to grant Imperial Preference to the Sudan. The question must also, however, be considered whether the foreign Government which had obtained a decision in its favour from the Permanent Court could claim damages for the injury which it had suffered by reason of the breach of its treaty rights during the period when rates of duty had been imposed upon its exports to this country while corresponding imports from the Sudan had been admitted free. It might be that, in practice, the foreign Government would not make this claim, but if it would have any legal right to do so, the possibility that it would exercise it can certainly not be altogether discounted.

13. The Permanent Court in decisions given by it has held that the breach of any treaty obligation creates an obligation under international law to make reparation, and has also held that under international law reparation can only be claimed for damage resulting directly from the breach of the treaty obligation, and not for indirect damages. The Permanent Court has further held that where the breach of the treaty obligation which is the subject of the proceedings before the court resulted in injury or loss to the nationals of the plaintiff State, the position before the court is that the State itself is the claimant and is claiming for the injuries done to itself in the person of its nationals, and that consequently it may claim as for damage suffered by itself an indemnity corresponding to the damage which the nationals have suffered as the result of the act which was contrary to international obligations. A summary of the existing decisions of the Permanent Court will be found in a reprint from an article in the "British Year Book of International Law" (Paper F); the decisions of the Permanent Court which appear to have any relevance to this question will be found discussed on pp. 4-8 and 22-24 of this article, together with the necessary references to the reported decisions of the court.

14. It is difficult to estimate what, under international law, would be the appropriate measure of damages in a case of this kind. It might be said that the refund of all the duties which had been wrongly levied could be claimed, and in such precedents as it has been possible to discover this has been the course adopted. A memorandum on this point is enclosed (Paper G). It might be contended, on the other hand, that the damage suffered by the claimant State and its nationals was the loss of trade which they had suffered by reason of the imposition of higher duties, or alternatively, the lower figure at which they had been obliged to offer their goods for sale. If this is the true criterion for calculating the damages, it is clear that it is one which is almost impossible of precise calculation, and it might be held, therefore, that the claimant would fail on the ground that it was for the claimant State strictly to prove its damages and it had been unable to do so. No precedent has been discovered in which this criterion has been adopted, and it would seem, in the light of the precedents referred to above, that such damages would be regarded as indirect or too remote. In any case, it would appear that since what a State possessing most-favoured-nation rights is entitled to claim for its goods is the treatment accorded to "goods of the same kind," "the like articles" or simply "goods" coming from any other (foreign) country (see provisions quoted in paragraph 2 and at the end of paragraph 5), the measure of damage would be limited to the classes of goods which, in fact, received Imperial Preference when exported from the Sudan; no claim could be made to the benefits of Imperial Preference in general, and consequently no claim could be based on the duties levied on goods other than those which, when exported from the Sudan, were admitted free of duty.

15. I have the honour, therefore, to request you to take these papers into your consideration and to favour Sir John Simon with your advice as to the likelihood of a foreign State, which possesses most-favoured-nation rights in one or other of the typical forms quoted in paragraph 2 above, being able to establish before an international tribunal its right to receive, in respect of goods imported into this country, the same treatment as that accorded to the like goods imported into this country from the Sudan, and generally as to the degree of risk attaching to the grant of Imperial Preference to the Sudan, with particular reference to the question of damages referred to in the preceding paragraph. Sir John Simon will, of course, be grateful to receive any observations of a general character which you may desire to offer.

I have, &c.

M. D. PETERSON.

List of Papers.

- (A).—Commercial Treaty with Turkey, March 1, 1930.
- (B).—Memorandum on the Sudan. [Annex A.]
- (C).—Anglo-Egyptian Agreement of January 19, 1899.
- (D).—Declaration of February 28, 1922.
- (E).—Foreign Office despatch to Lord Allenby of January 22, 1925, enclosing memorandum by Sir Cecil Hurst on the International Relations of the Sudan. [Annex B.]
- (F).—Reprint from the "British Year Book of International Law," 1930, of article by Mr. W. E. Beckett, entitled "Decisions of the Permanent Court of International Justice on Points of Law and Procedure of General Application."
- (G).—Foreign Office Memorandum of February 23, 1932, "Compensation for Imposition of Duties in Violation of Treaty Rights." [Annex C.]

Report.

A foreign State having most-favoured-nation rights in either of the typical forms would, in our opinion, have no difficulty in establishing before an international tribunal its right to receive the same treatment in respect of its goods imported into this country as that accorded to the like goods imported from the Sudan. The contrary view would involve a reversal of conclusions arrived at, not only by the Mixed Courts in Cairo, but by His Majesty's Government, to the effect that the Sudan has been constituted as a new and separate State, although undoubtedly a State sui generis. We are of opinion that those conclusions were right. The Sudan is a State existing under a condominium enjoyed by Great Britain and Egypt, but none the less it is, in our opinion, a separate State, and the declaration of Egyptian independence has thrown into clearer relief the impossibility of treating the Sudan as a part of the British Empire. It follows, in our opinion, that it is "another country" or "another foreign country" for the purpose of the most-favoured-nation clauses under our consideration.

If we are right in the opinion we have expressed on the main question submitted to us, the grant of Imperial Preference to the Sudan would be attended with a very serious risk of a liability to pay damages to another Power by way of reparation for the breach of treaty obligations. Such reparation would consist of an indemnity measured by the direct loss or expense suffered or incurred by the nationals of the Power in question in consequence of the duty imposed on their goods over and above the duty, if any, on goods from the Sudan. This would clearly cover a return of duties wrongly levied. Loss of trade directly resulting would, in our opinion, also be taken into consideration. We are of opinion that the damages would be limited to classes of goods exported from the Sudan.

It is impossible to do more than speculate as to the extent to which damages might result directly from the grant of preference and be capable of proof. Indirect loss of trade would not be admitted. Beyond a statement of these general principles based on rulings of the Permanent Court of International Justice, we do not feel able to go.

T. W. N. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.

Law Officers' Department,
July 4, 1932.

ANNEX A.

Memorandum on the Sudan.

1. It is a manifest untruth to claim that, ethnologically considered, Egypt and the Sudan are one. There is an entire disparity between the two types of natives, and their only similarities are that Egyptians and the tribes in the Northern Sudan speak Arabic and are nearly all Moslems.

2. Until the 19th century the whole of the tract between Egypt and the Congo had never been subject to one central authority, though the rule of the Fung kings in the 16th, 17th and 18th centuries nominally extended over the central portion of what is now the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan. The coming of the Arabs provided the north and central districts with a common language and religion, but not with unified political control.

3. In 1819 Mohamed Ali Pasha invaded the Sudan, and his armies had little difficulty in taking possession of the power which was already slipping from the impotent hands of native dynasties, whose main strength was expended in internecine bickering. An administrative system of a kind was established for the northern districts, and yearly expeditions were sent southwards in quest of gold and slaves. The Egyptian rule aimed only at the exploitation and not at the development of the whole country, and it is only surprising that the reaction to their amazingly callous maladministration was deferred for sixty years, for it was not until the Dervish rising in 1881 that this policy found its inevitable consummation.

4. The British connexion with the Sudan may be said to date from 1869, when the Khedive Ismail granted to Sir S. Baker powers over all the Nile Basin south of Gondokoro (between Mongalla and Rejaf), with instructions to annex it and effect reforms. On his way south Sir S. Baker was shocked by the poverty and desolation of the Nile Valley. In 1873 the Khedive appointed General Gordon to succeed Sir S. Baker, with the title of Governor-General of the Equatorial Provinces. At the same time Ismail Pasha expanded his domains in Bahr-el-Ghazal, in Eritrea and on the Ethiopian frontier.

5. In 1877 General Gordon was made Governor-General of the whole Sudan. Hampered by the venality and corruption of the Egyptian officials, and forced by sporadic revolts to dash from one end to the other of the vast domain under his control, General Gordon was unable to effect a twentieth part of the reforms necessary, and in 1880, just when he had succeeded in reducing the insurgents to quiescence, the Khedive recalled him.

6. In August 1881 the Mahdi proclaimed his divine mission of regeneration.

7. The attitude of successive Governments in England to Egypt and the Sudan may be summed up in the idea that, while it was held to be essential to the safety of Imperial communications that no other Power establish itself in Egypt, Great Britain would not herself step into that country. From the time of Bonaparte's expedition to Egypt until 1904, when the French recognised the British occupation of Egypt, there was a continual struggle, sometimes open and sometimes latent, between Great Britain and France for supremacy in the Eastern Mediterranean. The overland route to the East and then the Suez Canal only served to accentuate the conflict of interests. In the period between 1875 and 1883 the growing importance of the Canal and the financial collapse of Egypt gradually forced the hand of the British Government, and two new motives came to dominate our policy: the defence of the interests of the bondholders of the Canal Company, and, arising out of this, the reform of the Government of Egypt. French interests were similar, and the French Government, weakened by the Franco-Prussian war and unable to dispense with British goodwill, offered co-operation in Egypt. It was impossible to refuse this offer, and so we see, from 1876 onwards, carefully-selected Englishmen working in Egypt itself on the problem of finance, which, they early discovered, could not be divorced from the general government of the country. A period of vacillation and negative policy followed until in 1882 the course of events forced us to actual intervention and the use of armed force. The events of this year, the bombardment of Alexandria, the defection of the French, the defeat of Arabi Pasha by a British force, and the occupation of Cairo created a new situation. The occupation was declared to be temporary, but one definite move was made: the Anglo-French dual control was terminated and the control of Egyptian finance was vested in one British adviser. As Lord Cromer points out, the British Cabinet wanted two things—the evacuation of British troops and the continuance of reforms; these two things were incompatible, and as time went on, and despite the dislike felt for the situation at home and sundry attempts made to abolish the control, this irregular situation, complicated and embarrassing though it was, became an understood thing.

8. Any suggestion for the immediate withdrawal of troops from Egypt was rendered impossible by the revolt of the Sudan, and the necessity for providing for the defence of Egypt against invasion from the south. By 1882 the whole framework of society in Egypt was on the verge of collapse, and in 1883 the British Government decided that Egypt must evacuate the Sudan and hold only the frontier, Suakin, Massawa, and the Red Sea ports. General Gordon was chosen for the task of evacuation, and proceeded to Khartoum as Governor-General in 1884. The subsequent events of that year, culminating in the fall of Khartoum and the death of General Gordon in January 1885, are too well known to need recapitulation.

9. The next stage was one of retirement, but British public opinion was aroused, and the rise of that "new Imperialism," of which Cecil Rhodes was the father and inspirer, engendered new ideals.

10. The view of every unbiassed historian has been the same: "Le Gouvernement égyptien du Soudan portait en lui-même son germe de destruction." . . . "La cause du soulèvement Mahdiste doit être recherchée dans l'administration intolérable du Gouvernement égyptien" (Dr. Sarkissian).

11. It is worth noting at this point that the cost to the British Treasury of the four years 1882–85 amounted, in addition to normal maintenance charges, to over £13 million; that 1,971 British officers and men had perished and 6,683 been invalided "in consequence of our operations in Egypt"; and that, when the British and Indian troops left in Suakin were withdrawn in 1886, the Egyptian garrison left in charge was paid for by the British Government.

12. There ensued a period between 1885 and 1898 when the Sudan, unoccupied by either Egyptian or British forces, was res nullius.

13. The power of the Khalifa in the Sudan was broken once and for all by Sir H. Kitchener in September 1898 at the battle of Omdurman, and on the 19th January, 1899, the status of the Sudan was defined by an agreement between the British and the Khedivial Governments.

14. At the moment when the agreement was signed, the background was briefly as follows:—

Great Britain had accepted responsibility for the guardianship and regeneration of Egypt, and, by 1899, she had been paramount in that country for seventeen years. She had sacrificed men and money, and had saved Egypt from financial and political ruin. She had preserved her from invasion by the hordes of the Khalifa, and, by her weight in the councils of Europe, she had refuted the claims of others, who held that the Sudan had become res nullius to be annexed and developed by the first comer (cf. the Fashoda incident). Finally, an Anglo-Egyptian force under British officers had crushed the Dervish power and put Great Britain in a position to effect the regeneration of the Sudan in the interests of its inhabitants.

15. The history of the Sudan and its progress from 1898 to the present day is the record of the fulfilment of this duty.

16. The Condominium Agreement of 1899 was an attempt by Great Britain to obtain freedom of action in the Sudan without undue injury to the susceptibilities of Europe and of Egypt. Lord Cromer described the Constitution of the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan embodied therein as "a hybrid form of government, hitherto unknown to international jurisprudence," and as "the child of opportunism." He added: "Should it eventually die and make place for some more robust, because more real, political creation, its authors need not bewail its fate."

17. The political effect of the Condominium Agreement may be summed up in the following salient points:—

- (i) The joint sovereignty of Great Britain and Egypt is clearly and incontestably established by the flying of the two flags on public buildings.
- (ii) British control of the administrative machinery is provided by articles 3 and 4. Juridically the Governor-General nominated by the British Government, but appointed by the King of Egypt, may be regarded as possessing unlimited powers, for neither party to the Condominium has reserved to itself the power to review or disallow his acts. De facto he can be removed from his post, but only if the British Government consents. In practice he is subject to the instructions of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, conveyed to him by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, through the British representative in Cairo, who now holds the title of "High Commissioner for Egypt and the Sudan." The Governor-General does not receive instructions from the Egyptian Government.
- (iii) The appointment of consuls, &c., in the Sudan is specifically made subject to the consent of the British Government, which has, in fact, been withheld.

18. The legal effect of the agreement of 1899 was the subject of argument in an action brought in 1910 before the Mixed Courts in Cairo against the Egyptian and Sudan Governments. The plaintiffs were a firm of contractors who sued upon a contract made by the Sudan Government and joined the Egyptian Government on the ground that the Sudan had never ceased to be an integral part of Egypt.

19. The Egyptian Government pleaded that, by the Agreement of 1899, the Sudan Government was constituted an autonomous Government absolutely separate and distinct from the Egyptian Government, and that the Egyptian Government was consequently in no way responsible for the Sudan Government's contractual obligations. The court upheld this plea and the plaintiffs were nonsuited.

20. The Sudan Government pleaded that the jurisdiction of the Mixed Courts was excluded from the Sudan by the same agreement by virtue of which the Sudan Government was constituted an independent Government. The court upheld this plea and found that by the agreement a new State was established in the Sudan, distinct from and independent of Egypt.

21. The following passages from the Mixed Courts judgment on these questions are of interest:—

"Attendu que c'est un fait historique que . . . le Soudan a dû être abandonné en fait par l'Egypte et qu'ensuite . . . il a été décidé (par le Conseil des Ministres) que la moudirieh de la frontière . . . sera délimitée au sud par le markaz de Wadi Halfa;

"Attendu qu'on est donc amené à en conclure que l'Egypte, en fixant ainsi sa frontière sud, a considéré les provinces du Soudan comme temporairement perdues et séparées de l'Egypte, sans toutefois les abandonner définitivement, mais en attendant le moment propice pour les reconquérir."

"Qu'en effet le Soudan n'est pas revenu à l'Egypte libre de toute charge."

"Qu'il a été établi un véritable condominium au profit des Puissances conquérantes, que pour ainsi dire un Etat nouveau et indépendant de l'Egypte a été créé, qui a droit d'administrer, de légiférer et de juger;

"Attendu qu'il est donc manifeste que la convention dont il s'agit est un acte de souveraineté émanant non seulement du pouvoir souverain de l'Egypte, mais encore de celui de la Grande-Bretagne;

"Attendu qu'il s'ensuit que l'autorité judiciaire doit respecter la convention et s'arrêter, sinon devant une situation en droit, tout au moins devant une situation de fait, ladite convention ayant reçu son exécution;

"... il faut dire en l'état actuel des choses, d'une part, la Juridiction mixte ne peut pas proclamer sa compétence pour juger un procès mixte qui a pris naissance au Soudan et, d'autre part, vu que le Soudan est indépendant de l'Egypte, le Gouvernement égyptien n'a rien à voir dans le présent litige

"Par ces motifs :

Met hors de cause le Gouvernement égyptien;

Et statuant dans les rapports entre les demandeurs et le Gouvernement du Soudan;

"Se déclare incompetent."

22. The claims of the Egyptians that the sovereign rights of Egypt, acquired by conquest in 1820 and the years following remain unimpaired, may derive an appearance of force from the studiously conciliatory language of those who drafted the 1899 agreement, with the intention of avoiding complications in Europe, of excluding Ottoman suzerainty and of satisfying the amour-propre of Egypt. But what the old Egypt had won by the sword she had also lost by the sword.

23. In effect, had the words "mandate" and "mandatory power" been coined at that time, the position adopted by Great Britain might have been so described. Great Britain has conscientiously fulfilled her mandate for thirty-two years, albeit under the name of a condominium, and, in deference to the special interests of Egypt, under the ægis of two flags instead of one. Of these special interests the most vital is, of course, the waters of the Nile, and Egypt's absolute rights in this matter have been repeatedly admitted, and notably by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald in the House of Commons on the 10th July, 1924. Effect has been given to Britain's pledges to Egypt in this matter in the exchange of notes between His Majesty's Government and the Egyptian Government, dated the 7th May, 1929.

24. To revert to the course of history since 1899, there was no actual change in the relations between the British Government and the Egyptian Government on the one side, and the Sudan on the other until 1924. But the situation was materially affected by various important events during that period. In 1904 the French definitely recognised the British occupation of Egypt, while the outbreak of war with Turkey in 1914 necessarily involved an alteration in the position of Egypt. This alteration took two forms—the abolition of the Turkish suzerainty and the declaration of the Protectorate. After the war the great pressure of other problems, both internal and international, left little leisure for the consideration of Egyptian affairs, and it did not at first seem that the matter was urgent. But once again extraneous causes, in this case the growth of Egyptian nationalism, symbolised in the figure of Zaghlul Pasha, forced a decision upon the British Government. The grave disorders of 1919 were a trial of strength, and, to quote the words of Sir R. Graham, "the British authorities in Egypt, invested with full discretionary powers, have shown themselves unable or unwilling to stand up to the forces arrayed against them. The principle at issue has been surrendered." Egypt, in fact, held that she was an independent country, while the attitude of Great Britain had been that Egypt had become part of the British Empire. The Milner Commission exploded this theory and advanced a theory startling in its novelty, viz., that Egypt, though a Protectorate, could not be considered a part of the British Empire. The years 1920 and 1921 were taken up in fruitless attempts to negotiate with the Egyptians a modus vivendi which would give to Egypt a status between that of a Protectorate and that of an independent country. By the end of 1921 matters had reached a deadlock, and in November of that year the British advisers to the Egyptian Government stated unanimously that a decision which did not concede the principle of Egyptian independence . . . "must entail serious risk of revolution." As a result, and with obvious reluctance, the British Government agreed to the unilateral declaration of February 1922, which granted, with the reservation of four points, independence to Egypt. Of these reserved points, the Sudan was one. The effect of the declaration was that His Majesty's Government stated that the position of the Sudan was still governed by the 1899 agreement.

25. Since 1899, while Egyptian troops have been stationed in the Sudan, no Egyptian has held a higher grade administrative post. In 1924, following serious disturbances in the Sudan, particularly at Atbara and Khartum, organised by Egyptian influence and the dastardly assassination of the Sirdar, Sir Lee Stack, in Cairo, the Egyptian troops were withdrawn from the Sudan, and the Sudan Defence Force, which owes allegiance to the Governor-General, was formed; there are no Egyptian officers in this force. In January 1924 there had been eighty-four Egyptian mamours and sub-mamours in the Sudan; after the murder of Sir Lee Stack nearly all these were sent back to Egypt and their places taken by Sudanese. Amongst the minor clerical staff, only those Egyptians who had been known to have been indulging in undesirable political activities were sent out of the Sudan, and at the present time there are some 1,400 Egyptian officials occupying minor clerical and technical posts on the establishment of the Sudan Government.

26. It is therefore clear that, in practice, the administration of the Sudan has been British for the last thirty-three years.

27. There are certain points arising out of the above brief survey which are germane to the discussion of the exact political status of the Sudan. The first of these is the attitude adopted by Egypt to the 1910 decisions of the Mixed Courts, to which reference has been made in that survey.

28. Sir Malcolm McIlwraith, who was Judicial Adviser to the Egyptian Government when the 1899 Convention was drafted, stated in a letter to "The Times" on the 20th May, 1930: "Egypt herself admitted, in the Bencini case (i.e., the case above summarised) . . . that she had no rights or liabilities of government in the Sudan, since she demanded her dismissal from that suit expressly on the ground that the Sudan Government was a wholly separate and autonomous one."

29. The "Ministère Public," intervening in the case in 1910, pleaded:—

"Il y a eu donc concours de deux Puissances pour reconquérir le Soudan et l'on ne saurait, sous n'importe quel rapport, pouvoir alléguer ou même suggérer que le Soudan a été repris ou reconquis pour le seul compte de l'Egypte."

"Cette conquête a créé un Etat Nouveau, désigné sous le nom de Gouvernement du Soudan": and later: "Le Gouvernement du Soudan est tout à fait indépendant de celui de l'Egypte."

30. In the course of the discussions upon the terms of the Egyptian Constitution promulgated in 1923, it was learned that King Fuad desired his title to be "King of Egypt and the Sudan." The High Commissioner, acting on the instructions of His Majesty's Government, pointed out to His Majesty that this phrase could not be reconciled with the terms of the 1899 Condominium Agreement or of the declaration of the 28th February, 1922. At the beginning of 1923 King Fuad placed his signature to a document acquiescing in the view of His Majesty's Government as expressed above.

31. In August 1925 it was decided to create a special form of passport to be issued to "certain categories of persons permanently established in the Sudan." These passports bear the seal of the Governor-General and holders of them receive the same treatment as British-protected persons and do not require a British visa for the purpose of travelling to British territory. The absence of any requirement as to visas does not, however, confer upon the holder of a Sudanese passport any right of admission to British territory, or relieve them from the necessity of obtaining permission to land. An expired Sudanese passport can only be renewed by the issuing authority, viz., the Civil Secretary, Khartum, or the Sudan Agent, Cairo. It was at first provided that in cases of emergency the local authority empowered to deal with British passports should be entitled to issue a British emergency certificate, but this proposal was subsequently withdrawn in order to forestall Egyptian objections.

32. It is clear that the intention of these regulations was that neither British nor Egyptian consular officers should perform any function in connexion with Sudanese passports.

33. Lord Lloyd, then His Majesty's High Commissioner, Cairo, wrote to the president of the Egyptian Council of Ministers in May and August, 1926, informing him of the decision to issue Sudanese passports. Adly Pasha replied on the 14th September acknowledging the receipt of the second letter.

34. The protection of Sudanese abroad is undertaken by His Majesty's consular officers, but the instructions to consuls lay down that protection should only be accorded to persons holding Sudanese passports, and that all cases of persons claiming to be Sudanese, but not holding such passports should be referred to the Sudan Government.

G. A. WALLINGER.

Foreign Office, February 28, 1932.

ANNEX B.

Mr. Austen Chamberlain to Field-Marshal Viscount Allenby (Cairo).

(No. 86.)

My Lord,

Foreign Office, January 22, 1925.

I HAVE had under consideration the position of the Sudan Government in regard to international agreements and conferences. It will be remembered that this matter has been examined in some of its aspects in correspondence between your Lordship and my predecessors, but, until the outcome of the negotiations which were then expected to take place between the British and Egyptian Governments was known, it proved impossible to find a comprehensive solution of the problem.

2. Recent events have made it necessary to remove any ambiguity or misconception in regard to the status of the Sudan. His Majesty's Government have made it clear to all concerned that they intend to maintain their position in the Sudan and to remain responsible for the administration and development of the country. At the same time they have expressed their desire to maintain the condominium provided Egypt loyally accepts its obligations and refrains from any attempt, overt or covert, to undermine the British authority. I transmit to your Lordship the accompanying copy of a memorandum by my legal adviser, who defines the principle in accordance with which it seems to me that a solution of the questions arising out of the international relations of the Sudan, referred to in the preceding paragraph, may best be sought.

3. Sir C. Hurst considers that just as in the case of the Sudan Defence Force the Governor-General has been regarded as the embodiment of the condominium, so in the case of representation at international conferences and the signature and subsequent ratification of international agreements, or the accession to such agreements where this is possible, the Governor-General should be regarded as the embodiment of that "new, separate and independent State," which the Egyptian courts have recognised the Sudan to constitute. Acting on this principle it will be for His Majesty's Government to ensure that invitations to attend future international conferences are conveyed to the Sudan Government through this Department, and, if thought desirable, your Lordship may subsequently inform the Egyptian Government of the action taken and of the reply received from the Sudan Government. When an invitation has been accepted, and where the interests of the Sudan in the subject matter of the conference are such as to warrant the appointment of a separate Sudan delegate, the latter will be furnished with the necessary full powers by the Governor-General which might take the form of the accompanying draft. Owing to their limited interests, the Sudan Government may not in all cases desire to incur the expense of direct representation and may prefer to entrust the protection of their interests to the British delegate, who would then be furnished on behalf of the Sudan with the necessary full powers by the Governor-General.

4. It is necessary to determine the form which the Governor-General's instrument of ratification should adopt in the case of multilateral conventions to which under the procedure described above the Sudan may become a party, and I transmit to you, for communication to the Sudan Government, the accompanying copy of a draft instrument which, I am advised, will meet the purpose.

5. So far as concerns existing conventions or future conventions which are open to the accession of all States and of which the Sudan is not an original signatory, the Governor-General will only have to inform His Majesty's Government directly by means of a letter addressed to me of the desire of the Sudan Government to accede to any such convention. His letter, which should be drafted in such a form as itself to be equivalent to accession, will then be brought by the British diplomatic representative concerned to the notice of the Power responsible for recording accessions to the convention. The instrument of ratification referred to in the preceding paragraph can be conveyed to its destination through a similar channel.

6. It might conceivably be suggested that if the British and Egyptian Governments both were or became parties, without qualification or exclusion in regard to the Sudan, to a convention where there was no question of separate representation of colonies, possessions, protectorates or dependencies, and where the Sudan was not itself represented, that convention ought to be taken to be binding on the Sudan. It was precisely to avoid any question of this nature arising that, in the case of the Commercial Convention and the Convention regarding conditions of Business and Jurisdiction, signed at Lausanne in 1923, notification of the exclusion of the Sudan was made by the British delegation under the colonial exclusion clause. Again in the case of the conventions relating to the Simplification of Customs Formalities (Geneva, the 3rd November, 1923), the International Régime of Railways (Geneva, the 9th December, 1923), and to the International Régime of Maritime Ports (Geneva, the 9th December, 1923), to which His Majesty's Government and other parts of the Empire were parties, it was made clear in the letter conveying the instruments of ratification to the Secretary-General of the League of Nations that the King's ratification did not imply that these conventions would be applied in the Sudan, and this procedure might be followed in similar cases in the future.

7. Subject to any observations which, after consultation with the Sudan Government, your Lordship may wish to offer on the above proposals, I leave to your discretion the manner in which the Egyptian Government should be made aware of the intentions of His Majesty's Government.

I am, &c.

AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN.

ENCLOSURE IN ANNEX B.

Note by Sir C. Hurst on the International Relations of the Sudan.

THE method by which the Sudan shall in future become a party to treaties and international engagements has recently been under consideration. The Secretary of State has intimated a desire that the method employed should, while preserving the façade of the condominium, be such as to ensure full British control; such full British control constituting the policy which His Majesty's Government are determined to follow in connexion with the Sudan.

The safest and most effective method of meeting the Secretary of State's requirements will, in my opinion, be to take our stand firmly on the Anglo-Egyptian Agreement of 1899. That agreement embodies the arrangements made by Lord Cromer for the future government of the Sudan after the suppression of the Mahdist revolution, and is intended to give effect to the claims which accrued to the British Government by right of participation in the reconquest of the country. Article 3 of the agreement vested supreme military and civil command in the Sudan in a Governor-General, who was to be appointed by Egypt on the recommendation of the British Government.

The agreement of 1899 was the subject of consideration and interpretation by the mixed tribunals in Egypt in a decision rendered in 1910 in a case which involved the point whether the jurisdiction of the mixed tribunals extended to the Sudan. The tribunal held that the effect of the agreement was to establish what was in fact a condominium on the part of the two conquering Powers, and to constitute the Sudan as a new State, distinct and independent from Egypt and enjoying all administrative, legislative and judicial rights.

This decision is at the present juncture extremely useful. It places an interpretation on the agreement of 1899 which will enable the British control to be complete without in any way running counter to the agreement. The Governor-General, in whom the supreme military and civil command is to be vested, will always be an Englishman, and will always carry out whatever wishes the British Government express to him. Consequently, the convenient way to ensure British control, while preserving the façade of the condominium, will be to magnify the office and the importance of the Governor-General, who, though in form a functionary deriving his authority from both the British and the Egyptian Governments, will, in practice, always obey the instructions of His Majesty's Government. By emphasising the separateness from Egypt of the political entity which the 1899 agreement was held by the mixed tribunals to have brought into being, British control can be assured and Egyptian interference avoided. In the words of the decision of the tribunal, "the Sudan should be treated as having been constituted a new State, distinct and independent from Egypt."

All the difficulties relating to invitations to conferences, signature of treaties or accession to international instruments can then be got over without difficulty. So also can the question of passports for the Sudanese.

Passports drawn up in the name of the Governor-General should be issued to Sudanese, and the British representatives abroad should be notified that if any Sudanese should apply to them for aid he is to be entitled to all the assistance that can be rendered. The powers enjoyed under the condominium would certainly justify this. If a Sudanese chooses to apply to an Egyptian representative for assistance when he is abroad, there is no reason that he should not do so, for the right of Egypt to help him would also be derived from the condominium.

Invitations to attend at a conference should be issued to the Governor-General. Authority to sign an international instrument on behalf of the Sudan should emanate from the Governor-General. In practice it will usually be the case that the person authorised to sign on behalf of the Sudan should be the British representative, but he should receive a separate authorisation from the Governor-General, and the instrument should show on the face of it that it is signed on behalf of the Sudan. An accession to an international convention on behalf of the Sudan should also emanate from the Governor-General. So also would the ratification of a treaty which had been signed on behalf of the Sudan. The ratification must not be made in the name of the King; otherwise the condominium would necessitate the introduction of the King of Egypt as well.

I have just seen a telegram from Egypt which shows that the new Sudan defence force is being recruited on the terms of owing allegiance to the Governor-General. This arrangement is precisely in accordance with what I have suggested above as the best method of meeting the Secretary of State's requirement of ensuring British control while preserving the façade of the condominium. Allegiance to the Governor-General implies that the Governor-General is the head of a political unit of the nature of a separate State.

Foreign Office, January 16, 1925.

ANNEX C.

Memorandum on Compensation for Imposition of Duties in Violation of Treaty Rights.

I.

BY the United States Tariff Act of the 30th August, 1842, the duties on cotton goods imported into the United States were nearly doubled, but it was provided that the Act should not apply to goods shipped in vessels bound to any United States port which actually left their last port of lading "eastward of the Cape of Good Hope, or beyond Cape Horn, prior to the 1st September, 1842."

2. Article 2 of the Commercial Convention of the 3rd July, 1815, between Great Britain and the United States provides that "no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe . . . than are or shall be payable on the like articles being the growth, produce or manufacture of any other country."

3. Between August 1842 and the 13th May, 1843, a firm of Glasgow merchants imported at United States ports cotton goods to which were applied duties under the Act of 1842. These duties were paid under protest having regard to the terms of the treaty of 1815.

4. The question was submitted to the claims commission under the convention between Great Britain and the United States of the 8th February, 1853. The commission decided that there had been an infraction of the convention of 1815, and directed that the excess of duties exacted on cotton goods imported before the 13th May, 1843, should be refunded.

5. As regards interest, the commissioners pointed out that at the time the duties were demanded, the claimants formally protested and also claimed protection from the British Minister at Washington, so that the United States Government were, from the first, informed that the payment of the duty would be resisted. Further, the Act of 1842 contained a proviso as regards non-interference with existing treaties. Interest was therefore allowed on the claim from the time of payment.

II.

6. An Act of the United States Congress of the 22nd May, 1824, imposed an increase of duty on cottons with the proviso that it should not take effect on goods coming from beyond the Cape of Good Hope or Cape Horn for six months after it had been in operation as to goods imported from other countries.

7. The commission under the Anglo-United States Convention of the 8th February, 1853, regarded this proviso as a clear discrimination in violation of the Anglo-United States Convention of 1815.

8. The commission, therefore, allowed claims for the return of any excess of duties beyond those paid by those countries favoured by the proviso of the Act of 1824 during the six months' period.

9. As regards interest, the commission pointed out that "the duties were originally paid without complaint, and that the claim has been permitted to slumber, until very recently, without being brought to the notice of the United States; and we are of opinion that no interest should be allowed."

III.

10. The Anglo-United States Commercial Convention of the 3rd July, 1815, provides that no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the exportation of any articles from the one country to the territory of the other than such as are payable on the exportation of the like articles to any other foreign countries. It appears that from the date of the treaty down to the 6th May, 1830, Great Britain imposed an ad valorem duty of 10 per cent. on manufactured woollens exported to the United States and certain other countries, while during a large part of the time they were exported free of duty to other countries.

1932

11. As the result of representations by the United States, an order was finally issued in December 1845 by which the duties were refunded back to the 26th January, 1823, at which time the practice began of paying the duties under protest or conditionally. The claim for the refund of duties collected from the 3rd July, 1815, to the 26th January, 1823, remained unadjusted and were referred to the commission under the Anglo-United States convention of the 8th February, 1853.

12. It was conceded that the inequality of duties complained of violated the provisions of the convention of 1815, and it was decided that the duties should be refunded. For certain reasons, however, evidence of the precise amounts of duty paid by the United States importers could not be obtained, and the claimants made an arrangement with the British Government, by which the shippers' accounts, the claimants agreeing to waive interest on them, were accepted as a basis of settlement, and time was allowed for making the requisite apportionment between the several importers. This arrangement having been effected, the commission allowed the claims to be withdrawn.

13. From the above examples it would seem that in the case of the imposition of duties in contravention of treaty rights, the aggrieved party may claim a refund of all excess duties levied contrary to treaty obligations.

14. It is doubtful whether any claim would be upheld by an arbitral tribunal in respect of resultant damage to trade. In the Alabama arbitration before the Geneva tribunal, the arbitrators expressed the opinion that the indirect claims did not constitute good foundation for an award of damages as between nations. The Alabama Commission also held that "prospective earnings cannot properly be made the subject of compensation, inasmuch as they depend in their nature upon future and uncertain contingencies." The "Alabama" proceedings in this respect have been regarded as a reliable precedent by other arbitral tribunals which have disallowed indirect claims based upon loss of anticipated profits, loss of credit, and similar consequential elements of loss.

15. Thus, the following statements were made by the Venezuelan commissions in the arbitrations of 1903:—

"Damages to be recoverable must be shown with a reasonable degree of certainty, and cannot be recovered for an uncertain loss."

Again:—

"Governments, like individuals, are responsible only for the proximate and natural consequences of their acts. International as well as municipal law denies compensation for remote consequences, in the absence of evidence of deliberate intention to injure."

In the Hammaken case, Sir E. Thornton said:—

"The umpire has always been opposed to consequential damages, and thinks they ought never to be taken into consideration. It is impossible to measure them with any approach to justice; they are of an uncertain and imaginative nature"

A. F. ORCHARD.

Foreign Office, February 23, 1932.

1933

THIS DOCUMENT IS THE PROPERTY OF HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office

CONFIDENTIAL

(14468)

REPORTS BY THE
LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1933

(ii)

LIST OF REPORTS

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked 1^A, &c.

GENERAL.

No.		Date	SUBJECT.	Page.
1	Law Officers ..	Mar. 17, 1933	Polygamous marriages and nationality questions arising therefrom	1
2	Law Officers ..	July 28, 1933	Divorces under laws of Soviet Russia, Japan and China	74
2 ^A	Law Officers .. [Colonial Office]	July 28, 1933	Utilisation of Falkland Islands Dependencies Research and Development Fund	94

GERMANY.

3	Law Officers ..	Nov. 3, 1933	Locarno Treaty of Mutual Guarantee: effect of Germany's withdrawal from League of Nations	98
---	-----------------	--------------	---	----

IRAQ (see below).

NETHERLANDS.

4	Law Officers ..	Mar. 31, 1933	Interpretation of "Coast of Guinea" in British-Netherlands Convention, February 25, 1871.. .. .	105
---	-----------------	---------------	---	-----

PERSIA.

5	Law Officers ..	Nov. 9, 1933	Status of Basidu	116
---	-----------------	--------------	--------------------------	-----

TURKEY.

5 ^A	Attorney-General, Mr. G. T. Simonds and Mr. J. H. Stamp [Board of Trade]	Jan. 30, 1933	Claims of British nationals against Turkey entitled to benefit of second charge on proceeds of German property	143
----------------	---	---------------	--	-----

IRAQ.

5 ^B	Law Officers .. [Treasury]	Mar. 29, 1933	Date gardens in Iraq of Sheikh of Koweit and Mohammerah	148
----------------	-------------------------------	---------------	---	-----

(iii)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS)

1933

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.
Cases cited are indicated by italics.

ARB—DIV.

A.

Arbitration: admission by international courts of "travaux préparatoires" in constructing documents, 114.

B.

Basidu: status, 116-142.

C.

Claims: diplomatic, whether change of internal policy can be the subject of, if no international obligation involved, 97.
" of Sheikh of Koweit and Mohammerah to compensation from His Majesty's Government for taxes on date gardens in Iraq, 148-180.
" of British nationals against Turkey in respect of property, rights and interests, 143-147.
" ditto; position under article 297 of Treaty of Versailles and Treaty of Peace Order, 1919, 143-147.
" ditto; as a second charge on proceeds of German property, 143-147.

Coast of Guinea: interpretation of term in British-Netherlands Convention of 1871, 115.

Compensation: by His Majesty's Government for tax on produce of date gardens in Iraq of Sheikh of Koweit and Mohammerah, 180.

" by His Majesty's Government to Sheikh of Koweit for deprivation of portion of his date gardens in Iraq, 148-180.

Convention: See Treaty.

D.

Divorce: foreign, recognition by English courts, 78-87.
" history and development of law of, 90-92.
" under Soviet law, 74-87, 94.
" under Japanese law, 74, 77, 78, 87-90, 94.
" under Chinese law, 74, 77, 78, 90, 94.
" Soviet, Japanese, Chinese by mutual consent; recognition by English courts, 74-81, 94.

7492 [10221]

DIV—KOW.

Divorce: Soviet, by unilateral application; recognition by English courts, 74-87, 94.

" Soviet and Japanese, registered at a consulate; recognition by English courts, 87, 94.

" validity of foreign; law of domicile as governing principle, 77, 78, 80, 92, 93, 94.

Domicil: See Divorce.

F.

Falkland Islands: Dependencies; ordinance establishing fund for research and development of, 94-97.

" ditto; diversion of fund to other purposes not permissible, 97.

" ditto, ditto; diversion by new ordinance would lead to diplomatic representations, but not to valid legal claim against Crown, 97.

G.

Germany: withdrawal from League of Nations, 98-102, 104.

" ditto; effect on obligations under Locarno Treaty of Mutual Guarantee, 98-102, 104.

Gold Coast: term "Coast of Guinea" in British-Netherlands Convention, 1871, equivalent to, 115.

Guinea: interpretation of term in British-Netherlands Convention, 1871, 115.

I.

Islands: Qishm, sovereignty over, 141.

K.

Koweit, Sheikh of: date gardens in Iraq, 148-180.
" ditto; scope of His Majesty's Government's undertakings in 1914, 148, 151-153, 155.
" ditto; tax on produce of gardens and His Majesty's Government's obligation to compensate, 148-180.

a

(iv)

KOW—OCC.

Koweit, Sheikh of: date gardens in Iraq; deprivation of portion of gardens and His Majesty's Government's obligation to compensate, 148-180.

L.

Law, international: whether change of internal policy can be treated as breach of, 97.

League of Nations: effect of Germany's withdrawal from, on obligations under Locarno Treaty of Mutual Guarantee, 98-102, 104.

Locarno: See Treaty.

M.

Marriages: dissolution. See Divorce.
" polygamous, recognition of validity for nationality purposes, 1-73.
" ditto; working rules, 14-24.

Mohammerah, Sheikh of: date gardens in Iraq, 148-180.

" " ditto; scope of undertakings of His Majesty's Government in 1914, 148, 151, 156.

" " ditto; tax on produce of gardens and His Majesty's Government's obligation to compensate, 148-180.

Muscat: claim to sovereignty over Qishm and Basidu, 117, 141.

N.

Nachimson v. Nachimson: 74.

Nationality: children, born out of His Majesty's dominions, of polygamous marriages entered into by male British subjects, 1-24.

" foreign women, wives by polygamous marriages of British subjects, 1-24.

" women (British subjects) who entered into polygamous marriages with aliens, 1-24.

O.

Occupation: as title to sovereignty, 117, 141, 142.

PER—WHI.

P.

Permanent Court of International Justice: admission of "travaux préparatoires" as evidence, 114.

Prescription: as title to sovereignty, 141, 142.

Property, rights and interests: See Claims.

Q.

Qishm: sovereignty over, 141.

R.

Requisitions: in Turkey; claims of British nationals, 143-147.

S.

Sovereignty: over island of Qishm (and Basidu), 116-142.

" occupation as title to, 141, 142.

" prescription as title to, 141, 142.

T.

Tax: on produce of date gardens in Iraq of Sheikhs of Koweit and Mohammerah, 148-180.

ditto: obligation of His Majesty's Government to compensate Sheikhs, 180.

Treaty: of Mutual Guarantee (Locarno); effect of Germany's withdrawal from League of Nations, 98-102, 104.

" ditto, ditto: effect as regards obligations of His Majesty's Government, 104.

" British-Netherlands Convention, 1871; scope of article 5, 105-115.

" ditto: meaning of term "Coast of Guinea," 115.

" Peace (Germany): article 297, bearing of, in respect of British claims against Turkish Government, 147.

Treaty of Peace Order (1919): claims of British nationals against Turkey entitled to second charge on proceeds of German property under, 143-147.

Treaty of Versailles: See Treaty, Peace (Germany).

W.

Whittingham v. Whittingham: 75.

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.: 1933

GENERAL

[T 3126/695/376/1933]

No. 1.

[March 17, 1933.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, December 2, 1932.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to request your advice upon the question whether in any, and if so in what, circumstances:—

- (1) The children born out of His Majesty's dominions, the issue of polygamous marriages entered into by male British subjects, should be regarded as being persons whose fathers were British subjects within the meaning of section 1 (1) (b) of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914 (or, in the case of persons born before the date of the coming into force of that Act, of the corresponding provisions of 4 Geo. II, c. 21, and 13 Geo. III, c. 21), and consequently to be natural-born British subjects, provided that other requirements of the Act are fulfilled.
- (2) Foreign women, who have entered into marriage of a polygamous character with British subjects, must be considered to become themselves British subjects under the provisions of section 10 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914.
- (3) Women, who, being British subjects, have entered into polygamous marriages with aliens, must be deemed to lose British nationality under the provisions of section 10 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914.

2. A résumé of a number of cases which have arisen involving one or other of the above questions will be found in Annex I to the memorandum by the Second Legal Adviser of the Foreign Office (Paper A), which is enclosed herewith. Some of these cases await decision when the Secretary of State has been favoured with your opinion. In this memorandum these questions are discussed in the light of all the authority which it has been found possible to discover in the form of decisions of the English and Scottish courts, or of courts in other parts of His Majesty's dominions, or in the United States of America, and also of opinion given by your predecessors.

7492 [10221]

B

3. Sir John Simon has, before requesting your advice on these questions, consulted the Secretary of State for the Home Department, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Secretary of State for India, and the Treasury Solicitor, and further observations on, and discussions of, the questions are contained in the memorandum by the Assistant Legal Adviser to the Home Office and the letters from the Colonial Office, India Office and the Treasury Solicitor, copies of which are annexed (Papers B, C, D and E). With reference to paragraph 4 of the letter from the India Office (Paper D), I am to state that the Second Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office agrees that it is intended that the Rule VII (b) proposed in his memorandum should be read as subject to the proposed Rule II. He also agrees with the amendment of the proposed Rule IX as suggested in the second paragraph of the letter from the Colonial Office (Paper C).

4. In the past, the opinion of the Law Officers has been sought upon particular cases in which nationality questions have depended upon the recognition of polygamous marriages, and in response to such requests your predecessors have advised whether, in the circumstances of those particular cases, the individuals concerned should, or should not, be considered to be of British nationality. Some difference of opinion, however, has existed as to the exact grounds on which some of these previous opinions were based, and consequently as to the extent to which the views expressed in these opinions apply to other cases. Sir John Simon feels, therefore, that it would now be preferable, instead of referring specified cases to you for your opinion, to request you, if you see no objection, to advise upon the principles which should be applied when cases involving polygamous marriages in connexion with British nationality arise. This course would, on the one hand, avoid the necessity of referring a large number of individual cases to the Law Officers for their opinion, and, on the other hand, enable the whole question to be considered in all its aspects. With this end in view, the memorandum in Paper A concludes with a series of principles or rules, which the Legal Advisers of this Department suggest are those which should be applied for the purpose of determining the cases, in which polygamous marriages may be recognised as valid marriage, for the purposes of the application of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act.

5. I am, consequently, to request you to take these papers into your consideration, and to favour Sir John Simon with your opinion as to whether you consider the principles set out in the memorandum in Paper A are those which should be applied in connexion with the three questions set out in paragraph (1) above, or, if not, what are the principles which should be applied for the purpose of dealing with such cases.

6. I am also to request that Sir John Simon may be favoured with any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.

G. R. WARNER.

Report.

It is, in our opinion, undesirable that we should record our assent to, or our dissent from, such a series of abstract propositions as are set out in the papers accompanying the Foreign Office letter of the 2nd December, 1932. It is one thing to advise on concrete cases which appear to the Secretary of State to merit a report by the Law Officers; but we do not conceive it to be our duty to undertake functions which properly belong to text-book writers, or to attempt to reduce into order the whole of an obscure and chaotic part of the law, without reference to any particular set or sets of facts.

These more general reasons are in the present case reinforced by others which appear to us to be no less cogent. Some of the propositions before us (for example, those numbered V and XI) are expressed in very wide and general terms; and, though they may correctly state the law applicable to certain facts, we feel that it would be misleading and possibly embarrassing, both to the Secretary of State and to the Law Officers in the future, if we were now to signify our assent to them as rules of universal application. If, for instance, some unforeseen case should arise, the correct determination of which appeared to be inconsistent with any of the relevant propositions now submitted for our approval, the Law Officers would find themselves hampered by our attempt at codification of the law. Again, the propositions numbered II and IV appear to us to be inconsistent with each other, and though we concede that judicial authority can probably be found for both, we cannot think that any useful purpose is served by an attempt to elevate each of them into a legal principle. We recognise that in a concrete case we might properly be asked which of two apparently inconsistent decisions ought as a matter of law to be followed by the Secretary of State; but we are not prepared to speculate or pronounce on abstract questions of legal theory. The administrative work of a Department no doubt requires the formulation of rules both of practice and of law for the guidance of those who have to apply the law to particular cases, and it is a proper function of the legal advisers of the Departments to furnish, when necessary, those whom they advise with a statement of the legal rules which seem to them applicable to the work of the Department. But it is not for the Law Officers to draw up or to approve departmental codes of this kind. Their advice is always available to the Departments when particular cases of difficulty arise, and their opinions will, it is hoped, help the legal advisers of the Departments in the formulation or revision of their working principles, but in this respect their functions are those rather of a Court of Appeal than of a Court of First Instance, or a codifier of the law.

For the above reasons, although we have given the most careful consideration to the propositions which have been drawn up with so much care and learning, we do not think that we can usefully return any answer to the questions which have been submitted to us.

T. W. H. INSKIP.

F. B. MERRIMAN.

*Law Officers' Department,
March 17, 1933.*

PAPER A.

[T 827/125/376]

MEMORANDUM BY THE SECOND LEGAL ADVISER OF THE FOREIGN OFFICE.

General interpretation of British Nationality Acts as Acts of Parliament of the United Kingdom.

THERE is no doubt that the words "whose father was at the time of that person's birth a British subject," in section 1 (1) (b) of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act of 1914 (and the corresponding words in the Statutes of 4 Geo. II, c. 21, and 13 Geo. III, c. 21), mean the legitimate child of a British subject, and that the words "wife of a British subject" and "wife of an alien," in section 10, mean the spouse of a marriage which is recognised as valid. Further, these statutes, although they determine the nationality of British subjects belonging to all parts of His Majesty's dominions, are Acts of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and must everywhere⁽¹⁾ be construed in the manner and according to the rules applicable in this country to the construction of Acts of Parliament; that is to say, they must be interpreted and construed according to the principles of English law. A person born outside His Majesty's dominions must, therefore, in order to be a British subject under section 1 (1) (b) of the Act of 1914, be a person who can be regarded as legitimate under English law, and section 10 only applies to the wives of marriages which English law recognises. The expression "English law," however, must be deemed to include the rules of private international law applied by the English courts.

English rules of P.I.L. with regard to legitimacy.

2. The rule of private international law with regard to legitimacy is stated in Dicey's "Conflict of Laws" (4th edition, p. 530) as follows:—

"A child born anywhere in lawful wedlock is legitimate (but in order to enjoy in England full rights of inheritance of property and titles of honour, he must be born of a marriage which would not have been illegal on account of the relationship of the parents if celebrated in England)."

According to Dicey, therefore, the legitimacy in English law of any person, wherever born or domiciled, always depends on such person being the issue of a marriage which the English courts can recognise. If Dicey is right, then, in considering the question of polygamous marriages, the issue is the same whether it is a matter of the acquisition of British nationality by birth under section 1 (1) (b) of the Act of 1914 or by marriage under section 10. The question will turn in either case on whether the polygamous marriage is one that can be recognised. The Supreme Court of South Africa has, however, held that the children of a polygamous union may be regarded as the legitimate children of their father on the ground that they were legitimate by the law of the country of their domicile of origin, although the court felt obliged to refuse to regard the mother of the children as the wife of their father, on the ground that public policy prevented the recognition of a polygamous marriage as a marriage (Seedats (exors.) v. The Master, 1917, App. Div. 302, Annex II, Case No. 1). This case will be referred to later. It shows, however, that it is possible to make a distinction, and that children of polygamous marriages might be regarded as legitimate children of a British subject under section 1 (1) (b), even if the view were taken that no spouses of polygamous marriages could be regarded as "wives" for the purposes of section 10.

⁽¹⁾ I.e., a court in British India would have to decide a British nationality question in the same manner as an English court would decide it.

3. The rule applied by the English courts to determine the question whether a marriage is one which can be recognised as valid, is stated in Dicey (4th edition, p. 686) in the following terms:—

English rules of P.I.L. with regard to validity of marriages.

"Subject to the exceptions hereinafter mentioned, a marriage is valid when—

- (1) each of the parties has, according to the law of his or her respective domicile, the capacity to marry the other; and,
- (2) any one of the following conditions as to the form of celebration is complied with (that is to say):—
 - (i) if the marriage is celebrated in accordance with the local form.

The other conditions and exceptions given in Dicey to the above-mentioned rules are not relevant to the matter under consideration.

4. Subject to the requirement that the state of things existing at the moment of the child's birth is that which determines the question whether he can claim to be a British subject by birth (i.e., he must be the legitimate child of his father at that moment), and that subsequent legitimation does not of itself change the position as so ascertained⁽¹⁾ (Shedden v. Patrick (1854), 1 Macq. 535), it is to be presumed that the above-mentioned rules apply for the purposes of the application of the British Nationality Acts.

Application of rules of P.I.L. with regard to legitimacy, &c., under British Nationality Acts.

There appears to be no reason to suppose that the special rules regarding legitimacy which apply when succession to land in England or to titles of honour is in question (see the words in brackets in the rule quoted from Dicey in paragraph 2 above) apply for the purposes of acquisition of British nationality by descent or marriage.⁽²⁾

On the other hand, both the rules quoted in paragraph 2 and in paragraph 3 are subject to the general overriding exception of public policy.

5. It is, of course, clearly established that a polygamous marriage is not one in respect of which the matrimonial jurisdiction of the English courts can be invoked. It is not a "marriage," nor are the spouses a "husband" or "wife" within the meaning of these words in section 21 of the Judicature Act, 1925, or other statutes relating to the matrimonial jurisdiction of the courts. This is clearly laid down in the leading case of Hyde v. Hyde, L.R., I.P. and D. 130 (Annex II, Case No. 2). The reason for this conclusion given by Lord Penzance in his judgment in that case is, however, not that it is contrary to public policy to accord any sort of recognition to a polygamous marriage, but that the matrimonial law of this country is adapted to marriage as understood in Christendom ("the voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others") and is wholly inapplicable to polygamous marriages,⁽³⁾ and it would be impossible to do justice to the parties if the law applicable to one institution (monogamous marriage) were applied to a different institution (polygamous marriage).

Polygamous marriages under English law. Hyde v. Hyde.

Lord Penzance ended his judgment by saying: "All that is intended to be here decided is that as between each other (i.e., the spouses of a polygamous marriage) they are not entitled to the remedies, the adjudication or the relief of the matrimonial law of England. . . . This court does not profess to decide upon the rights of succession or legitimacy which it might be proper to accord to the issue of the polygamous union. . . ."

6. The first question is, therefore, whether it is the case that under English law no sort of recognition can be given in any circumstances to a polygamous marriage, and that such a marriage must be regarded as on the same footing as illicit intercourse, and the "wives" and "children" of such marriages as being in the same position as the partners and issue of illicit intercourse.

Can any recognition be given to polygamous marriages under English law for the purposes of succession, legitimacy, &c.?

This is the question so carefully left completely open in Hyde v. Hyde.

⁽²⁾ This is the view which has always been taken and previous Law Officers have so advised. An attempt is being made to obtain a decision in the High Courts in a test case on the question whether the Legitimacy Act, 1926, in any way alters the position in this respect.

⁽³⁾ This was the view of the Law Officers in 1906, 1908 and 1897 (see Annex III, Law Officers' opinions Nos. 10, 8 and 7).

⁽⁴⁾ (Following in this respect the judgment of the Privy Council delivered by Dr. Lushington in the case of Ardaseer v. Cursetjee, 10, Moore P.C. 375.)

Polygamous marriages are, of course, recognised as lawful and regulated by the law, not only of many foreign countries (such as Persia, Siam, Iraq, &c.), but also of many countries which form part of His Majesty's dominions or are under His Majesty's protection, which are governed under laws depending ultimately upon statutes of the Parliament of the United Kingdom (such as British India, the Straits Settlements, Hong Kong, &c.), and the Privy Council, exercising its appellate jurisdiction over the courts of these countries, has frequently not merely recognised the legal validity of polygamous marriages, but decided questions as to the legal rights which flow from them, including the legitimacy of the issue. (Cheong Thye Phin, 1920, A.C. 369, and Khoo Hooi Leong v. Khoo Hean Kwee, 1926, A.C. 529, are instances of numerous cases of the same kind.)^(*)

It is obviously going very much further to hold that all polygamous marriages must be regarded as on the same footing as illicit intercourse and that the issue must be regarded as illegitimate, than it is to hold that the matrimonial remedies of the English courts cannot be extended to them because such remedies are unsuitable. Nor does the wider proposition in any way follow logically from the narrower. To hold that the wider principle applies for the purposes of the application of the British Nationality Acts is particularly far-reaching, because these statutes govern the status of British Indians and natives of other British territories whose law recognises polygamous marriage, persons, in other words, who can normally contract no other kind of marriage.^(*) The result, in fact, would be that the children born abroad of such British subjects could never be held to have any right to British nationality, nor could their wives if these were aliens before marriage.

View of Sir E. Davidson and Law Officers in 1869.

7. The view that no recognition could be given by English law to polygamous marriages, and that, for the purposes of the British Nationality Acts (at that time 4 Geo. II, c. 21, and 13 Geo. III, c. 21), the children of such marriages must be regarded as illegitimate, was the view always held strongly by the late Sir Edward Davidson, formerly Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office. He seems to have held that this result followed necessarily from Hyde v. Hyde. The earliest of the relevant Law Officers' opinions, though it does not deal directly with questions of nationality, appears, indeed, to support this view. (Opinion of the 10th June, 1869, concerning the jurisdiction of the British Consular Court at Aleppo (Annex III, Law Officers' opinions No. 1: "English law knows marriage or legitimacy only in the sense in which it is understood amongst Christian nations.")

Law Officers' opinions of 1873 and 1883 (jurisdiction of British Consular Court in Siam).

8. The opinion of 1869 was, however, followed in 1873 by a Law Officers' opinion in which it was held that a previous Mahometan marriage between a Moorish subject and an English lady justified a consular officer in performing a consular marriage between the same parties and in regarding the prior marriage as satisfying the consular instructions, which required a prior lex loci marriage before a consular marriage was performed if one of the parties was

^(*) See also Khoo Hoi Leong v. Khoi Chong Yeok, 1930, A.C. 346, where the following passage occurs in the judgment of the Privy Council. (This case turned on the recognition under the law of the Straits Settlements of Chinese custom in connexion with Chinese British subjects domiciled in the Straits Settlements; the cases cited in this passage were decisions recognising secondary wives and the legitimacy of their offspring):—

(P. 355.) "The modifications of the law of England, which obtain in the Colony in the application of that law to the various alien races established there, arise from the necessity of preventing the injustice or oppression which would ensue if that law applied to alien races unmodified. That was the view expressed by Sir Peter Maxwell, C.J., in Choa Choon Neo v. Spottiswoode; and this Board in Yeap Cheah Neo v. Ong Cheng Neo stated that 'the rules of English law, and the degree in which, in cases of this kind, regard should be had to the habits and usages of the various people residing in the Colony are correctly stated' in Sir Peter Maxwell's judgment.

"From the above-mentioned necessity arises the recognition by the courts of the Colony of polygamous marriages among the Chinese, and, as a logical consequence the recognition of the legitimacy of the offspring of such marriages."

^(*) Since an Indian court must interpret the B.N. and S.A. Act in the same manner as an English court, it would follow that, if the above were really a correct statement of the position in English law, an Indian court would have to hold that the wives of British Indians were not "wives" for the purposes of section 10 or their children legitimate for the purposes of section 1 (1) (b).

a local subject (Annex III, Law Officers' opinion No. 2: Marriage of Miss Keane and a Moorish sheriff), and in 1883 the Law Officers advised that the offspring of British Indians born in Siam of polygamous marriages were British subjects (Annex III, Law Officers' opinion No. 3).

9. In 1888, in the case of Mr. Grant, an Englishman who had married under Mahometan rites a native Moorish woman in Morocco, the Law Officers advised that neither his wife nor children could be regarded as British subjects, "such marriage being of a polygamous character and, therefore, not recognised by British law" (Annex III, Law Officers' opinion No. 4: Case of Mr. Grant). The opinion of 1888 must have been based on the assumption that Mr. Grant was a domiciled Englishman (at this time the prevalent view, later shown to be erroneous by the decision of the House of Lords in Casdagli v. Casdagli, 1919, A.C. 145, was that an Englishman could not acquire a domicile in a foreign country in which His Majesty exercised ex-territorial jurisdiction over British subjects), and, consequently, this opinion is entirely consistent with the opinion of 1883 (No. 3, where the Law Officers expressly said that the issue of polygamous marriages of Englishmen would be illegitimate), and, in fact, the case was covered by the decision of Stirling J. in "In re Bethell," 38 Ch. D. 220 (Annex II, Case No. 3), another case of a polygamous marriage of a domiciled Englishman, but Sir Edward Davidson—presumably because he did not think it was correct—never referred to the opinion of 1883 and regarded the opinion in the Grant case as covering all cases of polygamous marriages.^(*)

Law Officers' opinion in 1888. Grant case.

10. In 1897 the Law Officers gave their opinion in the Abensur case (Annex III, No. 6). Mr. Abensur, a Moorish Jew, had married in Morocco by Jewish rites a Hebrew lady in 1885, and had by her three children. Under Jewish law a husband may take more than one wife and Jews in Morocco occasionally, but not frequently, did so. Mr. Abensur had, however, only one wife. In 1896 he obtained naturalisation as a British subject by a special Act of Parliament. No special mention was made of his children in the Act, but he had spent most of his fortune in obtaining this naturalisation in the interests of his children, and had been advised that they would become British subjects thereunder. The question was whether these children born before the date of his naturalisation were British subjects. There were two points in the case: (a) Whether the children could be regarded as legitimate in contemplation of English law; (b) whether, if so, they acquired British nationality by virtue of Abensur's naturalisation on the ground that his special Act of Parliament conferred upon him all "the rights, &c., of a natural born subject of Her Majesty the Queen." Of these two points, only (a) is relevant to the subject now under consideration. On this point the Attorney-General did not express any definite opinion ("I desire not to express any opinion against the legitimacy of the children"). The Solicitor-General held that the children must be regarded as legitimate ("It cannot, in my opinion, be broadly laid down that, for all purposes, the offspring of a polygamous marriage is to be treated, in the view of English law, as illegitimate. The Divorce Court and the law of inheritance to real property in this country recognise only monogamous marriage, but, for the purpose of inheriting nationality, I think that a polygamous marriage by a subject of His Majesty in a country where he is domiciled, and where the law allows of such unions, must be treated as lawful, the English law adopting for this purpose the law of the domicile").

1897. The Abensur case. Law Officers and Lord Halsbury, L.C.

11. Sir Edward Davidson disagreed so strongly with the Solicitor-General's opinion on the question of the legitimacy of Mr. Abensur's children, that the exceptional course was followed of referring the question to the Lord

^(*) In 1892 the Law Officers advised (with a qualification the exact meaning or reason for which is not quite clear to me) that a polygamous marriage of a British subject in a foreign country should not be registered by a British consul as a lex loci marriage under section 4 of the Foreign Marriage Act, 1891 (Annex III, Law Officers' opinion No. 5, registration provisions of the Foreign Marriage Act). This opinion hardly, I think, carries things further than Lord Penzance's judgment in Hyde v. Hyde. The view may well be taken that the registration provisions of the Foreign Marriage Act were intended only to cover marriages of a kind similar to those which could be celebrated under the other provisions of the Act (i.e., those which would come within the matrimonial jurisdiction of the English courts) without in any way implying as a necessary consequence that polygamous marriages must in all circumstances be regarded as of no legal effect in English law.

1892. Law Officers' opinion. The registration provisions of the Foreign Marriage Act.

Chancellor. Lord Halsbury, L.C., agreed with the Solicitor-General in holding that the children of Abensur were legitimate in contemplation of English law. He based his view on this point on the ground that the marriage of Abensur was a Jewish marriage, and it was perfectly clear both under the common law and by statute that the English courts recognised Jewish marriages between Jews as valid marriages, and it was immaterial for this purpose whether a Jewish marriage had been celebrated in a country where polygamy was recognised or not.^(*) He called attention to the passage in the judgment in Hyde v. Hyde, where it was made clear that that decision did not purport to decide questions of the legitimacy of the issue of a polygamous marriage. Owing to the doubts of Sir Edward Davidson the case was referred to Lord Halsbury a second time, but he maintained his opinion (the opinions of Lord Halsbury in this case are annexed to Law Officers' opinion No. 6 in Annex III).

12. In 1897, shortly after the opinion in the Abensur case, the Law Officers advised that the children born in Siam of Burmese British subjects possessed British nationality (Annex III, Law Officers' opinion No. 7). The Law Officers in this case followed the opinion of the Solicitor-General in the Abensur case, and observed that the opinion of the Law Officers in the Grant case (No. 4 (see paragraph 9 above)) did not lay down any general principle apart from the facts of the particular case.

13. In 1903 the Law Officers gave an opinion in which they approved a memorandum by Sir Cecil (then Mr.) Hurst, Assistant Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office (Annex III, Law Officers' opinion No. 8: Registration as British subjects by British consuls in Turkey of the wives and issue of British subjects of marriages celebrated in Turkey otherwise than under the Foreign Marriage Act). Sir Cecil Hurst had advised (inter alia) (i) that the marriages of all British subjects in Turkey should be regarded as valid marriages if they were valid according to the law of the country of origin of the British subject, and that the wives and issue of such marriages were British subjects and should be registered as such; (ii) that this principle included the polygamous marriages of British subjects which were valid by the law of the country of origin of such British subjects.

14. In 1905 the Law Officers advised that a polygamous marriage entered into by a woman British subject with an alien and valid by the lex loci contractus caused her to lose her British nationality under section 10 of the Naturalisation Act, 1870 (a provision which corresponds to section 10 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914) (Annex III, Law Officers' opinion No. 9)).

15. In 1906 the Law Officers were asked to advise whether Mr. W. T. Messiah, the son of a Jewish British subject born abroad, and the issue of a Jewish marriage celebrated in Morocco, was a British subject. The reference to the Law Officers states that Sir E. Grey was doubtful whether to accept the decision arrived at in the Abensur case (No. 6) as conclusive of the question of the legitimacy for nationality purposes of the issue of polygamous marriages, in view of the fact that the opinion of the Lord Chancellor and of the Attorney- and Solicitor-General respectively were not precisely the same and the decision was in direct conflict with the Law Officers' opinion in the Grant case^(*) (No. 5). The Law Officers advised (Annex III, Law Officers' opinion No. 10) that, on the assumption that the marriage of Mr. Messiah's father was valid by the law of his domicile and the lex loci contractus, Mr. Messiah must be regarded as legitimate and as a British subject even if such marriage was polygamous.

16. It will be seen that the view apparently taken by the Law Officers in 1869 (Annex III, No. 1), and so strongly held by the late Sir Edward Davidson, that in no circumstances can a polygamous marriage be recognised in English law, and that in consequence for the purposes of British nationality such marriages are nullities and the issue thereof illegitimate, has been rejected by ^(*) Lord Halsbury therefore clearly disagreed with the Law Officers' opinion of 1869 (Annex III, No. 1) because it was a Jewish marriage which formed the subject of that opinion.

^(*) Neither of these statements is quite correct (see paragraphs 9, 10 and 11 above). The terms of this reference show the pertinacious view taken by Sir E. Davidson on this question. It is remarkable that no reference is made to Law Officers' opinions Nos. 3, 7, 8 or 9.

Law Officers' opinion. Children of Burmese British subjects in Siam.

Law Officers, 1903. Marriages of British subjects in Turkey celebrated otherwise than under Foreign Marriage Act.

Law Officers, 1905. Polygamous marriages entered into by English women.

Law Officers, 1906. The Messiah case.

Results of Law Officers' opinions on the general question of recognition of polygamous marriages.

Lord Chancellor Halsbury and by subsequent Law Officers (including many who later held high judicial office) in six separate opinions (Annex III, Nos. 3, 6, 7, 8, 9 and 10). Before passing on from this fundamental question, it may, however, be useful to consider any relevant judicial decisions, both those of the English courts and of the courts of other parts of His Majesty's dominions and of the United States of America, to see whether or not they tend to support the view taken by these successive series of Law Officers.

17. The leading case of Hyde v. Hyde has already been referred to sufficiently (paragraph 5 above). It left the question of the legitimacy of children of polygamous unions completely open. The next case is In re Bethell, 38 Ch. D. 220 (Annex II, Case No. 3), the "Baralong marriage case." This was a decision on the question of legitimacy in connexion with succession to property, and the daughter of a domiciled Englishman, the issue of a polygamous union, was held to be illegitimate on the ground that the marriage was one which could not be recognised. The facts on which the decision was given were essentially the same as the Grant case (see paragraph 9 above and Annex III, Law Officers' opinion No. 4) in which the Law Officers advised in a similar sense. It is true that the language of the judgment is open to the construction that Stirling, J., thought the issue of polygamous marriages must in all cases be regarded as illegitimate. He does not appear to base his conclusion in any manner on the fact that C. Bethell was a domiciled Englishman. But the reasoning of the judgment is not in all respects very satisfactory. Inter alia, the learned judge professed to be bound by the authority of Hyde v. Hyde in reaching the conclusion he did, whereas, in fact, he was deciding a question which Hyde v. Hyde expressly left open.

It is doubtful if this case should be taken as an authority covering cases other than those in which the facts are similar, i.e., where it is a domiciled Englishman who has entered into the marriages or a person the law of whose domicile does not recognise polygamous marriages. This is clearly the view taken by the Law Officers in 1897 (paragraph 10 and paragraph 12) and in 1906 (paragraph 15).

In the case of Brinkley v. Attorney-General 15 P.D. 76 (Annex II, Case No. 4), which was a decision on a legitimacy petition and affirmed the validity of a Japanese marriage, stress was laid on the monogamous character of a Japanese marriage, but, as this was a marriage of a British subject domiciled in Ireland, the fact that this was regarded an essential in this case does not go to show that it is an essential for the validity of a marriage of a person domiciled in a country whose law recognises polygamy.

18. There are indeed many statements in general terms to be found in judgments of the English courts to the effect that English law does not recognise polygamous marriages. But these statements are, I think, to be found exclusively either (1) in judgments in matrimonial cases^() or (2) in judgments on a trial for bigamy,^() and consequently need not be necessarily considered as having a bearing on the question of the recognition of polygamous marriages otherwise than in connexion with classes of matters with which these judgments were concerned.

19. On the other hand, in Chetti v. Chetti, 1909, P. 67 (Annex II, Case No. 10) Sir Gorell Barnes P. expressly stated that his judgment in that case did not affect the question of the recognition outside India of Hindu marriages in India, and in In re Ullee, 53 L.T.N.S. 711 (Annex II, Case No. 11), Chitty, J., though he did not base his decision on this ground, stated, with reference to the offspring of a Mahometan marriage celebrated in London between a Mahometan

^(*) Such as (a) Warrender v. Warrender, 2 Cl. and F. 488 ("because we clearly never should recognise the plurality of wives and consequent validity of second marriages, standing the first, which second marriages the laws of these countries authorise and validate," Lord Brougham at p. 532 (see Annex II, Case No. 5)); (b) Harvie v. Fernie, 6 P.D. 35 (Lush, J., at p. 53: "If one of the numerous wives of a Mahometan was to come to this country and marry in this country, she could not be indicted for bigamy, because our laws do not recognise a marriage solemnised in that country, a union falsely called marriage, as a marriage to be recognised in our Christian country" (Annex II, Case No. 6)); (c) R. v. The Superintendent-Registrar of Marriages, Hammersmith (917, 1, K.B. 634 (Annex II, Case No. 7)); (d) Nachimson v. Nachimson, 1930, P. 85 and 217 (Annex II, Case No. 8).

^(*) R. v. Naquib, 1917, 1, K.B. 359 (Annex II, Case No. 9).

domiciled in India and an Englishwoman, that he was "by no means satisfied that, according to the principles of international law as now understood, he ought to hold the infants now in question to be illegitimate." Further recently, in a case before Lord Merrivale P., the estate of an intestate Mahometan domiciled in Bagdad, who left two wives, both Englishwomen, whom he had married in England by Mahometan rites, and children by both of them, was under the terms of a settlement, which was made an order of the court, to be distributed between all persons on the footing that both marriages were valid and all the children legitimate. It is true that the order was made by consent and therefore the case is not of much authority, but it would seem that it would have been proper, if the President thought that the marriages must be considered nullities and the children illegitimate, for the Treasury Solicitor to have been informed, since in that case the estate was bona vacantia and the Crown had a right to claim it. (In the estate of Abdul Majid Belshah, "Times" newspaper, the 16th and 18th December, 1926, 14th and 18th January, 1927, Annex II, Case No. 12).

In the Estate of Abdul Majid
Belshah.

General question. Decisions of other courts.

20. It does not appear, therefore, that the reported decisions of the English courts really afford any support for the view that polygamous marriages must in all cases be regarded as void in contemplation of English law and the issue as illegitimate. Such inferences as can be drawn from them are rather in the contrary sense and in conformity with the view to be found in the more recent Law Officers' opinions. As, however, there is a singular absence of direct authority on the question in the English cases, the decisions of courts in other parts of the British Empire or in the United States of America would presumably in a matter of this kind have a considerable persuasive authority, in so far as they are decisions of courts applying a law which is either based on English law or which, like English law, does not allow of polygamy.

Canadian cases.

21. There is an interesting Canadian decision of 1867 Connolly v. Woolrich and Johnson, Lower Canada Jurist, Vol. XI, 197 (Annex II, Case No. 13), in which a Red Indian marriage, entered into by a Canadian domiciled in Lower Canada with an Indian woman, was recognised as a valid marriage, and the children as legitimate for the purposes of succession to property. It is clear that the judge did consider that polygamous marriages must be recognised, but it would appear that he regarded the particular marriage as a monogamous one on the ground that the monogamous or polygamous character of a marriage depended not on the lex loci contractus, but on the law of the domicile of the husband.⁽¹²⁾ cases.

South African

22. There has been a considerable conflict of opinion on the question in the courts of South Africa.

(a) It has been held that the spouse of a polygamous marriage is not a "wife" within the meaning of an immigration statute which entitles a woman, although otherwise a prohibited immigrant, to enter the country if she is the wife of a person who is not a prohibited immigrant, and (with some conflict of judicial opinion) this ruling has been applied, even in cases where the polygamous marriage was good by the lex loci contractus and lex domicilii (Esop v. Union Government, 1913, 13 C.P.R. 133; R. v. Sukina, 1912, T.P.D. 1079. See Annex II, No. 14).

(b) It has been held that the spouse of a polygamous marriage (whether the first or second wife) is not to be regarded as a "wife" within the meaning of the rule which debars a wife from giving evidence against her husband in a criminal trial (Nalana v. Rex, 1907, T.P. 407; Rex v. Mboko, 1910, T.P. 445. See Annex II, No. 15).

(c) In 1909 it was held that the two wives of a man, domiciled in Pondoland, must be regarded as his legitimate wives and the issue of both wives as legitimate children for the purposes of succession duty on his estate. (The Estate Canham v. The Master, 1909, 26, S.C. 166, Annex II, No. 16.) In 1910, on the other hand, it was held that a polygamous native marriage must be regarded as no more than an illicit connexion: the children were illegitimate and the father had no rights of guardianship (Kaha v. Ntala, 1910, T.P. 964, Annex II, No. 17). Finally, in Seedats (Exors) v. The Master (1917, App. Div. 302—Annex II, Case No. 1—a case already referred to in paragraph 2 above), the Appellate Division held in another succession case—

⁽¹²⁾ On this point, see paragraph 27 below.

- (1) that the wife of a polygamous union was not a "surviving spouse" for the purposes of succession duty, but that
- (2) the children of such a union in a case where they were legitimate by the law of their domicile of origin must be regarded as legitimate and as "lineal descendants" of the testator for the purposes of succession duty.

If the last-mentioned case represents the final view of the South African courts, it appears that these courts (1) feel obliged on grounds of public policy to refuse to accord any recognition to the spouse of a polygamous union as a wife—a polygamous union being "a legal relation repugnant to the moral principles of its people," but (2) do recognise the issue of such unions as legitimate children when, at the time of their birth, their father was domiciled in a country whose law would have regarded them as legitimate.

23. There are a number of decisions of the United States courts. In an early case in the courts of North Carolina (Williams v. Oates, 27, North Carolina, Rep. 375: 5 Iredale 535—Annex II, Case No. 18), Ruffin, C.J., states (a) that if a United States citizen, having already a wife by a marriage contracted in the United States, were to go to Turkey and contract a further (polygamous) marriage there, the second marriage would be void; (b) that if a Turk with two wives were to come to the United States "we would not refuse to administer to them the justice due to the relations contracted by them." The view expressed upon point (b) by Ruffin, C.J., is confirmed by the judgment in Polybeare v. Prince (Beales Cases on the Conflict of Laws, Vol. III, p. 2, Annex II, Case No. 19) where the following dictum occurs:—

"If a Turkish or Hindoo husband were travelling in this country with his wife or temporarily resident here, we should, without hesitation, acknowledge the relation of husband and wife between them."

These statements are indeed obiter dicta, but there are also two decisions in which the wives of potentially polygamous Red Indian marriages have been recognised as acquiring the status of a wife, and as therefore being incapable (as married women) of instituting an action while the marriage subsisted (Wall v. Williamson, 8 Alabama 48, confirmed on appeal, 11 Alabama 826—Annex II, Case No. 20, and Morgan v. McGhee, 1844, reported in 24 Tennessee Rep. 12, and in 5 Humphrey Rep.—Annex II, Case No. 21), and in each of these cases disapproval was expressed of the view that polygamous marriages could not be recognised at all, so that the issue of such marriages were illegitimate, while in a third case of 1860 (Johnson v. Johnson's Administrator 30 Missouri, Rep. 72, Annex II, Case No. 22), the issue of a potentially polygamous Indian marriage were held to be legitimate for the purposes of succession.

24. These five United States cases (and I have been unable to find any decisions in a contrary sense)⁽¹³⁾ therefore strongly support the view of the Law Officers that it is not correct to say that English law can in no case recognise polygamous marriages as valid or the issue thereof as legitimate. The only Canadian case (paragraph 21 above) which I have been able to find points in the same direction, and the South African cases (paragraph 22 above) indicate the view that the children may in some cases be regarded as legitimate although their mothers cannot be recognised as possessing the status of wife.

Two articles in legal periodicals by learned writers, the first by Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick ("Non-Christian Marriage," in the Journal of the Society of Comparative Legislation, Vol. II, N.S. p. 367), and the second by C. K. Allen (formerly Professor of Jurisprudence in the University of Oxford) ("Status and Capacity," Law Quarterly Review, Vol. CLXXXIII (July 1930), p. 299), indicate a view on the general question similar to that held by previous Law Officers.

⁽¹³⁾ The much quoted statement in Story's Conflict of Laws, that marriages affected by polygamy or incest cannot be recognised, although good by the lex loci contractus, can hardly be read as intended to have any reference to the polygamous marriages of persons other than those domiciled in a country where polygamy is not recognised.

General effect of the cases:
Canadian,
South African,
and United States.

Views of writers.

Extracts from these articles are, for convenience of reference, reproduced in Annex IV to this memorandum (Nos. 1 and 2).

25. Assuming, therefore, that in some cases English law does recognise polygamous marriages as valid marriages and the wives of such marriages as possessing the status of wives, and the issue of such marriages as legitimate children, at any rate for some purposes, viz., succession to property (other than land in England) and British nationality, the next question that arises is what are the cases in which such marriages are recognised and what are the cases in which they are not. But before this question can be dealt with, it is necessary to clear the ground by dealing with another essential preliminary question, namely, what is the criterion which determines whether a given marriage is a monogamous or a polygamous marriage. The immediately following paragraphs are directed to this point.

The criterion to be applied to determine whether a marriage is polygamous.

26. Two views on this question appear to be found. The first makes the monogamous or polygamous character of the union depend on the "personal law"; this expression is used as meaning that law which is applied to determine questions of status—it is, under Private International Law as applied by the English courts, the law of the person's domicile or, more accurately, that law which is applied by the courts of the country in which he is domiciled, to determine such questions where such person is concerned. (It may be the religious law of the husband.) The second view determines this question by the nature of the contract of marriage into which the parties entered—i.e., the lex loci contractus of the marriage.

There is still a subsidiary question, if the second view is adopted, namely, whether the nature of the contract is determined solely by reference to the lex loci contractus, or whether the intention of the parties, as evidenced by their conduct and words, can be relied upon to show that their marriage was really a monogamous one, although celebrated by the use of a form of marriage which, under the lex loci contractus, was one which allowed of polygamy.

1st theory
Criterion is lex domicilii of husband; contrary to weight of authority.

27. The first of these two views proceeds on the assumption that there is one institution "marriage" which includes monogamous and polygamous marriage. The lex loci contractus only governs the form of the marriage. It is applied only to determine whether the parties did, in fact, go through a valid form of marriage. The "incidents," or, as it is sometimes termed, the "essentials," of the marriage (viz., the capacity of the parties to contract it, the mutual rights and obligations flowing from it, including the conditions under which it can be dissolved) are governed by the personal law of the parties, and the right or capacity of the husband to take a second wife is one of such incidents or essentials and depends on his personal law. Upon this view, every marriage contracted by a person whose personal law enjoins monogamy is a monogamous marriage, irrespective of whether the form of marriage was by the lex loci contractus, a form of monogamous marriage (such as a marriage before a registrar in England), or a form of polygamous marriage, such as a Mahometan or Hindoo marriage. There is a sentence in Lord Brougham's speech in Warrender v. Warrender (2 Cl. and Finn. 433 at p. 353, Annex II, Case No. 5) which certainly seems to support this view:—

"An Englishman, marrying in Turkey, contracts a marriage of the English kind, that is, excluding a plurality of wives, because he is an Englishman and only residing in Turkey and under Mahometan law accidentally and temporarily, and because he marries with a view of being a married man and having a wife in England, and for English purposes; consequently, the incidents and effects, nay, the very nature and essence, must be ascertained by the English and not by the Turkish law."⁽¹⁴⁾

This view certainly seems to be the view taken by Monk J. in the Canadian case of Connolly v. Woolrich (Annex II, Case No. 13). It has, indeed, a great deal to commend it, both in theory and as a practical rule, but, if it were right, it would mean, not only that a polygamous marriage contracted according to the lex loci by a domiciled Englishman would be a valid marriage and the issue legitimate, but also that it was a monogamous marriage and, as such, subject to the matrimonial jurisdiction of the courts. Consequently, it is contrary to the decision in In re Bethell (38 Ch. D. 220, Annex II, Case No. 3), where the issue of such a marriage contracted by a domiciled Englishman was held to be illegitimate, and to the opinion of the Law Officers in 1888 in the Grant case (Annex III, No. 4: Mahometan marriage in Morocco of a domiciled Englishman). Further, it is really contrary to Hyde v. Hyde (L.R. 1 P. and D. 130, Annex II, Case No. 2), inasmuch as Lord Penzance never considered it material to determine whether the petitioner, who had contracted a Mormon marriage, was domiciled in England or in Utah. (It would seem, however, that he was probably domiciled in Utah.) In the Nachimson case (1930, pp. 85 and 217, Annex II, Case No. 8) both Hill, J., and the Court of Appeal acted on the view that the lex loci contractus determined the monogamous or polygamous character of the marriage, although this may not have been very material, inasmuch as the lex loci contractus and the law of the domicile were at that time the same.

⁽¹⁴⁾ I confess to some difficulty in reconciling this passage with an earlier passage in the same speech at p. 532, where Lord Brougham says that Christian marriage is a wholly different thing from polygamous marriage.

Further, it would seem logically to follow from this view that any marriage, entered into by a man whose personal law sanctioned polygamy, would be a polygamous marriage, even if the form of marriage was by the lex loci contractus a monogamous one, such as an English marriage.⁽¹⁵⁾ Such a result is contrary—

- (1) to R. v. The Sup. Registrar for Marriages, Hammersmith (1917, 1 K.B. 634, Annex II, Case No. 7), where the refusal of the court to grant a mandamus directing the Registrar to issue a licence for the second marriage of Mir Anwarreddin, a Mahometan domiciled in India, proceeded on the basis that his first English marriage was a monogamous one and he could not marry again in England while it subsisted;
- (2) to R. v. Naquib (1917, 1 K.B. 359, Annex II, Case No. 9), where Naquib, an Egyptian Mahometan, was convicted of bigamy because he had contracted two marriages in England;
- (3) to Chetti v. Chetti (1909, p. 67, Annex II, Case No. 10), where the court granted a decree of judicial separation, in respect of the marriage celebrated in a London registry office, against a Hindoo domiciled in India and overruled (inter alia) his contention that the marriage was a polygamous one, and consequently not one within the matrimonial jurisdiction of the court.
- (4) to the Scottish decision in Lendrum v. Chakravati (1929, Scots Law Times Rep. 96, Annex II, Case No. 23), where Lord Mackay held that a Church marriage entered into in Scotland by a Hindoo domiciled in India was a monogamous marriage.

It would seem, therefore, that the view that it is the personal law of the husband which determines whether the marriage is monogamous or polygamous must be rejected as being in conflict with the authority of decided cases.

28. The alternative view is that polygamous marriage, though it shares the name marriage and has many results and incidents in common with monogamous marriage, is an essentially different institution, so different that it is necessary to have regard to the actual ceremony and the lex loci contractus, to ascertain not merely whether there was a marriage, but also which kind of marriage it was. The essential difference between the two kinds of marriage is illustrated not only (1) by the decisions to the effect that a court, administering a law framed for monogamous marriage, cannot exercise matrimonial jurisdiction in respect of a polygamous marriage (Hyde v. Hyde), but also (2) by the decisions, which imply the converse proposition, that methods of divorce, recognised by a law framed for polygamous marriage, cannot be utilised to dissolve a monogamous marriage, even if such method be the recognised method of dissolving marriages by the law of the matrimonial domicile (this is one of the two alternative grounds for the decision in the Hammersmith marriage case (Annex II, Case No. 7); the English marriage of the Mahometan of Indian domicile could not be dissolved by a Mahometan divorce. See the judgments of Darling, J., Swinfen Eady, L.J., and Bankes, L.J.), and (3) by the decisions to the effect that a first and subsisting polygamous marriage is no bar to a monogamous marriage; it does not invalidate it and the husband is not guilty of bigamy (see the judgment of Avery, J., in R. v. Naquib (1917, 1 K.B. 359, Annex II, Case No. 9), the dictum of Darling, J., in the Hammersmith marriage case, and of Lush, L.J., in Harvie v. Fernie (6 P.D. 35, Annex II, Case No. 6)).

Alternative theory.
Criterion is lex loci contractus; supported by authority.

⁽¹⁵⁾ It is perhaps possible to argue that this result does not follow from this theory, on the ground that a person whose personal law permits of polygamy is not bound by his personal law to exercise that right, and may by contract, express or implied, with his wife bind himself not to do so, and that such a contract is implied if he marries by the use of a monogamous form (see paragraph 29 below and Lord Mackay's judgment in Lendrum v. Chakravati, Annex II, Case No. 23). But if this argument is to be of any force the contract to live monogamously must be enforceable under the husband's personal law, since on this theory it is his personal law which is the determining factor.

This view that the monogamous or polygamous character of the marriage is to be determined by the lex loci contractus is not only that taken by the Law Officers in the Grant case (Annex III, No. 4), but is the only one which is really consistent with the decision in In re Bethell (Annex II, Case No. 3), and the reasoning upon which the judgments in Hyde v. Hyde, Brinkley v. the Attorney-General, the Hammersmith marriage case, Nachimson v. Nachimson, R. v. Naquib, Chetti v. Chetti (Annex II, Cases No. 2, 4, 7, 8, 9 and 10) are based.

Is the intention of parties (otherwise than as evidenced by lex loci contractus) relevant?

29. There is still the subsidiary question whether the fact that a marriage is celebrated in a form, which by the lex loci contractus is a polygamous form of marriage, is conclusive as showing that the marriage is a polygamous one or whether, if marriage contracted in such a form is shown to have been in fact and in intention from the beginning a monogamous marriage, it must be recognised as a monogamous marriage. The latter is the view for which Mr. S. G. Vesey-Fitzgerald contends in an article in the "Law Quarterly Review" (vol. 47, No. 186, April 1931, p. 252; "Nachimson's and Hyde's Cases," see Annex IV, No. 3). He bases his view upon the dictum of Lord Brougham in Warrender v. Warrender, already quoted in paragraph 27 above (but I doubt if this passage really supports this contention), and upon Grewal v. Grewal ("Times" newspaper, the 1st August, 1907, Annex II, Case No. 24); a case in which the exact ratio decidendi is not clear, but which hardly seems to support Mr. Fitzgerald's view of the law. Hyde v. Hyde and the Law Officers' opinion in the Grant case appear to be contrary to this view, and its weakness seems to lie in the fact that, if the personal law of the parties is one which recognises polygamy, this common intention of monogamy may be something which is unenforceable in the courts in whose jurisdiction the enforcement of their mutual rights and duties principally lies.

30. Three other points may be noticed with regard to polygamous marriages:—

Other points in connexion with polygamous marriages.

- (1) It is immaterial, as regards the character of the marriage, whether the husband has or has not exercised his right to take a second wife (In re Bethell (Case No. 3); the Grant case (Law Officers' opinion No. 4); Hyde v. Hyde (Case No. 2)).
- (2) If the husband of a polygamous marriage has taken more than one wife, no distinction can be made between them (Hyde v. Hyde; in the Estate of Abdul Majed Belshah (Case No. 12); R. v. Fatima (see Annex II, No. 14); R. v. Mboko (Case No. 15); The Estate Canham v. The Master (Case No. 16)).
- (3) The character of the marriage is determined once and for all by the lex loci contractus; a subsequent change of domicile or religion by the husband cannot cause an originally polygamous marriage to become monogamous or vice versa (see Sir Denis Fitzpatrick's article, Annex IV, No. 1).

Rule No. 1.

31. It would now seem to be possible to formulate the first principle or working rule to be applied in dealing with these cases as follows:—

I.

(a) A marriage entered into in a form which under the lex loci contractus is a form of monogamous marriage, is a monogamous marriage, whatever the intentions or the personal law of the parties may be, either at the time when the marriage is contracted or at any subsequent date.⁽¹⁶⁾

(b) A marriage entered into in a form which under the lex loci contractus is a form of polygamous marriage, is a polygamous marriage, whatever the intentions or the personal law of the parties may be, either at the time when the marriage is contracted or at any subsequent date.

32. It is now possible to begin the examination of the principles to be applied to determine the cases in which polygamous marriages can and cannot be recognised in English law so as to confer on the "wives" the status of a wife for the purposes of section 10 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act and upon the children the status of legitimacy.

The general principles which emerge from the Law Officers' opinions (1883, No. 3; 1888, No. 4; 1897, No. 6; 1897, No. 7; 1903, No. 8; and 1906, No. 10) is that the marriage must be recognised as valid by the lex loci contractus and the personal law (law of the domicile) of the parties.

The general principles of Private International Law applied by the English courts to determine the validity of marriages in general are (as stated in Dicey: Conflict of Laws—passage quoted in paragraph 3 above) that the marriage is valid if, and is not valid unless—

- (I) the parties possessed the capacity to marry each other according to the law of their domicile;
- (II) and the marriage was a valid one under the lex loci contractus.

Under (II) the lex loci contractus is essentially the governing factor as regards the form or solemnities, but requirement that the marriage should be good by the lex loci contractus is not (semble) confined to questions of form.

Dicey's rule No. (I) might be formulated without changing the sense, but so as to cover polygamous marriages, if it were made to read "the marriage was one which each of the parties had the capacity to contract under the law of their domicile."

The second principle or working rule to be applied in dealing with these cases might, therefore, be formulated in the following terms:—

II.

"A polygamous marriage will be recognised as a valid marriage if, and will not be recognised as a valid marriage unless—

- (a) the marriage was one which each of the parties had the capacity to contract under his or her personal law (the law of his or her domicile); and
- (b) the marriage was a valid one under the lex loci contractus."

Both of these requirements, (a) and (b) of principle No. II, need, however, some special and separate examination, and it is convenient to begin with (a).

33. It follows clearly from In re Bethell (Annex II, Case No. 3) and the Law Officers' opinion in the Grant case (Annex III, No. 5) that a domiciled English man (the case of a domiciled English woman will be considered later) cannot contract a polygamous marriage.⁽¹⁷⁾ This result seems to follow from the application of the principle laid down by the House of Lords in Brook v. Brook (9 H.L.C. 194, affirming the Vice-Chancellor, 3 Sm. and G.H. 481, Annex II, Case No. 25) that the "essentials" for the validity of a marriage depend on the lex domicilii, and a marriage which offends the lex domicilii in an "essential" is invalid. The monogamous character of the union is no doubt an "essential" under the marriage law of England,⁽¹⁸⁾ and a polygamous marriage contracted

In what circumstances can a polygamous marriage be validly contracted.

A man whose personal law is monogamous cannot contract polygamous marriage.

⁽¹⁶⁾ See the case of Richard We Cheang Lim (Annex I, No. 10) for a case which would come under this rule.

⁽¹⁷⁾ The Bronsdon case (see Annex I, No. 9) would come under this rule unless there is clear evidence of a domicile in Siam (see also Annex I, No. 11, Marriages in Abyssinia).

⁽¹⁸⁾ A more obvious essential than the prohibition of marriages with a deceased wife's sister under 5 and 6 Wm. 4 & 54, the offence against which rendered the marriage of a domiciled Englishman invalid in Brook v. Brook.

1933

Special position of Jewish marriages.

by a domiciled Englishman is contrary to the law of his domicile in an essential matter and therefore invalid.

Jewish marriages, however, require some special consideration. Though Jews do not practise polygamy in England or any European country, Mosaic law permits it. In Near Eastern countries, or in countries like Morocco where Jews are governed in personal status matters entirely by Jewish law, Jewish husbands would certainly have the right under the local law to take more than one wife, and both marriages would be good marriages. They apparently do so sometimes, though rarely.⁽¹⁹⁾ A Jewish marriage in Morocco or in Syria, for instance, is, therefore, a polygamous marriage under principle No. 1. Nevertheless Lord Halsbury advised in the Absensur case (Annex III, No. 6) that a Jewish marriage between two Jews must always be recognised as a valid form of marriage in the English courts, although polygamous by the lex loci contractus. The historical reasons for the special position with regard to Jewish marriages are explained in the extracts from R. v. Millis annexed to Lord Halsbury's second opinion in the Absensur case, namely, that Jews were regarded as a special community governed in marriage matters by their own religious law: and Jewish marriages (although potentially polygamous) have been recognised as marriages even for the purposes of the exercise of the matrimonial jurisdiction of the courts. Amongst recent cases the strong language of Lord Merrivale, P. in Spivach v. Spivach⁽²⁰⁾ seems to confirm Lord Halsbury's view. It would seem that a Jewish marriage between two Jews must be recognised as a valid marriage, although the husband is domiciled in England, and although it was performed in Morocco where a Jewish marriage is by the lex loci polygamous.

On the other hand, Jews domiciled in England or other European countries have no doubt lost by the law of their domicile the right actually to possess more than one wife.

35. In the light of the above considerations I suggest that a third rule or principle might be promulgated as follows:—

III.

Rule No. III.

A man whose personal law does not permit of polygamy, does not possess the capacity to contract a polygamous marriage;⁽²¹⁾ provided that no marriage celebrated between two persons of the Jewish religion must be held to be a marriage which the husband had no capacity to contract under Rule III, if such husband had, at the time of the marriage, no other wife.

A woman can contract a polygamous marriage whatever her personal law
before marriage

36. The next question which is rather a difficult one is whether a woman whose personal law does not admit of polygamy can contract a polygamous marriage. At first sight it might be thought that no logical distinction can be drawn between the position of a man and a woman in this respect.

It will be seen, moreover, that Chitty, J., in In re Ullee (53, L.T.N.S., 711; Case No. 11) seemed to think that the Mahometan marriage celebrated in England between the Mahometan of Indian domicile and an Englishwoman

⁽¹⁹⁾ See the case of Mr. Aron Abib, Annex I, No. 14.

⁽²⁰⁾ 46 T.L.R. 243, Annex II, Case No. 26:—

"If there is a fact conspicuous in the developments in the last 200 years of the law of marriage in this country, it is that the Legislature and the courts have known all the time of Jewish marriages. . . . The Legislature has provided in respect of Jewish marriages in a mode which leaves their validity beyond all question and, I should have thought, unimpeachable and unassailable. In the ecclesiastical courts in this jurisdiction the subject has arisen, and nobody until now has ever suggested in my hearing any doubt as to whether a Jewish marriage was a marriage of which the court must take account."

This case concerned a Jewish marriage in Poland.

⁽²¹⁾ It is clearly established (though it may seem illogical) that, under English law, a man whose personal law does permit of polygamy is regarded as possessing the capacity to contract a monogamous marriage, whether or not he possesses under the law of his domicile the capacity to contract such a marriage (Chetti v. Chetti (Case No. 10); the Hammersmith Marriage Case (Case No. 7); R. v. Naquib (Case No. 9); Lendrum v. Chakravati (Case No. 23)—this may be justified on the ground that the incapacity is one which it is contrary to public policy to recognise (like the incapacity of a Roman Catholic priest to marry at all): this is the ground suggested in Chetti v. Chetti—or on the ground that no person is compelled by the law of his domicile to take more than one wife and may consequently agree not to do so (Lendrum's case, No. 23).

"would not be binding on any spouse of English domicile," although he thought the children were legitimate, and Lord Mackay, in the Scottish case (Lendrum's case, Case No. 23), said that, if the marriage between the domiciled Scotswoman and the Hindu of Indian domicile were a polygamous marriage, it would "offend the law of capacity of the wife. She could not entertain such a contract." On the other hand, the Law Officers in 1905 (Annex III, No. 9) did not consider that a polygamous marriage entered into by a domiciled Englishwoman, which was good by the lex loci contractus, was a nullity. They thought that as a result of such a marriage the woman would acquire the nationality as well as the domicile of her husband.

Two grounds of distinction may possibly be made between the case of a woman whose personal law is monogamous entering into a polygamous marriage and the case of a man doing so:—

- (a) The wife of a polygamous marriage does not possess the right to have more than one husband. She is just as much confined to one husband as in a monogamous marriage;
- (b) A woman who goes through a ceremony of marriage with a man and lives with him on the assumption that she is validly married to him acquires by her residence with him a domicile in the place where his domicile is, even if the validity of the marriage is in issue, and the courts of his domicile are the courts of the domicile for the purpose of deciding the question of validity (see Lord Morison's judgment in Lendrum's case Annex II, No. 23).

In other words the woman acquires a polygamous personal law by the act of going through the ceremony of marriage and living with her "husband" and this renders her capable of contracting a polygamous marriage which is one which is recognised by the law of her new domicile.

37. The second of these grounds seems to be a good one and to justify the view of the Law Officers in 1905 and Rule No. IV might therefore be worded as follows:—

IV.

Rule No. IV.

A woman who enters into a polygamous marriage and resides with the spouse of such marriage, is deemed to acquire his domicile and his personal law and to possess the capacity to contract such a marriage (whatever her personal law before the marriage) provided that her husband possesses such capacity under his personal law.⁽²²⁾

38. Since the decision of the House of Lords in Casdagli v. Casdagli (1919, A.C. 145) it is no longer possible to contend that a person whose domicile of origin is English cannot acquire a domicile in a country like Persia, where the laws and customs of the people differ widely from those of this country and where the local law recognises polygamy. In many countries (like India or Iraq) matters of personal status and marriage are governed by the religious law of the persons concerned. It cannot be contended that it is legally impossible for a Christian of English race to become a convert to a religion like Mahometanism or Hinduism, whose religious law recognises polygamy.

The presumption is against it, unless evidence of a genuine acquisition of domicile and a genuine and not merely counterfeited conversion is forthcoming, but, if there is, there seems no reason to doubt that the personal law of a person who was a Christian and domiciled in England originally, may become Mahometan or Hindu law and therefore render him capable of contracting polygamous marriage.⁽²³⁾ The Law Officers' opinion in the Grant case is not contrary to this view, for, at the time it was given, the prevailing view was that an Englishman could not become legally domiciled in a foreign country where the Crown exercised extraterritorial jurisdiction.

⁽²²⁾ For a case which would be covered by this rule, see the case of Miss Ray, Annex I, No. 8 (see also Annex I, No. 11, Marriages in Abyssinia).

⁽²³⁾ See the Ellis case, Annex I, No. 4 (Annex III, No. 4), the Parrett case, Annex I, No. 13, and the Gales case, Annex I, No. 15. The evidence of the acquisition of a domicile in Persia in these cases has not, however, been fully investigated.

The law of the domicile of British subjects in extraterritorial countries. Egypt, Morocco, Abyssinia.

Conversely, though the presumption may be against it, there is no reason to doubt that a person whose personal law was originally Mahometan or Hindu can become domiciled in a country like England, so that his personal law becomes English and he ceases to be capable of contracting a polygamous marriage.

39. The Casdagli case decided (overruling the view commonly held to the contrary up to that date, based on In re Tootal's Trust and Abd-ul-Messih v. Farra) that a person whose domicile of origin is English can acquire a domicile in a foreign country where His Majesty exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction over British subjects, and the judgment of the Privy Council in Bartlett v. Bartlett (1925 A.C. 377) decided that the personal law (law of the domicile) of a British subject domiciled in Egypt is that law which the Crown has by Order in Council prescribed to be applied in His Majesty's consular courts in Egypt, namely, in the particular case the law applicable under article 90 of the Ottoman Order in Council, 1910, which reads as follows:—

"Subject to the provisions of this Order, the civil jurisdiction of every court acting under this Order shall, as far as circumstances admit, be exercised on the principles of, and in conformity with, English law for the time being in force:

"Provided that in all matters relating to marriage inheritance or other questions involving religious law or custom the court shall, in the case of persons belonging to non-Christian communities, recognise and apply the religious law or custom of the person concerned."

The person concerned in the Bartlett case was a British subject who was a Mahometan domiciled in Egypt, and the Privy Council said his personal law (the law of his domicile) was Mahometan law.

Article 91 of the Egypt Order in Council, 1930, reproduces (with amendments not material for the present purpose) article 90 of the old Ottoman Order. A corresponding provision is to be found in article 80 of the Abyssinia Order in Council, 1913, and in article 45 of the Morocco Orders in Council (1889-1929) Consolidated.

The consequence is that it becomes quite clear that the personal law of non-Christian British subjects⁽²⁴⁾ domiciled in any of these three countries is their religious law, and if that law permits of polygamy they are capable of contracting polygamous marriages.

If they are Christians their personal law is English law.⁽²⁵⁾ An English British subject domiciled in one of these countries, who became genuinely a convert to Islam would, however, acquire Mahometan law as his personal law.⁽²⁶⁾

China.

40. The only other important foreign country in which His Majesty now exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction over British subjects is China, and in this case the position is not so clear. Article 104 of the China Order in Council, 1925, contains no provision corresponding to the proviso to article 90 of the old Ottoman Order, and only provides that the civil jurisdiction of the court shall be exercised "as far as circumstances admit on the principles of, and in conformity with, English law for the time being in force."

At first sight the result would appear to be that the personal law of all British subjects domiciled in China, of whatever race or religion, is English law.

There are in China numbers of British subjects of Indian or Chinese race who practise polygamy; but the view has never been taken that these marriages were void and the children illegitimate.

The reason is to be found, I think, in the fact that, until the Casdagli decision in 1919, it was supposed to be impossible for a British subject to be domiciled in China, and that, in consequence, all British subjects in China retained a domicile in the part of His Majesty's dominions from which they originated, i.e., the Indians were domiciled in India, &c., and their personal law was the law which applied to them in India.

This view has the authority of three Law Officers' opinions given before the Casdagli or Bartlett decisions (1883, No. 3; 1897, No. 7; and 1903, No. 8).

⁽²⁴⁾ In the new Egypt Order Jewish law is no longer applied to Jews.

⁽²⁵⁾ See Annex I, No. 11, Marriages in Abyssinia.

⁽²⁶⁾ See, for instance, the Tully case, Annex I, No. 1, and the Palmer case, Annex I, No. 2; the Williams case, Annex I, No. 6.

The last of these opinions approved a memorandum by Sir C. Hurst, in which this view is very clearly stated. The effect of the Casdagli case on this particular point was probably overlooked. If it had not been, it would seem probable that, when the China Order of 1925 was drafted, a proviso corresponding to the proviso in the Ottoman Order would have been introduced. It may be advisable that this should be done at the first opportunity, as otherwise the legitimacy and British nationality of the issue born in China of Indian and other British subjects may be open to doubt.

Perhaps, however, while article 104 of the China Order remains as it is, reliance may be placed on the words "so far as circumstances admit" to avoid the conclusion that the personal law of Indian and other British subjects of polygamous religion and race, domiciled in China, is English law and to justify the view that their personal law may still be regarded as the law of their country of origin.⁽²⁷⁾

41. In the light of the considerations set out in the preceding paragraph I suggest two further rules formulated as follows:—

V.

A person whose personal law of origin does not admit of polygamy may by a change of domicile and/or of religion⁽²⁸⁾ acquire a personal law which does admit of polygamy, and a person whose personal law of origin does admit of polygamy may by a change of domicile or of religion acquire a personal law which does not admit of polygamy, but in both cases the presumption is against the change of domicile or religion.

Rules Nos. V and VI.

VI.

The personal law of a British subject domiciled in a foreign country in which His Majesty exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction over British subjects is that law which His Majesty, by Order in Council, has prescribed as the law applicable to such British subjects in His Majesty's Consular Courts in that country; nevertheless in China, under article 104 of the China Order in Council, the circumstances should be regarded as not admitting the application of English law as the personal law of British subjects of polygamous religion or race domiciled in China, but as admitting only the application of the law of their country of origin.

42. I also suggest for the reasons explained below the two following rules:—

VII.

(a) A prior polygamous marriage, although still subsisting, does not invalidate a subsequent monogamous marriage.

Rules Nos. VII and VIII.

(b) An existing monogamous marriage would not invalidate a subsequent polygamous marriage.

VIII.

(a) A monogamous marriage cannot be dissolved by any proceeding under a law applicable to polygamy, even if it be the law of the matrimonial domicile.⁽²⁹⁾

Relations of monogamous and polygamous marriages to each other.

(b) A polygamous marriage may be dissolved by any proceeding which is recognised as lawful by the law of the matrimonial domicile, even if such proceeding should not involve the interposition of any court of justice or State authority.⁽³⁰⁾

Rule VII (a) follows directly from the decision of Avory, J., in R. v. Naquib (Annex II, Case No. 9), and the dicta of Lush, L.J., in Harvie v. Fernie (Case No. 6), and Darling, J., in the Hammersmith marriage case (Case No. 7).

Rule VII (b) seems at first rather doubtful. It must, however, be remembered that only a man whose personal law is polygamous could contract a polygamous ⁽²⁷⁾ See the case of Mahomet Shah, Annex I, No. 3.

⁽²⁸⁾ According to the circumstances a change of domicile only may be necessary (viz., a Mahometan domiciled in England becomes domiciled in Persia) or a change of religion only (viz., a British subject domiciled in Egypt changes his religion and becomes a Mahometan) or a change of religion and a change of domicile (viz., a Christian British subject domiciled in England becomes domiciled in Egypt and becomes a Mahometan).

⁽²⁹⁾ See Annex I, No. 12, application for naturalisation by the Misses G. and H. Kuo Sing.

marriage after contracting a first monogamous marriage. It follows that such a man would not be domiciled in England or in any country where marriage is monogamous. His second polygamous marriage would, indeed, in the words of Lord Mackay⁽³⁰⁾ "be an infringement of the contract of monogamy into which he had entered and of the marital rights of the wife under that contract," but it does not follow that it would be regarded as invalid on that ground if good by the lex loci contractus and the law of his domicile.

Rule VIII (a) follows directly from the Hammersmith Marriage Case (Case No. 7).

Rule VIII (b).—There seems to be no reason to doubt that English law will recognise a dissolution of a polygamous marriage by any proceeding (even if it be only the unilateral act of the husband which he may do at any time he wills), provided that such proceeding is recognised as a valid divorce by the law of the matrimonial domicile. Even if it be the case that the English courts will not recognise that monogamous marriage can be dissolved in accordance with the law of the domicile without the interposition of the courts, there seems to be no reason to suppose that they would take the same view as regards the dissolution of a polygamous marriage (see the two decisions of the United States courts Wall v. Williamson and Johnson's case (Annex II, Cases Nos. 20 and 22), where the dissolution of the two Indian marriages by unilateral act of the husband were recognised). Connolly's case (Case No. 13) points to the same conclusion. The Law Officers' opinion of 1903 (Annex III, No. 8) approved Sir Cecil Hurst's memorandum, which contained a passage to this effect.

The lex loci contractus.

43. There are one or two points to be considered in connexion with the second requirement under Rule II, i.e., that the marriage should be valid by the lex loci contractus (paragraph 32 above). Where the polygamous marriage is celebrated in India or Persia or another country where the local law recognises polygamy and the forms or ceremonies necessary for a polygamous marriage are sanctioned by that law, the application of this requirement creates no difficulty and requires no comment.⁽³¹⁾

In extraterritorial countries.

In a foreign country where His Majesty exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction, the operation of the ordinary lex loci is practically excluded so far as British subjects are concerned. The lex loci contractus is (under the principle laid down in Bartlett v. Bartlett) the law prescribed for the British consular courts by Order in Council. In Egypt, Morocco, and Abyssinia, the proviso to the relevant article of the Order in Council makes it clear that in the case of non-Christian British subjects the lex loci contractus is the religious law of the person concerned.

Polygamous marriages celebrated in England, &c.

What, however, is the position as regards polygamous marriages (such as Mahometan marriages) celebrated in England (or in China, since English law applies under the Order in Council), or in any other country where the local law only provides for a monogamous marriage? Are these marriages void as not possessing the sanction of the lex loci contractus?

It will be noticed that (1) in In re Ullee (Annex II, Case No. 11) there was a Mahometan marriage celebrated in London between a Mahometan domiciled in India and an Englishwoman, and in that case Chitty, J., inclined to the view that the children were legitimate; (2) that in "In the Estate of Abdul Majid Belshah" (Annex II, Case No. 12) there were two Mahometan marriages celebrated in England, the husband being a Mahometan domiciled in Iraq and the two wives Englishwomen, and the course taken by the President was hardly consistent with the view that he regarded the two wives as strangers to the deceased intestate or their children as illegitimate.

It is, moreover, well known that Mahometan marriages are from time to time performed at the Mosque in Woking.⁽³²⁾

There is the rule of English common law that domiciled Englishmen [or quære all British subjects] carry with them English common law into a foreign country and continue to be subject to it except to the extent that the foreign country has subjected them to another code which supersedes their common law, and it is under this rule that marriages, celebrated between British subjects in the English common law form in a foreign country where there is no local form of marriage which they can use, are held to be valid marriages (see Dicey: Conflict of Laws, 4th ed., p. 686, Rule 182 (2) (111)). This rule finds its most frequent application in the case of Christian British subjects who find themselves in a country, like Persia, where the local forms of marriage are polygamous marriages and available only to persons of certain religions.

⁽³⁰⁾ Lendrum's case, No. 23, Annex II.

⁽³¹⁾ See the case of the British Indians in Iraq, Annex I, No. 7.

⁽³²⁾ In cases where a registrar of marriages attends it would seem that the marriage is an ordinary English monogamous marriage (see the decision of the South African courts in Mashia Ebrahim v. Mohamed Esop, 1905, Tr L.R. 59 in this sense in the case of a Mahometan marriage celebrated in that country in the presence of a marriage officer appointed by the Governor under a statute (Annex II, Case No. 27)).

Is there not another principle analogous to this rule of common law to the effect that, conversely, persons domiciled abroad whose personal law envisages polygamous marriage, for which the local English law provides no forms, are deemed when in England to carry with them sufficient of their own personal law to enable them to contract marriages in the manner recognised by their personal law? In re Ullee and In the Estate of Abdul Majid Belshah rather suggest it. Further, this view is rather supported by the Law Officers' opinion of 1903 (Annex III, No. 8), which dealt with the religious marriages in Turkey of British subjects (Indian Mahometans; Hindoos; and also of Maltese (Roman Catholic marriages)). The Law Officers approved the proposition that each different class of British subject carried with him in Turkey for marriage purposes his own personal law (i.e., that of his domicile of origin). In Turkey, at that date, His Majesty possessed extraterritorial jurisdiction over British subjects, and under the Order in Council then in force, the Consular Courts had to apply English law. Finally, there is the position with regard to Jewish marriages in England in early days, when the Jews lived in a separate community, applied their own religious law and custom in marriage and family matters—celebrated Jewish marriages—marriages which the courts recognised like foreign lex loci marriages. (See the extracts from R. v. Millis annexed to Lord Halsbury's second opinion in the Abensur case—Annex III, No. 6). The manner in which Mahometans marry at the Mosque in Woking seems very similar to the position of Jewish marriages in earlier times. Sir Denis Fitzpatrick in his learned article (see Annex IV, No. 1) quotes the following passage from a judgment of Sir Erskine Perry in a case in a court of British India, putting forward this view which he (Sir Erskine Perry) considered to be supported by judgments of Lord Stowell. "By the comity of nations, therefore, as existing between princes of Christian and non-Christian faith, the lex loci to its whole extent is held not to apply to Europeans placing themselves under the government of the latter. But if this is the case as regards Christian aliens in a foreign State, there can be no doubt that a similar comity requires a similar rule to be observed when a Mussulman or a Hindoo seeks a domicile in a Christian country. How far the peculiar laws of such non-Christians aliens would be recognised, it may not be very easy, nor is it necessary, to define beforehand. . . . But on very many questions such as marriage, divorce, succession and possibly adoption, there seems no reason to doubt that the proper law to be referred to for the decision of any controversy would not be the law of the Christian community, but the law or usage of the peculiar non-Christian class. That this was the opinion of the great jurist whom I last cited (Lord Stowell) is not left a matter of doubt, for he has stated it expressly in many of his judgments with respect both to Jews and that other singular oriental race, the gypsies. See 3 Ral. 32: Ruding v. Smith, 2, Hagg Cons. 384. Lindo v. Belisario, 1 Hagg 216."

Such authority as there is upon this point (and there appears certainly to be very little) points to the conclusion that persons whose personal law is Mahometan law or some other law which sanctions polygamy, should be deemed, when temporarily in a country whose marriage law is based upon the Christian conception of marriage, to carry with them sufficient of their personal law to regulate and govern their marriages and family relations, subject always, of course, to the limitation that their matrimonial rights and duties cannot be enforced in the local courts, even though their existence may be recognised.⁽³³⁾ If this view is accepted, the following further rules might be formulated.

IX.

When a polygamous marriage is celebrated in a country where the lex loci provides no form of polygamous marriage which it is possible for the parties to Rules Nos. IX and X.

⁽³³⁾ See the case of the British Indians in Madagascar, Annex I, No. 5.

1933

use, such a marriage should be deemed to be valid under the lex loci contractus provided that it is valid by the personal law of the husband.

X.

The lex loci contractus in the case of a marriage of a British subject celebrated in a foreign country in which His Majesty exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction over British subjects is the law prescribed by Order in Council for application by His Majesty's consular courts in that country.

Presumption in favour of validity and legitimacy.

44. Lastly, there is the general principle of law that, where there is evidence of a ceremony of marriage having been gone through followed by cohabitation of the parties, then the presumption, in case of doubt or in the absence of evidence to the contrary, is always in favour of validity and legitimacy.^(*) Presumably this principle applies to polygamous marriages and children born of them as well as to other marriages and their issue. The series of rules already suggested might be completed by the following:—

XI.

Rules Nos. XI and XII.

Where there is evidence of a ceremony of marriage, whether polygamous or otherwise, having been celebrated and followed by cohabitation between the parties, then, in case of doubt and in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the presumption is in favour of the validity of the marriage and the legitimacy of the issue.

XII.

In all cases, where under the preceding rules a polygamous marriage is to be held to be valid, any wife of such a marriage must be deemed to be a "wife" within the meaning of section 10 of the B.N. and S.A. Act 1914 (and the corresponding provisions of the Naturalisation Act 1870) and any child born the issue of such a marriage must be deemed to be legitimate and the husband to be the "father" of such child within the meaning of sect. 1 (1) (b) of the B.N. and S.A. Act 1914 and the corresponding provisions of 4 Geo. II, c. 21, and 13 Geo. III, c. 21

(Signed) W. E. BECKETT.

January 11, 1932.

Suggested Rules or Principles for Application in Cases where Questions Relating to Polygamous Marriages arise in connexion with British Nationality Law.

I.

(a) A marriage entered into in a form which under the lex loci contractus is a form of monogamous marriage, is a monogamous marriage, whatever the intentions or the personal law of the parties may be, either at the time when the marriage is contracted or at any subsequent date.

(b) A marriage entered into in a form which under the lex loci contractus is a form of polygamous marriage, is a polygamous marriage, whatever the intentions or the personal law of the parties may be, either at the time when the marriage is contracted or at any subsequent date.

II.

"A polygamous marriage will be recognised as a valid marriage if, and will not be recognised as a valid marriage unless:—

"(a) The marriage was one which each of the parties had the capacity to contract under his or her personal law (the law of his or her domicile); and

"(b) The marriage was a valid one under the lex loci contractus."

^(*) See, for example, Halsbury Laws of England, vol. 16, p. 309, sections 603-4, and Spivack v. Spivack (Annex II, Case No. 26).

III.

A man whose personal law does not permit of polygamy, does not possess the capacity to contract a polygamous marriage; provided that no marriage celebrated between two persons of the Jewish religion must be held to be a marriage which the husband had no capacity to contract under Rule IV, if such husband had at the time of the marriage no other wife.

IV.

A woman who enters into a polygamous marriage and resides with the spouse of such marriage, is deemed to acquire his domicile and his personal law and to possess the capacity to contract such a marriage (whatever her personal law before the marriage) provided that her husband possesses such capacity under his personal law.

V.

A person whose personal law of origin does not admit of polygamy, may by a change of domicile and/or of religion acquire a personal law which does admit of polygamy, and a person whose personal law of origin does admit of polygamy, may by a change of domicile or of religion acquire a personal law which does not admit of polygamy, but in both cases the presumption is against the change of domicile or religion.

VI.

The personal law of a British subject domiciled in a foreign country in which His Majesty exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction over British subjects, is that law which His Majesty, by Order in Council, has prescribed as the law applicable to such British subjects in His Majesty's consular courts in that country; nevertheless, in China, under article 104 of the China Order in Council, circumstances should be regarded as not admitting the application of English law as the personal law of British subjects of polygamous religion or race domiciled in China, but as admitting only the application of the law of their country of origin.

VII.

(a) A prior polygamous marriage, although still subsisting, does not invalidate a subsequent monogamous marriage.

(b) An existing monogamous marriage would not invalidate a subsequent polygamous marriage.

VIII.

(a) A monogamous marriage cannot be dissolved by any proceeding under a law applicable to polygamy, even if it be the law of the matrimonial domicile.

(b) A polygamous marriage may be dissolved by any proceeding, which is recognised as lawful by the law of the matrimonial domicile, even if such proceeding should not involve the interposition of any court of justice or state authority.

IX.

When a polygamous marriage is celebrated in a country where the lex loci provides no form of polygamous marriage which it is possible for the parties to use, such a marriage should be deemed to be valid under the lex loci contractus, provided that it is valid by the personal law of the husband.

X.

The lex loci contractus in the case of a marriage of a British subject celebrated in a foreign country in which His Majesty exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction over British subjects, is the law prescribed by Order in Council for application by His Majesty's Consular Courts in that country.

XI.

Where there is evidence of a ceremony of marriage, whether polygamous or otherwise, having been celebrated, followed by cohabitation between the parties, then, in case of doubt and in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the presumption is in favour of the validity of the marriage and the legitimacy of the issue.

XII.

In all cases, where under the preceding rules a polygamous marriage is to be held to be valid, any wife of such a marriage must be deemed to be a "wife" within the meaning of section 10 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914 (and the corresponding provisions of the Naturalisation Act, 1870), and any child born the issue of such a marriage must be deemed to be legitimate, and the husband to be the "father" of such child within the meaning of section 1 (1) (b) of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, and the corresponding provisions of 4 Geo. II, c. 21, and 13 Geo. III, c. 21.

ANNEX I.

RÉSUMÉ OF CASES ON FOREIGN OFFICE FILES

No. 1.—Tully Case.

A. P. T. TULLY, a British subject born in Putney in 1883, resided in Turkey during the war, assumed a Turkish name and became, or purported to become, a Mussulman, and in 1916 married according to Moslem religious rites a Turkish woman, Emineh Sofuet Khanum. The Moslem law permits of polygamy, and Turkish law at that time allowed polygamy. Two children were born of the union, and both were recognised as British subjects because they were both born in London. The question arose, however, as to the nationality of the wife. The latter stated that in the contract of marriage the right had been given to her (as well as to the husband) to divorce by repudiation, and having been deserted by Tully she had exercised this right and executed the necessary formalities before a notary in Constantinople. Tully disputed the validity of the divorce and, when the wife had recourse to a Turkish tribunal, disputed the jurisdiction of the tribunal on the ground that both parties were British subjects. The situation of the wife was that it was in her material interests at that time to establish that she was not a British subject.

No reply was ever given to the repeated questions of the wife whether she was a British subject. The Foreign Office view was never expressed officially. The minutes indicate a view that, following the Law Officers opinion in the Messiah case (1906) the principle to be applied to the case was that a male British subject who enters into a polygamous union with an alien will not confer British nationality upon his wife, unless by the law of his domicile he is capable of contracting a polygamous marriage, in which case the wife would become a British subject. Consequently the question turned first of all on whether Tully was domiciled in Turkey. If he was, then as His Majesty possessed extraterritorial rights in Turkey, the law of Tully's domicile was that which, under the Ottoman Order in Council, the Consular Court in Turkey would have had to apply to the case.

Article 90 of that Order provided that in all matters relating to marriage, inheritance and other questions involving religious law and customs, the Court shall in the case of persons belonging to non-Christian communities recognise and apply the religious law of custom of the person concerned. Assuming, therefore, that Mr. Tully was domiciled in Turkey the next question was whether he could be recognised as belonging to a non-Christian community within the meaning of the article. Assuming this question to be answered in the affirmative, the conclusion would be reached that the law of the domicile was Mahometan law and consequently, in accordance with the principle stated above, Tully's wife would become a British subject. On the other hand, the Home Office view appears to have been that this marriage could not be recognised as conferring British nationality on the wife whatever the domicile of Tully.

No. 2.—Palmer Case.

J. A. B. Palmer was born in Kent in 1899 and went to Constantinople in 1924 where he became engaged to a Turkish Mahometan lady, Sheriff Nafa'a. He embraced the Moslem faith, declared his intention of residing permanently in Turkey, and in October 1924 married this lady according to the rites of the Moslem religion. Soon after this he desired to come to England with his wife on business and wanted a passport issued to his wife as a British subject. The question was referred to the Home Office by the Foreign Office and the Home Office expressed their views upon the legal principles involved in a memorandum in which their conclusions were stated in the following terms:—

1. "English law will not recognise as valid in any circumstances or for any purpose (including the acquisition of British nationality) a polygamous marriage celebrated in a foreign country by a British subject domiciled in England and will not regard the woman (or women) with whom he forms the polygamous union as having any claim to the status and rights of a wife.
2. "Where the husband is domiciled in a foreign country which allows polygamy and while so domiciled he contracts a polygamous marriage in accordance with the local law it is by no means clear that the marriage is void for all purposes in contemplation of English law. Such a marriage will not be recognised in the Divorce Court or for purposes of succession (at any rate succession to real property in England), but there is no clear authority for holding that it will not be recognised for any other purpose including the nationality of the wife and the claim of the foreign-born children of the marriage to be British subjects if their father is a British subject.
3. "The case of polygamous marriages in those parts of the British Empire where polygamy is allowed by the local law and contracted between persons domiciled in those parts does not appear to be distinguishable on any logical or legal ground from the case dealt with in 2 above. There are, however, administrative considerations which tend strongly to support the policy of recognising and giving extra-territorial validity to such marriages, but it is doubtful how far our Courts are prepared to go in this direction."

The Home Office, taking the view (1) that if Palmer was not domiciled in Turkey it was clear that the marriage could not confer British nationality on the wife and it was uncertain whether he was so domiciled, and (2) that it was not absolutely certain even if he were domiciled in Turkey that the wife would acquire British nationality under the marriage, considered that she should not be regarded as a British subject.

When this communication was received in the Foreign Office Sir Cecil Hurst expressed the view very strongly that it was not either correct or prudent in cases of doubt for Government Departments to act upon the presumption of the invalidity of a marriage and to refuse to recognise its effect as conferring British nationality, but that on the contrary where there was no preponderance of authority in favour of the view of invalidity the proper course for the Government Department to follow was to presume validity until the contrary was established by the decision of a Court. In the end, however, the matter was settled by the issue of an emergency certificate to the lady in which her nationality was not stated, and on their arrival in England the parties settled all possible doubts by remarriage at a Registry Office in this country.

No. 3.—Mohomet Shah.

T 7712/7712/376
of 1929.

His Majesty's consul-general at Yunnan-fu in China reported in April 1929 that Mohomet Shah, a British Indian subject born in Gujrat, married in January 1928 a Chinese woman under a form of contract in use by the local Mahometan Chinese; a child was born of the marriage in 1928 in China, and Mohomet Shah desired that the child should be registered as a British subject. The Chinese authorities expressed the opinion that the contract would be accepted in a Chinese court of law as good evidence of a legal marriage. The marriage laws of the Moslem religion allow polygamy.

Mohomet Shah is domiciled either in Yunnan-fu or in British India. On the supposition that he is domiciled in India, the law of his domicile would be Mahometan law. On the supposition that he is domiciled in China, he is a person under the extra-territorial jurisdiction of His Majesty, and the China Order in Council must presumably be looked at to ascertain the law which applies to him in China (see Bartlett v. Bartlett, 1925, A.C. 377).

Article 104 of that Order provides that—

"Subject to the provisions of the Order, the civil jurisdiction of every court acting under this Order shall, as far as circumstances admit, be exercised on the principles of, and in conformity with, English law for the time being in force."

Article 113 provides—

"The Supreme Court shall, as far as circumstances admit, have for and within China, with respect to British subjects, all such jurisdiction in matrimonial causes as for the time being belongs to the High Court in England in like matters."

His Majesty's consul-general asked whether the child of Mohomet Shah should be registered as a British subject, but no reply has as yet been returned to him.

No. 4.—Ellis Case.

T 2835 of 1929.

Mr. Robert Ellis, born in the United Kingdom, served for twenty-two years in the Indo-European Telegraph Department of the Indian Government in Persia. In 1921 in Persia he married, according to Mahometan law, a Persian lady named Ozra Khanom—a form of marriage recognised in that country.

In 1928 he came with her to England on leave, and the question arose whether this lady must in England be treated as a British subject or as an alien. The Home Office, in March 1929, informed Mr. Ellis that the lady could not be regarded as a British subject. The Foreign Office suggested unofficially that Mr. Ellis should solve his difficulties by remarrying the lady in this country.

No. 5.—British Indians in Madagascar.

T 10707 of 1927-
T 11314 of 1927.

His Majesty's consul at Antananarivo, Madagascar, asked for guidance as to the recognition as British subjects of the wives of British Indians resident in Madagascar and their children born there. Such Indians often possessed more than one wife.

With the concurrence of the India Office instructions were sent to His Majesty's consul to the effect that, pending the result of full consideration of the whole question, no definitive ruling could be given, but in the meantime he might, when occasion arose, issue emergency certificates to such wives or children for the purposes of travel.

No. 6.—Williams Case.

R. A. Williams, a British subject born in Beirut, Syria, in 1883 and resident in Egypt since 1898, adopted the Mahometan religion and a Moslem name in 1912, and in that year contracted a marriage with an Egyptian lady of the Moslem faith according to the formalities of Mahometan law by notarial contract—a form of marriage which is recognised as a valid marriage in Egypt for Mahometans. Of the marriage, between 1912-19, four children were born in Egypt, and in 1927 Mr. Williams applied to His Majesty's consul at Cairo to have these children registered as British subjects.

The evidence in this case is strongly in favour of a domicile in Egypt, but there is some ground for thinking that Mr. Williams only adopted the Moslem faith in order that he might marry this lady.

Assuming a domicile in Egypt, it appears that the law of Williams's domicile is that which is laid down in the Ottoman Order in Council, 1910 (see Bartlett v. Bartlett, 1925, A.C. 377), article 90 of which provides that "In all matters relating to marriage, inheritance, or other questions involving religious law and custom, the court shall, in the case of persons belonging to non-Christian communities, recognise and apply the religious law or custom of the person concerned."

His Majesty's consul at Cairo asked for instructions from the Foreign Office with regard to the registration of these children, but no instructions have yet been sent to him.

No. 7.—British Indians in Iraq.

A number of British Indians of the Moslem faith reside in Iraq and have married there according to Moslem rites one or more wives by whom they have had children born in that country. In other cases they have gone to Iraq with wives whom they have married in India according to Moslem law. His Majesty's High Commissioner in Iraq, in a despatch to the Government of India, reported that such Indians had applied for passports for themselves and their wives and children, and asked for guidance as to the issue of passports, as British subjects, to second and subsequent wives of such Indians, where they were not British subjects before marriage, and their children born in Iraq.

The Government of India replied to the High Commissioner stating that the "practice of the Government of India was to include all the wives of a British Indian Moslem on the husband's passport and treat them as British subjects."

The High Commissioner consulted the Colonial Office on this reply, expressing doubt whether it was correct, since, for nationality purposes, it was necessary to show that these marriages were recognised as valid in English law, and they were polygamous marriages.

No reply has been returned to the High Commissioner on this point.

No. 8.—Marriage of Miss E. B. Ray to a Siamese

Mr. Bailey, acting consul-general at Bangkok, reported that Miss Ray, a British subject, was living in Siam with a Siamese as his wife, and a marriage between these parties had been registered with the Siamese authorities.

Under Siamese customary law a valid marriage is contracted if a man and woman, not under any incapacity or disability, freely consent to take each other as husband and wife and live together openly as such.

Under Siamese law a man may have more than one wife.

Mr. Bailey desired to be informed whether, by reason of this marriage, Miss Ray must be regarded as having lost her British nationality under section 10 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914. In reply to Mr. Bailey, the Foreign Office stated that if, as appeared to be the case, there was in Siamese law (the lex loci contractus) a valid marriage between the parties, Miss Ray must be regarded as having become the wife of an alien and to have lost her British nationality, the "provisions of British law regarding the national status of married women being of general application extending even to the case of polygamous marriages in countries where such marriages are lawful and that no exception could be made in the case of a Christian woman who contracted a polygamous marriage with a foreigner."

No. 9.—Marriage of Mr. H. J. Bronsdon to a Siamese woman.

His Majesty's consul-general at Bangkok, in a despatch of the 15th October, 1930, reported that a European British subject, named H. J. Bronsdon, born in England, stated that since November 1923 he had cohabited with a Siamese woman, named Khien, and that they regarded each other as man and wife and he applied for the issue of a British passport to Khien as a

1933

The Home Office, taking the view (1) that if Palmer was not domiciled in Turkey it was clear that the marriage could not confer British nationality on the wife and it was uncertain whether he was so domiciled, and (2) that it was not absolutely certain even if he were domiciled in Turkey that the wife would acquire British nationality under the marriage, considered that she should not be regarded as a British subject.

When this communication was received in the Foreign Office Sir Cecil Hurst expressed the view very strongly that it was not either correct or prudent in cases of doubt for Government Departments to act upon the presumption of the invalidity of a marriage and to refuse to recognise its effect as conferring British nationality, but that on the contrary where there was no preponderance of authority in favour of the view of invalidity the proper course for the Government Department to follow was to presume validity until the contrary was established by the decision of a Court. In the end, however, the matter was settled by the issue of an emergency certificate to the lady in which her nationality was not stated, and on their arrival in England the parties settled all possible doubts by remarriage at a Registry Office in this country.

No. 3.—*Mohomet Shah.*T 7712/7712/376
of 1929.

His Majesty's consul-general at Yunnan-fu in China reported in April 1929 that Mohomet Shah, a British Indian subject born in Gujrat, married in January 1928 a Chinese woman under a form of contract in use by the local Mahometan Chinese; a child was born of the marriage in 1928 in China, and Mohomet Shah desired that the child should be registered as a British subject. The Chinese authorities expressed the opinion that the contract would be accepted in a Chinese court of law as good evidence of a legal marriage. The marriage laws of the Moslem religion allow polygamy.

Mohomet Shah is domiciled either in Yunnan-fu or in British India. On the supposition that he is domiciled in India, the law of his domicile would be Mahometan law. On the supposition that he is domiciled in China, he is a person under the extra-territorial jurisdiction of His Majesty, and the China Order in Council must presumably be looked at to ascertain the law which applies to him in China (see Bartlett v. Bartlett, 1925, A.C. 377).

Article 104 of that Order provides that—

"Subject to the provisions of the Order, the civil jurisdiction of every court acting under this Order shall, as far as circumstances admit, be exercised on the principles of, and in conformity with, English law for the time being in force."

Article 113 provides—

"The Supreme Court shall, as far as circumstances admit, have for and within China, with respect to British subjects, all such jurisdiction in matrimonial causes as for the time being belongs to the High Court in England in like matters."

His Majesty's consul-general asked whether the child of Mohomet Shah should be registered as a British subject, but no reply has as yet been returned to him.

No. 4.—Ellis Case.

T 2835 of 1929.

Mr. Robert Ellis, born in the United Kingdom, served for twenty-two years in the Indo-European Telegraph Department of the Indian Government in Persia. In 1921 in Persia he married, according to Mahometan law, a Persian lady named Ozra Khanom—a form of marriage recognised in that country.

In 1928 he came with her to England on leave, and the question arose whether this lady must in England be treated as a British subject or as an alien. The Home Office, in March 1929, informed Mr. Ellis that the lady could not be regarded as a British subject. The Foreign Office suggested unofficially that Mr. Ellis should solve his difficulties by remarrying the lady in this country.

No. 5.—*British Indians in Madagascar.*T 10707 of 1927-
T 11314 of 1927.

His Majesty's consul at Antananarivo, Madagascar, asked for guidance as to the recognition as British subjects of the wives of British Indians resident in Madagascar and their children born there. Such Indians often possessed more than one wife.

With the concurrence of the India Office instructions were sent to His Majesty's consul to the effect that, pending the result of full consideration of the whole question, no definitive ruling could be given, but in the meantime he might, when occasion arose, issue emergency certificates to such wives or children for the purposes of travel.

No. 6.—Williams Case.

R. A. Williams, a British subject born in Beirut, Syria, in 1883 and resident in Egypt since 1898, adopted the Mahometan religion and a Moslem name in 1912, and in that year contracted a marriage with an Egyptian lady of the Moslem faith according to the formalities of Mahometan law by notarial contract—a form of marriage which is recognised as a valid marriage in Egypt for Mahometans. Of the marriage, between 1912-19, four children were born in Egypt, and in 1927 Mr. Williams applied to His Majesty's consul at Cairo to have these children registered as British subjects. T 7472/7472/376 of 1927 to
T 11116/1411/376
of 1929.

The evidence in this case is strongly in favour of a domicile in Egypt, but there is some ground for thinking that Mr. Williams only adopted the Moslem faith in order that he might marry this lady.

Assuming a domicile in Egypt, it appears that the law of Williams's domicile is that which is laid down in the Ottoman Order in Council, 1910 (see Bartlett v. Bartlett, 1925, A.C. 377), article 90 of which provides that "In all matters relating to marriage, inheritance, or other questions involving religious law and custom, the court shall, in the case of persons belonging to non-Christian communities, recognise and apply the religious law or custom of the person concerned."

His Majesty's consul at Cairo asked for instructions from the Foreign Office with regard to the registration of these children, but no instructions have yet been sent to him.

No. 7.—British Indians in Iraq.

A number of British Indians of the Moslem faith reside in Iraq and have married there according to Moslem rites one or more wives by whom they have had children born in that country. In other cases they have gone to Iraq with wives whom they have married in India according to Moslem law. His Majesty's High Commissioner in Iraq, in a despatch to the Government of India, reported that such Indians had applied for passports for themselves and their wives and children, and asked for guidance as to the issue of passports, as British subjects, to second and subsequent wives of such Indians, where they were not British subjects before marriage, and their children born in Iraq. T 3132/3132/378
of 1930 to
T 6640/3132/378.

The Government of India replied to the High Commissioner stating that the "practice of the Government of India was to include all the wives of a British Indian Moslem on the husband's passport and treat them as British subjects."

The High Commissioner consulted the Colonial Office on this reply, expressing doubt whether it was correct, since, for nationality purposes, it was necessary to show that these marriages were recognised as valid in English law, and they were polygamous marriages.

No reply has been returned to the High Commissioner on this point.

No. 8.—Marriage of Miss E. B. Ray to a Siamese

Mr. Bailey, acting consul-general at Bangkok, reported that Miss Ray, a British subject, was living in Siam with a Siamese as his wife, and a marriage between these parties had been registered with the Siamese authorities. T 8034 of 1929.

Under Siamese customary law a valid marriage is contracted if a man and woman, not under any incapacity or disability, freely consent to take each other as husband and wife and live together openly as such.

Under Siamese law a man may have more than one wife.

Mr. Bailey desired to be informed whether, by reason of this marriage, Miss Ray must be regarded as having lost her British nationality under section 10 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914. In reply to Mr. Bailey, the Foreign Office stated that if, as appeared to be the case, there was in Siamese law (the lex loci contractus) a valid marriage between the parties, Miss Ray must be regarded as having become the wife of an alien and to have lost her British nationality, the "provisions of British law regarding the national status of married women being of general application extending even to the case of polygamous marriages in countries where such marriages are lawful and that no exception could be made in the case of a Christian woman who contracted a polygamous marriage with a foreigner."

No. 9.—Marriage of Mr. H. J. Bronsdon to a Siamese woman.

His Majesty's consul-general at Bangkok, in a despatch of the 15th October, 1930, reported that a European British subject, named H. J. Bronsdon, born in England, stated that since November 1923 he had cohabited with a Siamese woman, named Khien, and that they regarded each other as man and wife and he applied for the issue of a British passport to Khien as a T 13155 of 1930.

[10221]

E 2

British subject. Mr. Bronsdon accompanied his application by a statutory declaration to this effect, and also by a declaration by a solicitor practising in Bangkok to the effect that under the Siamese law, the lex loci, these two persons would be regarded as man and wife. In this latter declaration the Siamese law with regard to marriage was described in a manner similar to that set up in the note with regard to the marriage of Miss E. B. Ray to a Siamese (see T 8034 of 1929).

Mr. Consul-General Johns asked for instructions as to whether a passport should be given to this lady as a British subject.

In the minutes on this paper the Legal Advisers of the Foreign Office recommended that a reply should be returned to Mr. Johns to the effect that this whole subject of polygamous marriages in connexion with British nationality was at present under consideration and until the advice of the Law Officers had been obtained it was impossible to give a final answer to his question.

In 1905 the Law Officers had advised that sections 10 (1) and (2) of the Nationalisation Act of 1870 referred not merely to marriage such as is contemplated by English law for the purposes of the construction of an English settlement or of the jurisdiction of the divorce court, but were of general application and that they applied in the case even of polygamous marriages in countries where such marriages were lawful. It was clear that this opinion would cover such marriages where both the parties were of polygamous religion or race. It was also clear that the opinion covered the case where the husband was of such religion or race and the wife was an Englishwoman, since these were the circumstances of the case in respect of which this advice was given; and it was on the basis of this opinion that the Foreign Office (in case No. 8) had advised Mr. Bailey, acting consul-general at Bangkok, that Miss Ray, a British subject, must be deemed to have lost her status as such by reason of her marriage to a Siamese man. The Law Officers had, however, not dealt specifically with the case of a polygamous marriage where the husband was a British subject of non-polygamous religion and race and the wife was a native woman, and though it might not be clear whether any distinction in principle could be drawn upon this difference, it would be advisable to await the further consultation of the Law Officers before any decision was given. The question seemed to be whether the man, a British subject, possibly still domiciled in England, should be deemed to be capable of contracting marriage in this way. In corresponding circumstances the Law Officers seem to have been of the opinion that an English woman could so contract a marriage.

Mr. Johns had, it was thought, therefore better inform Mr. Bronsdon in reply to his application that he could only grant this lady a temporary passport of short duration and this grant must not be taken by Mr. Bronsdon to imply that any final decision had been taken upon the question whether this lady had become a British subject by reason of this marriage, as the question was still the subject of further consideration. At the same time he should discover and report to the Foreign Office in case the point was a material one, whether Mr. Bronsdon should now be regarded as domiciled in Siam (i.e., whether he had now made Siam his permanent home).

No. 10.—Case of Richard Ewe Cheang Lim.

T 8547/7472/376
of 1927.

Dr. Lim Eng Hae, a British subject of Chinese race, born at Penang, a graduate of London University and a medical practitioner at Penang, and presumably domiciled there, married in Java a Chinese lady born in Java. The marriage was performed in accordance with the provisions of Dutch Indian law by a Dutch official. A child was born to them in Java, named Richard Ewe Cheang Lim, and Dr. Lim applied to His Majesty's consulate-general for the registration of the child as a British subject. The birth was, in fact, registered, but Consul-General Crosby subsequently raised the question whether the registration had been correct. Dr. Lim is not a Christian.

Under Dutch Indian law in Java, Chinese are subject to the same system of civil law as is applicable to Europeans, and only one wife is allowed by law to Chinese as well as Europeans, offspring of another wife not being recognised as legitimate unless in the case of Chinese the second wife was married before the husband entered Dutch territory or before the application in the territory of the European system of civil law to Chinese.

In the Straits Settlements, however, where Dr. Lim was domiciled, the law recognises polygamy for Chinese and the children of secondary marriages as legitimate.

Mr. Consul-General Crosby asked for a ruling—

- (a) With reference to the registration as a British subject of the son of Dr. Lim.
- (b) With reference to the general question as to whether entries should be made in the consular registers of the births of offspring of fathers who are not obliged to follow a monogamous rule of life.

Mr. Crosby stated that hitherto all the entries in his registers were confined to the children of parents professing a religion or following a customary law which did not permit of polygamy, but he emphasised certain political difficulties which might arise in the future if the registration of the children of the large number of Chinese British subjects in his district was to be refused.

In reply to Mr. Consul-General Crosby's despatch the Foreign Office approved the registration of the son of Dr. Lim on the ground that Dr. Lim's marriage in Java was, under the lex loci celebrationis, a monogamous one, and his son would be recognised as legitimate by the law of the Straits Settlements, where Dr. Lim was domiciled, and the case could, therefore, be dealt with independently of the general question of the issue of polygamous marriages.

Mr. Crosby was informed that instructions on this general question would be sent to him at a later date. No such instructions have, however, yet been given to him.

No. 11.—Abyssinian Lex Loci Marriages.

In 1926 a despatch from His Majesty's Minister at Addis Ababa raised various questions relating to the effect of marriages contracted in Abyssinia according to the local forms on the nationality of the parties, and a reply to these questions was furnished in a Foreign Office despatch of January 1927. As it is not possible to summarise the latter, these two despatches are quoted in full:—

(No. 237.)
Sir,

Addis Ababa, December 7, 1926.

I have the honour to transmit to you herewith a copy of a letter from Mr. A. L. Gardiner, barrister-at-law at Addis Ababa, regarding the question of change of nationality on marriage and of my reply thereto.

2. In illustration of what I have said to Mr. Gardiner regarding the difference in attitude towards marriage of the Abyssinians and of other countries, I may say that three degrees of marriage are recognised by Abyssinian law:—

- (i) Where a woman is hired, in the same manner as a domestic servant, at about 40 dollars a month. In this case she can be dismissed like a domestic servant, but while she cohabits she is regarded as a wife, and the children resulting from the union have no slur of illegitimacy.
- (ii) Where the marriage is arranged by mutual contract. In this case the woman cannot be dismissed, but can be divorced without much ceremony. She has the right, on divorce, to a division of household goods proportionate to the share therein of each party on entering into the original contract.
- (iii) Where an ecclesiastical marriage takes place. In this case divorce would appear not to be recognised or at least most difficult to obtain. Ecclesiastical marriage between British subjects and Abyssinians is probably extremely rare.

3. From the nature of Abyssinian marriage as described above the point arises whether marriages between British subjects and Abyssinians are valid according to British law.

4. It seems to me that we cannot possibly recognise a lex loci marriage in Abyssinia of the first and second category any more than we could in Japan, and that only a marriage before a British consular officer can entitle an Abyssinian woman to claim the nationality of her British husband.

When the parties are Moslems the case is simpler, since the marriage, in order to be legal, has to be performed by the Cadi, but even here the ground would not appear to be secure. For instance, if an Arab of Aden marries an Abyssinian woman (Moslem) before the Cadi and divorces her after a month, can she claim to be a full British subject?

5. I should be grateful if I might be given a ruling on this complicated question, and specially on the question of Moslem marriages, which is continually arising.

I have, &c.
C. H. BENTINCK.

[T 16331/16331/376]

(No. 6.)

Foreign Office, January 18, 1927.

Sir,
I received your despatch No. 237 of the 7th ultimo relative to marriages contracted under Abyssinian law and questions of national status consequent thereon.

2. Of the three degrees of marriage described in your despatch, it is clear that the kind of marriage referred to in paragraph 2 (i) could not be considered as a marriage for any purpose in English law and would be incapable of producing any effect on the nationality of the persons who had contracted it. On the other hand it would appear that the methods of marriage referred to in paragraph 2 (ii) and (iii) must be considered as marriages. It is a material factor in the consideration of the questions raised in your despatch whether under Abyssinian law and custom marriages celebrated by these methods can or cannot be polygamous. The effect of this factor will be explained in the following paragraphs.

3. English law does not recognise any polygamous union as a "marriage" for the purposes of the matrimonial jurisdiction of the English courts. On the other hand in certain cases a polygamous union which possesses the characteristics of a marriage will be recognised in English law as a marriage for other purposes, including that of the acquisition or loss of British nationality. If these marriages must under Abyssinian law be monogamous, then it would appear probable that they would be recognised as marriages by the English courts for all purposes.

4. The effect of these marriages on the nationality of the parties is hereafter considered with reference to cases where (a) the wives are British subjects and the husbands aliens, and (b) the husbands are British subjects and the wives aliens.

(a) I am advised that British women married to foreigners under a lex loci form of marriage which permits polygamy lose their British nationality by such marriage. It appears to follow that, even if Abyssinian law recognises polygamy in the case of unions of the kinds described in paragraph 2 (ii) and (iii) of your despatch, marriages of women who are British subjects with Abyssinians according to these forms in Abyssinia will cause such women to lose their British nationality. It would also cause them to lose their British nationality if they married aliens other than Abyssinians the law of whose domicile admitted of polygamy. If, however, they were to marry in such circumstances aliens the law of whose domicile did not admit of polygamy, it does not appear that the marriage would cause them to lose their British nationality, since presumably it would not be recognised as a marriage by the law of their husband's domicile. But, if, on the other hand, unions of classes (ii) and (iii) must be monogamous under Abyssinian law, then such women would lose their British nationality in every case, provided the validity of the marriage were not upset on some other ground.

1933

(b) In the case of marriages of men who are British subjects with women who are aliens, celebrated in Abyssinia according to the lex loci, essentially the same reasoning would apply. If the marriages are monogamous under the law of Abyssinia, and are not invalid on any other ground, the wives would appear to acquire British nationality in every case. If such marriages are by Abyssinian law polygamous, then British nationality will be acquired by the wives in cases where the law of the domicile of the British husband allows of polygamy. In other cases it would appear that British nationality would not be acquired by the wife, since no marriage had taken place according to the law of the British husband's domicile.

5. The only remaining question is as to the cases in which the law of a British subject's domicile can be said to recognise polygamy. In the case of British subjects, who are not domiciled in Abyssinia, the question naturally depends on the law of the place where they are domiciled. On the other hand the law of the domicile of British subjects who are domiciled in Abyssinia itself is not Abyssinian law, since His Majesty possesses extra-territorial rights in Abyssinia. It was decided by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Bartlett v. Bartlett (1925 A.C. 377) that the law of the domicile of a British subject domiciled in Egypt is the law which the Crown has by Order in Council prescribed for His Majesty's courts in Egypt. The same principle appears to apply to Abyssinia. The law of the domicile of British subjects domiciled in Abyssinia is therefore that which is prescribed in the Abyssinia Order in Council. Article 80 of that Order provides that "the civil jurisdiction of every court acting under this Order shall, as far as circumstances admit, be exercised on the principles of, and in conformity with, the law for the time being in force in British India: provided that in all matters relating to marriage, inheritance, or other questions involving religious law and custom the court shall, in the case of persons belonging to non-Christian communities, recognise and apply the religious law or custom of the person concerned." The law of the domicile therefore of all Christian British subjects is the law which would be applied to Christian British subjects were they in British India, i.e., a law which would not recognise a polygamous marriage. No polygamous marriage of a Christian British subject domiciled in Abyssinia would therefore confer British nationality on the wife. In the case of other British subjects domiciled in Abyssinia, it depends on their own religious law and custom whether they must be deemed to be capable in law of contracting polygamous marriages. In the case of those who are so capable, a marriage in the Abyssinian form would confer British nationality on the wife, although it may be a polygamous marriage.

I am, &c.
(For the Secretary of State),
G. R. WARNER.

No. 12.—Application for British Naturalisation by the Misses G. and H. Kuo Sing.

T 14645 of 1930.

A despatch of the 20th November, 1930, from His Majesty's Minister at Peking enclosed two applications for British naturalisation by the Misses G. and H. Kuo Sing, who were still minors, under section 4, or alternatively section 5 (2), of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914.

These girls are the daughters of W. K. Sing, a Chinese national, and Katharine K. Sing (née Reid), an English woman and British subject by birth.

The parents were married in Tientsin in 1911 in accordance with Chinese custom.

By an agreement in a deed, dated the 1st August, 1925, the parties dissolved their marriage by mutual consent, under which it would appear that the mother was left the sole guardian of the children.

This agreement apparently, under Chinese law, constitutes a valid divorce.

Mrs. Sing's principal object in securing this divorce was to facilitate her reacquisition of British nationality by naturalisation under section 2 (5) of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, together with naturalisation of her children under section 5 (1), but, having been advised that (a) she had ceased to be a British subject by her marriage in 1911, (b) that her divorce in 1925 would not be recognised as valid in English law and therefore that this course would not be open to her, the applications of the children for naturalisation were submitted. These applications were forwarded to the Home Office.

In the minute on this paper a legal adviser of the Foreign Office wrote:—

"I agree that this matter should be referred to the Home Office, but I suggest, as it raises a number of rather interesting points, that, in so referring it, we should make some observations on the following points:—

"First of all, if the Home Office have not had the Crown Advocate's opinion, referred to in paragraph 3 of this despatch, I think that it would be well that they should have it, and, in sending it, I think that the following observations might be made with regard to the case of Mrs. Alice Woodhead, to which that opinion refers, in order to show the differences between that case and this.

"In the case of Mrs. Alice Woodhead there has been a Scottish marriage in Scotland between an Englishwoman and a Chinese. After this the parties went to China and apparently became domiciled there, and, in accordance with the Chinese law, divorced one another by mutual consent and by deed. The Crown Advocate held, and there is no doubt on this point that he was right, that, by reason of this marriage, the lady ceases to be a British subject. He held, further, that this divorce by deed would not be recognised by the English courts as a valid dissolution of the marriage contracted in Scotland. He based his opinion on the decision of the English courts in R. v. The Superintendent Registrar of Marriages for Hammersmith, reported in 1917, L. K.B. 634. Whatever view is taken of the real ratio decidendi in that case, I think it is clear that the decision does cover it, and therefore, for so long as that case stands as good law, his opinion on this point was right.

"In this case there was a marriage between a Chinese man and an English woman in China, in accordance with Chinese custom. The Crown Advocate is of the opinion that this marriage was one under which the Englishwoman would lose her British nationality. I think that on this point his opinion is one which is in accordance with the opinion of the Law Officer in 1905 and therefore accords with the view which we also must at present adopt. Of this marriage there were born in China two daughters. Subsequent to their birth the parties to the marriage divorced one another by mutual consent and by deed in accordance with Chinese law. Sir Miles Lampson apparently thinks that the Crown Advocate's opinion in the Woodhead case covers this case, and that accordingly this Chinese divorce would not be recognised as dissolving the marriage. But this is not quite so certain, because there is a distinction between the two cases; in the Woodhead case there was a marriage contracted in the United Kingdom and therefore a monogamous marriage contracted in accordance with the principles attending the conception of that institution in European countries, and it was this marriage which the Crown Advocate was of opinion could not be dissolved by a Chinese divorce by mutual consent, China being a country whose law, I think, permits of polygamy; whereas now the question is whether a Chinese divorce can be regarded as dissolving a Chinese marriage. Whether or not the decision of the English courts in 1917 (referred to above) would cover this case depends largely on one's view as to what was the real ground of that decision, which it is not very easy to determine. A view which is commonly taken as the real ground of the decision in the case is that a monogamous marriage which is one institution cannot be dissolved by a divorce under a law whose conception of marriage allows of polygamy, a polygamous marriage being regarded as a different institution; or, to put it shortly, a monogamous marriage cannot be dissolved by a polygamous divorce. If this is the true ground of the decision, then it does not really cover this case, because here we are dealing with a Chinese marriage and a Chinese divorce, both of them equally covered by a law which permits of polygamy.

"One might, however, deduce from the language of parts of the judgments of some members of the court, and in particular the passages quoted in the Crown Advocate's opinion, that the ground of the decision was a different one, namely, whether the English courts will recognise any divorce which does not consist in the decree of a court. If so, of course, that case does cover this point. It does not, however, seem quite certain whether this view would now be upheld in view of the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in the Nachimson case; not that the point decided in the Nachimson case was this point, but indirectly it has some bearing upon it. Indeed, if the proceedings of the Nachimson case are continued it would seem that the courts will, in fact, have to pronounce on this very point, because it was the contention of the husband in that case, in replying to the wife's petition for judicial separation, that the marriage had already been dissolved by registration at a consulate. In the first part of the proceedings this question was not decided, since the issue was only whether there was a marriage at all of a kind coming within the matrimonial jurisdiction of the English courts, and the decision was that the means by which, under Soviet law, a Soviet marriage could be dissolved did not take away from the marriage the characteristics essential to give the English courts matrimonial jurisdiction.

"For these reasons I do not think that it is by any means certain that this lady's divorce under Chinese law would not be recognised as a valid divorce of her Chinese marriage by the English courts. The point is one which, of course, could be fully considered if the lady were to submit an application under section 2 (5) of the Act of 1914. If the Home Office were not prepared to consider her application under section 2 (5) on the ground that they were not sufficiently certain of the validity of her divorce she could presumably, if she has the means to do so, take proceedings to obtain a declaration in the English courts, and the decision of the courts on this point would throw some light on a point of English law where light is badly required. This course has this advantage for her that she might at the same time apply to have her children included under section 5 (1). She is the sole guardian of the children apparently. It might be well worth while facilitating proceedings for the purposes of obtaining a decision.

"Her two daughters are clearly not British subjects in any event. There is no doubt on this point, and it is clear that their applications for naturalisation under section 4 could not be considered. In so far as the application is made under section 5 (2) the matter seems to be one of discretion purely, and therefore one entirely for the Home Office to decide.

"Foreign Office, January 2, 1931."

No. 13.—The Case of Mr. Ronald Cedric Parrett.

T 7743/7743/378
of 1929, and
T 6792/6792/378
of 1931.

His Majesty's Minister at Tehran reported in June 1929 that Mr. R. C. Parrett, a British subject, accountant of the Anglo-Persian Oil Company (Limited), Tehran, had applied for a passport in the name of himself and his wife, Rafa'at I. Sufi, of Persian origin, and of the Mussulman religion. In support of his application Mr. Parrett produced the following documents duly legalised by the Shari Court of the Persian Ministry of Justice: (1) a certificate, dated the 4th October, 1928, of his adoption of the religion of Islam; (2) a marriage certificate, dated the 14th October, 1928, between himself and the said Rafa'at I. Sufi. The passport was then granted.

In May 1931 His Majesty's Minister at Tehran reported that Mr. R. C. Parrett had divorced his wife, Rafa'at I. Sufi, according to Moslem law, and contracted another Moslem marriage with another Persian lady, and now requested for another joint passport in the name of himself and his second wife. Mr. Parrett produced a copy of the act of divorce and the marriage certificate of the new union, both documents being registered and recognised as valid by the competent Persian authority. Sir R. Clive requested instructions, and he was informed that a temporary passport only should be issued, and that all definitive recognition of the wife as a British subject should be delayed pending the advice from the Law Officers on the general question of polygamous marriages.

No. 14.—The Children of Mr. Aron Abib.

T 2836 of 1931.

His Majesty's consul at Tripoli reported that Mr. Aron Abib, a British subject, born in Tripoli, of the Jewish religion, and apparently domiciled there, married in Tripoli, in accordance with the local Jewish law, L.L., his first wife being still alive, and the son of the second wife, Mr. Darco Abib, had applied for registration as a British subject. His Majesty's consul stated that under the Italian law in force in Italy polygamy was recognised in the case of Jews domiciled there, but not in the case of Jews domiciled in Italy.

(It would also appear that in the case of Jews domiciled in Tripoli, Jewish religious marriages were recognised under the Italian law in force in Tripoli.)

As the case appeared to be covered by the opinion of Lord Halsbury (L.C.) in the Abensur case, the Foreign Office instructed His Majesty's consul to register Mr. Darco Abib provisionally as a British subject pending the receipt of an opinion from the Law Officers on the whole subject of polygamous marriages in connexion with nationality questions.

No. 15.—Ralph Edward Gales.

T 3051 of 1931.

Mr. Parr, Chargé d'Affaires at His Majesty's Legation, Tehran, reported that Mr. R. E. Gales, a British subject, applied for a passport for his wife, a Persian lady, and produced a Persian marriage certificate which stated that R. E. Gales, a convert to Islam, had married this lady. (The certificate was evidence of a marriage recognised by Persian law, which, however, admits of polygamy for Mahometans.)

Mr. Parr reported that he had granted a passport to the lady limited for travel to the United Kingdom.

The Foreign Office suggested to the Home Office that until an opinion of the Law Officers had been received, it was desired to avoid as far as possible raising the question whether the lady was a British subject.

ANNEX II.

JUDICIAL DECISIONS.

Case No. 1.—Seedats (Exors.) v. The Master. S.A., 1917, Appellate Div. 302.

S, a Mahometan and domiciled in India, married X according to Mahometan rites and had four children by her born in India. He removed to Natal and became domiciled there, and, while so domiciled, but during a visit to India, he married in India according to Mahometan rites a second wife Y, and had by her six children, two born in India and four born in Natal.

Both marriages were good in form under the law of India, and under the law of India, so far as it applied to the case, both marriages were valid marriages and the children legitimate. S died and left a will bequeathing his estate to executors to be realised and distributed according to the Mahometan law of succession between X and Y and his children by both of them. Under the law of Natal, where estate was situated, a succession duty of 1 per cent. is charged where the successor is a lineal descendant of the testator and 5 per cent. if he is a stranger, while if a successor is a surviving spouse no duty is charged.

A dispute arose between the Master and the executors as to the duty payable on the estate.

Held:

(1) The expression "surviving spouse" in the Natal Act meant the survivor of a marriage recognised by South African law as valid, and the expression "lineal descendants" as applied to children meant children regarded by that law as legitimate.

(2) That, in view of the fact that S was domiciled in Natal at the time of his second marriage to Y, and the law of Natal did not permit of polygamy, the marriage with Y could not be recognised, and her children must be regarded as illegitimate and the duty levied at 5 per cent. as regards their share. ["Polygamous union is one the nature of which is consistent with the husband marrying another wife during its continuance; whether he exercise his privilege or not is beside the question."]

(3) That the marriage with X was a polygamous union, and, though good as a marriage by the lex loci contractus and by the lex domicilii, could not be recognised as a marriage by the law of South Africa on grounds of public policy, since it was a "legal relation repugnant to the moral principles of its people," and therefore X could not be held to be the "surviving spouse" of S.

(4) The children of S and X being legitimate according to the law of their domicile of origin must be regarded as legitimate in South Africa, and the grounds of public policy against the recognition of X as a wife did not apply to the recognition of her children as legitimate.

(The decision on this last point is partly based on Hyde v. Hyde (Case No. 2 below).)

Case No. 2.—Hyde v. Hyde. L.R. 1 P. and D. 130.

The petitioner, born in and originally domiciled in England, married the respondent in 1853 at Salt Lake City. The respondent was born in and originally domiciled in England. Both parties were at the time of the marriage of the Mormon faith, and the marriage was celebrated according to Mormon rites. At the time of the marriage both parties were resident (and quære domiciled) in Utah. They lived and cohabited in Utah and children were born there.

In 1856, however, the petitioner, while out of Utah, renounced the Mormon faith, and in 1857 he resumed his domicile in England.

In December 1856 a sentence of excommunication was pronounced against the petitioner in Utah, and the respondent was declared free to marry again. The respondent refused to change her faith or to leave Utah and rejoin the petitioner, and in 1859 contracted another Mormon marriage at Salt Lake City with another person, by whom she had children. The petitioner sought a decree of dissolution of his marriage with the respondent on the ground of adultery.

The evidence was that the Mormon marriage of the petitioner would be recognised as a valid marriage by the Supreme Court of the United States, and that under Mormon law polygamy was lawful and commonly practised. The petitioner had, however, never taken a second wife.

Held by Lord Penzance:

(1) Marriage, as understood in Christendom, may be defined as the voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others.

It is an institution and confers the status of husband and wife, which, apart from minor incidents, is the same in all Christian countries.

(2) Polygamous marriages exist in many countries which have laws adapted to define and regulate the rights and obligations of the parties to them, but polygamous marriage is a different institution from Christian marriage, and the status of husband and wife under it is a different one (Warrender v. Warrender).

(3) The matrimonial law of this country is adapted to a Christian marriage and is wholly inapplicable to polygamy. There is no law in England adapted for the institution of polygamous marriage.

(4) The nature of the institution is determined by the contract entered into by the parties when they married, and it would be impossible for the court to treat the first marriage of a person, contracted under a law permitting polygamy, as a Christian marriage and apply English law to it as defining the rights and duties of the parties. The result would be to render the marriage something entirely different from that which the parties contracted.

(5) The petition cannot be granted, but "this decision is confined to that object. This court does not profess to decide upon the rights of succession or legitimacy which it might be proper to accord to the issue of the polygamous union, nor upon the rights or obligations in relation to third persons which people living under the sanction of such unions may have created for themselves. All that is intended to be here decided is that as between each other they are not entitled to the remedies, the adjudication or the relief of the matrimonial law of England."

Case No. 3.—In re Bethell. 38 Ch. D. 220.

W.F.B., the testator, devised certain real estate in England to trustees (the defendants in these proceedings) upon trust (inter alia) for the use of his son, C.B. for life; and after the death of C.B., if he died leaving any child or children him surviving, upon trust for sale, the trustees to hold the proceeds for such child or children; and in the event of C.B. dying and leaving no surviving child the testator devised the said estate to his son W.B. (the plaintiff) for his life.

[10221]

F

There was evidence that C.B. had refused to be married to Teepoo in church, although there were facilities for this purpose, and never spoke of himself as married or of Teepoo as his wife. C.B. made testamentary provision for Teepoo and any child of his by her if they survived him, and directed that his relatives in England should be informed of these provisions in his will.

(1) The nature of the union into which C.B. and Teepoo entered was a Baralong marriage which is polygamous and not a marriage in the sense that that institution is understood under the law of England.

(2) A Baralong marriage is not a marriage according to the law of England, and, therefore, Sc., the child of Teepoo, cannot be considered to be a child of C.B. within the meaning of the will of W.F.B.

Stirling, J., professed in his conclusion No. 2 simply to be following Hyde v. Hyde, by which he was bound, but in Hyde v. Hyde the question of the legitimacy of children of polygamous marriages was stated clearly not to be decided.

Finally he refers to the U.S. case of Johnson v. Johnson's Administrator (Case No. 22), and the Canadian case of Connolly v. Woolrich (Case No. 13), and suggests that the marriages in those cases might have been held valid according to the law of England consistently with Hyde v. Hyde. In Johnson v. Johnson's Administrator the question was one of legitimacy. It is true therefore that the decision in favour of legitimacy in that case might be consistent with Hyde v. Hyde because in Hyde v. Hyde legitimacy questions were left open. Johnson's case is, however, only consistent with Stirling's, J., judgment in this case, another legitimacy case, if the latter judgment must be regarded as being based on the domicile of C.B. being English.

B, a British subject born and apparently domiciled in Ireland, married in 1886 in Japan, when temporarily resident in that country, a Japanese lady. As evidence of the marriage a certificate was produced from the office of the Governor of Tokyo stating that the parties had duly married in accordance with Japanese law, and there was evidence by experts in Japanese law to the effect that this certificate showed a marriage valid under Japanese law, and that under that law B was by his marriage precluded from marrying any other woman during its subsistence.

Held by Sir James Hannen, P.:

- (1) That a marriage valid by the law of Japan (lex loci) had been proved.
- (2) That a Japanese marriage being a monogamous one was a marriage which could be recognised as such in the English courts, although Japan was not a Christian country.

This was an appeal to the House of Lords from the Scottish Court of Session, and the question at issue was whether the Scottish courts could dissolve the marriage contracted in England of parties whose matrimonial domicile was in Scotland.

“ But the rule extends, I apprehend, no further than to the ascertaining of the validity of the contract, and the meaning of the parties, that is, the existence of the contract and its construction. If, indeed, there go two things under one and the same name in different countries—if that which is called marriage is of a different nature in each—there may be some room [532] for holding that we are to consider the thing to which the parties have bound themselves, according to its legal acceptance in the country where the obligation was contracted. But marriage is one and the same thing substantially all the Christian world over. Our whole law of marriage assumes this; and it is important to observe that we regard it as a wholly different thing, a different status, from Turkish or other marriages among infidel nations, because we clearly never should recognise the plurality of wives, and consequent validity of second marriages, standing the first, which second marriages the laws of those countries authorise and validate. This cannot be put upon any rational ground, except our holding the infidel marriage to be something different from the Christian, and our also holding Christian marriage to be the same everywhere. Therefore all that the courts of one country have to determine is whether or not the thing called marriage, that known relation of persons, that relation which those courts are acquainted with, and know how to deal with, has been validly contracted in the other country where the parties professed to bind themselves. If the question is answered in the affirmative, a marriage has been had; the relation has been constituted; and those courts will deal with the rights of the parties under it according to the principles of the municipal law which they administer.⁽¹⁾ constituted; and those who administer the law must administer it according to the principles of the municipal law which they administer.⁽¹⁾

"But it is said that what is called the essence of the contract must also be judged of according to the lex loci; and as this is a somewhat vague, and for its vagueness a somewhat suspicious proposition, it is rendered more certain by adding that dissolubility or indissolubility is of the essence of the contract. Now I take this to be really petitio principii. It is [533] putting the very question under discussion into another form of words and giving the answer in one way. There are many other things which may just as well be reckoned of the essence as this. If it is said that the parties marrying in England must be taken all the world over as this. If it is said that the parties marrying in England must be taken all the world over to have bound themselves to live until death or an Act of Parliament 'them do part,' why shall it not also be said that they have bound themselves to live together on such terms, and with such mutual personal rights and duties, as the English law recognises and enforces? Those rights and duties are just as much of the essence as dissolubility or indissolubility; and yet all admit, all must admit, that persons married in England and settled in Scotland will be entitled only to the personal rights which the Scottish law sanctions, and will only be liable to perform the duties which the Scotch law imposes. Indeed, if we are to regard the nature of the contract in this respect as defined by the lex loci, it is difficult to see why the nature of the contract in this respect as defined by the lex loci, it is difficult to see why we may not import from Turkey into England a marriage of such a nature as that it is capable of being followed by and subsisting with another, polygamy being there of the essence of the contract.

That indissolubility is of the essence,' appears plainly

"The fallacy of the argument, 'that indissolubility is of the essence,' appears plainly to be this: it confounds incidents with essence; it makes the rights under a contract, or flowing from and arising out of it, parcel of the contract; it makes the mode in which judicatures deal with those rights, and with the contract itself, part of the contract; instead of considering, as in all soundness of principle we ought, that the contract and all its incidents, and the rights of the parties to it, and the wrongs committed by them respecting it, must be dealt with by the courts of the [534] country where the parties reside, and where the contract is to be carried into execution."

On p. 535 the following further passage occurs:—

p. 535 the following further passage occurs:—

“ Hitherto we have been considering the contract as to its nature and solemnities, and examining how far, being English, and entered into with reference only to England, it could be dissolved by a Scotch sentence of divorce. But the circumstance of parties belonging to one country marrying in another (which is the case before us) presents the question in another light. In personal contracts much depends upon the parties having regard to the country where it is to be acted under, and to receive its execution; upon their making the contract, with a view to its execution in that country. The marriage contract is emphatically one with a view to an immediate view to the usual place of their residence. An Englishman, marrying in Turkey, contracts a marriage of an English kind, that is, excluding plurality of wives, because he is an Englishman, and only residing in Turkey and under the Mahometan law accidentally and temporarily, and because he marries with a view of being a married man and having a wife in England, and for English purposes; consequently the incidents and effects, nay, the very nature and essence (to use the language of the Appellant's argument) must be ascertained by the English, and not by the Turkish law. So of an Englishman marrying in Prussia, where incompatible temper, that is, disagreement, may dissolve the contract; as he marries with a view to English domicile, his contract will be judged by English law, and he cannot apply for a divorce here upon the ground of incompatible tempers. In [536] like manner a domiciled Scotchman may be said to contract not an English but a Scotch marriage, though the consent wherein it consists may be testified by English solemnities."

(1) See as to this passage an article on "Non-Christian Marriage" by Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick in Jour. Soc. Comp. Leg., N.S., No. V, p. 374.

Case No. 6.—Harvey v. Fernie. 6 P.D. 35 (C.A.).

The question in this case was whether a divorce granted by a Scottish court when the parties were domiciled in Scotland in respect of a marriage celebrated in England on a ground not recognised as a valid ground for divorce by an English court would be recognised in England.

Counsel for the appellant (arguing that the divorce would not be recognised in England) was contending that the status created by the marriage contract is governed by the lex loci contractus not the lex domicilii and (on p. 40) supports this contention by the argument that if this were not so a marriage entered into in England by a domiciled Turk must be regarded as a polygamous marriage.

James, L.J. (p. 46): "All the rights and consequences arising from the marriage are to be determined by the law of that which by the actual contract of marriage becomes the domicile of both parties, exactly to the same extent as if they had both been originally of the foreign country."

Cotton, L.J. (p. 47): "The word 'marriage' is used in two senses. It may mean the solemnity by which two persons are joined together in wedlock, or it may mean their status when they have been so joined. The solemnity . . . must depend upon the law of the country where that solemnity takes place. When the marriage takes place in a country which is not the country of the domicile, the country of the domicile will hold the persons as duly married if they have followed the forms required by the country where it is solemnised. Of course I am speaking only of Christian countries and that gets rid of what was put to us by (Counsel for the appellant) that we have to consider what would be the consequence of dealing with the law of the domicile supposing it to be Turkish" (and he goes on to say), that the status is governed by the law of the domicile, that divorce is not an incident of the contract governed by the lex loci contractus; divorce is an incident of the status.

Lush, L.J. (p. 53): "There is no analogy whatever between the union of a man and a woman in a country where polygamy is allowed, and the union of a man and a woman in a Christian country. Marriage in the contemplation of every Christian community is the union of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others. No such provision is made, no such relation is created in a country where polygamy is allowed, and if one of the numerous wives of a Mahometan was to come to this country and marry in the country, she could not be indicted for bigamy, because our laws do not recognise a marriage solemnised in that country, a union falsely called marriage, as a marriage to be recognised in our Christian country."

This decision was affirmed by the House of Lords on appeal, 8 A.C. 43.

Case No. 7.—R. v. The Superintendent Registrar of Marriages, Hammersmith; ex parte Ma-Anwaruddin. 1917, 1 K.B. 634.

M-A was a native of and domiciled in the province of Madras in India. He was a Mahometan and under the law of India was subject in matters of personal status to Mahometan law. In March 1913 he contracted in England a civil marriage with R.P.H. She deserted him and in December 1913 M-A obtained in the City Civil Court at Madras a decree of restitution of conjugal rights against R.P.H., which was served on her, but she refused to obey the decree.

In August 1915 M-A made a declaration of divorce against R.P.H. This declaration was drawn up and signed in England. It was based on the desertion of R.P.H. and her failure to obey the decree of the Madras Civil Court. This declaration was a valid dissolution of the marriage under Mahometan law, which applied to M-A under the law of India. Under Mahometan law a husband can divorce his wife by a declaration of divorce by a mere declaration of his will and pleasure. M-A could not obtain a divorce from R.P.H. from the courts of India because the courts only had jurisdiction to dissolve the marriages of Christians. Under Mahometan law a man may have four wives.

M-A presented a petition to the Divorce Division of the High Court in England praying (1) for a declaration that his marriage had been dissolved, or alternatively (2) for a decree of dissolution of his marriage with R.P.H.

His petition was dismissed by Bargrave Deane, J., on the ground that the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain it because M-A was not domiciled in England.

Bargrave Deane, J., stated in his judgment that he thought that the marriage with R.P.H. had in fact been dissolved and that there was no marriage subsisting.

In August 1916 M-A applied to the Superintendent Registrar of Hammersmith for a licence to marry V.L.L. and upon his application being refused, he obtained from the Divisional Court a rule nisi directed to the Superintendent Registrar, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding him to issue a certificate and licence for the marriage with V.L.L.

The Solicitor-General appeared to show cause against the issue of the writ, and argued (inter alia):—

- (I) That an English marriage could not be dissolved by a "declaration of divorce" under Mahometan law; only a Mahometan marriage could be so dissolved.
- (II) An English marriage could only be dissolved by a decree of an English court or a court of the husband's domicile.
- (III) A Mahometan marriage being polygamous was not a marriage recognised by English law.

M-A (appearing in person) argued inter alia that the decision in Ganer v. Lady Lanesborough, 1790, 1 Peake 25, showed that a decree of a court was not essential for the dissolution of a marriage.

Held by Lord Reading, C.J.:

(I) The marriage with R.P.H. was a valid marriage. M-A could not set up the law of his domicile (Mahometan law), which permitted him to have four wives as rendering invalid a monogamous marriage contracted by him in England (Chetti v. Chetti).

(II) The status of marriage is conferred by entering into a contract of marriage; M-A by entering into the marriage in England celebrated in accordance with the law of England had acquired the status of a party to a marriage as understood in English law (viz. a monogamous marriage).

(III) R.P.H. acquired by the marriage the domicile of M-A, and consequently became subject to the law of his domicile in respect of the consequence of the marriage relation (Harvey v. Fernie) and the marriage could (prima facie) be dissolved in accordance with the law of M-A's domicile and for a cause which would not support a petition for divorce in England.

(IV) Mahometan law was the personal law of M-A, but it was a religious law and not the general law applicable to all who are domiciled in India, but only to Mahometans. R.P.H. acquired by the marriage the domicile of M-A in India, but she did not acquire his religion or become subject to Mahometan law, except in so far as it was the law of his domicile, and then to that extent only.

(V) There was no dissolution of this marriage by the courts of India, but only a dissolution by the mere operation of the laws of the religion of the husband and without a decree of a court of law.

There was no authority for the view that an English marriage could be dissolved in this way.

(N.B.—It is difficult to see whether Lord Reading based his view upon (1) the absence of a decree of a court, or (2) the fact that the dissolution was one according to the law of M-A's religion only, which did not apply in India to all persons domiciled there. The manner, however, in which he carefully reserved his view as to whether the marriage would have been dissolved even if a court in India had made a decree if such a decree had been based upon the husband's right to pronounce a declaration of divorce rather indicates that he considered (2) and not (1) the more important.)

Darling, J.:

(1) A Mahometan polygamous marriage is an institution differing widely in character from an English monogamous marriage. They are not the same institutions (Hyde v. Hyde).

(2) A person who was already a party to a polygamous marriage and then came to England and contracted a monogamous marriage could not be indicted for bigamy. The first union would not be regarded as a marriage (Harvey v. Fernie). The nature of the marriage into which M-A and R.P.H. entered is determined by the lex loci contractus (English law). It was a monogamous marriage.

(3) M-A's marriage with R.P.H. was one to which a declaration of divorce under Mahometan law had no application.

Bray, J.:

The authorities (Harvey v. Fernie) show that the English courts will recognise the decree of a court of the domicile even if given on grounds which would not support a decree in England. They do not decide that the courts will act upon the law of the domicile in the absence of a decree. There has been no decree here.

On appeal to the Court of Appeal, it was held by Swinfen Gady, L.J.:

- (1) M-A contracted a monogamous (Christian) marriage with R.P.H.
- (2) A Mahometan polygamous marriage is something quite different—a different status (Warrender v. Warrender, Harvey v. Fernie).
- (3) The marriage with R.P.H. has not been dissolved by a court of competent jurisdiction, and it was not a marriage in the Mahometan sense which can be dissolved in the Mahometan manner.

(N.B.—He also quotes Lord Brougham in Warrender v. Warrender:—

"Indeed, another consequence would follow from this doctrine of confounding with the nature of the contract that which is only a matter touching the jurisdiction of the courts and their power of dealing with the rights and duties of the parties to it: if there were a country in which marriage could be dissolved without any judicial proceedings at all merely by the parties agreeing in pais to separate, every other country ought to sanction a separation in pais there and uphold a second marriage contracted after such separation. It may be safely asserted that so absurd a proposition never could for a moment be entertained," which indicates that he thought that a divorce by "agreement in pais to separate" would not be recognised in this country.)

Banks, L.J.:

- (1) A Christian marriage is a different institution from a Mahometan marriage.
- (2) A Christian marriage cannot be dissolved by a Mahometan divorce.
- (3) A Christian marriage cannot be dissolved by an "agreement in pais to separate," even if that is recognised by law of domicile.

Case No. 8.—Nachimson v. Nachimson. 1930, P. 85 (Hill, J.) and 217 (C.A.), 46 T.L.R. 166 and 444.

This was a petition for judicial separation, on the ground of cruelty, brought by the female petitioner, I.N., against the male respondent, G.M.N. The parties had, on the 19th March, 1924, been through the formalities required by the laws of the U.S.S.R. for a marriage at the Moscow Provincial Registration Office, Krasno Presna Section, Moscow—their domicile at that time being Russian. The parties subsequently cohabited in Sweden and in England, where a child was born to them. The present petition was filed on the 9th March, 1929. The respondent alleged that the marriage had been dissolved on the 29th January, 1929, according to the laws of the U.S.S.R. by an ex parte registration of dissolution, at the instance of the respondent, at the consulate-general of the U.S.S.R. in Paris (there being at that time no Soviet consulate in London), and appeared under protest.

On the 11th November, 1929, an order was made for the trial of the following questions before the hearing of the petition:—

- (1) Have the respondent and petitioner ever been man and wife?
- (2) If yea: (a) Were the parties domiciled in the U.S.S.R. on the 29th January, 1929?
- (b) Was their marriage dissolved on that day?

The evidence of several experts in Russian law was given on the points of Russian law arising out of these questions. These experts were unanimous on the question of the nature of the union between the parties created by the marriage in Moscow, namely, that it was a union presumably for life, between a man and a woman, and continued until dissolved, and that neither party could marry another person during the subsistence of the marriage; and in holding that, under the law of the U.S.S.R., such a marriage could be terminated at any time by mutual consent or the unilateral desire of one party, if the appropriate proceedings were gone through—which consisted merely in registration at the appropriate office. Their evidence was conflicting on the question whether, in this case, the registration of dissolution at the consulate-general in Paris was effective under that law to dissolve the marriage—the difference relating to the jurisdiction of the consulate-general in respect of these parties.

Both parties contended that the nature of the union between them created such a relationship of husband and wife as to give the court jurisdiction. The respondent contended—

- (a) That the matrimonial domicile was Russian.
- (b) That the dissolution by registration in Paris was a valid dissolution under the laws of the U.S.S.R., and the English courts recognised any dissolution of a marriage of parties domiciled abroad which was recognised by the lex domicilii.
- (c) Alternatively, if the parties were not domiciled in the U.S.S.R., the provision of the lex loci contractus that the marriage could be terminated unilaterally or by common consent was one attached to the contract of marriage, and a dissolution in accordance with it must be recognised by the law of the domicile.

The petitioner contended—

- (a) That the parties were now domiciled in England, and that the marriage could only be dissolved by the English courts in the manner and on the grounds recognised in English law;
- (b) That the question whether and in what manner a marriage could be dissolved was an incident to the marriage, and was not one which affected the nature of the contract; the provisions of the lex loci contractus on this point were immaterial.

And, alternatively, assuming a Russian domicile—

- (c) The English courts would not recognise a dissolution (i) which was not the judgment of a court, or (ii) pronounced elsewhere than the country of domicile; and
- (d) In any case, the registration in Paris was not a valid dissolution of the marriage according to the laws of the U.S.S.R.

Held by Hill, J.:

- (1) That, though neither party desired it, it was necessary for the court ex officio to decide the first question first of all—as, if there was no marriage, the court had no jurisdiction over the matter alleged in the petition. The question was whether the parties were "husband" and "wife" and there was a "marriage" within the meaning of these terms in section 21 of the Judicature Act, 1925, from which the jurisdiction of the High Court in matrimonial causes and matters was derived.

(2) That it was therefore necessary to determine what was the nature of the union by the lex loci contractus (U.S.S.R.), and ascertain whether such union was of such a kind that it was a "marriage" in respect of which the court had jurisdiction to grant relief in a matrimonial cause.

(3) That, in order to give the court jurisdiction, the marriage must be the (a) voluntary (b) union for life (c) of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others (Hyde v. Hyde, L.R. 1 P. and M. 130).

(4) That a marriage contracted in the U.S.S.R. was a union which the parties or one party could dissolve at will by complying with the forms prescribed by law.

Though the requirement of English law that the marriage must be "for life," does not exclude unions dissoluble by Act of State, but only means indissoluble by the acts of the parties during life, that requirement was not fulfilled by a marriage under which the parties were bound to one another until death or until one (or both) desired a dissolution and procured a ministerial Act of State, which gives legal force to the desire; and, in consequence, a marriage contracted under the laws of the U.S.S.R. was not a "marriage" within the meaning attached to that word in the Statute from which the court derived its jurisdiction, and there was no jurisdiction to give the relief prayed for in this case.

Note on p. 96.—The learned Judge said: "There can be no question but that a marriage which permits polygamy is not a 'marriage' at all within the meaning of English law even as regards the first wife."

On appeal by the petitioner against the judgment of Hill, J., the Court of Appeal (Lord Hanworth, M.R., Lawrence, L.J. and Romer, L.J.), unanimously reversed his decision.

The C.A. agreed with the judgment of Hill, J., on the points summarised above under the numbers (1), (2) and (3), but differed from him with regard to (4), and held that:—

(1) The dissolubility or indissolubility of the marriage and the conditions under which it could be dissolved is a question relating to the rights of the parties under, or flowing from, the marriage and is a matter which was an incident of and not part of the essence of the contract of marriage; these conditions are not conditions incorporated in and forming part of the marriage contract under the lex loci contractus of the marriage, but are conditions of defeasance governed by the law of the domicile of the spouses and not dependent on any agreement between them or capable of being altered by the parties (following on this point the dicta of Lord Brougham in Warrender v. Warrender).⁽²⁾

(2) Consequently in determining whether there was a marriage within the meaning of section 21 of the Judicature Act, 1925, so as to give the Court jurisdiction to entertain a petition for judicial separation and in ascertaining the essential nature of the union under the lex loci contractus for this purpose, the conditions under which marriages could be dissolved under the lex loci contractus of this marriage were immaterial, since they did not form part of the essence of the matter and it is the law of the matrimonial domicile of the parties and not the lex loci contractus which governs all questions relating to the dissolution of the marriage.

(3) That in considering, by reference to the lex loci contractus, whether the essential nature of the union so contracted fulfilled the conditions necessary to give the Court jurisdiction and applying for this purpose the requirements of the definition of Lord Penzance in Hyde v. Hyde (see point No. 3 above) and in dealing with the requirement (b) that it should be a "union for life," the test was whether the union was or was not one of limited duration and, if it was of unlimited duration, and continued for life, unless dissolved in accordance with the law of the domicile of the spouses, it satisfied the condition of this requirement and was a "union for life."

(4) Upon the evidence of the experts, it was not possible under the law of the U.S.S.R. for parties by agreement to make provisions relating to the duration of the marriage or relating to the conditions under which it could be dissolved, and marriage in Russia were of unlimited duration and continued for life unless dissolved.

(5) Consequently a marriage celebrated in the territory of the U.S.S.R. in accordance with the law in force in that territory in 1924 was a marriage within the meaning of that term in section 21 of the Judicature Act, 1925, and fulfilled the requirements necessary for the matrimonial jurisdiction of the English courts to be invoked by the parties to it.

Case No. 9.—R. v. Naquib. 1917, 1 K.B. 359 (C.C.A.).

N, who was an Egyptian by birth and Mahometan by religion, went through a Mahometan form of marriage in Egypt with X in 1898. In January 1903 N went through a form of marriage in England with A.W., his marriage with X still subsisting.

In 1913 N divorced X by a Mahometan divorce. In 1914 N married T.J.S. in England, A.W. being still alive and his marriage with her not having been annulled or dissolved.

N was indicted for bigamy. It was contended on behalf of N that the marriage with A.W. in 1903 was void by reason of the prior marriage with X, and in 1914 when he married T.J.S. he was not married to any person.

⁽²⁾ 2 Cl. and F. 488 at p. 532.

No evidence of the validity of the marriage with X under the laws of Egypt was given, but Avory, J., held: (1) That it was incumbent upon the defence to produce such evidence if they relied upon a foreign marriage, and that, as the defence had failed to do so, the court could take no account of it, and (2) even if the marriage in Egypt with X was valid by Egyptian law, it was a polygamous marriage; a polygamous marriage was a different thing from a monogamous marriage and will not be regarded in England as a marriage, and therefore it was no bar to the marriage with A.W., which was a valid marriage. N was convicted.

On appeal to the C.C.A. the conviction was affirmed; the C.C.A. expressed no opinion on second ground on which conviction was based, but held the first ground to be a good one and dismissed the appeal.

Case No. 10.—Chetti v. Chetti. 1909, p. 67.

The petitioner, an Englishwoman, married the respondent, a Hindu domiciled in India, at a London registry office in 1890. The respondent returned to India shortly after the marriage and petitioner sought a decree of judicial separation on the ground of desertion.

The respondent contended (1) that the marriage was null and void on the ground that by his personal law (the law applicable to him in India, the country of his domicile) he was incapable of marrying anyone outside his own caste or who was not a Hindu. (2) That under his personal law he might take more than one wife; consequently his marriage with the petitioner was not a monogamous marriage and not within the matrimonial jurisdiction of the court, or, alternatively, that by his personal law he was incapable of contracting anything except a polygamous marriage.

Held by Sir G. Barnes, P.:

(1) That the incapacity under the law of his domicile alleged by respondent to marry the petitioner was not a general incapacity resting on all persons domiciled in India, but a religious incapacity, which did not differ in principle from the incapacity of a priest under the law of some Catholic countries. It was an incapacity he could get rid of by changing his religion.

(2) That even if (a point on which the president declared he was not satisfied on the evidence) the marriage would be regarded as invalid in the courts of India, on ground of incapacity on the part of the respondent, the English courts could not recognise such incapacity as invalidating the marriage celebrated in England.

N.B.—The president stated in his judgment that the present case did not affect the question of the recognition outside India of Hindu marriages entered into in India.

Case No. 11.—In re Ullee. 53 L.T.N.S., 711 Chitty, J., and 54 L.T.N.S. 286 C.A.

Ullee, the Nawab Nazim of Bengal, went through a ceremony of marriage with an Englishwoman (the applicant in this case) in London according to the rights of the Mahometan religion, which Ullee professed, in May 1870. Of this marriage four children were born. In 1875 Ullee made a declaration before the Lord Mayor of London avowing the marriage, recognising the children as his and making them his heirs according to Mahometan law, and at the same time a deed was entered into between the applicant and Ullee providing that Ullee should have sole control over these children in the matter of their education. In 1880 he went through a similar ceremony in England with another Englishwoman, and the applicant left him. He had also in India, prior to 1870, at least one other wife, with children. After the applicant left him he retained her four children and sent them to India, and a little later returned himself to India, where he died in 1884. He left a will appointing two persons as guardians of these children.

At the time of the application two of the children had been brought by their guardians to England for the purposes of their education. The applicant claimed the custody of these children from the guardians on the ground that there had been no valid marriage between the parties and they were illegitimate, and that consequently the right of custody was vested in her as their mother. On behalf of the respondents it was argued that the children were legitimate since their father was of Indian domicile and the law of his domicile was Moslem law, and consequently the rights of custody were vested in the father, and he could appoint guardians by will. Alternatively, they relied upon the terms of the deed and pleaded that the court, in the exercise of its discretion, should confirm their guardianship in the interests of the children. As regards the deed, the applicant pleaded that a mother was unable to dispose of the rights of custody over her children by deed, since it was contrary to public policy.

Chitty, J., found for the respondents, but he did so on the ground that, even if the children were to be assumed to be illegitimate, the court could have regard to the rights of the putative father, and could exercise its discretion in accordance with the interests of the children, and he held that the guardianship of the respondents was in the interests of the children, and this decision on the ground of discretion was upheld by the Court of Appeal.

Chitty, J., did not decide the question whether the children must or must not be regarded as illegitimate, but he made certain observations upon this question. He referred to the fact that at the time of the marriage Ullee was already married and the marriage was polygamous and intended to be so, and he referred to the case of Hyde v. Hyde, and said that such a polygamous marriage could not be regarded as a marriage in the sense that the term is used in English law, and, even if binding on the husband in Mahometan law, it could not be binding on any spouse of English domicile. But he then quoted the passage in the judgment of Lord Penzance in Hyde v. Hyde, in which Lord Penzance said that, in refusing to treat a polygamous marriage as a marriage for the purposes of the matrimonial jurisdiction of the English courts, he was in no way to be taken as deciding in any question with regard to the rights of succession or legitimacy of the wives and children of such marriages; the question of their status according to English law was left open. Chitty, J., said, with reference to the applicant and her children: "I am by no means satisfied that, according to the principles of international law as now understood, I ought to hold the infants now in question to be illegitimate," but, for the reasons given above, he found it unnecessary to decide the question.

Case No. 12.—In the Estate of Abdul Majid Belshah, Deceased.

(The "Times" newspaper, December 16 and 18, 1926, January 14 and 18, 1927.)

NOTE.—(In the report of the "Times," the deceased is described as being domiciled in England. It has been ascertained that this is an error and that the deceased was admitted on the pleadings to be domiciled in Bagdad.)

The deceased, Abdul Majid Belshah, was a person of Mahometan religion domiciled in Bagdad. According to the law of his domicile (i.e., Mahometan law) he was capable of marrying more than one wife. For some fifteen or more years before his death he had been resident in England and engaged as a teacher of Eastern languages. In 1905 in England he went through a ceremony of marriage according to Mahometan law with an English woman, described in the proceedings as Violet Annie Majid, and by her he had two children. Later, in 1920 (or alternatively in 1922) he went through a ceremony of marriage in England according to Mahometan law with another English woman, described in the action as Kate Elizabeth Belshah, by whom he had also two children. In 1923 he died intestate. Claims to his estate were made in the Probate Division of the High Court by these two women and their respective children, in which each of them denied the right of the other to succeed to any of the estate. However, during the hearing the two parties came to an agreement, and the proceedings were terminated on the terms of an agreed settlement, which was made an Order of the Court. Under this settlement both parties recognise the validity of both the marriages according to Mahometan law and the legitimacy of the four children, and the solicitors to the two parties were appointed administrators ad colligenda bona.

Case No. 13.—Connolly v. Woolrich and Johnson.

The report of this case is extremely long (sixty-eight closely printed pages). In the summary which I give here only those points which appear to be most relevant to the matters now under consideration are given, and for the purposes of a short summary it has been necessary to take the various points relied upon in the judgment in somewhat different order from that in which they appear in the report.

Connolly v. Woolrich and Johnson.

"Lower Canada Jurist," Vol. XI, 197 (1867).

(Decision of Monk, J., in Superior Court of Lower Canada.)

W. Connolly, a R.C. born in Lower Canada, which was his original domicile, in 1786, went to the North-West Territories when 16 years of age and resided there for thirty years at different posts of the North-West Company.

In 1803, in the Athabasca country in the North-West Territories, at the age of 17 years, he took to live with him as his squaw or Indian wife, an Indian girl called "Suzanne Pas de Nom," the daughter of an Indian Chief, with the consent of her father, and lived with her as his wife, according to the usages and customs of the Cree tribe to which she belonged. They were faithful to one another for twenty-eight years and had six children. They both came to Lower Canada in 1831 and remained there, living as husband and wife, for a short period, Suzanne being called Mrs. Connolly and introduced as his wife to the principal people of the locality.

In 1832 Connolly left Suzanne and married according to the rites of the Roman Catholic Church Julia Woolrich, his second cousin (under a dispensation from the Bishop), and lived in Lower Canada with Julia as his wife till 1849 when he died. He had two children by her.

In 1848 he made a will, bequeathing all his property to Julia and her two children. The validity of the disposition of the whole of the property by will was disputed by the Plaintiff, one of Connolly's children by Suzanne, on the ground—

- (1) That Connolly and Suzanne were validly married and Suzanne was his lawful wife at the time of his death.
- (2) That the law of the domicile of Connolly was the law of Lower Canada, and under that law (in the absence of contract) the régime of community of goods was created between Connolly and his wife Suzanne Connolly, and under this régime Suzanne Connolly at the time of Connolly's death was entitled to one half of his property and Connolly could only dispose by will of one half.

1933

- (3) That the Plaintiff (Suzanne Connolly being now dead) was entitled to one-sixth of of his mother's half share and the Plaintiff claimed an account for that purpose from the Defendant who was then in possession of the whole property.

The Defendant (Julia being dead at the time of the institution of the action) was the Executor under Julia's will, and he contended inter alia (1) that the alleged marriage of Connolly to Suzanne was a nullity and that Julia was the only lawful wife of Connolly on the grounds that the union of Connolly and Suzanne was not one which could be recognised as a valid marriage; since it was a union which was only concubinage, or alternatively was one which, if governed by any law or custom at all, was governed by the customs of the Cree Indians which permitted polygamy and divorce at will by repudiation.^(*) (2) Alternatively to (1), that the union was one governed by the law of the Cree Indians (a) which permitted divorce at will, and Connolly had in this way divorced Suzanne before he married Julia; (b) which did not recognise the system of community of goods.

In considering the law applicable to this case Monk, J., said that there were two principles to be applied: (1) that the law to be applied to determine whether a marriage had taken place was the law of the place where the marriage was contracted, and (2) that assuming that by the application of (1) it was found that a valid marriage had been contracted the law which must be applied to determine the rights, powers and capacities of the parties to the marriage was not the law of the country in which the marriage was celebrated, but the law of the husband's domicile, and that there was a distinction to be drawn between these two matters. In support of his views with regard to the principles to be applied, he cited the passage which is quoted below from Burge's Colonial and Foreign Laws (p. 261):—

"It ought always to be remembered that the question, whether the status has been constituted by means of a legal marriage, is perfectly distinct from the consideration of the rights, powers and capacities which the status confers.

"The enquiry whether the status has been constituted is answered by the law of the country in which the marriage was contracted.

"If by marriage, which, according to that law, is valid, the status is constituted, the connexion of the parties with the law of that country ceases, unless that place be the domicile of the husband; and then its law governs, not because the marriage was celebrated there, but because it is the country of the husband's domicile. The parties, if they do not, by any express agreement on their marriage, stipulate as to their future rights and capacities, are presumed to submit to them as they have been defined by some municipal law; and the law which, it is presumed, they contemplate is not that of a country in which they have no intention to reside, and to which, therefore, their status cannot be subject, but that of the country in which, as it is the place of their domicile, their rights and capacities are to be exercised.

"Jurists, therefore, concur in selecting the law of the domicile of the husband and wife as that which determines the personal powers and capacities incident to their status, and not the law of the place in which the marriage was celebrated." Burge, Colonial and Foreign Laws, vol. I, p. 245; 5, 14.

Monk, J., held that the law of the domicile of Connolly was the law of Lower Canada. Connolly had acquired a domicile of origin in Lower Canada, and had never lost it during his long residence in the North-West Territories because he had always had the animus revertendi. (Alternatively, if Connolly had lost his domicile of origin and acquired a domicile in the North-West Territories, he had again acquired his domicile in Lower Canada on his return in 1831).

In regard to the lex loci actus, the alleged marriage took place on the Rat River in the Athabasca country, in what was then called the North-West Territories. The Athabasca country was at that time an undeveloped country inhabited mostly by Indians, with settlements and trading posts scattered here and there, and the learned judge held that the principles which he had to apply to determine what was the law of that country were the following:—

- (1) In the case of a colony, plantation or settlement of a European country in savage territories the law of the parent (or settler) State then in being became immediately and ipso facto in force in these new settlements, and the discoverers and first inhabitants of these places carried with them as their inalienable birthright the laws of their own country, but only took with them so much of these laws as were applicable to the conditions of an infant colony.
- (2) The laws and usages of the native tribes were not abrogated, but left in full force in regard to the civil rights of the natives.

Applying these principles to the Athabasca country, Monk, J., found the facts to be as follows:—

The Athabasca country was situated in a part of Canada which was discovered and developed both by French and British, the British working from Hudson Bay and through the Hudson Bay Company and the French from Lower Canada. The Athabasca country was originally in the French area and belonged to the Crown of France, in the same way as the Hudson Bay Company's area belonged to the British Crown. In 1770 the Hudson Bay Company were granted a charter by Charles II, and this charter made English law applicable within the territory of the company to all persons belonging to the company or living under it, but Monk, J., held on various grounds that the Athabasca was not covered by this charter (inter alia on the ground that it was then belonging to the French Crown and the charter excluded territory possessed by any other Christian Power or State). In the alternative, if he was wrong on this point and it was the Hudson Bay Company's area, English law was only made applicable to the persons under the company, and the Indians remained subject to their own law and customs. The position, therefore, was that the two systems of law existed side by side in the Athabasca territory, that is to say, (a) French (or, in the alternative, English) law applicable to the white settlers and (b) the Indian customs applicable to the Indians. In 1763, on the cession of the French possessions on the continent of North America, the North-West Territories came under the British Crown, but English law was not introduced into the territories ceded by France, and the laws of the Indians and the French settlers remained as they were. The possible lex loci actus, therefore, in this case were French law applicable to the settlers, and therefore to Connolly, and the native Indian law applicable to the Indians.⁽⁴⁾

(*) The evidence was that polygamy was in fact rarely practised by the Northern American Indians and was practically confined to powerful Chiefs, and that it was not practised by the white men who frequently married Indian women according to the local Indian customs and treated their Indian squaws as wives whom they had married for life.

The marriage in question, therefore, was one which was contracted by Connolly, a white settler (subject to French law), and an Indian woman, Suzanne, subject to Indian law and custom, according to the customs of the Indians, and the question was whether this marriage, celebrated according to Indian law and custom, could in these circumstances be recognised as valid by the application of the general rule that a marriage celebrated in any country in accordance with the forms and laws of that country must be recognised elsewhere as a ceremony capable of creating the status of marriage. The objections raised to the recognition of this marriage were:—

- (1) The difference in race and religion of the parties.
- (2) That the Cree Indian law and custom could not be recognised as a law at all.
- (3) That a union under the Cree law and custom could not be recognised as creating the status of marriage owing to the fact that under it divorce by repudiation at will, and polygamy were permitted.

Monk, J., overruled No. (1) on the ground that the differences of religion and race and the fact of one party being a Christian and the other a pagan could not materially, if at all, affect the question. He overruled No. (2) on the ground that the Crown, as the supreme authority in the Empire, had by not abolishing or altering the Indian law and custom and by allowing it to exist for 100 years, impliedly sanctioned it, and that the sovereign power in these matters having by proclamation acknowledged the law and usages of the Indians to be in force the Court must, so long as they were in force in any part of the British Empire or elsewhere, acknowledge and enforce them, and consequently the Indian custom or usage was, as regards the jurisdiction of the Court, a foreign law of marriage which must be recognised as such. With regard to (3) (the objection based on the right of repudiation and on polygamy) Monk, J., said that there seemed to be two questions: (a) whether a union under the Cree Indian law could be considered to be a marriage at all, and (b) whether, if so, the existence of the right of repudiation and polygamy afforded any ground for making an exception to the general rule that all marriages celebrated in a foreign country under the law of that country must be recognised. As to what must be regarded as a marriage, he cited the early Canon Law which recognised as marriages all unions where consent existed followed by co-habitation (per verba de presenti). This law prevailed generally over Europe until the Council of Trent. The Council of Trent introduced a new requirement, the presence of a priest, but this requirement did not apply until the declaration had been published in the parish, and did not apply in places where circumstances rendered its fulfilment impossible. Turning then to the Common Law of England, Monk, J., held that a marriage per verba de presenti was a good marriage by English Common Law, and said with regard to the decision of the House of Lords in Rex v. Millis, which laid down that the presence of a minister episcopally ordained was necessary, that even if this decision was correct (which he thought it was not) and even if it were binding on him (which he thought it was not on the ground that the Law Lords were equally divided) still that decision did not lay down a rule of English Common law which was applicable outside the United Kingdom or in places where it was virtually impossible to fulfil this requirement. There were no ministers or priests or magistrates in the Athabasca country and the intention of Connolly to make Suzanne his wife was held to be clearly proved. On these grounds he held that the marriage according to the Cree Indian law did constitute a status which must be recognised as a marriage and could not be disregarded and treated as a nullity.

He then turned to the second question, (b), and said that this question was whether there was any authority for treating marriages celebrated in countries and under laws where the right of repudiation and polygamy were permitted as exceptions to the general rule. He said that he was unable to find any authority of sufficient weight in support of such an exception, and cited large numbers of authorities, but only one of them, and that a French author, Merlin, deals specifically with polygamous marriages:—

"I do not find in any of these authorities the distinction here contended for, and what the law does not distinguish I will not. And here it may be proper that I should refer more particularly than I have heretofore done to one noticeable incident in these Indian marriages, and that is polygamy. It was contended that this imports to this connexion in an especial manner its invalid character and renders it unworthy of recognition as a legal marriage by this Court, excluding it from the operation of the general rule so clearly enunciated and laid down in authorities which I have just cited. But it is obvious and must be conceded at once that this is an incidental and not an essential element in the law or custom of marriage known among those aboriginal tribes. It is an abuse but not a condition of or an essential ingredient in these barbarian obligations of matrimony. If proved at all in this case it is manifestly established as the exception and not the rule; and in regard to marriages between Christians and natives it is not proved to be the custom."

(4) See footnote at the end of the case. Monk, J., also considered the position in the alternative on the footing that he was wrong in his findings above, and that the laws applicable were either English law and Indian custom or English Common Law alone to the exclusion of all Indian custom.

On these grounds the judge held that the marriage must be recognised.

Dealing next with the second contention of the Defendant, that if this was a marriage according to the law and custom of the Cree Indians that law and custom permitted divorce by repudiation, and Connolly had exercised this right, Monk, J., held (referring here again to this distinction between the law which decides whether the status of marriage has been constituted and the law which decides the rights and powers and capacities which the status of marriage confers) that the right of repudiation or divorce came within the latter category and was governed by the law of the domicile of the husband. The law of the domicile of Connolly being the law of Lower Canada, and that law not recognising divorce by repudiation, Connolly was unable to terminate his marriage in this way.

On these grounds, therefore, Connolly's marriage with Suzanne was held to be good and the second marriage with Julia Woolrich a nullity.

Dealing finally with the third contention of the Defendant, that the marriage being governed by Cree Indian law that law did not recognise any system of community of goods between husband and wife, Monk, J., held that the system of the proprietary rights between husband and wife was a matter which was governed by the law of the domicile as being one of the rights, powers and capacities conferred by the status of marriage, and on this ground the proprietary rights of Connolly and Suzanne under their marriage were governed by the law of Lower Canada, which did recognise the system of community of goods, and on this ground he gave judgment for the Plaintiff.

Note 1.—The case was decided on the footing that in the Athabasca country at the relevant time the two possible laws applicable as the lex loci were French law and Indian law, but the view which Monk, J., took that this marriage would have been a good marriage at English Common Law if that law alone applied would have rendered the decision the same on this hypothesis.

Note 2.—It will be seen from the above summary that the decision is partly based upon the distinction between the ceremony which is governed by the lex loci actus, the law to be applied to see whether the status of marriage is created, and the rights, powers and capacities of the parties, assuming the status to be created under (1) above, which are governed by the law of the domicile. In determining the question whether the status was created, Monk, J., rejected the contention that the fact that under the lex loci actus polygamy was permitted prevented the court from recognising the ceremony in accordance with the lex loci as creating the status of marriage, and then went on to hold that the question of divorce fell into the second category and was one which was decided by the law of the matrimonial domicile and not by the lex loci actus. So far as the point raised by the right of divorce by repudiation at will is concerned the decision of the judge upon this point is in agreement with the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in the Russian case of Natchimson v. Natchimson.

It will be seen also that Monk, J., held that the fact that under the lex loci actus polygamy was permitted did not prevent the court from recognising that the ceremony of marriage had created the status of marriage. There is no decision of the English courts to the same effect on this point. But it is interesting to observe that Monk, J., also treats the question of polygamy (i.e., the right of the husband to take more wives) as a matter which is an incident to the status (being a question of the rights, powers and capacities of the parties to the marriage) which should, therefore, be governed by the law of the matrimonial domicile, and that the application of this principle results in the following conclusion: That if an Englishman governed by English law enters into a Mahometan or other polygamous marriage in a foreign country where such marriages are recognised, he must be regarded as having contracted a marriage, but since by his personal law, the law of the domicile, he is not permitted to be polygamous, the result is that a monogamous marriage has been contracted, but (scilicet) in the contrary case, if an Englishwoman marries in this country a Moslem domiciled in a country where polygamy is permitted, a marriage is created, but it is one which will be governed by the law of the domicile of the husband, namely, Mahometan law.

The first of these propositions seems to be in conflict with the decision of the English courts in the Baralong case, and the second is contrary to the decision of the English courts in the cases of Ex-parte Anwarudin Khan and R. v. Naquib.

Group of Cases No. 14.—Esop v. Union Government. 1913, C.P.R. 133.

E, an Indian Mahometan resident in Cape Colony since 1902, visited India in 1912 and married B.M. there by Mahometan rites, and brought her back to South Africa in 1913. The question was whether B.M. had the right to admission under section 4 (e) of Act No. 30 of 1903 as the "wife" of the applicant.

Held that the marriage between B.M. and E being a polygamous one, B.M. could not be regarded as the "wife" of E within the meaning of the Act, the word "wife" meaning the spouse of a marriage recognised in South Africa and polygamous marriages not being so recognised.

(N.B.—Report does not make it clear where E was domiciled, but presumably in South Africa.)

R. v. Sukina. 1912, T.P.D. 1079.

S was indicted with a contravention of Act No. 15 of 1907, namely, being a prohibited immigrant and entering the Province. It was admitted that she was prima facie a "prohibited immigrant," but it was claimed she was entitled to the benefit of the exception in the Act in favour of "the wife or minor child" of a person who is not a prohibited immigrant as being the wife of H.M., who was not a prohibited immigrant.

H.M. had married S in India in 1895 according to Mahometan rites. This marriage was by the lex loci contractus a polygamous marriage. H.M. had in 1905 at Johannesburg contracted a second Mahometan marriage with one I, whom it was alleged he had since divorced.

Held by Wessels, J. (who was in a minority)—

- (1) The marriage with I in 1905 contracted according to Mahometan rites in the Transvaal was not a valid marriage (if the marriage had been valid the divorce would not be valid).
- (2) The marriage with S being good by the lex loci celebrationis and the domicile of parties at that time was a good marriage, and S came within the exception in the Act.

Held by Bristow and Carlewis, JJ., that the marriage between H.M. and S being a polygamous one, it could not be recognised in South Africa.

See also R. v. Fatima, 1912, T.P.D. 59, another case on the Immigration Act in which Wessels, J. (who took same view as in his dissenting judgment in R. v. Sukina), says he does not distinguish between first and subsequent wives of a polygamous marriage.

Group of Cases No. 15.

In South Africa a wife is (or was at the relevant time) not competent to give evidence in a criminal trial against her husband.

Held in Nalana v. Rex, 1907, T.S. 407, that the second wife of a native, married according to native custom was not his "wife" so as to be debarred from giving evidence against him.

And in Rex v. Mbobo, 1910, T.P. 445, that the first wife (and only wife) of a native, married according to native custom was not debarred as his wife from giving evidence against him.

These cases are based on the view that polygamous marriages cannot be recognised as marriages and there is no distinction to be drawn between first and later wives and it is immaterial whether in fact there is more than one wife.

Case No. 16.—The Estate Canham v. The Master.

In the Supreme Court of South Africa, 1909, 26 S.c. 166.

C, an Englishman, went to Pondoland in 1850. He lived there under Pondo rule (Pondoland being then an independent native State) and married a native woman according to Pondo custom. F.C., son of C, was born of this marriage in 1862 and lived in Pondoland as a Pondo subject till its annexation. While so living there, and prior to the annexation, F.C. married two wives according to the native customs of Pondoland. These two wives and their fourteen children survived him, and the matter came before the court with regard to the rates at which the estate of F.C., which had been left by will to these wives and children, should be taxed for estate duty. If they were to be regarded as wives and children, they were subject to only a very small rate of duty. If they must be regarded as strangers, a high rate of duty was chargeable.

Held: That these marriages were contracted in Pondoland before the annexation, according to the law and custom of that country; both wives and all their children must be recognised as legitimate wives and children, and the lower rates of taxation only were payable.

Case No. 17.—In Kaha v. Ntala. 1910, T.P. 964.

In this case the court, following Nalana v. Rex and Rex v. Mboko, held that a polygamous native marriage must be regarded by the court as no more than an illicit connexion. The children were illegitimate and the father had no rights of guardianship over them; and no action could be entertained for the recovery of a dowry by a husband because it must be regarded as something given in earnest of illicit connexion.

1933

46

GENERAL

Case No. 18.—Williams v. Oates. 27 North Carolina Reports 375. (5 Iredale 535.)

The question was whether the marriage of a divorced woman domiciled in North Carolina, under the law of which she was not free to marry again, celebrated in South Carolina, was valid. Ruffin, C.J., delivering judgment against the validity of the marriage, says that the act of the parties in going to South Carolina to get married was in fraudem legis:—

"Now, if the law of South Carolina allows of such a marriage, and although it is true that generally marriages are to be judged by the lex loci contractus, yet every country must so far respect its own laws and their operation on its own citizens as not to allow them to be evaded by acts in another country purposely committed to defraud them. . . . If a person contracts a marriage here, and, leaving the other party, he goes to Turkey and marries half a dozen wives contrary to the laws of this State, it would be impossible that we could give up our whole policy regulating marriages and inheritances, and allow all those women and children to come in here as wives and heirs, with the only true wife and heirs according to our laws. And it would be yet more clear if two persons were to go from this country to Turkey, merely for the sake of getting married at a place in which polygamy is lawful and then coming back to the place where it is not lawful."

(Then he refers to an English case, dealing with a person domiciled in England who got divorced in Scotland and then married again—the marriage being held void in England though good in Scotland.)

"It was declared invalid on the personal incapacity of one of the parties to contract, when his first wife was living, by the law of England. . . .

"Certainly every country should be disposed to respect the law of another country, but not more than its own. That ought not to be expected. If a Turk with two wives were to come here, we would not refuse to administer to them the justice due to the relations contracted by them at home. But if an American marries at home, where plurality of wives is excluded, and then, contrary to his engagement with that wife, takes another, where a plurality of wives is tolerated, and the first wife claims the benefit of the law of her own country from the courts of her own country, while the second wife claims from the same courts the immunities and rights conceded to her in the law of her original country; these claims are incompatible and one only be granted, and it is easy to see that the obligations arising out of the first contract are to be sustained by the country in which they are assumed and that our courts must hold the second marriage void in our law, which denied the capacity to contract it."

Case No. 19.—Polybere v. Prince. "Beale's Cases on Conflict of Laws," Vol. III, p. 2.

Case deals with status of slavery.

P. 3. "The general doctrine of foreign jurists seems to be that the state of the person, that is, his legal capacity to do or not to do certain acts, is to be determined by the law of his domicile. . . . (Then deals with qualifications to this rule.)

P. 4. "Besides those personal laws determining the state and condition of individuals which are founded on natural relations and qualities and such as are universally recognised among civilised communities, as those of parent and child, those resulting from marriage, from intellectual imbecility and the like, they may [the laws of foreign countries], and in point of fact do, establish distinctions which are not founded in nature, but relate only to the peculiarities of their own social organisation, to their own municipal law, and to the artificial forms of society which are established amongst themselves. Now it is usually admitted that other nations are bound by the jus gentium to admit the validity of all those personal statutes of other communities establishing such distinctions among their members, whether natural or artificial, to a certain extent. Their validity will be admitted, and they will be enforced by the tribunals of other countries, as to acts which are done and rights which are acquired, within the territorial limits of the community where those laws are established.

"If a Turkish or Hindoo husband were travelling in this country with his wife, or temporarily resident here, we should, without hesitation, acknowledge the relation of husband and wife between them, but the legal pre-eminence of the husband as to acts done here would be admitted only to the extent that marital rights are recognised by our laws and not as they are recognised by the law of the domicile."

Case No. 20.—Wall v. Williamson. 8 Alabama 48.

Action on a promissory note given by the defendant to the plaintiff—defence, that the defendant was the wife of the plaintiff and could not be sued by him.

The case turned inter alia on (1) the validity of a marriage between the parties in the year 1831 in the territory of the Choctaw Indians and according to the customs of that tribe, followed by cohabitation till 1839, and (2) the question whether it had been validly terminated. In the interval the territory of the Choctaw Indians had been annexed to the territory of the State of Alabama. Both parties were of Indian extraction from the Choctaw tribe. It was in evidence that by the laws and customs of the Choctaw tribe (a) the husband could dissolve the marriage at will; (b) the husband could take plurality of wives; (c) that the husband had purported to dissolve the marriage.

GENERAL

47

Goldthwaite, J., quoting the general rule from Story that a marriage valid at the place where it is contracted is valid everywhere, and mentions Story's qualification that marriages involving polygamy or incest are an exception, as Christianity is understood to prohibit them, and therefore no Christian country would recognise polygamous or incestuous marriages. (He also quotes Lord Brougham in Warrender v. Warrender.—

"It is important to observe that we regard it (marriage) as a wholly different thing, a different status, from Turkish or other marriages among infidel nations, because we clearly never would recognise the plurality of wives and consequent validity of second marriages, notwithstanding the first, which second marriages the laws of these countries authorise and validate.")

He then says:—

"If this doctrine is to be understood as leading to the conclusion that a court can collaterally enquire into the existence of such a relationship as would, in a direct proceeding, annul a marriage, it is questionable whether it is sustainable. . . .

"A parallel case to a Turkish or other marriage in an infidel country will probably be found among all our savage tribes, but can it be possible that the children must be illegitimate if born of the second or succeeding wife? However the true rule may be, it is immaterial to this case unless it can be shown that when the law tolerates polygamy there can be neither lawful wife nor legitimate children, for here the evidence does not disclose any previous marriage."

He then goes on to find that in 1831 the Choctaw tribal law was in force at the place where the parties lived, and says:—

"The consequence is that, if valid by those customs, it is also recognised by our law."

He further says that:—

"The marriage was dissolved according to Choctaw usages by the abandonment of the husband.

"Whatever may have been the capacity of the husband to abandon his wife and thereby dissolve the marriage if both had become residents of Alabama after the tribe had departed from its limits, it is clear that the same effect must be given to a dissolution of the marriage by the Choctaw law as is given to a marriage by the same law. . . . We conceive that the same effect must be given to this Act as would be given to a lawful decree in a civilised country dissolving the marriage."

On appeal from the decision quoted above the court took the same view on all points relevant to the question under consideration.

Wall v.
Williamson.
11 Alabama 826.

Case No. 21.—Morgan v. McGhee. 24 "Tennessee Reports" 12 and 13. (1884, 5 Humphrey.) (Action of Detinue for Slaves.)

The question was whether the plaintiff was or was not a married woman and thereby possessed no right to sue.

G. Morgan and M. McGhee were married in 1813 according to the usages of the Cherokee tribe of Indians in that part of the territory of the Cherokees which was within the limits of the State of Tennessee. By these usages only a public agreement to live together as husband and wife was necessary, and they so lived as husband and wife.

Held, the marriage should be recognised, as a marriage made and consummated in an Indian nation should be recognised in the same manner as a marriage celebrated in a foreign country.

Case No. 22.—Johnson v. Johnson's Administrator. 30 "Missouri State Reports" 72 (Year 1860).

One of the questions in this case was whether the issue of the deceased Johnson and an Indian woman were to be regarded as the legitimate children of Johnson.

Napton, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The facts were that Col. Johnson was a Government factor at Prairie du Chien in 1812 (at that time a military post in Indian country outside the limits of any State). Whilst there he formed a connexion with an Indian woman, a chief's daughter, with whom he lived several years and had by her three children, whom he brought up and educated as his daughters and introduced into society as such, and they lived in his house till they married, and when he died he left them by will the bulk of his fortune.

1933

In 1822 Col. Johnson moved to the City of St. Louis, and he then left the Indian woman with her tribe and shortly afterwards married the plaintiff in this action. There was no evidence whether the Indian woman was or was not living at the time of this marriage.

P. 85. "There is no doubt that permanency enters into the idea of marriage as understood among all civilised and Christian people, and the proposition stated in the instruction of the land court is undoubtedly well sustained by writers who have discussed the subject of marriage. It may be further conceded that, even by the law of nature, a mere casual commerce between the sexes does not constitute a marriage. But when there is a cohabitation by consent for an indefinite period of time, for the procreation and bringing up of children, that, in a state of nature, would be a marriage, and, in the absence of all civil and religious institutions, may safely be presumed to be, as it is termed by some writers 'a marriage in the sight of God.'" (Selford on Marriage.)

"If permanency is to be regarded as an essential element of marriage by the law of nature, it is clear that all such connexions which have taken place among the various tribes of North American Indians, either between persons of pure Indian blood or between half-breeds or between the white and Indian races, must be regarded as mere illicit intercourse, and the offspring as illegitimate: for it is well established . . . that in most of the tribes, perhaps in all, the understanding of the parties is that the husband may dissolve the contract at his pleasure. . . .

"It is plain that among the savage tribes of this continent marriage is merely a natural contract, and that neither law, custom nor religion has affixed to it any conditions or limitations or forms other than what nature has itself prescribed. It can hardly be said that the power of divorce in one or both of the parties to the contract, at his or her pleasure, is inconsistent with the law of nature.

"It is well settled, as a general proposition, that a marriage valid according to the law or custom of the place where it is contracted is valid everywhere. (Story, 'Conflict of Law,' § 113.) It is equally clear, both upon authority and upon the general principles of public policy and natural equity, that where the legitimacy of children is called in question, especially after their death and a great lapse of time, every reasonable presumption is indulged in favour of legitimacy. . . ."

(Dealing with the separation of Colonel Johnson from the Indian woman), the court said: "It seems to be a right conceded to the husband by the terms of the contract, and its exercise cannot therefore be regarded as inconsistent with it."

Case No. 23.—Lendrum v. Chakravarti. 1929, Scot's "Law Times" Reports, 96.

The pursuer, F.H.L., a girl of 18 years of age and daughter of a Scottish minister of Glasgow, married in a church in Glasgow in 1918 the defender, C, a Hindu domiciled in British India. It was the common intention of the parties that at the end of the war the pursuer should go to India with the defender as his wife where they would reside. In 1919 the defender left for India and settled there. Later in the same year the pursuer followed him and lived with him in India. In 1922 she returned to Scotland in disgust at the conditions of her life in India and remained there till 1924. In 1924 she returned again to the defender, but left him again in 1925 and came back to the United Kingdom. In 1928 she commenced in the Scottish courts the suit for a declarator of the nullity of her marriage with C.

The issue of jurisdiction was decided first and it was held by Lord Morison (Lord Ordinary):

(1) That, although the nullity of the marriage was in issue, a woman, who has gone through a ceremony of marriage with a man and then lives with him on the assumption that she is validly married to him, acquires by her residence with him de facto a domicile in the place where his domicile is.

(2) That C was domiciled in British India and F.H.L. had acquired a domicile in India.

(3) That nevertheless in a suit for a declarator of nullity of marriage the courts of the country in which the marriage was celebrated had jurisdiction as well as the courts of the country of the domicile and consequently the suit was one which the Scottish courts could entertain. (The decision of the House of Lords in the Salvesen case was not cited to the Lord Ordinary, and Lord Mackay, in his judgment on the merits, refers to this case, but thought (a) it was not for him to interfere with the decision of Lord Morison on this point except on very cogent grounds, (b) that the speech of Lord Haldane in Salvesen's case "left open a somewhat narrow platform for the forum loci celebrationis."

On the merits of the case it was contended on behalf of the pursuer (the defender was not represented)—

(1) That the marriage was void because the pursuer had been induced to enter into the marriage by the fraud of C in that he had represented falsely and fraudulently "that he was a Brahmo; that a Brahmo was not a Hindu; that a Brahmo was not allowed by his law to take more than one wife; that a Brahmo, in matters of marriage, was substantially in the position of a Christian, being (a) monogamous, and (b) unitarian; that by a certain Act described as the Brahmo Marriage Act he was entitled to marry the pursuer; and that she would be his proper wedded wife," which representations were false in that (a) C was able to have more than one wife in India if (which it was open to him to do) he reverted to Hinduism, (b) his marriage with the pursuer was not recognised in India.

(2) (a) That C was a person, whose personal law permitted polygamy and in consequence the marriage of 1918 (and any marriage with him wherever and however celebrated) was a polygamous marriage, and (b) that the pursuer was incapable of entering into a polygamous marriage by her personal law and consequently the marriage was void.

(3) That the marriage was void because C was incapable by the law of domicile from contracting a marriage with the pursuer of conferring on her the status of a lawful wife, and/or of contracting, a marriage in the manner, in which this marriage was celebrated, and in order that a marriage should be valid, it must be one which both parties are capable of contracting by their personal law.

(4) That there was no consensus ad idem as the pursuer intended and thought that in entering into this marriage with C she would acquire the legal status of the wife of C in India, but under his personal law C was incapable of contracting a valid marriage with the pursuer and conferring upon her the status of a lawful wife in India.

Held by Lord Mackay:

(1) That the pursuer's first contention must be rejected on the grounds (a) that fraudulent misrepresentation on the part of C was not established, (b) that even if it had been established the misrepresentations would not avoid the marriage since misrepresentations with regard to the social condition, legal condition or means of a party do not constitute a ground for nullity of marriage.

(2) That the pursuer's second contention (i.e., that the marriage celebrated in 1918 was a polygamous marriage and void) must be rejected. He said that this contention would mean "as I understand it, that any person to whom, according to his system of personal law, it may be open, without crime and without religious offence, to take a second wife, is eo facto precluded from entering into any married union, not merely with all Christian persons, but with all persons who live under a system of law where monogamy is enforced. So put, I should think that hundreds and thousands of unions at present regarded as binding would be shaken. It would, I think, be directly in the teeth of the decision in the English Court of Appeal of Rex v. Superintendent Registrar of Marriages, Hammersmith ([1917], 1 K.B. 634)," and he went on: "The true way of looking at the matter appears to me to be this: Although by the law affecting one of the parties to a contract of monogamous marriage he may, without offence to his own system of general law, be entitled to take a second wife, yet if the contracted marriage is his first and if he uses words and so contracts as to leave no doubt that he binds himself towards his spouse to live monogamously, then his taking any second woman to wife, while not rendering him amenable to penal laws in his domicile, is undoubtedly an infringement of the contract of monogamy into which he has entered and of the marital rights of his wife under that contract, and accordingly would afford her a remedy in any competent court where such a breach was recognised as inferring dissolution. There arises at once a dilemma, but a very simple dilemma, to solve. If the contract between these two parties was one which recognised the defender's right to enter into subsequent and co-incident marriages, then it was not a Christian marriage or a monogamous one, and it would offend the law of capacity of the wife. She could not entertain such a contract. If, on the other hand, it clearly limited the parties, by vows of fidelity on each side, to the one and only wife and one and only husband, then it was a monogamous and valid Christian marriage, for there is no juridical difficulty in the concept that a person by such a contract debars himself from some part of the liberties legally allowed to him by his own system of law. Although this was not fully argued out in the Hammersmith case, it appears perfectly certain that it is involved because the court unanimously held that in the case of the marriage of a Mahometan man his first marriage to an English and Christian woman was a valid impediment which justified the Registrar in not issuing the document entitling him to marry a second person; that is to say, they affirmed positively the validity of his first marriage, their eyes being perfectly open to the fact that his personal law permitted him four wives."

(3) The pursuer's third contention must be rejected on the grounds—

That though (a) the Law of Scotland was that the capacity of each party to enter into a marriage was governed by the law of his domicile and, in order that the marriage should be valid, the parties must be capable both by the law of their respective domiciles and by the lex loci celebrationis;^(*)

And though (b) the evidence of the law of India was to the effect that no marriage between a Hindu and any person not a Hindu would be recognised as valid in India whether celebrated in India or elsewhere and C was a Hindu domiciled in India;

Nevertheless (c) this provision of the (Hindu) law of India was not a provision relating to the capacity of a Hindu domiciled in India, but in the nature of a prohibition against mixed marriages of Hindus and was not one whose extra-territorial operation was recognised under private international law.^(*)

^(*) On this point Lord Mackay said the rule (Exception No. 1) in Dicey's Conflict of Laws, 4th edition, p. 708, "The validity of a marriage celebrated in England between persons of whom one has an English and the other a foreign domicile is not affected by any incapacity which though existing under the law of such foreign domicile, does not exist in English law," is not a rule of Scottish law if it is a rule of English law. But quære whether, in view of the fact that it is based upon the cases of Simonia v. Mallac, Sottomayer v. de Barros, No. 2, and Ogden v. Ogden, and that these cases have been adversely commented upon by the Privy Council and the House of Lords in Attorney-General of Alberta v. Cook and the Salvesen case, this rule is any longer a rule of English law.

^(*) Lord Mackay thus reaches by a slightly different process of reasoning, the same results as the English courts in Chetti v. Chetti, a result which is stated in Dicey Exception No. 2, Conflict of Laws, 4th edition, p. 709, as follows: "A marriage celebrated in England is not invalid on account of any incapacity which, though imposed by the law of the domicile of either or both of the parties, is of a kind to which our courts refuse recognition."

1933

(4) That the pursuer's fourth contention was a valid one as the error of the pursuer was one induced by C and was one in substantialibus and on this ground a decree of nullity should be pronounced.

Case No. 24.—Grewal, otherwise Buck, v. Grewal.

(The "Times News," August 1, 1907. Bargrave Deane, J.)

Petition for Decree of Nullity.

M.C.B. went through a ceremony of marriage in 1903 at a London registry office with K.S.G., an Indian, formally baptised as a Sikh, who had never professed Christianity. K.S.G. had in 1888 gone through a ceremony of child marriage according to Hindu ceremonies, which was valid according to Hindu law, with M.D.K. According to Sikh law—

- (1) Marriage with a Christian was invalid.
- (2) No man might have more than one wife, though he might have concubines.

K.S.G. had returned to India after the marriage (and was presumably domiciled there at all relevant times) and was living with his wife, M.D.K.

M.C.B. alleged that she did not know K.S.G. had a wife living in 1903, and he had described himself as a widower, and prayed for a decree of nullity on the ground that K.S.G. had already a wife alive at the time the marriage with her was celebrated.

Bargrave Deane, J., granted a decree, but report is not clear whether the decree was based (a) on the ground that K.S.G. had already a wife and the 1903 marriage was bigamous, or (b) on the ground of fraud and mistake, i.e., that M.C.B. thought he had no wife in India, whereas, in fact, he had one.

Case No. 25.—Brook v. Brook. 9 H.L.C. 194 (H. of L.).

(Also 3 Smo. and Giff. 481. Vice-Chancellor's Court.)

A and C, both British subjects domiciled in England, married in Denmark. C was the sister of A's deceased wife. Such a marriage was lawful in Denmark.

Under 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 54, the marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister is made void.

Held:

(1) That this statute affected all persons domiciled in England, wherever they might be transiently resident.

(2) That the forms of entering into the contract of marriage were governed by the lex loci contractus, but the essentials depend on the lex domicilii.

(3) That the provisions of 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 54, constituted an essential thing, and the marriage was one which A could not, under law of domicile, contract. It was therefore void and the children of the union must be regarded as illegitimate.

A passage from Story is quoted in the judgments, regarding marriages involving polygamy or incest, and referred to in a manner which indicates the view (a) that the monogamous or polygamous character of a marriage is an essential; (b) that a polygamous marriage entered into by a domiciled Englishman would not be recognised.

Case No. 26.—Spivack v. Spivack. 46 T.L.R. 243. 1930, W.N. 46. Divisional Court.

(Lord Merrivale, P., and Bateson, J.)

This was an appeal brought before a Divisional Court by the appellant, George Spivack, against an Order of the Stipendiary Magistrate of Leeds, whereby he was found to have deserted the respondent, his wife, and ordered to pay a weekly sum towards her maintenance. The appellant appealed on the grounds that there had never been a valid legal marriage between him and the respondent.

The facts were that in 1890, in what was then Russian Poland, a Jewish ceremony of marriage took place between the parties, who were then both under 21 years of age, and they lived together in the house of the respondent's father, and three children were born. The appellant came to England in 1895, leaving the respondent in Poland, but for a number of years he sent her sums of money. Communication between them then ceased, and in 1913, in England, the appellant went through a ceremony of marriage with another woman. In 1929 the respondent traced the appellant's whereabouts, came to England and took proceedings against him and obtained the Order against which the appellant now appealed.

The appellant contended inter alia(*) that there was no evidence of a lawful marriage in 1890, or that the ceremony alleged by the respondent was a valid celebration of marriage, either by Jewish law or the law in force in Russian Poland. Before the Divisional Court evidence was given by a person who was Russian consul in London under the Imperial régime, to the effect that a document produced by the respondent was a certificate of marriage duly registered in accordance with the local law, and would have been recognised as a certificate of a valid marriage by the authorities of the former régime in Russia.

Lord Merrivale, P. (in whose judgment Bateson, J., concurred), in dismissing the appeal, held (a) that the certificate produced was evidence of a marriage valid by the lex loci; (b) that, even in the absence of such a certificate and of the evidence of the former Russian consul, the court would have presumed that a marriage existed, on the evidence of the respondent that a Jewish religious ceremony had taken place, followed by cohabitation, on the principle set out in "Halsbury's Laws of England, Husband and Wife," Part 2, Marriages, paragraph 604: "Where there is evidence of a ceremony of marriage having been gone through, followed by the cohabitation of the parties, everything necessary for the validity of the marriage will be presumed in the absence of decisive evidence to the contrary. This was," he said, "the lifelong practice in this division," and quoted the contentions of Mr. Bethell, afterwards Lord Westbury, before the House of Lords in Piers v. Leigh, 5 Clark Finelly 381, and the maxim semper præsumitur pro matrimonio.

He distinguished the practice of the Probate and Divorce Division in this matter from that of the criminal courts in bigamy trials, as evidenced in cases such as R. v. Naquib, 1917, 1 K.B.D. 362, where strict affirmative proof of the validity according to the law of the lex loci is required of every foreign marriage.

In cases such as the present before the Probate and Divorce Division the burden of impeaching the marriage lay on the party impeaching it.

Case No. 27. Mashia Ebrahim v. Mohomed Esop. 1905 Tr. L.R. 59.

The appellant brought an action against the respondent. The respondent contended that the appellant was a married woman and could not bring an action without the joinder of her husband.

The appellant, who was a Malay woman, had gone through a Mahometan ceremony of marriage, performed according to Malay rites in a mosque by a Malay priest, with E in Capetown.

The appellant contended that Malay Mahometan marriages were polygamous, and as such not recognised by the South African courts, and therefore she was in the same position as a single woman.

Held:

That if the marriage were polygamous, the courts would not recognise it.

But, though Mahometan marriages were in general polygamous, the Governor had power under an Act of 1860 to appoint marriage officers for the purpose of celebrating Mahometan marriages. There was no evidence that this marriage of the appellant was not celebrated by such a marriage officer. A marriage celebrated by such an officer was a valid marriage, and, though celebrated according to Mahometan rites, must be deemed to be a monogamous marriage. The presumption in case of doubt must be in favour of the validity of the marriage.

(*) The respondent also argued that the Jewish marriage was dissoluble at any time at the will of one of the parties by the delivery of a letter of divorce, and that therefore, on the authority of the judgment of Hill, J., in the case of Nachimson v. Nachimson, the marriage was not of the kind which came within the matrimonial jurisdiction of the English courts. The judgment has now been reversed (see 1930, p. 217), but Lord Merrivale (speaking before the delivery of the judgment of the Court of Appeal) said:—

"... if there is a fact conspicuous in the developments in the last 200 years of the law of marriage in this country, it is that the Legislature and the courts have known all the time of Jewish marriage; that the Legislature has put Jewish marriages outside of the ambit of its enactments providing for the legality of the ceremony of marriage in this country, and has left them where they stood before the various marriage Acts, and has merely required by an enactment in the course of the last century that there shall be a representative of a registry present, who shall see that the marriage is registered. The Legislature has provided in respect of Jewish marriages in a mode which leaves their validity beyond all question and, I should have thought, unimpeachable and unassailable. In the ecclesiastical courts in this jurisdiction the subject has arisen, and nobody until now has ever suggested in my hearing any doubt as to whether a Jewish marriage was a marriage of which the court must take account."

1933

ANNEX III.

PREVIOUS LAW OFFICERS' OPINIONS.

Law Officers' Opinion No. 1.—Jurisdiction of British Consular Court in Aleppo.

Law Officers' opinion of June 10, 1869: Sir R. P. Collier, Sir J. D. Coleridge and Mr. Travers Twiss.

The following passage occurs:—

"That if the suit before the Consul at Aleppo be, strictly speaking, a matrimonial cause the Consular Court has no jurisdiction to entertain such a suit between British Indian Jews living there under British protection. It may be, however, that it is a suit as to property, in which case it will be necessary for the Consular Court to decide the point as to the validity of the marriage in question before it. The English Court of Divorce does not recognise polygamic contracts, even when they are sanctioned by the lex loci. Neither do the Courts of Common Law. The English law knows marriage or legitimacy only in the sense in which it is understood amongst Christian nations; the state of the husband of one wife, and the status of children, the issue of such a union. By the 7th section of the Order in Council of the 31st December, 1864, the civil jurisdiction of the Consular Court is, 'as far as circumstances admit, to be exercised upon the principles of and in conformity with the Common Law of England,' and the English law recognises no such marriage as that which has here been contracted. The fact that such a marriage is tolerated by Turkish law does not affect the question. Nor does the fact, that the Jewish law enjoins or sanctions such a marriage, make any difference. Such a marriage does not become good in English law, because it does not offend a Jewish conscience."

Law Officers' Opinion No. 2.—Marriage of Miss Keane and Moorish Sheriff.

Law Officers' opinion of April 7, 1873: Sir J. D. Coleridge, Sir G. Jessel and Dr. J. Parker Deane.

Under the instructions existing at that date with regard to the performance of consular marriages, it was laid down that a consular marriage might be celebrated, although one of the parties only was a British subject provided that the party, who is not a British subject, is a subject of the country in which the marriage is proposed to take place, and had previously complied with the requirements of the Marriage Law of that country. Sir J. Drummond Hay, His Majesty's Consul-General in Morocco celebrated a marriage between a Moorish Sheriff of high rank in Morocco and an English lady, Miss Keane. Before the consular marriage took place a marriage was celebrated according to Moorish law between this lady and the Sheriff, Moorish law in fact allowing a husband more than one wife, although the Sheriff had not at the time any other wife. The Law Officers advised that His Majesty's Consul-General was in fact acting correctly and in accordance with his instruction in performing this marriage.

Law Officers' Opinion No. 3.—Jurisdiction of the British Consular Court in Siam.

Law Officers' opinion of July 31, 1883: Sir Henry James, Sir Farrer Herschell and Dr. J. Parker Deane.

My Lord,

"We are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Sir Julian Pauncefote's letter of the 2nd instant, stating that, with reference to the concluding paragraph of our report of the 7th February last, in the case of Ai Baa, of which report a printed copy was enclosed, he had the honour to transmit to us the papers relating to the exercise of jurisdiction by the British Consular Court in Siam over protected persons, and its recognition by the Siamese Government. That our opinion was now requested as to whether, under the circumstances stated by the Acting Consul-General at Bangkok, he should be instructed to obtain a Declaration (by an exchange of notes or otherwise) from the Siamese Government, recognising British jurisdiction over protected British subjects, and whether such Declaration would be sufficient to support such an Order in Council as was suggested in the reference to us from the Foreign Office of the 27th January last, and which was embodied in our report of the 7th February.

"In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have the honour to report:—

"That the letter of Mr. Newman presents the question in a new aspect. It would appear that very many of the children of British subjects who receive British protection, though illegitimate according to our law, if they were the children of Englishmen, are the offspring of the marriage of the subjects of British India and other parts of Her Majesty's dominions.

"And such offspring would, as we understand, be regarded as legitimate in those dominions, and also legitimate according to the law of Siam. If this be so, we think they may properly be regarded as British subjects.

"There may, of course, be children of British subjects who do not come within this category, and are not, strictly speaking, entitled to the privilege of British subjects. But we quite recognise the difficulty pointed out by Mr. Newman, of ascertaining decisively in all cases the status of the children of British male subjects. Under the circumstances, therefore, the practically convenient course would probably be to treat them as British subjects, unless the fact of illegitimacy should be brought to the knowledge of the consulate.

"As it is not likely that there will be many such cases, it might be more expedient to avoid raising the question with the Siamese Government until some practical necessity for so doing arises."

We have, &c.

(Signed) HENRY JAMES.
FARRER HERSCHELL.
J. PARKER DEANE.

NOTE.—It would appear that this opinion relates to the offspring of unions of a polygamous character contracted by British subjects in Siam. The Law Officers appear to have held (1) that if the fathers were Englishmen the children would be illegitimate, and therefore not British subjects; (2) that if they were the offspring of the marriages of British Indian subjects and would be regarded as legitimate by the laws of British India, then the children should be regarded as British subjects.

Law Officers' Opinion No. 4.—Case of Mr. Grant.

Law Officers' opinion of June 14, 1888: Sir Richard Webster, Sir Edward Clarke.

My Lord,

"We were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Sir Julian Pauncefote's letter of the 29th ultimo, stating that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us the papers noted in the accompanying list, with reference to an application which had lately been made to Mr. Frost, the British vice-consul at Rabat, in Morocco, to enrol in the register of his vice-consulate as British subjects two children born at that place under the following circumstances:—

"That the father of the children (who were aged 4 and 2 years respectively) was a British subject named Grant, who, while retaining his British nationality, had formally embraced the Mahometan faith, and, in compliance with the rites of that religion, and with all the requirements of the Moorish law, had contracted a marriage, of which those children were the offspring, with a native Mussulman woman.

"That Mr. Grant had, as yet, only contracted the marriage above alluded to, and that, although that union might doubtless from one aspect be properly described as partaking of a polygamous nature, he was not at present living in a state of polygamy.

"That it was, however, competent for him, at any moment during the duration of the union of which those children were born, to contract other marriages with one or more Mussulman women which would, according both to the Mahometan religion and the Moorish lex loci, be of equal validity with his first marriage.

"That Her Majesty's consular officers abroad having been instructed (see circular instruction of the 29th May, 1876) that the illegitimate children of British parents born abroad were not British subjects, and therefore should not be registered as such, Mr. Frost, who entertained some doubt as to whether those children were to be considered as illegitimate or not, had applied for further instructions with respect to the case.

"That, with reference to the legal status of the children in question, Sir Julian Pauncefote was to refer us to the judgment delivered on the 15th February last by Mr. Justice Stirling in the Baralong marriage case, and reported at length in the 'Times' newspaper of the following day. (See also L.R., Chancery Division, vol. XXXVIII, p. 220.)

"That it was understood, on the authority of counsel engaged in the case, that no appeal was pending, or would be brought, against the decision of Mr. Justice Stirling.

"That Sir Julian Pauncefote was also to call our attention as bearing, though less directly, upon the subject to the cases of Warrender v. Warrender (2 Clarke and Finelly's House of Lords Reports, p. 488) and Hyde v. Hyde and Woodmansee (L.R. 2 Probate and Divorce Division, p. 130), and also to the enclosed report of the then Law Officers, dated the 10th June, 1869.

"That Sir Julian Pauncefote was to request that we would take the papers into our consideration, and that we would favour your Lordship with our opinion as to the instructions which should be sent to Sir William Kirby Green with reference to the application addressed by Mr. Grant to Vice-Consul Frost to register as British subjects the children in question, and with any general observations which we might have to offer on the case.

"In obedience to your Lordship's commands, we have the honour to report:—

"That, in our opinion, Sir William Kirby Green should be directed [Qy. 'to instruct Mr. Frost'] to refuse to register as British subjects the children of Mr. Grant by his marriage according to the Mahometan faith with a Moorish Mussulman woman, such marriage being of a polygamous character, and therefore not recognised by British law."

We have, &c.

(Signed) RICHARD E. WEBSTER.
EDWARD CLARKE.

1933

NOTES.—(1) Mr. Grant was an Englishman.

(2) At the time this opinion was given the view prevailed that an Englishman could not become domiciled in a foreign country in which His Majesty exercises ex-territorial jurisdiction.

(3) At the time this opinion was given there was in the relevant Morocco Order in Council, no provision corresponding to article 45 of the Morocco Orders in Council, 1889-1929 consolidated, providing that in all matters relating to marriage, inheritance and other questions involving religious law and custom the court shall, in the case of persons belonging to non-Christian communities, recognise and apply the religious law and custom of the person concerned.

(4) Though the attention of the Law Officers was called to the opinion of their predecessors given in 1869 (Law Officers' Opinion No. 1, Jurisdiction of the British Consular Court at Aleppo), their attention was not drawn to the opinion in the opposite sense of 1883 (Law Officers' Opinion No. 3, Jurisdiction of the British Consular Court in Siam), nor to the opinion of 1873 (Law Officers' Opinion No. 2, Marriage of Miss Keane and a Moorish sheriff), which also indicates a view contrary to that of the opinion of 1869.

Law Officers' Opinion No. 5.—The Registration Provisions of the Foreign Marriage Acts.

Law Officers' opinion of June 27, 1892: Sir Richard E. Webster, Sir Edward Clarke.

My Lord,

"We were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Sir Philip Currie's letter of the 13th instant, stating that he was directed by your Lordship to bring to our attention two points with regard to the registration, under the Foreign Marriage Acts, of marriages solemnised in accordance with the local law of a foreign country, respecting which some doubt had been expressed, and with reference to which, therefore, your Lordship desired to be favoured with our opinion for his guidance.

"That the other point was whether any marriage, by whatever form, rite, or ceremony solemnised in a Mahometan or other polygamous country, could be registered under the Foreign Marriage Acts, unless it had been solemnised in pursuance of those Acts.

"That the question upon which the determination of that point appeared to rest was whether, in a Mahometan or uncivilised country where the marriage law was repugnant to the fundamental principles of English jurisprudence and of religion and morality as understood in this country, any marriage which was solemnised in accordance with the local law, and which derived such validity as it possessed wholly and merely therefrom could be recognised as a marriage within the meaning of that term as employed in Christian countries, and systems of jurisprudence, even for the limited purpose of registration under an English Statute relating to foreign marriages.

"That it appeared to be clear that if a British subject attempted to avail himself of the forms of the lex loci in a Mahometan or heathen country, or of the ceremony of marriage observed amongst the Mormons, even though the parties were competent to contract, the marriage was not regarded as valid in English law, and that, consequently, the essential principle underlying the recognition of lex loci marriages generally, viz., the fact that it was valid by the law of the place of its celebration, was in that case quite inapplicable.

"That your Lordship was disposed to think that the expression 'lex loci marriages' should be confined, in its interpretation, to such marriages alone as did not violate the essential requirement of Christian wedlock, viz., the union of one man with one woman to the exclusion of all others, and that polygamous marriages being in no sense and for no purpose marriages in contemplation of English law were not such 'lex loci marriages' as were contemplated by the wording of section 4 of 'The Foreign Marriage Act, 1891,' and could not be registered thereunder.

"That Sir Philip Currie was, at the same time, to transmit copy of a despatch from Mr. Payton, Her Majesty's Consul at Mogador, asking for guidance with regard to his duties under the Foreign Marriage Acts, together with the draft of the reply which your Lordship proposed to send him, if we concurred in its terms.

"That it would be found that the correctness and expediency or otherwise, of the answers suggested in the draft depended on the principles to be decided in connexion with the latter of the two points specially raised in Sir Philip Currie's letter to us.

"That Sir Philip Currie was to request that we would be so good as to take the papers into our consideration and favour your Lordship with our opinion on the points raised therein, and also with any general observations upon the subject which we might be good enough to offer.

"In obedience to your Lordship's commands, we have the honour to report—

"1. That there is a distinction between solemnisation and registration of marriages under the Foreign Marriage Acts.

"As to solemnisation at the marriage office under section 8 of 'The Foreign Marriage Act, 1892,' no marriage can be solemnised at the official house of the marriage officer if by English law the parties cannot lawfully inter-marry, but if lege loci contractus the parties can marry, notwithstanding the impediment preventing a valid English marriage, the marriage may still be registered under section 18 of the above Act.

"2. Except in the case, which we do not imagine to exist, of the law of the foreign country expressly providing that valid marriages may be contracted in the way and according to the forms actually adopted, we are of opinion that no form, rite, or ceremony of marriage in a Mahometan or polygamous country can be registered under the Foreign Marriage Acts.

"3. The registration of 'lex loci marriages' should be confined to marriages which do not violate the essential conditions of Christian wedlock.

"4. We approve of the draft reply to Consul Payton as altered and initialled by us."

We have, &c.
(Signed) RICHARD E. WEBSTER
EDWARD CLARKE.

Law Officers' Opinion No. 6.—The Abensur Case.

Law Officers' opinion of June 30, 1897: Sir Richard Webster, Sir Robert Finlay.

Gentlemen,

I am directed by the Marquess of Salisbury to transmit to you the Papers which are noted in the accompanying list, relative to an application which has been made to Her Majesty's Consul at Tangier for the enrolment, in the Consular Register of British subjects, of certain infant children of a naturalised British subject, named Mr. Isaac A. Abensur, aged respectively 9 years, 5 years and 6 months.

Mr. Abensur, who was theretofore a subject of the Sultan of Morocco, having divested himself of his Moorish nationality in contemplation of Moorish law, was naturalised as a British subject by a special Act of Parliament, the short title of which is 'Abensur's Naturalisation Act, 1896,' on the 7th August last.

This Act (Paper B) confers upon him (section 1) "All the rights, privileges, and capacities whatsoever of a natural-born subject of Her Majesty the Queen," and the question which now arises for decision is, whether the infant children who are the offspring of a marriage contracted between Mr. Abensur and a Hebrew lady at Tangier on the 10th June, 1885, according to the Hebrew religious law prevailing in Morocco are (1) according to English law legitimate; and (2) if according to English law legitimate, whether they are entitled to be registered as British subjects, notwithstanding that they were born before the date of their father's naturalisation, under the special Act already quoted.

I am to draw your attention to the instructions upon this subject which was addressed to Her Majesty's Consul at Tangier on the 17th March last (Paper E), to the report by the Law Officers of the Crown respecting the case of Mr. Grant's children (the 14th June, 1888), to which reference is therein made (Paper F), and to Mr. Consul White's despatch of the 9th ultimo (Paper H), in which he gives particulars as to the local law and usage of Morocco in regard to Jewish marriages in that country.

You will observe that in this last-named paper Mr. White reports that Mr. Abensur obtained his private Act of Parliament largely in the interests of his children, and was assured by his legal adviser (for whose opinion, however, neither Her Majesty's Government nor this Department are in any way responsible) that under that Act those children would obtain British nationality equally with himself.

Mr. White also draws attention to a despatch which was addressed to Sir J. D. Hay by Lord Rosebery on the 6th March, 1886, and in which it was stated that marriages performed by Jewish Rabbis between British subjects in Mahometan countries would be admitted as valid in England.

The despatch in question is enclosed (Paper J).

I am to request that you will take the enclosed papers into your consideration, and favour his Lordship with your opinion as to the question set forth in the third paragraph of this letter, and generally as to the instructions which should be sent to Her Majesty's representatives in Morocco for their guidance in dealing with applications for the registration of children of marriages between British subjects performed by Jewish Rabbis in that country.

I have, &c.
(Signed) F. H. VILLIERS.

Report.

We agree in thinking that the doctrine of English law that for the validity of a marriage in England the presence of an episcopally ordained clergyman is necessary, has no bearing upon the present case. It never applied to the marriage of Jews in England, and cannot apply to the marriage of a Jew in Morocco.

With regard to the other points raised, we are not quite agreed as to reasons, though agreeing in the result. The opinion of the Attorney-General upon these points is as follows:—

"The question whether Abensur's marriage was monogamous raises points of difficulty, but, for the purposes of the question submitted to us, it is not necessary to express any opinion thereon, or to consider whether Mr. Abensur's children are legitimate according to English law. A good deal may depend upon the place where, and the circumstances under which, the questions arise, and I desire not to express any opinion against the legitimacy of the children.

"In my judgment, however, assuming them to be legitimate, they yet cannot be registered as British subjects. 'Abensur's Naturalisation Act' is not, I think, retrospective, and cannot be held to naturalise children born before the Act was passed.

"To attain Mr. Abensur's object I think he must obtain an Act of Parliament making his children born before the passing of the Act British subjects, and it would be well to provide, at the same time, that any children born after the passing of the Act should also be British subjects."

The opinion of the Solicitor-General upon these points is as follows:—

"For the present purpose I think it is immaterial whether the marriage of Abensur was monogamous or polygamous. This question would be material if he desired the assistance of the English Divorce Court (Hyde v. Hyde, L.R. 1 P. and D. 130) or of his children claimed to inherit real property in England (see Birtchistle v. Vardill, 7 C. and F. 1895). But it cannot, in my opinion, be broadly laid down that for all purposes the offspring of a polygamous marriage is to be treated, in the view of English law, as illegitimate. The Divorce Court and the law of inheritance to real property in this country recognise only monogamous marriages, but for the purpose of inheriting nationality I think that a polygamous marriage by a subject of Her Majesty in a country where he is domiciled, and where the law allows of such unions, must be treated as lawful, the English law adopting for this purpose the law of the domicile.

This second objection, therefore, to the registration, in my opinion, fails like the first. A difficulty, however, is presented by the fact that the children were born before Abensur was naturalised. If they had been born after the Act of Naturalisation they would, though born abroad, in my opinion, be British subjects by virtue of the statutes 7 Anne, cap. 5, sec. 3, and 4 Geo. II, cap. 21, sec. 1.

"The children born before the Act of Naturalisation stand, however, on a different footing.

"It is no doubt eminently reasonable that infant children living with their father should follow his nationality.

"The Law Officers, in their report of the 4th November, 1861, advised that, in their opinion, minors who were born in Her Majesty's Dominions, but whose fathers had become naturalised American citizens, ought, during their minority, to be considered and treated as between the two Governments, not as British subjects, but as American citizens, minors in this position being by the Statute Law of the United States regarded as American citizens.

No difficulty would exist with regard to children born abroad of a person afterwards naturalised, who might not desire to assume the character of British subjects, as the statute 4 Geo. II, cap. 21, merely confers upon children born abroad the privilege of being British subjects, but does not fasten upon them without their own concurrence any burdens whatever (see Sir Roundell Palmer's speech in the House of Commons on the 20th March, 1868, as quoted in 'Forsyth on Constitutional Law,' p. 339). But, in the present case, as they were born abroad, the title of these children to be, in view of English law, British subjects must depend upon 7 Anne, cap. 5, sec. 3, as explained by 4 Geo. II, cap. 21, which confers this privilege only on children whose fathers were at the time of their birth natural-born subjects.

Although for some purposes naturalisation by special Act has undoubtedly a retrospective effect ('Blackstone's Commentaries,' Book II, Chapter 15, p. 250, of 11th edition citing Co. Lib. 129a), it appears to me to be impossible to say that Abensur was at the time of the birth of these children, before the passing of his special Act, a natural-born subject as required by 4 Geo. II, cap. 21."

The Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General are therefore agreed in thinking that the claim to have these children recognised as British subjects fails.

We may further observe that the Morocco Order in Council does not appear to make any provision for the registration of infants, and that, before advising generally as to applications for the registration of children of marriages between British subjects performed by Jewish Rabbis in Morocco, we should desire further instructions as to the law or practice under which such registration has been carried out.

(Signed) RICHARD E. WEBSTER.
ROBERT B. FINLAY.

The Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office, Sir Edward Davidson, disagreed so strongly with the Law Officers' opinion in this case that Lord Salisbury caused the question to be referred to Lord Chancellor Halsbury. Lord Halsbury gave an opinion in which he disagreed both with the Law Officers and with Sir Edward Davidson. He agreed with the Law Officers in holding that the children of Mr. Abensur must be regarded as being legitimate in contemplation of English law, but on this point he based his opinion on the fact that they were the offspring of a Jewish marriage, and Jewish marriages (apparently whether monogamous or polygamous) were recognised by the English courts. He thought that Lord Penzance in Hyde v. Hyde deliberately used the expression "Christian marriage" in order that nothing which he said might be deemed applicable to Jewish marriages, though he went on to quote, with regard to polygamous marriages, the passage in the judgment in that case in which Lord Penzance said that his decision had no bearing upon the question of the legitimacy of the children of a polygamous marriage.

The Lord Chancellor disagreed with the Law Officers on the question as to whether these children born before Abensur's naturalisation had become British subjects by virtue of it (i.e., on a point which is irrelevant to the present question).

Sir Edward Davidson still being strongly opposed to the view which was now taken by both the Lord Chancellor and the Law Officers, the question was referred to the Lord Chancellor again, but the Lord Chancellor adhered to his previous opinion. In this connexion he added certain observations with regard to Jewish marriages.

The relevant portions of these two opinions of Lord Halsbury are set out below marked (A) and (B).

(A.)

(First Opinion of Lord Halsbury, L.C., in the Abensur Case.)

"I am unable to agree with the Attorney- and Solicitor-General, or with Mr. Davidson.

"It seems to me a very strange misapprehension of what is really involved in this case has run through all the papers on the subject. It seems to have been forgotten that if the objection made to the registration of Mr. Abensur's children is founded upon the view that they are not the offspring of marriage at all, the result must be of so far-reaching and extraordinary a character that I think that result cannot have been before the minds of the Law Officers.

"Mr. Abensur was married to the person, who lived with him as his wife, by the Chief Rabbi, and according to the rites and ceremonies of the Jewish Church.

"So far as I understand the argument, no question is raised on the validity of the form, or that the form does not comply properly with the rites and ceremonies of the Jewish Church. But the objection is raised that the relation between the man and the woman was not a marriage at all; that, in short, the status of married people was never created between them. The fact that what I will call the marriage was celebrated in a polygamous country does not affect the argument. Apart from the objection which I have stated, and with which I will deal, it is immaterial where the marriage was celebrated.

"I do not understand that in Morocco more than elsewhere any peculiar ceremonies are essential other than those that existed in this case; but, if I understand the objection aright, it is, as I have said, to the nature of the contract entered into between the parties by reason of the Jewish religion permitting the marrying of more than one wife.

"I will deal with the cases in the English Divorce Court presently, but, putting the broad proposition as I have stated, it comes to this: that no Jewish marriage by persons professing the Jewish faith can be recognised as a marriage in England; there can be no lawful issue of the connexion between a Jew and a Jewess, although sanctioned by the ordinary rites and ceremonies which Jews recognise as appropriate to marriage.

"I should have thought the fact that inasmuch as Jewish marriages, so called, have been repeatedly recognised by the Legislature of this country, and by the ecclesiastical courts of this country, would have rendered such a contention impossible, and for my own part I am unable to understand what construction is to be placed upon section 2 of 6 and 7 William IV, cap. 85, which is in these words:—

"And be it enacted that the Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, and also persons professing the Jewish religion, may continue to contract and solemnise marriages according to the usages of the said society and of the said persons respectively; and every such marriage is hereby declared and confirmed good in law, provided that the parties to such marriage be both of the said society, or both persons professing the Jewish religion, respectively."

"It will be observed that every such marriage is by that statute declared and confirmed good in law, provided that both parties to such marriage be both professing the Jewish religion.

"It is obviously nothing to the purpose to say that the English law prohibits more than one wife, and punishes with the penalties attaching to bigamy the person who enters into a second marriage during the lifetime of the person whom he has first married, because, if the objection be a good one, there has never been a marriage at all.

"The Jewish religion in all countries recognises the right, as part of their belief, to take a second wife during the lifetime of the first, and, if the reasoning be accurate in the papers put before me, there is no first wife or second wife—there is no marriage at all, because a connexion between two persons by the rites and ceremonies of the Jewish religion, which in all other respects is binding, is of no avail to establish the status or religion of marriage by reason of the theoretic belief that a person may have more wives than one at the same time. If any such principle exists, it is a very extraordinary thing that no trace of it is to be found; but, on the contrary, we find Lord Stowell trying and deciding a case of jactitation of marriage between a Jew and a Jewess.

"It can hardly be suggested that Lord Stowell did not know what were the tenets of Jews in this respect, and, indeed, in one of the cases referred to in the papers, Lindo v. Belisario, he took counsel with the learned Hebrews and declared the nullity of the marriage by reason of the neglect of the proper forms which he held to be an essential part of the necessary preliminaries to marriage established in that case.

"Undoubtedly Lord Penzance, in the case of the Mormon marriages, Hyde v. Hyde and Woodmansee, 1 Probate and Divorce, 130, decided that what was there called a marriage did not correspond to what in all Christian countries is recognised as a marriage, and I note that in that case he uses the terms 'Christendom' and 'Christian belief' throughout his judgment with a very marked emphasis.

"It is also true that Sir James Hannen in Brinkley v. The Attorney-General, 15 Probate and Divorce, p. 78, applies Lord Penzance's decision to the case of a Japanese.

"Whether Lord Penzance had in his mind the Jewish marriages I cannot say, and certainly the emphasis with which he repeats that phrase 'Christian and Christendom' as an important element of what he is saying in every part of his judgment suggests that he must have had Jewish marriages in mind.

"No such point appears to have occurred to Sir James Hannen—and he extends the observations of Lord Penzance as if they were of universal application and applies them to a Japanese. Whether that reasoning be good or bad I will not now discuss, though I think it was open to very considerable question, because, to my mind, it is impossible for an English court to overlook as matter of law the continued and long-established recognition of Jewish marriages.

1933

58

GENERAL

"And even in respect of Lord Penzance's judgment it is to be observed that, apart from the continued use of the word 'Christian,' he is very cautious to add that—

"This court does not profess to decide upon the rights of succession or legitimacy which it might be proper to accord to the issue of the polygamous unions, nor upon the rights or obligations in relation to third persons which people living under the sanction of such unions may have created for themselves. All that is intended to be here decided is that as between each other they are not entitled to the remedies, the adjudication, or the relief of the matrimonial law in England."

"Under these circumstances, I think, Mr. Abensur's children ought to be registered. To refuse to register them upon such grounds as have been set forth would shake the validity of every Jewish marriage in this country, since, as I have said (and, indeed, as is stated in the papers submitted to me), the Jewish view of the marriage and its obligations in respect of monogamous or polygamous marriages are the same in England as in Morocco—and, indeed, all over the world—though the practice, which for this purpose is immaterial, is said to be very rarely adopted in Spain."

(Signed) HALSBURY.

House of Lords, December 16, 1897.

(B.)

(Second Opinion of Lord Halsbury, L.C., in the Abensur Case.)

"I have already advised that Mr. Abensur's children should be registered.

"I am represented as relying upon the lex loci of the marriage being one which allows of polygamy. So far from doing so, I expressly said it was in my view immaterial where the marriage was celebrated.

"This is the view held by all Her Majesty's Judges given by the mouth of Lord Chief Justice Tindal in Millis v. The Queen in Error, as will be seen below in the passages quoted.

"Of course Lord Campbell, Lord Brougham, and Lord Denham thought the question could be decided by a mere agreement to take each other as husband and wife, but they urged the case of the Jews against those who contended for the proposition that a person in holy orders must be a party to the celebration.

"Lord Lyndhurst and Lord Cottenham treated of this matter in the passages quoted below. Against such a weight of authority I at least would not feel myself justified in laying down an opposite view, and I observe no opinion of the Attorney or Solicitor-General countenancing the view that a Jew to be married must be married by a person in holy orders.

"The other misrepresentation is, that my opinion rested on the enactment of the Act of William IV. What I said was, and what I should have thought no lawyer could have misunderstood was, that that Act confirmed and declared to be lawful the Jews' marriages which had been excepted in terms from the exigency of Lord Hardwicke's Act (see section 18, 26 Geo. II).

"Further, I observe, Mr. Davidson has entered into an enquiry whether the views of the Jews are as stated in the papers submitted originally to me, and controverts the statement thus made to me.

"As to this, I have no means of entering into this question; but I should very much doubt whether a Jewish authority could be found to say that what their whole national traditions approved was unlawful, however much they might deprecate the practice, but be that as it may, I have advised upon the hypothesis of fact submitted to me."

(Signed) HALSBURY.

ANNEXES TO LORD HALSBURY'S SECOND OPINION IN THE ABENSUR CASE.

The Queen v. Millis, 10 Cl. and Find. 672.

(Lord Chief Justice Tindal.)

"And as to the case of the Jews, it is well known that in early times they stood in a very peculiar and excepted condition. For many centuries they were treated, not as natural-born subjects, but as foreigners, and scarcely recognised as participating in the civil rights of other subjects of the Crown. The ceremony of marriage by their own peculiar forms might therefore be regarded as constituting a legal marriage, without affording any argument as to the nature of a contract of marriage per verba de presenti between other subjects. But even in the case of a Jewish marriage, it was more than a mere contract; it was a religious ceremony of marriage; and the case of Lindo v. Belisario is so far from being an authority that a mere contract was a good marriage, that the marriage was held void precisely because part of the religious ceremony, held necessary by the Jewish law, was found to have been omitted."

(The Lord Chancellor, p. 864.)

"I must not pass over the observations that have been made upon the marriages of Jews and Quakers. It is said they can only be supported on the ground of their being contracts per verba de presenti de futuro followed by cohabitation.

"No such argument can, I think, be justly raised from the decisions respecting marriages amongst the Jews. They are treated in those decisions as a distinct people, governed, as to this subject, by their own religious observances and institutions, among which marriage is included. Speaking upon this subject Lord Stowell, in the case of Ruding v. Smith (2 Haggard's, Consistory Reports 371) observes that 'the matrimonial law of England for the Jews is their own matrimonial law; and an English Court Christian, examining the validity of an English Jew marriage, would examine it by that law, and that law only, as has been done in the cases that were determined in this court on those very principles.' Such are the admitted grounds of decision in the case of Jewish marriages.

GENERAL

59

(Lord Cottenham, p. 900.)

"In Goldsmid v. Bromer (1 Hagg., Consistory Reports 314), Lord Stowell says: 'The parties are both Jews, and both appeal to the Jewish law, by which this question must be decided. The Jews, though British subjects, have the enjoyment of their own laws in religious ceremonies, and the Marriage Act acknowledges this privilege, by excepting them out of its provisions. To deny them the benefit of their own law upon such subjects would be to deny to a distinct body of people the full benefit of the toleration to which they have long been held to be entitled.'"

Law Officers' Opinion No. 7.—Children of Burmese British Subjects Born in Siam.

Law Officers' opinion of July 31, 1897.

Gentlemen,

I have the honour, by direction of the Marquess of Salisbury, to transmit to you herewith, the papers noted in the accompanying list, which relate to a question which has arisen in connexion with the registration of British subjects at Her Majesty's consulate-general in Siam.

It is, his Lordship conceives, unnecessary to invite your perusal of the voluminous earlier correspondence which has passed on this subject. It may suffice to state that various circumstances have of late years led to a large increase in the number of persons who apply to be registered at the Bangkok consulate-general, and that in consequence many disputes have arisen with the Siamese authorities as to who are, and who are not, entitled to British protection. These and other considerations render it desirable that the practice of registration should not be unduly extended.

I am to invite your particular attention to the considerations set out in the Memorandum by Mr. Davidson, Q.C., the legal adviser to the Foreign Office, which forms the enclosure to the letter from this Department to the India Office of the 9th April, and to the reply received from that Office of the 27th instant.

I am to request that you will be good enough to take these papers into your consideration, and to favour Lord Salisbury with your opinion as to whether Her Majesty's Government are entitled, in law, to claim as British subjects—in the sense in which that expression is employed in the treaties between Great Britain and Siam—the children and grandchildren of persons born on British soil, or on soil which has subsequently become British, and, if so, whether it is competent for Her Majesty's Government to exercise any discretion with reference to asserting or declining to assert as against the Siamese Government, and in admitting or declining to admit with reference to the claimants themselves claims of this nature in the circumstances mentioned.

Lord Salisbury will at the same time be glad to be favoured with any observations of a more general nature which you may desire to offer on the papers.

I have, &c.
(Signed) FRANCIS BERTIE.

Report.

We assume from the terms of the despatch from the India Office and of Sir Charles Turner's Memorandum that there is nothing in the local law of British Burmah which specially affects this question.

Upon the conquest of Burmah, Burmese subjects became British subjects, and we think that their children and grandchildren, born subsequently to the conquest, are also, by British law, British subjects, though born out of Burmah.

The fact that these children and grandchildren are the issue of polygamous marriages is not, in our opinion, decisive of the question of nationality.

The rules relating to the jurisdiction of the English Divorce Court, and to succession to land in England, have not necessarily any application to questions of nationality, and the opinion of the Law Officers, dated the 14th June, 1888, in the case of Abdul Kerim Grant, did not lay down any general principle apart from the facts of the particular case.

There are many parts of the British Dominions in which polygamous marriages are lawful, and for the purposes of nationality it seems to us impossible to treat the issue of such marriages, who are legitimate by the law of the domicile of their parents, as illegitimate.

(Signed) RICHARD E. WEBSTER.
ROBERT B. FINLAY.

[10221]

I 2

1933

60

GENERAL

Law Officers' Opinion No. 8.—Registration as British Subjects by British Consuls in Turkey of the Wives and Issue of British Subjects of Marriages celebrated in Turkey otherwise than under the Foreign Marriages Act.

[April 28, 1903.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

I have the honour, by direction of the Marquess of Lansdowne, to transmit to you a despatch from His Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, forwarding a despatch from His Majesty's consul-general at Beirut, in which the latter enquires: (1) whether, in view of a circular addressed by the Marquess of Salisbury to His Majesty's consular officers on the 4th November, 1899, which forbids the registration of lex loci marriages in Mahometan or polygamous countries without fulfilment of the provisions of "The Foreign Marriages Act, 1892," the issue of such marriages are to be registered at His Majesty's consulate-general as British subjects; and (2) whether, after such marriage has been dissolved in the Mahometan or polygamous country, and the divorce is valid according to the personal law of the parties, the husband can claim to register a second wife and her children as British subjects.

A copy of the circular above referred to is enclosed for convenience of reference. I am also to transmit to you a memorandum which has been drawn up by the Assistant Legal Adviser to this Office on the subject; and I am to request that, in taking these papers into your consideration, you will inform his Lordship whether you concur in the conclusions arrived at in this memorandum, and, if so, whether instructions may properly be sent to Mr. Drummond-Hay to the effect suggested.

I have, &c.
(Signed) CHARLES HARDINGE.

Report.

We agree with the view of the Assistant Legal Adviser that the answers to both the questions asked by Mr. Drummond-Hay should be in the affirmative, and we think instructions may be sent accordingly.

(Signed) R. B. FINLAY.
EDWARD CARSON.

Royal Courts of Justice, April 28, 1903.

ANNEX.

Memorandum by Mr. Hurst.

Both the questions asked by the consul should, in my opinion, be answered in the affirmative. I think he enunciates the correct principle when he writes:—

"The validity of these marriages would, I conclude, be decided by the laws of their country of origin."

The doctrine is recognised that a man carries his common law with him wherever he goes; if he is in a foreign country he continues to be subject to that law except in so far as entrance into that foreign country has subjected him to another code which supersedes his common law.

For a British subject of Indian origin polygamy is lawful if he is a Mahometan or a Hindu, or, I think, if he is a Jew; marriage is one of the questions which is decided in the British courts in India by the personal law of the litigant, and the bigamy clause of the Indian Penal Code is carefully worded so as to preserve this right.

When a British Indian settles in the Ottoman Empire, where he will still be subject to the King's jurisdiction, he will continue subject to his personal law of marriage, except in so far as His Majesty enacts otherwise for him; no such legislation has, in fact, been provided with regard to him, and, consequently, a British Indian marrying according to his personal law contracts a marriage which is valid and of which the offspring will be legitimate; if his personal law permits polygamy, the marriage in the Ottoman Dominions will not be invalid because it is polygamous.

The same reasoning applies to the British subject of Maltese origin: if he contracts in the Ottoman Dominions a marriage which is valid by Canon Law, which is the Common Law of Malta, that marriage is valid.

The Law Officers recently advised that the marriage of an Englishman in a Greek island, celebrated by an ordained clergyman, was valid because it was good by the Common Law of England; as Greece had made no other provision for the marriage of Christians of other communions, the Englishman was governed in this particular matter by his common law.

This opinion of the Law Officers really covers the questions asked by the consul.

If the marriage is valid the issue are legitimate and, consequently, entitled to be registered at the consulate both in the register of British subjects and in the register of births.

Similar considerations apply to the divorce question, where, under the religious law of his community, a man's marriage can be severed, a divorce in accordance therewith in the Ottoman Empire is permissible and valid for a British Indian, as being in accordance with his personal law, and because no machinery for divorce, that he could make use of, has been provided under the Ottoman Order in Council.

For Christians this question as to divorce cannot arise, because the Canon does not, any more than the English Common Law, allow divorce.

GENERAL

61

If the divorce is recognised, then the subsequent marriage is lawful and its issue legitimate. Cases that were decided on the rights of Englishmen to inherit real estate in this country, and cases on the jurisdiction of the English Divorce Court, do not appear to me to have any bearing on this question.

I have also read all the Abensur print, but nothing in the decisions arrived at in that case appears to me to conflict with what I have written above.

As to the practical working out of the proposition, there might, with Hindus or Mahometans, be difficulty in finding out whether the marriages (and divorces for Mahometans) were, in fact, valid by the religious law of the community; but the consul's despatch appears to refer chiefly to Jews and Maltese, and I do not see why there should be trouble as to these: the care with which Jewish records are kept is proverbial.

(Signed) C. J. B. HURST.

February 2, 1903.

Law Officers' Opinion No. 9.—Loss of British Nationality by Women British Subjects contracting Polygamous Marriages with Aliens.

[April 25, 1905.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 16, 1905.

I have the honour, by direction of the Marquess of Lansdowne, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list, which relate to applications made by Fatma Hanem, widow of the late Menshawi Pasha, an Ottoman subject, and Rakel, daughter of Helal Sassoon, and widow of the late Elyak Rivan, an Ottoman subject, for readmission to British nationality.

I am to invite your attention to the correspondence and minutes (Paper G) which passed in 1899 with reference to an application made by Mrs Abigail Maimaran, widow of Isaac Maimaran, a Moorish subject, for readmission to British nationality. These papers were amongst those submitted to, and discussed by, the inter-Departmental Committee appointed in 1899 to consider difficulties which have arisen with regard to the interpretation of the Naturalisation Acts; the committee, however, considered that the point involved was one relating rather to the law of marriage than to that of nationality, and did not make any recommendation with regard to it.

I am also to draw attention to the report of the Judicial Adviser to the Egyptian Government for the year 1901 (Paper H), at p. 43 of which reference is made to the case of Fatma Hanem, and at p. 48 of which appear comments by Mr. McIlwraith on the general question of the nationality of a European woman marrying an Ottoman subject.

In the present case it will be observed that, owing to the non-fulfilment of the conditions of residence prescribed by section 8 of "The Naturalisation Act, 1870," by the applicants, no steps can be taken by His Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department for the grant of a certificate. The question, however, arises as to whether the marriages contracted by these ladies with Ottoman subjects were of a kind which would be recognised as valid by the English courts on the ground that they were valid by the lex loci; and on the answer to this question depends whether Fatma Hanem and Rakel Rivan can, in accordance with section 10 (1) of "The Naturalisation Act, 1870," be deemed to be subjects of the State of which their late husbands were subjects, and consequently to have lost their status as British subjects.

I am to request that you will take these papers into your consideration, and that you will be so good as to favour Lord Lansdowne with your opinion as to whether, for the purposes of section 10 (1) of "The Naturalisation Act, 1870," the marriage of an Englishwoman must be understood to mean such a marriage alone as is recognised as valid in contemplation of English law, or whether a marriage which, though not per se valid in contemplation of English law, is binding according to the lex loci celebrationis and the personal law of the husband will satisfy the requirements of the Statute.

I have, &c.
(Signed) F. A. CAMPBELL.

Report.

In our opinion section 10 (1) and (2) of the Naturalisation Act refers not merely to marriage such as is contemplated by English law for the purposes of the construction of an English settlement or of jurisdiction of the Divorce Court. These provisions are of general application, and we think that they apply in the case even of polygamous marriages in countries where such marriages are lawful. This would clearly be so if the woman, being a Mahometan subject of His Majesty or of any Mahometan Power, contracted a polygamous marriage with a subject of another country in which polygamy is lawful. We do not think that an exception can be made from its provisions in the case of a Christian woman who contracts a polygamous marriage with a foreigner. When the marriage is valid according to the law of the country where it is contracted, we think the woman acquires the nationality as well as the domicile of her husband.

(Signed) R. B. FINLAY.
EDWARD CARSON.

Royal Courts of Justice, April 25, 1905.

1933

62

GENERAL

Law Officers' Opinion No. 10.—The Messiah Case.

[October 19, 1906.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Foreign Office, July 30, 1906.

Gentlemen,

I have the honour, by direction of the Secretary of State, to transmit to you the enclosed papers relating to an application for a certificate of British nationality made by Mr. Wilfred Judah Messiah, of Oran, in order to enable him to claim exemption from military service in France.

The application was forwarded by His Majesty's Consul-General at Algiers on the 23rd April last (Paper 1), and is supported by the accompanying documents, viz.:—

- (a) Contract of marriage at Mogador (the 27th August, 1862), in accordance with Hebrew religious law, between the father and mother of the applicant, Moses Messiah and Esther Youli (or July).
- (b) Certificate of the birth of the applicant, Wilfred Judah Messiah (the 20th April, 1885), at Oran.
- (c) Certificate of the birth of the father of the applicant, the aforesaid Moses Messiah, at Gibraltar, the 13th March, 1828.

The documents were forwarded to the Home Office in order that the necessary steps might be taken in the matter, and I am to enclose a letter from that department in reply (Paper 2), stating that the marriage of the father of the applicant, on the validity of which the claim of the latter for a certificate of British nationality depends, appears to have been of a polygamous character (see passages underlined in the Marriage Contract); but that, having regard to the case of Isaac Aaron Abensur in 1897, Mr. Gladstone proposes, subject to the concurrence of Sir E. Grey, to issue the desired certificate.

With regard to the case of Isaac Aaron Abensur referred to, I am to enclose a copy (in print) of the correspondence, &c., which passed in the matter (Paper 3), and I am especially to call attention to the memorandum on p. 9, in which the facts of the case and the opinions expressed thereon are fully set forth, and also to the subsequent opinion of the then Lord Chancellor (Lord Halsbury). The decision arrived at in the matter will be found on p. 38 in a minute of the late Lord Salisbury, as follows:—

"This opinion" (that of the Lord Chancellor) "must be accepted as the best exposition of the existing law that we can obtain in the absence of any decided case."

"Therefore Mr. Abensur's children must be registered."

Sir E. Grey feels, however, some hesitation in accepting the decision arrived at in the Abensur case as conclusive of the question whether the offspring of a polygamous marriage, contracted according to the Hebrew religious law prevailing in Morocco, are, according to English law, legitimate, inasmuch as the views of the late Lord Chancellor differed in some material respects from those of the then Attorney-General (now Lord Chief Justice of England) and the then Solicitor-General (Sir Robert Finlay), besides being directly in conflict with the opinion of previous Law Officers given in the case of Abdul Kerim Grant (see p. 25 of print).

Moreover, so far as Sir E. Grey is aware, none of the other legal authorities, before whom the case indirectly or directly came, took quite the same view as the then Lord Chancellor; and in these circumstances he is disposed to think that it would be dangerous to accept as finally conclusive of the question what was not a judicial decision, but merely an opinion of the ex-Lord Chancellor, without at any rate giving the matter fuller consideration.

I am therefore, in forwarding these papers, to request that you will be good enough to favour Sir E. Grey with your opinion, whether in the present case the applicant for a certificate of British nationality, Mr. Wilfred Judah Messiah, being the offspring of a marriage of a polygamous character, is to be regarded as legitimate in contemplation of English law, and, if so, on what ground?

Sir E. Grey would also be glad to receive any observations of a general nature which you may be good enough to offer on the papers now submitted to you.

I have, &c.
(Signed) ERIC BARRINGTON.

Report.

We understand the facts to be that Moses Messiah, the father of the applicant, is a natural-born British subject, who, at the time of his marriage with Esther Youli, was domiciled in Algeria, and that such marriage is valid according to the Jewish law and to the law of the domicile of the parties and of the place where the marriage was contracted, namely, Algeria.

We think that such marriage, in spite of its polygamous character, is valid by English law for the purpose of conferring British nationality upon the offspring on the ground that it is a good marriage according to the law of the domicile of the parties and of the place where the marriage was contracted, and also of their religion, if that be material, although such marriage would be considered in England as invalid for the purpose of succession to land in England, or of claiming the assistance of the matrimonial courts there.

We think, therefore, that the applicant is entitled to British nationality on the ground that he is the legitimate (for this purpose) son—born out of His Majesty's Dominions of a natural-born British father.

We offer no opinion on the question whether the possession of a certificate of British nationality will enable the applicant to escape military service in France.

(Signed) JOHN L. WALTON.
W. S. ROBSON.

Law Officers' Department, October 19, 1906.

GENERAL

63

ANNEX IV.

ARTICLES IN LEGAL PERIODICALS.

No. 1.—Society of Comparative Legislation Journal, Vol. II, N.S.

Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick, writing on non-Christian marriage, says (on p. 367 of the "Society of Comparative Legislation Journal," Vol. II, N.S.):—

"As regards non-Christian marriage generally, there is a further point which seems worth mentioning, namely, that the character of a marriage as Christian or non-Christian must be determined by looking at it as it stood at the time it was contracted, according to the law under which it was contracted. In other words, once a non-Christian marriage, always and everywhere a non-Christian marriage. Thus, if the parties to a potentially polygamous marriage were to come into England, the courts there would not say: 'The husband has only one wife, and if we recognise his union with her as a marriage, he cannot, during the continuance of such marriage with her, take a second wife in England. Hence we may treat this union as monogamous and Christian.' They would, on the contrary, hold the marriage to be still polygamous and non-Christian. Similarly, where persons who are not Christians contract a non-Christian marriage, and during the continuance of that marriage are converted to Christianity, the character of their marriage is unaffected by the conversion, and remains non-Christian. This was held by a full bench of the Madras High Court,⁽¹⁾ and a similar view was taken by the Allahabad High Court.⁽²⁾ The Calcutta High Court⁽³⁾ in a case before it acted as if it took an opposite view, but the parties in that case did not appear by counsel, and the point was not raised."

A Marriage once Non-Christian always Non-Christian.

On p. 368, he says, with regard to the recognition of non-Christian marriages:—

"What we have to deal with here, as stated above, is the treatment of the non-Christian marriage, and the legal relations, rights, and duties springing directly or indirectly from it, in cases where such marriage has been contracted in some foreign country or in some part of Her Majesty's dominions abroad where such marriages are legal, and comes in some way in question before the courts in England or in some part of Her Majesty's dominions similarly situated. The question is one of private international law, using the phrase in its widest sense.⁽⁴⁾

Recognition of Non-Christian Marriages.

(P. 369.) "It may be said at once that it seems almost hopeless to think of the courts of a country like England dealing with the personal relations of the parties to a non-Christian marriage, except, perhaps, in regard to some particular points; and one thing above all might be easily anticipated, namely, that a piece of machinery like the English Matrimonial Court, constructed specially for the purpose of dealing with the personal relations of the parties to a Christian marriage, would be found altogether unsuitable for handling non-Christian marriages. It must, however, be remembered that a marriage gives rise directly or indirectly to many other legal consequences besides the personal relations between the parties, and to them different considerations may apply.

Its Difficulties.

(P. 370, footnote.) "Sir Erskine Perry, in his judgment in the case of The Khojas and Memons (Oriental Cases, p. 127), actually formulated a very far-reaching claim of certain non-Christian people to have their personal law administered to them, and he considered that he had for it the support of Lord Stowell, but in this he perhaps went too far. Lord Stowell never put the dots on the 'i's' and the crosses on the 't's,' as Sir E. Perry does. The passage (which seems worth quoting), after referring to the well-known remarks of Lord Stowell in The Indian Chief, proceeds as follows: 'by the comity of nations, therefore, as existing between princes of Christian and non-Christian faith, the lex loci, to its whole extent is held not to apply to Europeans placing themselves under the government of the latter. But if this is the case as regards Christian aliens in a foreign State, there can be no doubt that a similar comity requires a similar rule to be observed when a Mussulman or Hindu seeks a domicile in a Christian country. How far the peculiar laws of such non-Christian aliens would be recognised, it may not be very easy, nor is it necessary, to define beforehand. But on very many questions, such as marriage, divorce, succession, and possibly adoption, there seems no reason to doubt that the proper law to be referred to for the decision of any controversy would not be the law of the Christian community, but the law or usage of the peculiar non-Christian class. That this was the opinion of the great jurist whom I last cited is not left a matter of doubt, for he has stated it expressly in many of his judgments with respect both to Jews and that other singular Oriental race, the gypsies.' See 3 Rol. 32; Ruding v. Smith, 2 Hagg. Consist. 384; Lindo v. Belisario, 1 Hagg. 216."

Jewish Marriages before Lord Stowell.

(P. 371.) "The next case was that of Lindo v. Belisario, which was a jactitation suit brought by a Jewess against a Jew, charging him with having boasted of a marriage with her which was not good or valid in law."

(P. 372.) "It [marriage] is a contract according to the law of nature, antecedent to civil institution, and which may take place, to all intents and purposes, whenever two persons of different sexes engage by mutual contracts to live together. Our first parents lived not in

⁽¹⁾ I.L.R. 17 Mad. 235 [1893].

⁽²⁾ 2 N.W.P.H.C. Rep. 370.

⁽³⁾ I.L.R. 18 Cal. 252 [1891].

⁽⁴⁾ As distinguished from the narrower, and, for certain purposes, more proper sense of a body of definite rules already recognised between the courts of civilised States. It is to private international law in this latter sense Professor Dicey confines himself in his Conflict of Laws, and thus non-Christian marriage falls outside the scope of that truly admirable work.

political society, but as individuals without the regulation of any institutions of that kind. It is hardly necessary to enter something of a protest against the opinion, if any such opinion exists, that a mere commerce between the sexes is itself marriage. A marriage is not every casual commerce, nor would it be so even in the law of nature. A mere casual commerce without the intention of cohabitation and bringing up of children would not constitute marriage under any supposition. But when two persons agree to have that commerce for the procreation and bringing up of children and for such lasting cohabitation, that in a state of nature would be a marriage, and, in the absence of all civil and religious institutions, might safely be presumed to be, as it is popularly called, a marriage in the sight of God. It has been made a question how long the cohabitation must continue by the law of nature—whether to the end of life. Without pursuing that discussion, it is enough to say that it cannot be a mere casual and temporary commerce; but must be a contract at least extending to such purposes of a more permanent nature in the intention of the parties. The contract thus formed in the state of nature is adopted as a contract of the greatest importance in civil institutions. Rights of property, he goes on to observe, spring from it, and so on."

Dicta of Lord Brougham on Non-Christian Marriage in "Warrender v. Warrender."

(P. 375.) "As to what really these utterances of his regarding the non-Christian marriage are to be taken to mean there is room for considerable doubt. They have sometimes been referred to in support of the view that no court in a civilised Christian country can recognise any marriage except a Christian marriage, and that such a court must treat every other marriage as a mere nullity, under whatever circumstances and for whatever purposes it may present itself for consideration; but it is perfectly clear from the first of the two passages we have italicised above that Lord Brougham did not mean to assert that. It may with more plausibility be suggested that, though he did not mean to lay this down in respect to non-Christian marriages generally, he did mean to lay it down in the second passage italicised, in regard to such non-Christian marriages as might be deemed to be polygamous, including those only potentially polygamous. But it is very hard to say what opinion exactly Lord Brougham meant to express in this latter passage, or, indeed, whether he had formed in his own mind any opinion definite enough to help us. It may be that all he meant to say was that we could not treat a second polygamous marriage as good, standing the first, and that he would have been prepared, like the Christian Church, to treat the first polygamous marriage as good, but as binding the man to monogamy. There is a passage a little lower down which goes to support, to some extent, this view of his meaning; but if that was his view, it is clearly one which we could not accept."

"Further, whether his observations are to be taken as applying to a first polygamous marriage or only subsequent one standing the first, the question arises—What exactly did he mean by saying that 'We never should recognise the plurality of wives,' or, to put it in the more usual form, that we should never recognise a polygamous marriage?"

"Recognising" a polygamous marriage.

"Now what is ordinarily meant when it is said that a particular court cannot 'recognise' a certain marriage which it is admitted has, as a matter of fact, been contracted is simply this, that that court cannot give effect to, or do away with, or otherwise deal with, some or all of the legal relations, rights and duties springing directly or indirectly from that marriage, by virtue of the law under which it has been contracted; and if Lord Brougham merely meant that he could not in this sense 'recognise' a polygamous marriage for the purposes of a case like that before him, and on which his attention would be naturally fixed—a case dealing with the personal relations between the parties to the marriage—that would be no more than was subsequently decided, so far as the English Divorce Court was concerned, in the Hyde case. But it must be remembered that one of our courts might be asked to 'recognise' such a marriage for any one of a number of other purposes, as, e.g., if a man of a polygamous race, domiciled and married in his own country, were to die there leaving two wives, and children by both, and these children were to institute proceedings here to recover the share legally due to them of some money left by their father in the hands of an agent here. Now had Lord Brougham thought out all this, and did he mean deliberately to say that, for the purpose of the case just put, and of all other cases that could be put, our courts should refuse to 'recognise' a polygamous marriage? I must say that, having regard to the circumstances, this seems extremely unlikely; and it may be added that, if he had thought the whole position out in such detail, he would probably, more suo, have given us the benefit of his reflections on it at length. It is a relief to turn from such matters of speculation to the case of Hyde v. Hyde, where we shall find ourselves on firmer ground."

Jurisdiction of Matrimonial Court over mutual personal rights of parties—whether exclusive.

(P. 378.) "It does not, of course, follow because there exists in a country a special court, like the English Divorce Court, established for the purpose of affording certain sorts of relief to the parties to a Christian marriage, and to them only, that somewhat similar relief will not be granted by some other court in that country to the parties to a non-Christian marriage."

Enforcement of other rights arising under non-Christian marriage.

(P. 379.) "But this is very far from exhausting the question before us. It does not necessarily follow, because the judicial system of a country like England must abandon the idea of dealing adequately with the purely personal relations between the parties to a non-Christian marriage, that it should treat such a marriage as for all purposes a mere nullity, incapable of giving rise to any legal consequences whatsoever. It does not necessarily follow that it should refuse to recognise and enforce any proprietary or pecuniary claims to which the marriage may give rise between the parties to it—that it should refuse, for example, to entertain a claim by a Mahometan wife to a sum due to her on account of her 'dower,' or a claim by a Mahometan or Hindu widow to succeed to the whole or a portion (say) of some funds left by her husband in England. Still less does it follow that, if there were children of the marriage, and they, on the death of their parents, claimed to succeed (say) to funds left by the parents in England, they should be held to be illegitimate, and as such not entitled to succeed. In short, it does not follow, as some have suggested, that our courts in England should absolutely ignore all family relations among the great majority of the human race, treating all wives among them as mere concubines, all children as bastards and all property left by an intestate among them as escheating or becoming ownerless.

(*) Westlake's Private International Law, 1st ed., s. 347.

"Lord Penzance was most careful in his judgment in the Hyde case to guard against any such startling conclusions being drawn from his decision."

(P. 380.) "Besides the questions which Lord Penzance here expressly states that he meant to leave untouched, it is obvious from what he says that he means to leave similarly untouched other important questions, which may depend on the validity or invalidity of a non-Christian marriage. You may, for example, have a question of national character or domicile depending on the validity of such a marriage; or, again, the question of the validity of a subsequent marriage may depend on whether a previous marriage of a non-Christian type is to be deemed a valid marriage or not."

(P. 382.) "The results to which we have now got are:—

"(1) That a non-Christian marriage is not a marriage in respect of which the English Matrimonial Court, or any like court in Her Majesty's Dominions, can exercise its peculiar jurisdiction.

"(2) That a non-Christian marriage is not a marriage through the medium of which a claim can be made out, in the United Kingdom and some other parts of Her Majesty's Dominions, to succeed to real property ab intestato, or, it may probably be added, otherwise by mere operation of law.

"As to the rest, the general question of the treatment to be accorded by the courts of a country like England to a non-Christian marriage entered into in a foreign country in accordance with the law of that country, and of the extent to which those courts can give effect to the legal relations, rights and duties springing directly or indirectly from such a marriage, is, so far as we have hitherto carried our enquiry, completely open. We now come to a case decided by one of our most eminent judges (Mr. Justice Stirling) in 1888, which, according to the way in which it is to be understood, may or may not have an important bearing on that general question.

"The Baralong Case. The case referred to is "Re Bethell," commonly spoken of as the Baralong Case."

(P. 384.) "No case has yet come before a court which would call for a detailed consideration of the judgment, but it has been found necessary to consider it for certain purposes out of court, and the result has been that a difference of opinion has arisen between persons eminently deserving of respect as to what should be understood to be the real grounds on which the learned judge based his decision. Two views have been taken of those grounds, which may be called the narrower and the broader view. The former view is that the judge decided as he did only because Christopher Bethell was, at the time of his marriage with Teepoo, an Englishman domiciled in England; and that consequently if Teepoo's husband had been a real Baralong pure and simple, domiciled and married in his own country, and had died leaving (say) money in the hands of an agent in England, as he might conceivably have done, and the daughter of the marriage had come to claim it as his next of kin, it is at least possible that she would have been held to be legitimate. It seems quite clear from paragraphs 605-7 of his Commentary on the Indian Penal Code that that eminent lawyer, Mr. J. D. Mayne, would agree with those who take this view.

"The broader view is that the judge decided as he did on the wider ground that every polygamous marriage must be held by a court in England to be, for all purposes whatsoever, a mere nullity, and that he would accordingly in the case just put have held the daughter to be illegitimate.

"Now, first, as to the narrower view. If it is right, Mr. Justice Stirling's decision is just what we should all have expected it to be.

"If the English law of marriage adheres to a domiciled Englishman to such an extent and so persistently that he cannot even contract a valid Christian marriage with his deceased wife's sister in a foreign country, where by the local law such a marriage is permissible, it may well be argued that, a fortiori, he cannot, by going into a country where a system of non-Christian marriage prevails, contract a valid non-Christian marriage. It may be added that the language of Lords Campbell and Cranworth in the Brook case(*) is sufficiently general to support the view that he cannot."

(P. 386.) "To turn now to the broader view of the grounds of the judge's decision, it must be admitted that there is something to be said in favour of it. It seems certainly strange that if the learned judge meant to decide as he did simply on the ground that Bethell was a domiciled Englishman at the time of his marriage he did not expressly say so. Further, there is a passage in his judgment which at first sight reads as if he meant to put his decision on the wider ground. After referring to Lord Brougham's dicta in the Warrender case, which we have already (p. 374) discussed, and to Lord Penzance's decision in the Hyde case, he says: 'I conceive that, having regard to these authorities, I am bound to hold that a union formed between a man and a woman in a foreign country, although it may there bear the name of a marriage, and the parties to it may there be designated husband and wife, is not a valid marriage according to the law of England unless it is formed on the same basis as marriages throughout Christendom, and be in its essence the voluntary union of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others.'

"I confess that when I first read the judgment I agreed with those who take the broader view of the ground on which the decision rests; but on further reflection I have come to agree with those who take the narrower view and think that the learned judge decided as he did merely

Results of cases so far examined.

The Baralong Case.

Views as to the "Ratio Decidendi."

The element of domicile.

The broader ground—a polygamous union.

Conclusion as to grounds of decision.

(*) Law Rep. 38 Ch. D. 220: 57 L.J. Chanc. 487.

(*) 2 House of Lords 193 [1861]. See also Mr. J. D. Mayne's Commentary on the Indian Penal Code, s. 628.

1933

because Bethell was domiciled in England at the time of his marriage. The circumstance that this ground is not expressly stated in the judgment may be explained by the course the argument had taken. The counsel for the infant referred to Bethell's English domicile, and admitted⁽⁹⁾ that, if the marriage was a polygamous one, it was invalid. All their efforts were directed to showing that the marriage was not meant to be polygamous, and thus the real issue in the case was whether it was polygamous or not. On this, which was substantially an issue of fact, the judge's attention would naturally be concentrated, and he had no occasion to trouble himself much about the law. As to the passage above extracted from his judgment, we are in no way driven to put upon it the construction put upon it by those who take the broader view, and which would make it deal with a variety of matters which the judge was in no way called upon to consider.

"It is submitted that when he said in effect that no non-Christian marriage was, as he expressed it, a valid marriage according to the law of England," he was using the phrase "law of England"⁽⁹⁾ in the narrower sense of the law of England governing English marriages, the essential portions of which an Englishman, like Bethell, domiciled in England, would carry with him abroad, and not in the broader sense of the law of England as including all principles of private international law which would be followed by our courts. It seems impossible to suppose that the learned judge could have considered that he was bound, by Lord Brougham's dicta and Lord Penzance's decision in the Hyde case, to hold that the law of England in the latter and broader sense must always and for all purposes treat non-Christian marriage as invalid, and in particular that he would be bound by these authorities to hold that the child of a marriage contracted in their own country between members of a polygamous community there domiciled is illegitimate. Lord Penzance, as we have seen (pp. 379-80), most carefully guarded himself against being supposed to decide anything like that; and as for Lord Brougham's dicta, it will be seen, from what has already been said (pp. 374-6), that they could not bind any judge to hold anything.

"Assuming the narrower view of the grounds of Mr. Justice Stirling's decision to be right, our general question is still a completely open one, and we must accordingly look beyond our English law reports to see whether we can find anything to throw light on it."

No. 2.—"Law Quarterly Review," CLXXXIII, July 1930: "Status and Capacity."— By Carleton Kemp Allen.

P. 299.

If an Oriental has by the law of his own country the right to kill his wife for adultery, or his son for disobedience, his lex domicilii will not avail him as a defence if he exercises those rights in this country. Our courts would not, as will be submitted presently, in any way deny the status of the husband and wife in such a case; but they would not allow that status to produce practical results which would shock English ideas and disturb public order.

P. 302.

(Reversed in the
C.A. 1930/W.N.
145.)

It is even doubtful whether the children of polygamous marriages, perfectly valid in the countries where they have been contracted, would be permitted to exercise rights of inheritance in England.⁽¹⁰⁾ It has recently been held that Soviet marriages are not marriages at all in the view of English law; would the offspring of these unions be entitled to succeed to personal property in England? There is no certain answer to these questions at present; but it is difficult to doubt that foreign rules of legitimacy and legitimation might be regarded by English courts as contra bonos mores, and that in such circumstances the capacities which usually accompany the status of legitimacy would not be permitted by our law.

P. 308.

To take another example of a status "not recognised" by English law: It is said that English law does not recognise or "will not give effect to" any form of marriage other than the monogamous. The group of cases of which Hyde v. H. (1866) L.R. 1 P. and M. 130 is the chief and Nachimson v. N. (1930), p. 85, is the most recent, seems to lay down this principle: A person of foreign domicile cannot employ the machinery of English courts in order to dissolve a marriage of a kind which is unknown to English law.⁽¹¹⁾ A Mormon spouse polygamously married in Utah cannot dissolve the marriage in England by means of a procedure which was devised for monogamous marriage. The effect of the rule is purely negative; it says nothing positive as to the status of the parties. It is never denied that the parties may be irreproachably wedded spouses within their own community, at the risk of redundancy, it must be repeated that the court cannot affect that question, even if it would; what is denied is that they are spouses in the sense in which English law, and indeed all Christendom, understands the term. That being so, they can hardly expect to put in motion legal machinery which is clearly intended for spouses in the Christian sense. Lord Penzance in Hyde v. H. points out the absurdities which would result from any attempt to adapt the unadaptable; the parties would come before the court asking for English matrimonial remedies, in a state of inextricably-tangled bigamy and ⁽⁹⁾ P. 226 of report in Law Reports and p. 490 of that in Law Journal Reports.

⁽¹⁰⁾ See Dicey's Conflict, p. 6.

⁽¹¹⁾ The question is left open by Hyde v. H. (1866) L.R. 1 P. and M. 130 (see Dicey, p. 290, and post, p. 308), and by the curious case of Re Ullee (1885), 54 L.T. (N.S.) 286, though in the latter case Chitty, J., at first instance, seemed to incline to the view that the children of a Mahometan marriage would be considered legitimate for all purposes in England.

⁽¹²⁾ See per Lord Brougham, Warrender v. W. (1835), 2 Cl. and F. at p. 351. The rule does not appear to apply to Jewish marriages, which in some countries may be dissolved by the mere repudium of one party: Spivack v. Spivack (1930), 46 T.L.R. 243 (though this was a case of maintenance, not of divorce).

adultery." The chief ground of his decision is the impossibility—apart from the undesirability—of attempting to bring one kind of marriage within the territory of a totally different kind. "We have in England no law framed on the scale of polygamy, or adjusted to its requirements" (p. 136). "All that is intended to be here decided is that as between each other (the spouses) are not entitled to the remedies, the adjudication, or the relief of the matrimonial law of England" (p. 138).⁽¹²⁾

It is, indeed, a little misleading to say that a polygamous marriage is not recognised in England—at all events for purposes other than the application of the matrimonial law. It is difficult to believe that a Mahometan wife ceased to be a wife merely because she happens to be temporarily in England. American courts have expressed strong opinions to the contrary.⁽¹³⁾ The wife cannot, it is true, go to an English court for the enforcement of matrimonial duties or for relief from matrimonial obligations; but it is apprehended—though with diffidence, in the absence of authority—that if, while she was in England, any person wrote or said that because she was not married in the Christian sense she was no true wife, but an immoral woman living in fornication with a man not her husband, she would have a good cause of action for libel or slander in an English court. Or, again, is it conceivable that a Mahometan married to a wife of, say, 14 years, would be liable in this country for carnally knowing his wife, under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885? Yet this result would seem to follow if his married status is in no way recognised by our law.

No. 3.—Article in the "Law Quarterly Review," vol. 47, No. 186, April 1931, p. 252, by
S. G. Vesey Fitzgerald, entitled "Nachimson's and Hyde's Cases."

In this article the author contends that where a marriage is celebrated which is a valid form of marriage by the lex loci celebrationis, and is in intention and in fact a monogamous marriage, it should be recognised and treated as a monogamous marriage, although the form of marriage was one under which polygamous marriages are contracted (viz., a Mahometan marriage, &c.).

The author supports his contentions by a reference to the language of Lord Brougham in Warrender v. Warrender, 2 C.L. and F. 488 at p. 530; the Sikh marriage case, "Times," the 1st August, 1907; a decision of the Indian courts reported Sonaluzmi v. Vishnaprasad (1903) 28 B. 597, in which it was held that a marriage celebrated according to polygamous form between Hindus barred the subsequent marriage by the husband according to the rights of the monogamous Brahmo Samaj, to which meantime he had become affiliated, and that his existing marriage was clothed by his new tenets with the legal vesture of monogamy; and the decision of the Supreme Court of the State of Iowa, Royal v. The Cudahy Packing Company, 195 Iowa, 757.

The author recognises that the decision in Hyde v. Hyde is against his contention in the sense that Lord Penzance in that case never considered the possibility that a marriage contracted in a polygamous form might be nevertheless considered to be a monogamous marriage, though the author's contention in no way affects the famous definition of marriage in that case which the English courts have always applied with regard to cases in which their matrimonial jurisdiction was invoked.

The author does not consider, and does not appear to be aware of, the possibility carefully safeguarded by Lord Penzance, that a polygamous marriage, although one not coming within the scope of the court's matrimonial jurisdiction, might nevertheless be a marriage for the purposes of legitimacy and succession to property.

⁽¹²⁾ In parts of the Empire where domiciled subjects (Chinese) may lawfully have secondary wives, the issue of these wives or concubines are recognised by the Privy Council as legitimate for purposes of succession: Cheang Thye Phin v. Tan Ah Loy [1920], A.C. 369; Kho Hooi Leong v. Kho Hean Kwee [1926], A.C. 529.

⁽¹³⁾ "If," said Ware, J., in Polydore v. Prince (Beale's Cases, at p. 1, 741), "a Turkish or Hindu husband were travelling in this country with his wife, or temporarily resident here, we should, without hesitation, acknowledge the relation of husband and wife between them; but the legal pre-eminence of the husband as to acts done here would be admitted only to the extent that the marital rights are recognised by our laws, and not as they are recognised by the law of his domicile." (The latter part of the dictum is undoubted (see Dicey, Rule 141, and ante, p. 299). Dicey is therefore scarcely accurate in saying (p. 290, note (c)) that the dictum of Ruffin, C.J., in Williams v. Oates (5 Iredell 535) is "isolated." Ruffin, C.J., said: "If a Turk with two wives were to come here, we would administer to them the justice due to the relations contracted by them at home": cited and doubted by Wharton, s. 130. It is certain that jurisdiction in separation and restitution of conjugal rights will be exercised independently of the lex domicilii: Armstrong v. A. [1898], p. 178; Graham v. G. [1923], p. 31; but whether it would be exercised by English courts in relation to a polygamous marriage does not appear to be settled.

1933

PAPER B.

[T 13620/125/376]

OBSERVATIONS BY THE ASSISTANT LEGAL ADVISER TO THE HOME OFFICE.

IN commenting briefly on Mr. Beckett's memorandum it is not desired to question the desirability of establishing the conclusion (as suggested in Rule XII) that, where a polygamous marriage is to be held valid under the preceding rules, the wife of any such marriage is to be deemed to be a "wife" for the purposes of British nationality law and any child of such a marriage is to be deemed legitimate and the husband to be deemed the "father" for the same purpose. The memorandum makes out a strong case in favour of the view that for some purposes (other than the matrimonial jurisdiction of the English courts and succession to land in England or to titles of honour) a polygamous union is in English law a valid marriage, if each of the parties had the capacity to contract the marriage under his or her personal law, and if the marriage was a valid one under the lex loci contractus. If such union can be held to be valid for any purpose, there are good reasons (stated in paragraph 6 of the memorandum) why it should be regarded as valid for the purposes of the application of certain provisions of the British Nationality Acts and the Naturalization Act, 1870.

2. As regards the rules or principles set out in Mr. Beckett's memorandum, there appears to be some inconsistency between Rules II and IV. Rule II states that a polygamous marriage is valid if, and not valid unless, the marriage is a valid one under the lex loci contractus and each of the parties to the marriage had the capacity to contract that kind of marriage under his or her personal law (the law of his or her domicile). This implies that the capacity of a woman to enter into a valid polygamous marriage must always depend upon her own personal law as distinct from that of her intended husband; and that for this purpose the same test (i.e., domicile immediately before marriage) is to be applied to each party separately. Rule IV says, in effect, that, so far as the woman is concerned, her capacity to contract such a marriage is governed, in cases where she resides with her husband, not by her own personal law before the marriage, but by that of her husband; she is deemed on marriage to have acquired his domicile and personal law.

3. Rule IV appears to be based upon the authority of Lord Mackay's judgment in Lendrum v. Chakravarti (1929), Sc. L.T. Rep. 96. It is not altogether clear how its application in any particular case is to be determined. It is obvious that the fact that the wife resides with her husband cannot, in the nature of things, be established on the actual date of the marriage. The test must either be (a) that on that date she intends to reside with him, or (b) that she has lived with him for some period after the marriage. If (b) is the right test to apply, the question whether she acquired her husband's domicile and personal law at the moment of marriage cannot be determined until some time afterwards. It follows that a polygamous union which, by reason of the "wife's" incapacity under her own personal law, is an invalid marriage in English law at the time it was celebrated may become a valid marriage ex post facto by the process contemplated in Rule IV.

4. Assuming, however, that Rule IV be accepted and the capacity of the woman to enter into a valid polygamous marriage is (in those cases where she "resides with the spouse of such marriage") to be determined by reference to the law of the domicile which she acquires by reason of the marriage, it would appear to follow that in the great majority of cases the wife cannot be regarded as possessing for this purpose any independent personal law of her own; her own personal law is, in such circumstances, ousted by the mere act of going through the ceremony of marriage.

5. If Rule IV is accepted, it is suggested that Rule II should be expressed to be subject, so far as concerns the wife's personal law, to the qualification in Rule IV.

6. If Rules I-XI in Mr. Beckett's memorandum are to be applied to British nationality law with the consequences suggested in Rule XII, this would, as Mr. Beckett points out, mean that the expressions "wife" and "father" would be interpreted as including respectively the wife of a polygamous marriage and the husband of such a marriage. If this interpretation of these expressions is established by a decision of the High Court, the same meaning would have to be given to them in the courts of all parts of His Majesty's dominions in which the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, or the relevant previous Act is in force as an Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and in which that Act is the law to be applied in the courts of those parts for the purpose of determining whether any person is a British subject or not. As regards the Dominions, each of whom (other than the Irish Free State) has passed an enactment substantially in the same terms as the Imperial Act of 1914, it would, to say the least of it, be inconvenient if the courts of a Dominion were to take, as regards the meaning of the word "wife" in the corresponding enactment of the Legislature of that Dominion on the subject of British nationality, a view different from that taken by the English courts. Such a difference of interpretation would mean that a person who is a British subject in the United Kingdom would be regarded as an alien in the Dominion concerned; and, conversely, a person might be regarded as an alien in the United Kingdom and yet be a British subject in the Dominion in question. Similar differences might arise as regards the nationality of the children born abroad of a British subject whose marriage was polygamous. If, as a result of the recognition in an English court of the validity of the marriage, the children were held to be legitimate, it would follow, as Mr. Beckett points out, that they would fulfil the conditions required by s. 1 (1) (b) of the Act of 1914 and would be British subjects and should be so recognised in all those parts of His Majesty's dominions whose courts are bound to interpret and construe the Act of 1914 according to the principles of English law. But Dominion courts might hold that they were not bound by those principles in the interpretation and construction of their own Acts relating to British nationality and might decline to recognise as British subjects the children born abroad of such a polygamous marriage. The result of the application of a different principle would be that the law of British nationality, though in substantially uniform terms in the various enactments in force throughout the Commonwealth, would not be uniform in its application. It is, of course, obvious that differences of this kind cannot be avoided so far as concerns the decisions of courts. But in the absence of judicial decisions producing such a result it seems desirable to ensure that, so far as possible, the various enactments relating to British nationality throughout the Commonwealth should be construed for administrative purposes according to uniform principles and this result might perhaps be achieved by consultation with the Dominions.

November 19, 1932.

PAPER C.

[T 3748/125/376]

Colonial Office to Foreign Office.—(Received March 31, 1932.)

Sir,

Downing Street, March 30, 1932.

I AM directed by Secretary Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister to acknowledge the receipt of Foreign Office letter No. T 827/125/376 of the 18th February, regarding the proposed reference to the Law Officers of the Crown on the question of the nationality of women who have entered into polygamous marriages and of children born out of His Majesty's Dominions the issue of polygamous marriages entered into by male British subjects, and to request you to lay before Secretary Sir John Simon the following observations on the subject:—

2. Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister is advised that the authorities cited in connection with the proposed Rule IX in paragraph 43 of the memorandum by the Second Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office, go to show, only that where the husband's personal law recognises polygamy, English law regards as valid a polygamous marriage celebrated in England or in a country where English law governs British subjects. Even if this proposition is established, there may well be countries in respect of which it could not be. It would appear, therefore, that the proposed rule is too wide and should be qualified by the words "unless the lex loci contractus otherwise provides."

3. It is also suggested that, apart from the fact that the order in the case of In the Estate of Abdul Majid Belshah was made by consent, that case can, for the following reason, hardly be regarded as good authority for the proposed rule. The question at issue in that case concerned the devolution of movables on intestacy, which depends upon the law of the domicile of the deceased. The only question to be decided, therefore, would be, who were in fact the individuals who, by the law of the domicile, should succeed to the property, and if the answer to that question was that the persons to inherit was one who had taken part in England in a certain ceremony, it does not follow that, in giving effect to the law of the domicile, the English court recognised that ceremony as a marriage or the person concerned as a wife.

4. I am to take this opportunity to enclose a note, by one of the Assistant Legal Advisers to the Colonial Office, on the subject of the case of Mr. J. S. Lee (otherwise known as Li Jow Son) who was granted a certificate of naturalisation as a British subject in 1924. It will be observed that the view acted upon in that case was not in conformity with the effect of the proposed Rules II and XII.

I am, &c.

GERARD L. M. CLAUSON.

Case of J. S. Lee (otherwise known as Li Jow Son).

J. S. Lee, a Chinese national, applied to the Governor of Hong Kong in November 1923 for a certificate of naturalisation under the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914. Lee stated that he was married in 1900 to Li Wan Shi, but there was no children of the marriage; that he subsequently took unto himself a concubine named Ng Shi, and a son was born to him of this concubine on the 25th July, 1915; and that he also took unto himself another concubine named Helen Lee, and a son was born to him of this concubine on the 6th October, 1922.

In his application for naturalisation Lee asked that his two children, who were born not of his wife, but of his two concubines, should be included in the certificate.

The Crown Solicitor of Hong Kong, in an opinion from which it appears that under Chinese law Ng Shi and Helen Lee would be regarded as wives and not as mere concubines, expressed the view that the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, contemplated one wife to the exclusion of others, and only children born of such wife, and that Lee's concubines and sons by concubines or adoption should not be mentioned in and would not be affected by any certificate of naturalisation granted to him.

The Legal Adviser to the Colonial Office concurred in the view expressed by the Crown Solicitor, and the certificate of naturalisation granted to Lee contained no mention of his children.

PAPER D.

[T 9466/125/376]

India Office to Foreign Office.—(Received August 10.)

Sir,

India Office, August 9, 1932.

WITH reference to your letter of the 18th February, 1932, T 827/125/376, and connected correspondence, on the subject of the proposed reference to the Law Officers of the Crown on certain nationality questions arising out of polygamous marriages, I am directed by Secretary Sir Samuel Hoare to state for the information of Secretary Sir John Simon that the suggested rules at the end of the Foreign Office memorandum dated the 11th January, 1932, are acceptable to the Government of India.

The Government of India observe, however, that if the Law Officers conclude that the suggested rules do not embody a correct statement of the existing law, and more particularly if their opinion lends any support to the view attributed in paragraph 7 of the memorandum to the late Sir Edward Davidson, they may find it necessary to suggest that steps should be taken to amend the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act in such a manner as to introduce the substance of the rules proposed by the Second Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office.

2. The point had been raised whether any ambiguity exists in connection with the sense in which the expression "personal law" is used in the proposed Rules II-VI and Rule IX; reference may also be made to the statements bearing on the question of the interpretation of the expression in paragraphs 26, 38 and the last sub-paragraph of paragraph 43 of the memorandum. In the view of the Government of India the expression "personal law" is always intended to denote the law which the Courts of the country of a particular person's domicile would apply to that person in matters of status. Hence, since by virtue of provisions such as those contained in, e.g., Section 16 of the Madras Civil Courts Act, 1873, and Section 5 of the Central Provinces Laws Act, 1875, the Courts in British India would apply the Muhammadan religious law of marriage to a Muhammadan domiciled in British India, the Muhammadan religious law is the personal law for the purpose of the memorandum and rules of a Muhammadan domiciled in British India (cf. paragraph 26 of the memorandum).

3. The question had also been raised whether some addition should be made to meet the case of the Indian States in the proposed Rules VI and X, dealing with the case of British subjects in foreign countries in which His Majesty exercises extra-territorial jurisdiction. The position appears to the Government of India to be that the subjects of British India take their personal law with them and enjoy it without any reference to any extra-territorial jurisdiction which may be enjoyed by His Majesty in those States. The Government of India doubt, therefore, whether there is any real occasion to refer to the Indian States in the proposed rules, as it may be assumed that all the States follow British India in applying what may be termed the personal law to questions of marriage. Consequently a marriage contracted, e.g., by a British Indian Muhammadan in a State, is covered in terms of Rule II.

4. As regards the proposed Rule VII, the Government of India assume that the latter part of Rule VII (b) is intended to be read subject to Rule II. In other words, Rule VII (b) is designed to protect a subsequent polygamous marriage from being invalidated (for the purpose of legitimacy vis-à-vis the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914) by reason only of an existing monogamous marriage, but not to oust the necessity of the subsequent polygamous marriage satisfying the conditions necessary to the recognition of the marriage for that purpose under Rule II.

I am, &c.

A. DIBDIN.

PAPER E.

[T 13619/125/376]

Treasury Solicitor to Foreign Office.—(Received November 22.)

Sir,

WITH reference to Mr. Warner's letter, T 827/125/376, of the 18th February last, enclosing a memorandum by the second legal adviser to the Foreign Office on the subject of polygamous marriages, and subsequent correspondence relating to the same matter, I concur generally with the conclusions set out in Mr. Beckett's memorandum, which appear to be in agreement with the present state of the authorities, but I venture nevertheless to submit the following observations.

I find it difficult to reconcile the second and fourth propositions stated by Mr. Beckett. If a polygamous marriage is recognised as a valid marriage if, and will not be recognised as a valid marriage unless, the marriage was one which each of the parties had the capacity to contract under his or her personal law, I do not understand how a woman who enters into a polygamous marriage and resides with the spouse of such marriage can be deemed to acquire his domicile and his personal law and to possess the capacity to contract such a marriage, whatever her personal law before the marriage, provided that her husband possesses such capacity under his personal law. There is, I agree, authority for both propositions, but they appear to me nevertheless to be inconsistent with one another. I hesitate to say on which side the greater weight of authority lies; but I am inclined to think that it is in favour of Mr. Beckett's fourth proposition, although principle and reason are in favour of his second.

I appreciate that Mr. Beckett's propositions generally are stated in reference to questions arising in connection with British nationality law, but it would be desirable, I suggest, for the sake of avoiding misunderstanding hereafter, that attention should be drawn to certain qualifications which might otherwise be overlooked. There is, for example, so far as I know, nothing to prevent the Sovereign from conferring a hereditary peerage upon a person who is not a British subject, but a person on whom a peerage is conferred is only entitled to a Writ of Summons if he is a British subject. On the other hand, it seems clear that a person who is the lawfully begotten offspring of a polygamous or potentially polygamous marriage has no claim to a Writ of Summons, even if he is a British subject, on the ground that a peerage was conferred upon his father. The point has arisen in connection with the Sinha peerage, and I believe is still the subject of discussion.

It can scarcely be denied that the law on the subject of polygamous marriages and their incidents is in a sad state of confusion, arising mainly, if not wholly, from the failure of the Courts to adhere to the well recognised principles of the Common Law which ordinarily govern questions of personal status. The abandonment of these principles seems to be due in part to the difficulty experienced by the Courts in fitting into the Common Law system juristic conceptions which are alien to and inconsistent with English legal ideas, and in part to a very natural desire to protect Englishwomen against the consequences of their own folly. The results have proved very unfortunate, and it is difficult to discern in Mr. Beckett's twelve propositions a body of coherent and consistent law.

The English Courts at the outset declined to admit that the jurisdiction of the Divorce Court could be invoked for the purpose of dissolving a polygamous marriage. That this refusal was based upon sound legal doctrine cannot be doubted; but it is singular that they have failed to see that to make English ceremonies of marriage available to those whose personal law permitted polygamy was an equal if not a greater impropriety. Certainly it is strange doctrine that a polygamist may enter into a valid marriage in England, but has no right to have a polygamous marriage dissolved by an English Court. The Courts have, it is true, endeavoured to evade the dilemma by holding that the contract created in England by the marriage of a polygamist according to the law of England brings into existence a monogamous marriage only; but they so hold by abandoning in toto the fundamental principle that matters of status, and especially the essential validity of a marriage, are regulated by the law of the domicile and not by the lex loci contractus.

It is submitted that if this topic had been the subject of a well-considered decision by one of the higher tribunals when it first arose, the conclusion must necessarily have been that the ceremonial of marriage prescribed by English law was only available for those whose personal law recognised no other form of marriage than monogamous marriage, the whole basis of the Common Law, so far as questions relating to marriage are concerned, being essentially based on the idea of monogamy and on nothing else. There is in truth no place for polygamy in the Common Law system, although such legal incidents as flow from it under the personal law of those who practise polygamy are entitled to recognition in an English Court in the same way as rights lawfully acquired under any foreign system of law are entitled to recognition on the principles of international law and comity which have been adopted in England. Nor need a conclusion such as is suggested above have caused any practical inconvenience, as Mr. Beckett's ninth proposition clearly shows. But to hold that one who is a polygamist by his personal law and who marries in England according to English law thereby becomes a monogamist is to destroy the unity of the personal law and to set the lex loci contractus up in competition with the law of the domicile as the determining factor in the status created by marriage.

The mischief is, however, already done, and only the Legislature can now remedy it. An opportunity might have occurred a few years ago of having the whole subject reviewed with the assistance of such arguments as the Law Officers might have thought fit to present, if the case of In re Belshah, Belshah v. Majig, of which an account is given on p. 38 of Mr. Beckett's Memorandum, had not been settled on terms which were made an Order of the Court. In that case, if the polygamous marriages of the deceased were not entitled to any recognition by an English Court, it would seem that the deceased's property vested in the Crown as bona vacantia and that the Treasury Solicitor, as the Crown's Nominee, ought therefore to have been made a party to the proceedings for the purpose of representing the Crown's interest. This aspect of the matter appears, however, to have escaped the notice of the learned President, and the attention of the Treasury Solicitor was never drawn to the case until the proceedings were over and the property had been divided among the various claimants. Possibly another opportunity of the same kind may occur; and it is a matter for consideration whether, when fundamental questions affecting the English law of marriage arise in proceedings between private individuals (such as recently occurred in connection with the case in which the question of Soviet marriages was discussed), the assistance of the King's Proctor ought not to be invoked by the Court in order that he may lay the facts before the Attorney-General and the latter may appear before the Court and bring to its notice all relevant arguments and authorities, if he is of opinion that over and above the issues between the parties to the suit questions of general public interest and importance are involved. It is, perhaps, significant that Parliament has enacted that in the case of all petitions for a declaration of legitimacy or of British nationality the Attorney-General must be cited as a respondent, presumably on the ground that these are matters of status in which the public interest requires to be represented by a public officer.

I am, &c.

M. L. GWYER.

1933

74

GENERAL

[T 8615/1326/376/1933]

No. 2.

July 28, 1933.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Recognition by English courts of divorces by declaration and registration under laws of Soviet Russia,
Japan and China.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, June 26, 1933.

I HAVE the honour to state, by direction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that he and the Secretary of State for the Home Department desire to obtain your opinion on the question whether a dissolution of marriage by declaration and registration in accordance with (a) the law of Soviet Russia, (b) the law of Japan, and (c) the law of China, should be recognised as a valid dissolution of the marriage if the parties were, at the material time, domiciled in Soviet Russia, Japan or China, as the case may be. The laws of these three countries possess in regard to divorce certain features in common.

2. The question is of practical importance in the administration of both the Foreign Office and the Home Office. On the one hand, the nationality of a woman—and her eligibility for a British passport—may depend upon whether or not a divorce obtained by her or her husband under Soviet (Japanese or Chinese) law is valid in English law, e.g., where having been married to a British subject and subsequently divorced under Soviet (Japanese or Chinese) law, she thereupon marries an alien. In such a case, if her first marriage still subsists, her second marriage is invalid, with the consequences that she remains a British subject. On the other hand, cases arise in which a British-born woman has married a Soviet (Japanese or Chinese) national or an alien of some other nationality and the marriage has subsequently been dissolved by registration under Soviet (Japanese or Chinese) law at a time when the parties were domiciled in Soviet Russia (or Japan or China, as the case may be). In such a case her eligibility for the grant of a certificate of naturalisation to enable her to recover her British nationality depends upon whether, by virtue of the Soviet (Japanese or Chinese) divorce, her marriage has been dissolved within the meaning of section 2, sub-section (5) of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914.

(a) Soviet Divorces.

3. I am to refer you to the text of the Soviet Civil Code relating to marriage and divorce, in the pamphlet published by the Soviet Government, copy of which is enclosed (Paper No. 1).⁽¹⁾ This code, which came into force on the 1st January, 1927, and the earlier code promulgated in 1918, came under consideration on a petition for judicial separation in the recent case Nachimson v. Nachimson (1930), P. 85, 217; and their effect, in the light of the evidence of Russian lawyers, is summarised in the judgment of Hill J. at pp. 92, 93, and in the judgments of the Master of the Rolls and Lawrence L. J., at pp. 222, 229–230. The divorce in that case, however, was one obtained under the earlier law of 1918.

4. Under the law of 1918 provision was made for the dissolution of marriage by mutual consent, subject to the requirement that the parties must appear before the official in charge of the register in which the marriage had been recorded, and, on their declaring their desire to be divorced, the registrar was bound to register the divorce and, when so registered, the marriage was dissolved. In the absence of mutual consent, application had to be made to a court of law by the party desiring the dissolution, the court being that of the residence of the other party; and it was necessary in such a case that notice by summons should be given to the other party or that proof should be given showing it was impossible to give such notice. Upon fulfilment of these requirements, and upon the mere declaration, by the spouse instituting the proceedings, of his or her desire to be divorced, the court had no discretion and was bound to make a decree dissolving the marriage.

⁽¹⁾ Not reproduced.

GENERAL

75

5. A decree of divorce given under the law of 1918 in respect of a marriage where the parties appear to have been domiciled in Russia was considered in the unreported case of Whittingham v. Whittingham (a transcript of the shorthand notes is attached, Paper No. 2).⁽²⁾ In that case the husband obtained the divorce in Russia when the wife was living in England, and no notice of the proceedings was served on the wife, although the husband knew of her address, and the law of 1918 required that notice should be served if the address of the respondent was known. The President appears to have taken the view that the Soviet divorce was invalid on this ground in Soviet law and, therefore, invalid everywhere. The case was one where, in the interests of both parties to the suit, it was desirable that the Soviet divorce should be held invalid, but (apart from the question of notice) no suggestion was made either by the President or counsel for the petitioner (the respondent was not represented) that, if the Soviet divorce had been valid in Soviet law, and notice had been given to the respondent, it would not have been valid in this country (see paragraph 24 below; this was one of the cases described in class (e) in that paragraph).

6. By the decree of the 19th November, 1926, a new code of laws (Paper No. 1) on marriage, the family, and guardianship, was adopted and brought into force as from the 1st January, 1927. Articles 18–20 of this code are as follows:—

18. During the lifetime of both parties to a marriage, the marriage may be dissolved either by the mutual consent of both parties to it or upon the ex parte application of either of them.

19. During the lifetime of both parties, the dissolution of a marriage (divorce) may be registered at the civil registry office, whether the marriage was registered or unregistered, provided that in the latter case it had been established as a fact by the court in accordance with section 12 of the present code.

20. The fact that a marriage has been dissolved may also be established by a court, if the divorce was not registered.

Provision is made in articles 22–24 for the custody and maintenance of children and for alimony. The registration is performed by a responsible public official and takes place at the Civil Registry Office (see article 111 of the code). The relevant articles relating to the registration of declarations of dissolution of marriages are as follows:—

138. A declaration of dissolution of marriage is filed with the Civil Registry Office either in writing or orally at [sic: ? of] the place of residence of either the husband or the wife.

139. In case the declarant possesses no documents attesting the registration of the marriage that is being dissolved, he signs a statement indicating the time and place where the marriage was registered and assumes the responsibility for the correctness of the information given.

140. In case the declaration of the dissolution of marriage is made by one of the conjugal partners, the other partner receives a copy of the record of the dissolution of marriage addressed as indicated by the declarant.

141. Documents issued to foreigners attesting a divorce granted according to the laws of their respective countries are regarded as equivalent to extracts from the registers of divorce.

There is also a “Note 2” to article 111, to the following effect:—

The registrations mentioned in the present section are entered outside the territory of the U.S.S.R. by the plenipotentiary representatives and consulates of the U.S.S.R. (the 26th September, 1927: Compiled Statutes of the R.S.F.S.R., 1927, No. 105, section 705).

7. It is to be observed that article 20 of this code provides that the fact that a marriage has been dissolved may be established by a court if the divorce was not registered. From this provision and from the terms of article 19, “may

⁽²⁾ Not printed.

[10221]

L 2

1933

be registered," it would appear to follow that, in the case of divorce by mutual consent at any rate, the dissolution is complete as soon as the parties have made their declaration (orally or in writing—see article 138) and that registration merely affords evidence of the fact of dissolution. In the case, however, of a dissolution "upon the ex parte application" of one of the parties only (see article 18) it seems that registration may be essential since the dissolution can only take place upon such application, i.e., application to register the declaration made by the party concerned.

8. The facilities for divorce provided by the code are available to all persons in Soviet Russia, including British subjects or other foreigners who may be domiciled there. Indeed it would appear that spouses of foreign nationality temporarily resident there could take advantage of these facilities and obtain a divorce which would be valid in Soviet Russia; but, in any such case, the divorce would not of course in any event have extra-territorial validity.

9. The characteristics of the Soviet law of divorce which are relevant for present purposes are thus: (1) in matters of substance an unqualified right to divorce by mutual consent or at the unilateral desire of one party; (2) in matters of procedure: (i) the procedure is either by way of purely administrative registration or, in so far as it requires (under the law of 1918) recourse to a court of law, does not allow the exercise of any judicial discretion; and (ii) (in the case of divorces under the law of 1926) the procedure by way of declaration and registration may be carried out by one of the parties only without any prior notice to the other party, though it is provided (article 140) that the other party is to receive a copy of the record of the registration of the divorce "addressed as indicated by the declarant." Seeing, however, that there is an unqualified right to divorce by mutual consent or unilateral application, the absence of prior notice to the other party does not seem to be a material matter, since such notice would not enable the other party in any way to affect the result. It would be a meaningless formality as the legislators of 1926 apparently realised when in the new code they dropped this requirement which had previously existed under the law of 1918 (see the evidence in the Whittingham case, p. 15, Paper No. 2). The procedure is only a logical result of the substantive principles of the law. The notice of the completed registration which is required to be given to the other party under article 140 is no doubt to enable the latter to take proceedings under article 24 for alimony, and with reference to the guardianship and maintenance of children.

10. The decision in Nachimson's case was confined to the issue whether a marriage under Soviet law is a valid marriage according to English law, notwithstanding that under Soviet law the marriage can be dissolved by mutual consent or at the will of either party upon fulfilment of merely formal conditions of official registration. Hill J. held that such a marriage did not comply with the essential of marriage in English law and will not be recognised by an English court; but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, who held that the conditions under which marriages can be dissolved in the country where they take place cannot be regarded as conditions incorporated in the contract of marriage by the lex loci contractus. Such conditions, the Court of Appeal held, were not part of the essence of the contract of marriage, but conditions of defeasance incidental thereto and are governed, not by the lex loci contractus, but by the lex domicilii.

11. The validity of a Soviet divorce in English law was a second issue raised in the petition in Nachimson's case, but Hill J., in view of his decision on the first issue, held that he had no jurisdiction to deal with it. It is, however, relevant to observe at this stage that the judge referred to this second issue as raising the question "whether the rule that this court regards as binding a decree of divorce pronounced by a court of the husband's domicile, is to be extended so as to include a divorce effected by registration according to the law of the husband's domicile, and effected without notice to the wife." The Court of Appeal also refrained from dealing with this second point (see per Lord Hanworth, p. 222). It has already been pointed out in paragraph 5 above that in Whittingham v. Whittingham, where the validity of a Soviet divorce by judicial decree under the law of 1918 was in issue, the President decided the case on the ground that, owing to the absence of notice, the divorce was invalid under Soviet law.

(b) Japanese Divorces.

12. For information relating to the law of Japan relating to divorce, I am to refer you to a memorandum, dated the 18th June, 1932, prepared by the legal adviser to His Majesty's Embassy at Tokyo (Paper No. 3). It will be seen that under Japanese law divorce can be obtained in two ways:—

- (a) By mutual consent.
- (b) By decree of a court.

No particular question appears to arise with regard to Japanese divorces obtained by means of a decree of a court. But in the case of divorce by mutual consent, it seems that the procedure is analogous to that in force in Soviet Russia. A divorce by mutual consent can be obtained as of right upon the notification in proper form of such consent to a registrar. It will be seen, however, that Mr. Gadsby is uncertain whether this procedure is really available under Japanese law to persons not of Japanese nationality, but United States citizens have from time to time availed themselves of it. It is desired that you should consider the matter of the Japanese divorces by consent upon the hypothesis that the divorce in question is valid under Japanese law.

(c) Chinese Divorces.

13. In Paper No. 4, a copy of a despatch from His Majesty's consul-general at Shanghai is enclosed,^(*) which shows that, under Chinese law (Civil Code, articles 1049–1050), it is possible for two spouses to enter into an agreement in writing to dissolve their marriage; that such an agreement, provided it is in proper form, operates ipso facto as a divorce; that if the parties choose to apply to a Chinese court the agreement can be registered for record purposes. Full information with regard to the marriage law of China is not at present available, but articles 971, 1049 and 1050 of the Chinese Civil Code are quoted in translation in Paper No. 5. The Law Officers are asked to advise whether an English Court would recognise a Chinese decree of divorce based upon the agreement of the spouses to dissolve their marriage.

Questions of principle which arise in connexion with the recognition by the English courts of Soviet, Japanese, and Chinese divorces.

14. It may be desirable in the first place to consider whether, in connexion with the recognition by the English courts of Soviet, Japanese, and Chinese divorces, there is any distinction to be drawn between cases where the spouses are of Soviet, Japanese, or Chinese nationality as the case may be, and cases where they are British subjects or nationals of a third State. It would appear that no distinction is to be made based upon considerations of nationality. The English courts have consistently adopted the law of the domicile as the law applicable to matters of divorce and questions of personal status generally, and have paid no attention to the nationality of the parties except in so far as it has been necessary to consider the law of their nationality where questions of renvoi arise because the country of the domicile is one which applies the law of the parties' nationality. Unless, therefore, it can be said that there are considerations of public policy which would arise in connexion with the recognition of such divorces by the English courts in the case of British subjects or nationals of third States (although such persons are domiciled in Soviet Russia, Japan, or China, as the case may be), which would not arise in the case of Soviet, Japanese, or Chinese nationals, it would appear that any distinction on these grounds must be rejected.

15. A second question arises as to whether it is material, in connexion with the recognition of these divorces, whether the marriage which is dissolved was one celebrated in one of the countries concerned or was one celebrated in England or in a third State. It would appear that the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Nachimson case, and the earlier cases upon which this decision is based, show that no such distinction can be made. The basis of the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Nachimson case was that (a) the validity of a marriage must be determined in accordance with the lex loci contractus, and (b) the manner in which a marriage can be terminated is not one of the essentials of the contract of marriage, but is incidental thereto and, depends not upon the lex loci contractus, but upon the law of the domicile of the parties at the time of the dissolution, a law which may be different from that of their domicile at the time when the marriage was celebrated. The English courts have already, in Bater v. Bater (1906), p. 209, recognised that a marriage celebrated in England between parties domiciled there at that time can be terminated by a divorce obtained in another country in which the parties had become subsequently domiciled, and upon grounds which would not have supported a petition for divorce in England. In this connexion it is desired to draw your attention to the observations of Romer L.J. in the Nachimson case (1930) P. at pp. 242-244.

(*) Not printed.

16. Before passing on to a discussion of some of the particular points which arise in connexion with these divorces, it may be desirable to call attention to the fact that if the English courts do not recognise Soviet, Japanese, or Chinese divorces in cases where the spouses are domiciled in the country where the divorce was given, the result is that the parties are considered to be man and wife in England, although under the law of their domicile, which is presumably the country with which they are most closely connected and in which they will in the main be resident, they are divorced. Thus, in numerous instances, the situation might be created where persons are held to be married in one country and to be divorced in another. In recent cases the English courts have alluded to the undesirability of such a situation, and this consideration appears to have influenced a recent rather remarkable development towards the general recognition of the supremacy of the law of the domicile in matters of marriage and personal status. The principle, indeed, is by no means a new one, and was stated in a most categorical form by Lord Westbury as long ago as 1868 in Shaw v. Gould L.R. 3 H.L. 55, at pp. 82-83; but there was for a time a tendency to narrow its application and introduce exceptions. Recently, however, beginning with the decisions of the House of Lords and the Privy Council, there would appear to have been a considerable development in the last ten years in the direction of rejecting the supposed exceptions and towards a broad application of the principle. This development can be seen in the following cases: Lord Advocate v. Jaffrey (1921) 1 A.C. 146 (see in particular p. 152, per Lord Haldane); Eustace v. Eustace (1924) P. 45 (see pp. 49-50, per Sir Henry Duke, P.); Attorney-General for Alberta v. Cook (1926) A.C. 444 (see pp. 452-458); Salvesen v. Administrator of Austrian Property (1927) A.C. 641 (see pp. 653-4 per Lord Haldane; p. 670 per Lord Phillimore); H. v. H. (1928), P. 206; Inverclyde v. Inverclyde (1931), P. 29; De Massa v. De Massa (the Times newspaper, the 31st March, 1931). It would appear, therefore, that certain dicta in older cases, indicating circumstances in which the English courts might refuse to recognise divorces good by the lex domicilii, having been pronounced at a time when the pre-eminent position of the law of the domicile was less well established, may have to be reconsidered in the light of this recent development.

17. In the case of Soviet divorces, on the assumption that the parties to a marriage (whether the marriage was contracted according to Soviet law or otherwise) were domiciled in Soviet Russia at the material time, three main questions would appear to arise for consideration:—

- (1) Whether in the existing state of English law (including the rules of private international law as applied by the English courts) it is (for reasons of public policy or otherwise) impossible to recognise a foreign divorce, if such divorce were obtained under a law which permits of divorce (a) by mutual consent, (b) on the unilateral desire of either spouse?
- (2) Whether in the existing state of English law (including the rules of private international law as applied in the English courts) it is essential for the recognition of a foreign divorce, not only that the parties should be domiciled in the foreign country at the material time and that the divorce should be valid in the country where it was given, but also that the divorce should be judicially determined by a decree or sentence of a competent court of law. In other words, is the rule of private international law that a foreign divorce obtained in accordance with the law of the country of domicile is entitled to extra-territorial recognition, limited, so far as concerns the application of the rule by an English court, to cases where the law of the country of domicile provides for divorce by the decree or sentence of a court of competent jurisdiction, obtained in accordance with that law?

- (3) Assuming that recognition of a Soviet divorce would not be refused by the English courts merely on either of the grounds indicated in the two preceding questions, could the validity of such a divorce, in cases where there was no mutual consent and the registration was effected on the application of one only of the spouses without notice to the other, be successfully challenged in an English court, on the ground that by reason of the absence of notice the proceedings were contrary to natural justice?

These three questions will be separately considered in the order indicated above. The first question applies also to Japanese and Chinese divorces obtained by mutual consent.

First Question: Can the English courts recognise a divorce based upon a right of the spouses to a dissolution of their marriage (a) by mutual consent; (b) at the unilateral desire of one party?

18. With regard to the first question, it is clearly established that the English courts do not refuse to recognise a foreign divorce granted by a court of the domicile merely because the divorce is given upon a ground or in conditions which would not support a petition for a divorce in England, even if the marriage which is dissolved was an English marriage and celebrated between persons who at that time were domiciled in England (see Bater v. Bater (1906), P. 209). Reference on this point may also be made to Dicey's Conflict of Laws, fifth edition, pp. 424 and 426, where the author cites "incompatibility of temper" as being a ground recognised in the laws of certain foreign countries for divorce. It has, it is thought, never been suggested that a foreign divorce by a court of the domicile on the ground of incompatibility of temper is one which the English courts would not recognise, and Lawrence L.J. in the Nachimson case (p. 232) says "No substantial distinction can be drawn between such a ground and the mutual agreement of the parties to separate." The distinction, therefore, if there is a distinction which would justify a refusal to recognise a Soviet divorce by mutual consent or unilateral application, appears to be one of degree, i.e., as to the extent to which the principles of the foreign law under which the divorce was obtained differs from the principles of English law.

19. In this connexion it may be noted that Jewish Rabbinical law permits a husband to divorce his wife by means of a proceeding before a Rabbi, known as "Gett," which appears to be a unilateral act dependent only upon the husband's will and the fulfilment of certain formalities. Under the law of some foreign countries Jews are governed in matters of personal status, including marriage and divorce, by their own religious law. This was formerly the position in Russia in the days of the Empire, and is still the case in Egypt and some other countries in the Levant. No case has been found where the English courts have been called upon to decide whether they can recognise a Jewish Rabbinical divorce pronounced in a country where the parties were domiciled, and where, by the law of the country, Jews were left to be governed by their own religious law. The point arose, and evidence was given upon it, in the case of Spivack v. Spivack 46 T.L.R. 242; but in that case the allegation that the Jewish marriage had actually been dissolved by this means, if made, was not pressed, and the only point made in argument and dealt with in the judgment was that the fact that a Jewish marriage could be dissolved in this way led to the conclusion (following the reasoning of Hill J. in the Nachimson case) that a Jewish marriage was not one which the English courts could recognise at all. In the case of Preger v. Preger 42 T.L.R. 281 a Jewish divorce by "Gett" was also raised, but there the parties were domiciled in England, and it was not even contended that in those circumstances the marriage could be regarded in English law as having been dissolved by that means. In the case of Sasson v. Sasson (1924) A.C. 1007, two Jewish British subjects domiciled in Egypt had been divorced by the Grand Rabbinate at Alexandria, and the husband had applied to the British consular court in Egypt for a declaration that this Jewish divorce had dissolved the marriage. Though the fact is not stated in the report, it would seem probable that this was another case of a divorce by "Gett." The Privy Council held that the declaration was one which the husband was entitled to obtain from the court by reason of the provisions of article 90 of the Ottoman Order in Council, 1910, which provided that in all matters relating to marriage the consular court should, in the case of persons belonging to non-Christian communities, recognise their religious law and custom. The judgment of the Privy Council contains the following passage:—

"The court had no jurisdiction itself to dissolve a marriage. It had, however, jurisdiction to declare rights and, in matters relating to marriage (which obviously include divorce) it was bound in the case of persons not belonging to Christian communities to recognise and apply the religious law and custom of the persons concerned. It is not necessary to cite the various cases in which the power of courts to divorce a vinculo has been discussed. The case of Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier (1895) A.C. 517 finally settled that the proper and only court is the court of the domicile. Now the court of the domicile here could not grant divorce, but, on the other hand, it was bound by the words above cited to acknowledge the validity of a divorce good according to the religious law of the non-Christian subject. The situation seems to their Lordships identical with that which has often arisen in India. Divorce by means of the use of the phrase known as "talak" is not a ground which would be good by English law. None the less, the British courts have often given effect to Mohammedan divorces, and an instance may be found in the case of Sarabai v. Rabiabai I.L.R. 30 Bom. 537. Their Lordships are, therefore, of opinion that the appellant is entitled to the declaration as to the divorce which she seeks. The declaration as to the validity of the agreement following is a corollary, and affords in their view a justification for her appeal to the English court."

20. It is true that this judgment is one given on appeal from His Britannic Majesty's court in Egypt, and is based in part on the provisions of the Ottoman Order in Council, but, unless it is possible to imagine that after this decision of the Privy Council the English courts would have held that in England the parties must be regarded as still man and wife and as precluded from marrying again, this judgment appears to be consistent only with the view that a non-judicial divorce may be recognised in this country if under the law of the country where the parties are domiciled and where the divorce is pronounced such a proceeding is binding on the courts of that country. The basis of the decision appears to have been that the law of the domicile, whatever it may be, determines the validity of the proceeding. The importance of this decision for present purposes is that the divorce was pronounced by a non-judicial authority whose sole jurisdiction was derived from the religious law of the parties, such law in its turn being made binding upon the courts set up by His Majesty in Egypt under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act. It may well be argued, in applying the result of this decision to the case of Soviet divorces, that a Soviet divorce by registration is under Soviet law binding on the courts of Soviet Russia, although in the case of a divorce by registration no judicial authority actually takes part in the proceedings at any stage. It would follow that the rule of private international law that questions of personal status (marriage and divorce) are determined by the law of the domicile, should be applied in our courts without necessarily limiting the application of the rule to cases where there has been a judicial decree.

21. On the other hand, in the case of R. v. the Superintendent Registrar of Marriages for Hammersmith, ex parte Mir-Anwaruddin (1917) 1 K.B. 634, Lord Reading C.J. suggested doubts as to whether, even the decree of a foreign court of the domicile, founded upon the husband's unilateral right to terminate a marriage, would be recognised here as a valid dissolution of a marriage contracted in England (but, as explained in paragraphs 29-32 below, this is a decision which can be regarded as based on a number of alternative grounds); and in the case of Papadopoulos v. Papadopoulos (1930), P. 55, a decision of a divisional court, Lord Merrivale P. appears to have adopted, as one of the various grounds for refusing to recognise an order of a Cyprus court declaring a marriage null and void, the fact that the order was made by consent and was no more than a judicial recognition of a compact made between the parties to the effect that their marriage was null and void, but this, again, was a very complicated case where there were many grounds for refusing to recognise the Cyprus judgment, and Hill J., the other member of the court, did not adopt this ground in his judgment.

22. Nevertheless, although the case of Whittingham v. Whittingham clearly cannot be pressed very far, it is perhaps worth notice that in a case where counsel for the petitioner and the President were obviously seeking, in the interests of all parties, for some ground on which the Soviet divorce could be held to be invalid in England, it did not apparently occur to the President or to counsel to suggest that the English courts could not in any case recognise a divorce obtained under a law which permitted a spouse at his or her will to obtain a divorce by unilateral application.

23. It has already been stated that the Court of Appeal in the Nachimson case did not purport to decide the question whether a Soviet divorce could be recognised in this country, but the manner in which such divorces could be obtained was nevertheless the issue on which the question they did decide turned, and consequently was present to the minds of the court. If the judgments of the Court of Appeal are looked at, it will be seen that not only did no member of the court suggest that such divorces could not be recognised, but that a part of the reasoning of the judgment of Romer L.J. (pp. 244-246) is directed to minimising the differences in principle between the conditions under which divorces can be obtained in Soviet Russia and in other countries. "We have," says Romer L.J., "not been given any evidence as to the laws of divorce of other Christian countries, but it is easy to conceive of a law that permits of divorce merely for incompatibility of temper. A husband and wife must be the best judges of whether their tempers have proved to be incompatible, and if they both agree that it is so, I could well understand the ministerial duty of recording their agreement and of giving effect to their desire being entrusted to some official other than a judge."

Second Question: Is it necessary that the divorce should be a decree of a court given after judicial determination?

24. There are six different classes of divorces which may be affected by the answer to this question:—

- (a) Chinese divorces by mutual consent, which are registered in a Chinese court, though there does not appear to be any "judicial determination" except for the court to satisfy itself that the necessary consent of both spouses exists.
- (b) Japanese divorces by mutual consent, which are merely notified to a registrar.
- (c) Soviet divorces by mutual consent, which are notified to a registrar under the laws of 1918 and 1926.
- (d) Soviet divorces by mutual consent after 1926, which have not been notified to a registrar, the notification not being essential, but only for the purposes of evidence.
- (e) Soviet divorces by unilateral application under the law of 1918, which required an application to a court, but required nothing in the way of judicial determination except possibly that the court had to see that the other party was notified.
- (f) Soviet divorces by unilateral application under the law of 1926, which merely require an application to a registrar for registration.

In none of these cases is there anything in the nature of "judicial determination" in the ordinary sense, seeing that, by reason of the relevant provisions of the substantive law, there is really no issue for judicial determination. As Romer L.J. said in the Nachimson case (p. 241), commenting on the change introduced in 1927 substituting (f) for (e): "If the court by its decree had merely to give effect to the desire of the applicant, it was no doubt felt that the desire might just as well be expressed before a registrar and given effect to by registration." The function to be performed in all cases is ministerial, but, if it is relevant whether this function is performed by a court or a ministerial officer such as a registrar, then classes (a) and (e) can be distinguished from the other four classes. If it is a relevant distinction whether something more than the agreement of the parties is required, whether some interposition of the authority of the State takes place, even if that something is a mere ministerial act of registration, then class (d) can be distinguished from the other five classes.

1933

25. Both the Whittingham case and the Nachimson case provided instances of class (e). It has already been pointed out that in the Whittingham case the President held the divorce to be invalid in this country, but he did so on the ground that the provisions of Soviet law with regard to notice had not been complied with, and that, in his view, the decree was invalid under Soviet law. He expressed no opinion on any wider issue. It has also been pointed out that the Court of Appeal in the Nachimson case did not have to decide whether the divorce was valid in this country. The second question will, therefore, be considered in the light of all authorities which it has been possible to find throwing light on it.

26. In Dicey, Conflict of Laws, Fifth Edition, p. 422, the existing law is stated as follows:—

“Rule 98. The courts of a foreign country have jurisdiction to dissolve the marriage of any parties domiciled in such foreign country at the commencement of proceedings for divorce.

This rule applies to (i) an English marriage; (ii) a foreign marriage.”

This rule is based on Bater v. Bater (1906), p. 209; Harvey v. Fernie (1882), 8 A.C. 43; Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier (1895), A.C. 517; and other judicial decisions cited by Dicey, note (a), p. 422. It does not appear to be contemplated in the rule, or in the judgments to be found in the judicial decisions cited in support of the rule, that divorce can be obtained otherwise than by the decree of a court of the domicile. It is stated by the present editor of that work on p. 425 that the rule does not cover such cases as the dissolution of marriage by unilateral action under the Soviet code of 1926; and that “it may be doubted if as regards persons other than Russian subjects at least such divorces could be recognised. Nor is there authority for recognition of divorces not given by any judicial authority, and there are dicta to the contrary.” (The editor here refers to R. v. Superintendent Registrar of Marriages for Hammersmith ex parte Mir-Anwaruddin (1917) 1 K.B. 634, to which reference is made in paragraphs 29–32 below.)

27. An examination of the decisions suggests at least the possibility that the almost invariable references to the “decree or sentence of a competent court” of the foreign country concerned are due to the fact not that such a decree is the only procedure by which a marriage can be dissolved, but that it is the procedure then followed in nearly every civilised Christian country which recognised divorce at all. It is natural, in these circumstances, that English courts should constantly refer to the decrees of competent courts of jurisdiction when dealing with the principles governing the recognition of foreign divorces. Possibly this accounts for the numerous dicta which suggest that a decree of a court is essential to the recognition of a foreign divorce. For example, Lord Westbury, in the course of his judgment in Shaw v. Gould (1868) L.R. 3 H.L. 55 at p. 81, said:—

“The first essential for the validity of a foreign decree is that it should be pronounced by a court of competent jurisdiction between parties who are bona fide subject to that jurisdiction.”

Again in Wilson v. Wilson (1872) L.R. 2 P. & M. 435, at p. 442, Lord Penzance said:—

“It is the strong inclination of my own opinion that the only fair and satisfactory rule to adopt in this matter of jurisdiction is to insist upon the parties in all cases referring their matrimonial differences to the courts of the country in which they are domiciled. . . . It is both just and reasonable that the differences of married people should be adjusted in accordance with the laws of the community to which they belong, and dealt with by the tribunals which alone can administer those laws.”

The dissenting judgment of Brett L.J. in the now overruled decision of the Court of Appeal in Niboyet v. Niboyet 4 P.D. 1 contains certain passages which are of interest in this connexion. At p. 11 of the report he says:—

“As has been frequently pointed out, a decree of dissolution of marriage cannot be the judicial declaration of a mere consequence agreed between the parties for the breach of a contract, as in ordinary cases of breach of contract, or a mere compensation or individual remedy for the breach of a private duty as in an action for damages, but can only be a judicial sentence of the law of the country in and for which the court is acting, by which such court assumes to alter not only the relation between the parties, but the status of both.”

28. The above passages and many other passages which might be quoted from judicial decisions of the last fifty years might, as already suggested, be interpreted as excluding from recognition what may be called an administrative divorce under the law of a foreign country. But our courts have not gone so far as to lay down any positive rule on the subject, and it is believed that, apart from mere dicta, the only explicit references to the question whether our courts will recognise a non-judicial divorce are to be found in R. v. Superintendent Registrar of Hammersmith, ex parte Mir-Anwaruddin (1917) 1 K.B. 634.

29. In that case a marriage had been solemnised in England in 1910 between a Mohammedan domiciled in India and a Christian woman. In 1915 the husband made in England a declaration of divorce (“talak”) against the wife, this declaration being a valid dissolution of the marriage under Mohammedan law which applied to the husband under the law of India. He could not obtain a divorce in the courts of India because the courts there only possess jurisdiction to dissolve marriages of Christians, and he had tried to obtain a divorce in England, but his petition was rejected on the ground that he was not domiciled in this country. He wished to marry again in England, and the registrar refused to issue a licence. He obtained a rule nisi directed to the superintendent registrar to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding him to issue a licence for the marriage. It was argued by the Solicitor-General, who appeared on behalf of the superintendent registrar, that the “declaration of divorce” had not validly dissolved the marriage of 1910 because (1) only a Mohammedan marriage could be dissolved by “talak”, and an English marriage could not be dissolved in this way; (2) an English marriage could only be dissolved by a decree of an English court or a court of the husband’s domicile; and (3) a Mohammedan marriage, being polygamous, was not a marriage recognised by English law. The judgments of the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal are worth studying, but it will be seen that, though both courts decided unanimously against the recognition of the divorce by “talak”, the judges did not all agree as to the grounds upon which their decision was based.

30. Lord Reading C.J. appears to have founded his judgment mainly on two points: (a) the absence of a decree of a court, and (b) the fact that the dissolution was one according to the law of the husband’s religion only, which did not apply in India to all persons domiciled there. The fact that he carefully reserved his views as to whether the dissolution of the marriage could have been recognised, even if a court in India had made a decree if such a decree had been based on the husband’s right to pronounce a declaration of divorce, suggests that he considered (b) and not (a) the more important.

The judgment of Darling J. is based on the ground that a Mohammedan (polygamous) marriage is a different institution from English monogamous marriage, and that divorce proceedings applicable to the former can have no application to the latter.

Bray J. said that the authorities, and, in particular, Harvey v. Fernie, 8 A.C. 43, shows that the English courts will recognise the decree of a court of domicile, even if given on grounds which would not support a decree in England. The cases, he said, did not decide that the courts here will act on the law of the domicile in the absence of a decree; and he pointed out that there had been no such decree here.

31. In the Court of Appeal, Swinfen Eady L.J. based his judgment on the following points: (1) That a Mohammedan polygamous marriage is something quite different and gives rise to a different status as compared with a monogamous Christian marriage; (2) that the marriage in the present case had not been dissolved by a court of competent jurisdiction, and that it was not a marriage in the Mohammedan sense, which can be dissolved in the Mohammedan manner. On this last point, he referred to the following well-known passage in the judgment of Lord Brougham in Warrender v. Warrender, 2 Cl. and F. 488, at p. 532:—

“Indeed, another consequence would follow from this doctrine of confounding with the nature of the contract that which is only a matter touching the jurisdiction of the courts, and their power of dealing with the rights and duties of the parties to it; if there were a country in which marriage could be dissolved without any judicial proceedings at all, merely by the parties agreeing in pais to separate, every other country ought to sanction a separation had in pais there, and uphold a second marriage contracted after such a separation. It may safely be asserted that so absurd a proposition never could for a moment be entertained."⁽⁴⁾

Banks L.J. based his judgment on the grounds that (a) a Christian marriage is a different institution from a Mohammedan marriage; (b) a Christian marriage cannot be dissolved by a Mohammedan divorce; (c) a Christian marriage cannot be dissolved by an "agreement in pais to separate," even if that is recognised by the law of the domicile.

32. It seems to follow from the reliance placed by Swinfen Eady L.J. on the passage quoted above, that he thought a divorce by agreement in pais to separate would not be recognised as a divorce in this country, even though it were a method of divorce valid and effective under the general law of the country of the husband's domicile. On the other hand, there are certain dicta in the judgments of Lawrence L.J. and Romer L.J. in Nachimson's case, which seem to show that in their opinion at any rate the true principle governing the validity of foreign divorce is the law of the domicile, whatever it may be; and that persons domiciled in a country whose law provides for divorce, are not precluded from securing recognition of a divorce obtained in accordance with that law merely by reason of the fact that no judicial decree is required, or that the procedure does not involve the exercise of discretion by a court of law. Your attention is drawn to the passage in the judgment of Lawrence L.J. at pp. 235-6 of (1930) P., where he says that if it be right to qualify the definition of a valid marriage by the introduction of a reference to its dissolution (which, in his opinion, it was not), the qualification instead of being "unless the State dissolves the bond" (as stated by Hill J. in the court below) should be "unless the bond is dissolved during the lifetime of the spouses in accordance with the law of their domicile for the time being"; or, as Romer L.J. puts it (p. 244), "until its earlier termination in accordance with the laws of divorce that may be applicable to it." The Lords Justices appear to have deliberately refrained from qualifying this statement of the rule governing the extra-territorial validity of a divorce by reference to divorce by judicial decree. Later on (on p. 245) Romer L.J. says: "But the dissolution in Russia is as much or as little a dissolution by the State as it is in England. It is true that in Russia the ministerial act of State was, in the year 1924, performed by a registrar where both parties desired a dissolution, and at the present time even when only one party desires it. But can that make any real difference? In Russia the State official to whom has been given the duty of exercising the ministerial act is a registrar. In this country he is a judge."

33. The dicta in the English judicial decisions discussed above leave room for doubt as to how our courts would view the matter if called upon to adjudicate upon the validity of a Soviet divorce effected under the existing Soviet code or any non-judicial divorce under the law of Japan or China. It may, therefore, be desirable to refer briefly to the history and development of the law of divorce, with a view to seeing whether there is any historical basis for holding that a divorce obtained in the country of the domicile otherwise than by way of judicial decree, is not entitled to extra-territorial recognition. The Historical Summary annexed (Paper No. 6) shows that the principle that divorce should be granted only by the decree of a court was derived from the later canon law and incorporated in the municipal law of England and many other European countries. But it would, it is suggested, be erroneous to conclude that, because a State has followed this principle in its own law, it cannot or should not accord recognition to a foreign divorce obtained in accordance with the law of the domicile by a purely administrative process. Moreover, the existence of the system of divorce by Act of Parliament, though it follows a procedure which is in some respects of a judicial character, shows that English municipal law has itself provided an important exception from the principle referred to above.

⁽⁴⁾ It will be seen that in the passage from which this extract is taken Lord Brougham is contesting the view that the conditions as to termination of a marriage by the law of the lex loci contractus are incorporated as part of the contract of marriage, so that the English courts would have to apply the foreign lex loci contractus as regards dissolution in the case of persons domiciled in England.

Third Question: Absence of notice to the other party (proceedings contrary to natural justice).

34. This question would not appear to arise in the case of divorces by mutual consent, whether under Soviet, Japanese, or Chinese law, since in these cases, ex hypothesi, both parties have full knowledge. It only arises in connexion with Soviet divorces by unilateral application under the law of 1926. Under the law of 1918 notice to the other party was required, and Lord Merrivale held in the Whittingham case that the absence of such notice invalidated the divorce in Soviet law. There are indeed English judicial decisions, in which the courts have declined to recognise as valid in this country a decree pronounced, on the petition of one of the parties, by a court in the country of the husband's domicile without notice to or without the knowledge of the other party. The principle on which such objection to recognition is based was stated by Lord Penzance in Shaw v. Attorney-General L. R. 2 P. and M. 156, at p. 162. Lord Penzance, in challenging the proposition that a man might, according to the laws of this country, be divorced from his wife by the tribunal of a country in which he has never had either domicile or residence, said that in any such case the man "has never submitted himself, either directly or inferentially, to the jurisdiction of such a court, and has never, by any act of his own, laid himself open to be affected by its process, if it never reaches him. A judgment so obtained has, therefore, in addition to the want of jurisdiction, the incurable vice of being contrary to natural justice, because the proceedings are ex parte, and take place in the absence of the party affected by them." This dictum was cited by Horridge J. in the recent case Rudd v. Rudd (1924) P. 72. In that case it was held that where a husband domiciled in England has acquired a new domicile leaving his wife in England, the wife will not be bound by proceedings for divorce in the courts of her husband's new domicile, of which she has, in fact, no knowledge and no notice.

35. In Pemberton v. Hughes (1899) 1 Ch. 796, however, the Court of Appeal declined to entertain an objection, on the ground of alleged irregularity of service of process (failure to give the wife ten clear days for appearance), to the recognition of a divorce decree granted in Florida, and held that such a decree would be treated and acted upon by the English courts as final, notwithstanding any irregularity of procedure under local law, provided the foreign court had jurisdiction over the subject matter and the proceedings do not offend against English views of substantial justice. In support of the objection it was argued by counsel that by reason of this irregularity the judgment or decree was not a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, and that the real question was "whether this Florida court was a court at all." The following passages from the judgments in the Court of Appeal may be quoted:—

per Lindley M.R. at p. 790-1:—

"Assuming that the defendants are right, and that the decree of divorce is void by the law of Florida, it by no means follows that it ought to be so regarded in this country. It sounds paradoxical to say that a decree of a foreign court should be regarded here as more efficacious or with more respect than it is entitled to in the country in which it was pronounced. But this paradox disappears when the principles on which English courts act in regarding or disregarding foreign judgments are borne in mind. If a judgment is pronounced by a foreign court over persons within its jurisdiction and in a matter with which it is competent to deal, English courts never investigate the propriety of the proceedings in the foreign court unless they offend against English views of substantial justice. Where no substantial justice, according to English notions, is offended, all that English courts look to is the finality of the judgment and the jurisdiction of the court, in this sense and to this extent—namely, its competence to entertain the sort of case which it did deal with, and its competence to require the defendant to appear before it. If the court had jurisdiction in this sense and to this extent, the courts of this country never enquire whether the jurisdiction has been properly or improperly exercised, provided always that no substantial injustice, according to English notions, has been committed."

And at pp. 792-3:—

"It may be safely said that, in the opinion of writers on international law, and for international purposes, the jurisdiction or the competence of a court does not depend upon the exact observance of its own rules of procedure. The defendants' contention is based upon the assumption that an irregularity in procedure of a foreign court of competent jurisdiction in the sense above explained is a matter which the courts of this country are bound to recognise if such irregularity involves nullity of sentence. No authority can be found for any such proposition; and, although I am not aware of any English decision exactly to the contrary, there are many which are so inconsistent with it as to show that it cannot be accepted.

"A judgment of a foreign court having jurisdiction over the parties and subject matter—i.e., having jurisdiction to summon the defendants before it and to decide such matters as it has decided—cannot be impeached in this country on its merits: Castrique v. Imrie L.R. 4 H.L. 414 (in rem); Godard v. Gray L.R. 2 Q.B. 139 (in personam); Messina v. Petrocchiano (1872) L.R. 4 P.C. 144 (in personam). It is quite inconsistent with those cases, and also with Vanquelin v. Bouard 15 C.B. (N.S.) 341, to hold that such a judgment can be impeached here for a mere error in procedure. And in Castrique v. Imrie, Lord Colonsay said that no enquiry on such a matter should be made.

"A decree for divorce, altering, as it does, the status of the parties, and affecting, as it may do, the legitimacy of their after-born children, is much more like a judgment in rem than a judgment in personam (see Niboyet v. Niboyet (1878) 4 P.D. 1); and where there are differences between the two, the decisions on foreign judgments in rem are better guides for the determination of this case than decisions on foreign judgments in personam."

per Vaughan-Williams L.J. at pp. 796-7:—

"The true principle seems to me to be that a judgment, whether in personam or in rem, of a superior court having jurisdiction over the person, must be treated as valid till set aside either by the court itself or by some proceeding in the nature of a writ of error, unless there has been some defect in the initiation of proceedings, or in the course of proceedings, which would make it contrary to natural justice to treat the foreign judgment as valid as, for instance, a case where there had been not only no service or process, but no knowledge of it."

From these judgments it is evident that the Court of Appeal considered that the question of the validity of a foreign decree of divorce must be determined on exactly the same principles as would be applicable in the case of any other foreign judgment in rem, and that no mistake in municipal procedure or law could override the actual decision.

36. The underlying principle in the above judicial decisions (Shaw v. Attorney-General and Rudd v. Rudd) is that the respondent in the proceedings had been deprived of the opportunity of appearing and defending in accordance with the requirements of natural justice as understood in an English court. Where the divorce is obtained by unilateral declaration and registration under Soviet law, the want of notice may afford an additional argument for non-recognition. It would thus appear possible that, even if an English court is prepared to apply the law of the domicile and to recognise a Soviet divorce by mutual consent, notwithstanding that it was obtained without a judicial decree, the same court might decline to recognise a Soviet divorce by unilateral declaration and registration, on the ground that such a procedure is repugnant to English ideas of natural justice. On the other hand, it must be observed that in those cases where the English courts have refused to recognise a foreign divorce of a court of the domicile on the ground that one of the spouses has not received sufficient notice of the proceedings, the absence of such notice deprived such party of the opportunity which he or she would otherwise have had of defending the proceedings, and opposing the grant of the decree by the court. It was for this reason that the absence of notice made the foreign proceedings contrary to natural justice. Such a consideration has no practical application in the case of a Soviet divorce by unilateral application, seeing that either spouse has an absolute right to terminate the marriage in this way, and the notice to the other party would not enable the latter in any way to oppose or prevent the dissolution of the marriage. It therefore seems doubtful whether the mere absence of notice, and the principles upon which the decisions in Shaw v. The Attorney-General and Rudd v. Rudd proceeded have any real application to this case at all, and that the substantial question in connexion with these classes of divorces is whether the English courts can or cannot recognise a divorce obtained under a law which gives an absolute right to either spouse to obtain the dissolution of the marriage upon his or her unilateral application. This is the first question which is discussed in paragraphs 18-23 above.

Soviet and Japanese Divorces Registered at a Consulate.

37. In cases where the spouses are resident abroad, Soviet divorces can be registered at a Soviet Embassy or consulate instead of being registered with a registrar in Russia (see Note 2 to article 111 of the law of 1927). The proceedings in the Nachimson case appear to indicate that registration at a consulate was also possible under the law of 1918. A recent communication from the Japanese Consulate-General to the Home Office indicates that Japanese divorces, by mutual consent, can also be registered at a Japanese consulate where the parties are resident abroad. If there are no other objections to the recognition of Soviet or Japanese divorces, it is thought that it is probably immaterial whether they are registered in Soviet Russia or Japan or at a Soviet or Japanese consulate, and that the principle must be that if the divorce is good by the law of the domicile, it can be recognised by the English courts. It will be remembered that, though the English courts only recognise divorces pronounced by the courts of the matrimonial domicile and do not in general recognise divorces pronounced by the courts of a country where the parties are not domiciled, it has been held that the English courts will recognise a divorce pronounced by the courts of a country where the parties are not domiciled if such divorce would be recognised in the country of their domicile (see Armitage v. the Attorney-General (1906) P. 135 and Dacey, Conflict of Laws, Fifth Edition, p. 431).

38. A note on the whole question, which has been prepared by the Solicitor for the Affairs of His Majesty's Treasury, is enclosed for your information (Paper 7).

39. I am to request that you will be good enough to state whether, in your opinion—

- (a) Soviet divorces by mutual consent under the law of 1918;
- (b) Soviet divorces by mutual consent under the law of 1926;
- (c) Japanese divorces by mutual consent;
- (d) Chinese divorces by mutual consent;
- (e) Soviet divorces by unilateral application under the law of 1918; and
- (f) Soviet divorces by unilateral application under the law of 1926 would be recognised by the English courts as a valid dissolution of the marriages upon the assumption that the parties are domiciled in the countries in which the divorces are pronounced, and that the divorces are valid by the law of the country in which they take place. You are also requested to advise whether it is material in this connexion if the Soviet or Japanese divorces have been registered at a Soviet or Japanese consulate instead of being registered in Soviet Russia or Japan.

40. Sir John Simon and Sir John Gilmour would also be grateful for any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.
G. R. WARNER.

1933

Enclosures.

- Paper No. 1.—Pamphlet giving text of Soviet Civil Code. [Not printed.]
 Paper No. 2.—Shorthand notes: Whittingham v. Whittingham. [Not printed.]
 Paper No. 3.—Memorandum by the Legal Adviser of His Majesty's Embassy in Tokyo on Japanese divorces.
 Paper No. 4.—Despatch from His Majesty's consul-general at Shanghai. [T 11378/11378/376/1932.]
 Paper No. 5.—Chinese Civil Code.
 Paper No. 6.—Summary of history and development of the law of divorce.
 Paper No. 7.—Note by the Solicitor for the affairs of His Majesty's Treasury.

Enclosures.

Paper No. 3.

Memorandum by the Legal Adviser to His Majesty's Embassy at Tokyo.

The Civil Code of Japan governs all questions as to the manner in which divorce may be obtained in Japan.

This code provides two methods of divorce, namely:—

- (1) Divorce by mutual consent; and
- (2) Judicial divorce (i.e., divorce by judgment of the court).

Divorce by Mutual Consent.

Article 808 provides that "husband and wife may effect divorce by mutual agreement."

But a person who is under full 25 years of age who desires to effect a divorce by mutual consent must obtain the consent of those persons who possess the right to give consent to his or her marriage in accordance with the provisions of articles 772 and 773 (i.e., the father and mother, or of one parent if the other is unknown, dead, has left the house, or is unable to express his or her intention, or of the guardian, or of the family council, as the case may be).

By the corresponding application of articles 774 and 775, an incompetent person need not obtain the consent of the guardian (committee) in order to divorce by mutual consent, and divorce by mutual consent takes effect when it is notified to the registrar.

By article 811 the registrar is not allowed to accept any notification of divorce until he has ascertained that the divorce is not contrary to the provisions of the second paragraph of article 775, i.e., that the notification must be given either orally or by a document signed by both parties concerned and at least two witnesses of full age.

The procedure in question is laid down in detail in the Law Concerning Family Registries.

But article 811 proceeds to state that, when the registrar has accepted the notification of divorce by mutual consent, in error, the validity of the divorce is not affected even when the divorce is contrary to laws and ordinances.

Nevertheless, if there existed no intention to get divorced, e.g., when both parties have not consented to it, or where the consent of one party has been procured by coercion, the divorce is void even though notification of it has been given and accepted.

It should be noted that the free consent of both husband and wife is necessary to effect a divorce by mutual consent.

Article 812 provides that, where the persons who have been divorced by mutual consent have not determined, by the agreement to divorce, who is to take care of the children, the custody of the children passes to the father, save that when, by reason of the divorce, the father has left the house which he entered by marriage, the custody of the children belongs to the mother.

The duties of the father and of the mother are not affected by the provisions quoted from article 812, so far as such duties are without the scope of the said custody.

In my opinion, it is very doubtful whether a husband who is not a Japanese subject (and so does not possess a family register, which all Japanese subjects must have) can avail himself of the provisions of the Civil Code with regard to divorce by mutual consent. More than one American husband has gone through the form of divorce by mutual consent; and the Japanese registrars will, in fact, accept notifications from husbands and wives who are not Japanese subjects. But I do not know of any case in which a husband who possessed British nationality has joined with his wife in making the notification required. In my own practice, I have consistently advised against it on the ground that the method is probably available only for Japanese subjects, and have urged my clients to obtain divorce by means of a judgment of a court.

But I can see no objection to the obtaining of a divorce by mutual consent where the husband is a Japanese subject, even though the wife prior to her marriage may have been of some other nationality.

Judicial Divorce.

Article 813 of the Civil Code provides that: Neither husband nor wife may institute an action for divorce save in the following cases:—

1. If the spouse has committed bigamy.
2. If the wife has committed adultery.
3. If the husband has been criminally sentenced to a penalty for illicit sexual intercourse.
4. If the spouse has been sentenced to a penalty for a misdemeanour or graver offence in connexion with forgery, bribery and corruption, sexual immorality, theft, robbery, obtaining property under false pretences, embezzlement of property received in trust, and receiving stolen goods, or any of the offences specified in articles 175 and 260 of the Criminal Code, or has been sentenced to major imprisonment for not less than three years for an offence other than those above mentioned.
5. When such ill-treatment or gross insult as to make conjugal community unendurable has been received from the spouse.
6. When (wilfully) deserted in bad faith by the spouse.
7. When ill-treatment or gross insult has been received from the lineal ascendants of the spouse.
8. When his or her spouse has inflicted ill-treatment or gross insult upon one of his or her lineal ascendants.
9. When, for a period of not less than three years, it has been uncertain whether the spouse is alive or dead.
10. When, in the case of a "muko-yoshi," the adoption is dissolved, or in the case of an adopted son married to the daughter of the house, the adoption is dissolved or annulled.

Note.—The offences specified in articles 175 and 260 of the then Criminal Code, are those contemplated in articles 96 and 186 of the present Criminal Code.

If, with regard to Nos. 1 to 4 of article 813, one of the spouses has consented to the act of the other, no action for divorce may be commenced. And the same applies with regard to Nos. 1 to 7 when either the husband or the wife has condoned the act of the other or the act of the other's lineal ascendants.

A person who has been sentenced to one of the penalties mentioned in No. 4 of article 813 cannot institute an action for divorce on the ground that the same fact exists with regard to his or her spouse.

No action for divorce upon one of the reasons mentioned in Nos. 1 to 8 of article 813 can be brought after the expiration of one year from the time when the person entitled to institute the action has become aware of the fact which constitutes the cause of the divorce. And the same applies after the expiration of ten years from the date of the occurrence of the fact.

No action for divorce upon the ground mentioned in No. 9 of article 813 can be instituted after it has been ascertained that the spouse is alive or dead.

In the case of No. 10 of article 813, an action for divorce may be instituted incidentally with the action for dissolution or annulment of the adoption when there is one.

And an action for divorce on the ground specified in this No. 10 cannot be brought when three months have elapsed from the time when the party concerned has become aware of the dissolution or annulment of the adoption, or where the right to divorce has been waived.

The provisions of article 812, which I have already quoted under the heading of Divorce by Mutual Consent, apply correspondingly to judicial divorce. But the court is empowered to order different dispositions with regard to the custody of the children, if it thinks it in the interest of the children to do so.

Japanese people very rarely resort to judicial divorce, which they regard as rather disgraceful. They greatly prefer the expedient of a divorce by mutual consent, to which the consent of the wife is very often obtained by means which would render the divorce void if they were disclosed. But divorce is very much of a family, as opposed to a personal, matter in the eye of the Japanese law and public. I mean, of course, the family in the sense of the "house."

JOHN GADSBY,
Legal Adviser.

Tokyo, June 18, 1932.

Paper No. 5.

Chinese Civil Code.

(Translation.)

Article 971.—Relationship of marriage is extinguished by divorce.

Article 1049.—Husband and wife may effect a divorce themselves where they mutually consent to it; but, in the case of a minor, the consent of his or her statutory agent must be obtained.

Article 1050.—Divorce by mutual consent is effected in writing and requires the signatures of at least two witnesses.

Paper No. 6.

Summary of History and Development of the Law of Divorce.

Under the canon law of Rome on the subject of divorce a mensa et thoro—which was the law applied in the ecclesiastical courts in England—no provision at any time existed for the grant of such a divorce (i.e., judicial separation) otherwise than by the decree or sentence of a competent ecclesiastical tribunal; and as marriage was regarded as a sacrament by the Catholic Church, there was no provision at all under the canon law for the complete dissolution of marriage. It is, indeed, necessary to go back to the Roman law of divorce before the time of Justinian for any system based upon the principle that a marriage could be terminated by the personal act of the husband or the wife in accordance with such procedure as is now established under Soviet law. As is stated in Kitchin, History of Divorce, 1910, p. 254, the divorce laws "commenced in Europe with the ancient customs of the Roman, Germanic and Frankish peoples, who by a slow process of evolution had come to regard marriage as the most intimate, the most important and the most venerable of all partnerships, in which husband and wife were equal partners. Being based upon consent and affection alone, that partnership could be dissolved by the dissent of the parties when affection had turned into aversion, without the necessity of having to disclose the secret causes of their dissension, and without having to prosecute each other before a public tribunal." Kitchin (p. 255) points out that in the east of Europe the Eastern Church . . . established the practice that divorce could only be obtained from an ecclesiastical tribunal and on any of the grounds of the Roman law except mutual consent; and that "this practice has been considerably modified by the lapse of time, but still remains in its essential principles in the Eastern countries of Europe, except that marriage has been declared to be a civil contract and divorce is now regulated by the State through its legislative and judicial machinery." In the west, on the other hand, "the canon law was made under similar influences to those in the east, and the Catholic Church having declared marriage to be indissoluble, proceeded to establish the practice of dissolving it, but only in the publicity of an ecclesiastical tribunal." It seems of some interest to observe, however, that in England the decree of a tribunal does not appear to have been regarded as essential in pre-Norman times, since it appears, according to a statement in Pollock and Maitland, History of English Law, Vol. II, p. 390, that "the 'dooms' of Æthelbert, Christian though they be, suggest that marriage might be dissolved at the will of both, or even at the will of one of the parties to it."

2. In certain European countries^(*) the mutual consent still remains a ground for divorce; but in each case the parties have to proceed before, and obtain a decree from, a judicial tribunal which may have some discretion in the matter.

3. Attention may here be drawn to an article written by Lord St. Helier for the Encyclopædia Britannica at the time when he was President of the Probate and Divorce Division of the High Court, in which he laid stress on the fact that whereas under the early Roman law the personal act of the husband or the wife "was purely the act of the party who performed it," and no idea of judicial interference or contract seems to have been entertained, the canon law of Rome under the influence of Christianity was based on the principles: (1) that there could be no divorce a vinculo, and (2) that no divorce could be had at the will of the parties, but only by the sentence of a competent, that is to say, an ecclesiastical court. Lord St. Helier states that English law in 1857 adopted this second principle and that "complete divorce has never been governed by any other principle than this."

4. Before the passing of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, the ordinary judicial tribunals in this country had no power to dissolve a marriage. Marriage could only be put an end to (a) by a private Act of Parliament dissolving the marriage, or (b) by decree of annulment granted by an ecclesiastical court, in the case of a void or voidable marriage, on the ground, e.g., of impotence—a proceeding which was equivalent to a petition for a declaration of nullity which, however, in mediæval practice served the purpose of a true divorce (Pollock and Maitland, History of English Law, Vol. II, 391 n.). Apart from this, the ecclesiastical courts possessed the only jurisdiction exercisable by any court and their powers were confined to granting divorce a mensa et thoro. The effect of the Act of 1857 was to transfer to the court for divorce in matrimonial causes (a) the powers of the ecclesiastical courts to grant a judicial separation (divorce a mensa et thoro), and (b) powers equivalent to those exercised by Parliament in granting complete dissolution of marriage. Divorce by act of the legislature, of which the first instance occurred in 1551 (see Hansard, 1830, vol. XXIV, p. 1260), was adopted more generally after the Reformation in order to meet the growing dissatisfaction on account of the failure of the law (due to the re-establishment of the doctrine of indissolubility in Foljambe's case (1600), 3 Salk. 138), to put an end to the marriage in such a way as to enable the parties to remarry. There are many instances of such divorces in the 17th and 18th centuries, and during the first half of the 19th century; and divorce by private Bill is still the only means of which a divorce a vinculo can be obtained by persons domiciled in Northern Ireland. Further, a divorce by Act of the Parliament of Canada was the only method of dissolving marriages in the province of Ontario until 1930, and still is in the province of Quebec in the case of persons domiciled there.

5. There appears to be no reported decision in which the English courts have been called upon to pronounce on the validity in England of a divorce granted by the Canadian Parliament; but it is difficult to see on what ground such recognition could be withheld. Indeed, non-recognition would lead to the absurd position that the courts of this country would fail to give effect to a divorce obtained in accordance with the law of the domicile of the parties by a process similar to that exercisable by the Parliament in Great Britain. If a Canadian legislative divorce is recognised by the English courts, it would appear to follow that a judicial decree is not essential to the recognition of a foreign divorce. It might be contended, however, that such recognition would not afford any support to the view that a foreign divorce obtained by a purely administrative procedure should be regarded as binding in this country, because the functions of Parliament in respect of a private Bill of divorce are in effect judicial, and Parliament in the exercise of these powers acts as a court of justice (see per Lord Westbury in Shaw v. Gould L.R. 3 H.L. at pp. 84-85; Report of House of Commons Committee in Chippendale's case (1850), 105 H.C. Journ. 563; Roberts, Divorce Bills in Imperial Parliament, 1906, p. 3). But if this last contention is advanced, it follows that the recognition of a divorce granted by the Canadian Parliament (or another legislature) depends upon whether the English court is satisfied that the Parliament also proceeds in granting divorces in a judicial manner.

(*) E.g., Belgium and Roumania: see Reports on the Laws of Marriage and Divorce in Foreign Countries, "Misc. No. 2 (1894)," Part II; p. 34 (article 233 of Belgian Law of Divorce, 1893); and p. 127 (Roumanian Civil Code, tit. "Divorce by Mutual Consent").

1933

Paper No. 7.

Note by the Solicitor for the Affairs of His Majesty's Treasury.

It is submitted that most of the difficulties which arise in connexion with Soviet divorces and other divorces of the same kind disappear if the fundamental principle of English law that all questions affecting status are to be referred to the law of the domicile is firmly kept in mind. It is because the question whether the de cuius has the status of a married man or of a bachelor falls to be determined by the law of the domicile alone that the English courts recognise the validity of a divorce pronounced in accordance with that law. A decree of divorce is equivalent to a declaration that thenceforward the law of the domicile will regard the two persons concerned as no longer having the status of married persons.

2. If this be so, it follows as a necessary consequence that the grounds on which the law of the domicile pronounces a divorce and the machinery whereby the pronouncement is made are not matters with which on principle English law ought to be concerned. As regards grounds of divorce, this has long been settled by authority; but as regards machinery, it must be admitted that there has been a certain confusion of ideas, in which history, ecclesiastical doctrine and irrelevant notions of public policy have all played their part, and have tended to obscure the essential legal principle which lies at the root of the subject. There is in truth no more reason why English law should seek to apply its own ideas of public policy to the method adopted by the law of the domicile for terminating the marriage status than it does to the ceremonies prescribed by the lex loci contractus for bringing it into existence or to the principles followed by the law of the domicile for determining the essential validity of the marriage itself. It is one thing to refuse on grounds of public policy to recognise a status at all, as in the case of slavery; it is quite another in the case of a status such as marriage, which is a recognised status all the world over, to require the acceptance of English ideas or standards respecting the manner of its acquisition or loss. The possession of the status of marriage in the case of a person domiciled abroad is a question of fact; a man is either married or he is not; and though he may have lost the status of marriage in a way which does not commend itself to English thought, that is no reason for denying a fact established by the only law competent to pronounce upon it.

3. For the same reason it ought to be no concern of English law that the law of the domicile dissolves an existing marriage otherwise than by the decree of a court or even by the mere consent of the parties. There is no virtue in the intervention of a court, and marriages can still be dissolved in Northern Ireland by Act of the Imperial Parliament. The matter is one within the exclusive competence of the personal law. The status of legitimacy is equally a matter for the personal law, but it could scarcely be denied that legitimation per rescriptum principis (if recognised by the personal law) would be recognised in England no less than legitimacy arising from lawful wedlock or per subsequens matrimonium.

4. No difficulty is presented by the cases in which considerations arise of what is sometimes called "natural justice," i.e., cases in which English law has felt compelled to refuse recognition to a foreign divorce because due notice of the divorce proceedings was not given to one of the parties. The question can only arise where the divorce is the result of some judicial process, never where it is the result of a purely ministerial act; and in the former case only where the absence of notice is something more than a mere defect or irregularity in procedure and therefore goes to the root of the court's jurisdiction. Such cases are in the nature of things likely to be rare, for the foreign court must be credited with knowing its own procedure best, and the English court has no reason to be astute for the purpose of arrogating to itself a right to nullify the foreign decree while it remains without any power to pronounce a decree of its own in substitution for that which it has declined to recognise.

5. It is believed that the English authorities, though to some extent obscure and conflicting, nevertheless are not irreconcilable with the above; but it must be admitted that a real difficulty is created by the Mir-Anwarruddin case, which appears to lay down the principle that a Christian, or at any rate an English marriage (i.e., a marriage celebrated in England and according to English forms), cannot be dissolved otherwise than by the decree of a competent court. This, however, was the case of a Moslem domiciled in British India, who had purported to divorce his wife by a "talak," that is, a unilateral act recognised by the law of his religion as effective to terminate at any rate a Moslem marriage. The marriage had been celebrated in England at a register office, and the view hitherto taken by the English courts is that such a marriage, even if contracted by a man whose personal law recognises polygamy, must be regarded as a monogamous marriage. There appears to have been no evidence before the court on the question whether the man's personal law (i.e., the law of his religion or caste, which is the personal law of all persons domiciled in British India) would have regarded the English marriage as binding, or, if so, as either essentially monogamous or as dissoluble by a "talak." In these circumstances, and granted the premiss that one to whom polygamy is permissible by his personal law can nevertheless contract a monogamous marriage by means of an English marriage ceremony, the judgment of the Court of Appeal can perhaps be reconciled with the view put forward in the preceding paragraphs, if (but only if) it can be assumed that Moslem law would not have recognised the "talak" as effective to dissolve the English marriage. In any event, the decision cannot safely be extended to any case in which the circumstances were not substantially the same or as applicable to the dissolution of marriages in which the element of polygamy does not appear. Indeed, it may be said with much force that the fundamental cause of the difficulties to which the Mir-Anwarruddin case gives rise is to be sought further back, and lies in the error made in admitting the right of those whose personal law recognises polygamy to contract a marriage at all by English rites and ceremonies, which have in contemplation only marriage as known to English jurisprudence, viz., monogamous marriage.

6. The special circumstances of the Mir-Anwarruddin case apart, it is submitted that the fact that the marriage subsequently dissolved was celebrated in England is an irrelevant consideration, whether there has been a change of domicile or not. If it be said that because English law requires the decree of a court before an English marriage can be dissolved, even if the dissolution is valid by the law of the parties' domicile, then a country which does not recognise divorce at all, such as Italy or the Irish Free State, would have an equal justification for asserting that a marriage celebrated in that country is incapable of dissolution in any other country. So extreme a view as the latter has never been advanced by any English court, and in these circumstances it is strange that the former should ever have been entertained. The conclusion must therefore be that the law of the domicile is alone to be looked to for the purpose of determining whether a status of marriage still exists or has come to an end, and the manner in which the law of the domicile may see fit to terminate it is a matter for that law alone, the function of the English court being to ascertain the fact and not to criticise it by reference to its own standards of public policy.

(Initialled) M. L. G.

April 3, 1933.

Report.

Upon the assumption that the spouses are domiciled in the country in which their marriage is dissolved and that the dissolution is valid by the law of that country, we are of opinion that the dissolution of their marriage in any of the circumstances mentioned in (a) to (f) would be recognised by the English Courts as valid.

There is no doubt that, so far as a decree of divorce by a court is concerned, the court of the existing bona fide domicile for the time being of the parties concerned has jurisdiction to dissolve a marriage irrespective of the country where the marriage took place.

The grounds upon which the foreign court may dissolve a marriage are not material. Divorce by mutual consent or upon the ex parte application of one of the spouses is not different in principle. It is still a question, in our opinion, of the law of the country of domicile, and the fact that divorce by these methods is not agreeable to English ideas and habits is of no consequence.

If registration at a Soviet or Japanese consulate has the same effect as registration in Soviet Russia or Japan, according to the laws of those countries, the difference in point of procedure is not, in our opinion, material.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.

Law Officers' Department, July 28, 1933.

[W 9284/7582/50/1933]

No. 2^d.

[Colonial Office.]

[July 28, 1933.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, July 18, 1933.

Utilisation, for purposes other than those specified, of moneys standing to credit of Falkland Islands
Dependencies Research
and Development Fund.

I AM directed by Secretary Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister to state that he desires to submit to you certain questions with regard to the future utilisation of moneys standing to the credit of the Falkland Islands Dependencies Research and Development Fund. A list of the relevant documents, copies of which are enclosed, is attached.

2. By Letters Patent dated the 21st July, 1908, the Dependencies of the Colony of the Falkland Islands were defined to be "the groups of islands known as South Georgia, the South Orkneys, the South Shetlands and the Sandwich Islands and the territory known as Graham's Land, situated in the South Atlantic Ocean to the south of the 50th parallel of South latitude and lying between the 20th and the 80th degrees of West longitude." By Letters Patent dated the 28th March, 1917, the Dependencies were declared "to include and to have included all islands and territories whatsoever between the 20th degree of West longitude and the 50th degree of West longitude which are situated south of the 50th parallel of South latitude; and all islands and territories whatsoever between the 50th degree of West longitude and the 80th degree of West longitude which are situated south of the 58th parallel of South latitude." Laws for these Dependencies are made by the Governor of the Falkland Islands with the advice and consent of the Legislative Council of the Colony.

3. British sovereignty over the Falkland Islands and certain of the Dependencies is challenged by the Argentine Government, who also claim sovereignty over the islands.

4. Between 1905 and 1912 revenue from the Dependencies was principally obtained from import duties, rents of land sites for whaling purposes and fees for whaling licences.

5. Commencing with the 1912-13 whaling season an export duty on whale oil was introduced, the rate being 3d. per barrel (40 gallons) (Ordinance No. 1 of 1912). Notice of the intention to impose this taxation was given to the whaling companies then operating in the Dependencies by circular letters from the Falkland Islands Government dated the 29th January, 1912, and the 1st February, 1912. The letter of the 29th January, 1912, was addressed to leaseholders in South Georgia, and the letter of the 1st February, 1912, was sent to licensees in the other Dependencies.

6. During 1915 the rate of duty was raised from 3d. to 3½d. per barrel (Ordinance No. 3 of 1915), and an export duty on guano was introduced (Ordinance No. 7 of 1915). The duty on guano (of all kinds) was fixed at 1½d. for every 100 lb. or part thereof.

7. In 1918 (Ordinance No. 6 of 1918) an export duty on seal oil was added, the rate being the same as for whale oil, viz., 3½d. per barrel.

8. During 1919 (Ordinance No. 3 of 1919) the export duties on whale oil and seal oil were increased to 1s. 6d. a barrel, and in 1920 (Ordinance No. 5 of 1920) the rate was raised to 5s. a barrel. A refund of 2s. 6d. a barrel was authorised for the seasons 1920-21 (Ordinance No. 4 of 1921), 1926-27 (Ordinance No. 5 of 1928) and 1927-28 (Ordinance No. 5 of 1928). For the seasons 1921-22 to 1925-26 refunds were authorised in accordance with a sliding scale, the rate of refund varying with the average market price realised for first-grade oil. For the seasons 1928-29 to 1931-32 the duty was fixed at the rate of 2s. a barrel, the system of refunds being discontinued. For the 1932-33 season the rate was lowered to 1s. 6d. a barrel.

9. The increases from 3½d. to 1s. 6d. and thereafter to 5s. were explained to the whaling interests (including Norwegian and Argentine concerns) in a letter of the 7th May, 1920, a copy of which is enclosed. Protests followed, and copies of the more important replies are enclosed.

10. The Inter-Departmental Committee referred to in this correspondence was appointed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies in 1918, with the following terms of reference:—

"To consider what can now be done to facilitate prompt action at the conclusion of the war in regard to the preservation of the whaling industry and to the development of other industries in the Dependencies of the Falkland Islands; and to consider not only the economic questions above referred to, and the scheme for the employment of a research vessel, but also what purely scientific investigations are most required in connexion with these regions, and whether any preliminary enquiries by experts in this country could be instituted."

The report of that committee was presented in August 1919 and published in April 1920 (Cmd. 657). The programme of investigations recommended by the committee is summarised in paragraph 156 of the report, a copy of which is enclosed.

11. When authority was given in 1919 for the rate of duty to be raised from 3½d. to 1s. 6d., directions were also given, by the Secretary of State to the Governor, that the extra revenue should be carried to a separate fund. A Dependencies Research Fund was accordingly opened, and on the 1st January, 1924, its balance stood at £300,301 15s. 3d. On the same date the balance of the Dependencies General Account stood at £15,493 0s. 4d.

12. By Ordinance No. 6 of 1924 (copy enclosed) a new fund was created, under the title of "The Dependencies Research and Development Fund." To this fund were transferred the balances from the two funds referred to in the preceding paragraph, viz., (a) the Dependencies Research Fund, and (b) the Dependencies General Account. It was also provided that the new fund was to be credited with the excess of revenue over expenditure of the Dependencies at the end of each financial year.

13. Section 2 of the Ordinance No. 6 of 1924 laid down that the new fund was to be established for the following purposes:—

- (a) Research in connexion with the whaling industry and any purposes incidental thereto;
- (b) The development of the resources of the Dependencies and research in connexion therewith and any purposes incidental thereto; and
- (c) Such other purposes as the Governor may with the consent of the Legislative Council and the sanction of the Secretary of State from time to time direct.

This Ordinance was passed by the Legislative Council on the 22nd December, 1924, and on the same day the following resolution was adopted by the council:—

“Whereas it is provided in section 2 of the Dependencies Research and Development Fund Ordinance, 1924, that the fund shall be established for certain specified purposes and also for such other purposes as the Governor may ‘with the consent of the Legislative Council and the sanction of the Secretary of State from time to time direct.’

“Be it now resolved that the purposes for which the Research and Development Fund is established be held to include all the researches, whether immediately recommended or not, referred to in the report of the Inter-Departmental Committee on Research and Development in the Dependencies of the Falkland Islands which was presented to Parliament by command of His Majesty in April 1920 (Cmd. 657).”

14. The researches undertaken under the authority of the foregoing resolution have taken the form of a series of investigations, principally in the Antarctic area, carried out by the Discovery Committee, a body appointed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies in 1923. For a number of years the income of the Dependencies Research and Development Fund more than sufficed to meet all charges in connexion with these investigations, including the cost of the headquarters staff in London. Since 1931, however—as a result not only of the economic depression, but also of the new “pelagic” method of whaling, which virtually eliminates the use of shore stations—the amounts received in export duty have been seriously reduced; and as a consequence the charges on the fund have exceeded the income. The balance now stands at approximately £380,000.

15. Funds are urgently required for purposes of scientific research, &c., which are of the highest importance to the Empire as a whole, e.g., the maintenance of the Imperial College of Tropical Agriculture, Trinidad, and of the East African Agricultural Research Station, Amani. The work of such institutions is, in the Secretary of State’s opinion, likely to produce scientific results of much greater value than the continuance of the Discovery Committee programme; and it would, he considers, be definitely to the public advantage if some at least of the moneys now standing to the credit of the Dependencies Research and Development Fund could be made available for their support.

16. Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister would accordingly be glad if you would take the foregoing, and the enclosed papers, into consideration at an early date and advise him—

- (1) Whether, by virtue of paragraph (c) of section 2 of the Falkland Islands Ordinance No. 6 of 1924, it is permissible to expend a part of the balance of £380,000 now standing to the credit of the Dependencies Research and Development Fund on purposes not ejusdem generis as those specified in paragraph (a) and paragraph (b) of that section?
- (2) If the answer to (1) is (a) in the affirmative, or (b) in the negative, and a further ordinance were passed amending Ordinance No. 6 of 1924 in such a way as to make such expenditure permissible, and part of the said balance were so expended, whether, having regard to the terms of the letters numbered III, IV and VI to X on the attached list, the foreign interests concerned would have a good claim against the Crown, or, alternatively, whether the foreign Governments concerned would be able to establish a breach of international law against His Majesty’s Government upon which a diplomatic claim could be founded?
- (3) Generally.

I am, &c.
G. A. JONES.

1933

List of Documents.

- I.—Letters Patent, dated the 21st July, 1908.
- II.—Letters Patent, dated the 28th March, 1917.
- III.—Circular letter, the 29th January, 1912.
- IV.—Circular letter, the 1st February, 1912.
- V.—Report of the Inter-Departmental Committee on Research and Development in the Dependencies of the Falkland Islands (Cmd. 657).
- VI.—Letter, the 7th May, 1920 (to Messrs. Chr. Salvesen and Co., the Southern Whaling Company, Messrs. Brandt’s Sons and Co.⁽¹⁾ and the Association of Norwegian Whaling Companies).
- VII.—Letter, the 1st December, 1920 (to the Association of Norwegian Whaling Companies).
- VIII.—Letter, the 7th February, 1921 (to Messrs. Chr. Salvesen and Co.).
- IX.—Letter, the 17th May, 1921 (to Messrs. Chr. Salvesen and Co., the Southern Whaling and Sealing Company, Messrs. W. Brandt’s Sons and Co. and the Association of Norwegian Whaling Companies).
- X.—Letter, the 10th January, 1923⁽²⁾ (to the Association of Norwegian Whaling Companies).
- XI.—Ordinance No. 1 of 1912.
- XII.—Ordinance No. 3 of 1915.
- XIII.—Ordinance No. 7 of 1915.
- XIV.—Ordinance No. 6 of 1918.
- XV.—Ordinance No. 3 of 1919.
- XVI.—Ordinance No. 5 of 1920.
- XVII.—Ordinance No. 4 of 1921.
- XVIII.—Ordinance No. 6 of 1924.
- XIX.—Ordinance No. 5 of 1928.
- XX.—Letter from Foreign Office, No. W 7582/7582/50, the 5th July, 1933.

Report.

We answer the first question submitted to us by saying that it is not permissible, in our opinion, to expend any part of the balance of £380,000 now standing to the credit of the fund in question on any purposes unconnected with the Dependencies. The ejusdem generis rule of interpretation hardly seems to us to throw much light on the scope of paragraph (c) of section 2 of Ordinance No. 6 of 1924. The function of the Governor and the Legislative Council with the sanction of the Secretary of State is to select “such other purposes” as they may decide, and, provided the purposes are “for the Dependencies,” we do not regard paragraphs (a) and (b) as in any way limiting the choice of “purposes.” We attach much more importance to the long title of the ordinance and to what we regard as the obvious intention of the ordinance, particularly having regard to paragraph 3 (c), namely, an intention to use the fund so as to promote the interests of the Dependencies.

Having regard to the explicit terms of the letters mentioned in the second question submitted to us, and particularly letters VI and VIII, we entertain no doubt at all that the diversion of any part of this fund by means of a new ordinance to the proposed or similar objects would lead in due course to diplomatic representations. We do not think that a good, that is to say, as we understand the question, a valid legal claim could be made against the Crown. However binding in honour the letters may be, they are not, and do not take, the form of a contract, and they cannot be made to support a claim for damages for breach of contract. So far as international law is concerned, we are unaware of any precedent for the suggestion that a change of internal policy, even if the application of a fund raised by taxation is involved, can be treated as a breach of international law. Any claim would depend upon the question whether the subject of the country putting forward the claim could be said to have been treated in a manner incompatible with any international obligation. In the absence of the disclosure of a similar case, as the result of an investigation of the records of the Foreign Office, we should say that no international obligation is involved or has been broken.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
F. B. MERRIMAN.

Law Officers’ Department,
July 28, 1933.

⁽¹⁾ London agents of the Compañía Argentina de Pesca.

⁽²⁾ Copies of this letter were later sent to Messrs. Chr. Salvesen and Co., the Southern Whaling and Sealing Company, Messrs. Wm. Brandt’s Sons and Co. and Messrs. T. Dannevig and Co.

GERMANY

[C 9618/1788/18]

No. 3.

[November 3, 1933.]

(1)

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

(Important.)
Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, November 1, 1933.

Locarno
Treaty of Mutual Guarantee,
October 6,
1925: effect of Germany's withdrawal from League of Nations on obligations of His Majesty's Government.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Sir John Simon, to request your advice upon the question whether, in the event of Germany ceasing to be a member of the League of Nations, the obligations of His Majesty's Government under the Treaty of Mutual Guarantee, drawn up at Locarno on the 6th October, 1925, terminate. You will be aware that Germany has given notice of withdrawal from the League of Nations under article 1, paragraph 3, of the Covenant, a notice which becomes effective, if it is not cancelled in the meantime, at the expiry of two years from the date on which it is given. Certain views have been expressed in certain sections of the press to the effect that when Germany's notice of withdrawal from the League becomes effective, the obligations of His Majesty's Government under the Treaty of Locarno either automatically terminate, or can be terminated if notice to this effect is given by His Majesty's Government. A copy of the Treaty of Locarno is enclosed herewith (Paper A (1)), together with a memorandum submitted by the Secretary of State to the Cabinet, in section 3 of which (pp. 8 and 9, Paper B) the question now submitted to you is discussed.

2. In addition to the points dealt with in this memorandum, I am desired to invite your attention to certain other considerations. Article 8 of the treaty contains express provisions as to the circumstances in which the obligations of the parties to this treaty may be terminated, namely, the lapse of one year after a decision by the Council of the League of Nations voting by a two-thirds majority to the effect that the League of Nations ensures sufficient protection to the high contracting parties. While it may have been thought, at the time the treaty was signed, highly improbable that any signatory of the treaty would cease to be a member of the League of Nations, and while the membership of the League of Nations of all the parties to the treaty was clearly indicated as a condition precedent to the signature of the treaty, since article 10 provides that the treaty should not come into force until Germany has become a member of the League of Nations, the right given by article 1, paragraph 3, of the Covenant to any member of the League to withdraw was known to all the signatories at the time the treaty was concluded, and it was therefore clearly open to them, if it was their intention that the withdrawal of any of them from the League should bring the treaty to an end, to have inserted an express stipulation to this effect in the treaty. The fact that no such stipulation was inserted, although there is in article 8 a provision defining the circumstances under which the treaty should come to an end, may be invoked as an argument (on the principle expressio unius exclusio alterius) for holding that the withdrawal of a party from the League does not give the other parties any right to consider themselves released from their obligations thereunder. Further, if it is contended that the withdrawal of Germany from the League of Nations introduces a factor so unforeseen and so out of harmony with the scheme upon which the provisions of the treaty are based, so as to enable a party to invoke the doctrine of rebus sic stantibus, or the principle of frustration in Contract Law, it may be said in reply that the fact that Germany is not a member of the League of Nations does not cause the provisions of the treaty to become completely unworkable, and that there is, therefore, no complete frustration such as to bring the circumstances within the scope of these doctrines, seeing that (as pointed out in Paper B) article 17 of the Covenant provides a means by which these provisions can still be operated, even though Germany is not a member of the League of Nations. On the other hand, the treaty has always been explained, both at Geneva and by Ministers in Parliament in this country, as a treaty within the framework of the Covenant of the League of Nations and as a means of strengthening its provisions. The opinion of the legal advisers of the Foreign Office is that the withdrawal of Germany from the League of Nations would not afford His Majesty's Government any legal ground for holding that their obligations under this treaty were automatically, or could be by notice, terminated, and the Secretary of State wishes to know urgently whether you concur in the opinion of his legal advisers on this point.

(1) Not printed. See Treaty of Mutual Guarantee between the United Kingdom, Belgium, France, Germany and Italy, drawn up at Locarno on October 16, 1925 [Cmd. 2764].

GERMANY

I have, &c.
R. F. WIGRAM.

Enclosure in (1)—Paper B.

Note on the Treaty of Locarno.

(Extract from Cabinet Paper of October 20.)

IN view of Germany's having given notice of her intention to withdraw from the League, the following points in connexion with the Treaty of Locarno are material:—

(a) The obligations of the United Kingdom under the treaty may be summarised as follows:—

(1) If the Council of the League finds that a violation of the undertaking not to go to war against each other, contained in Article 2, has been committed by Germany, France or Belgium, we are bound immediately to come to the assistance of the Power against whom the act complained of was directed. In that case, as we are a permanent member of the Council, our assent is necessary to any finding.

(2) If the Council finds that a breach of Articles 42 and 43 of the Treaty of Versailles (relating to the demilitarisation of the Rhineland zone) has been committed, we are bound to come immediately to the assistance of France and/or Belgium. In this case again our assent is necessary to the finding of the Council.

(3) In the event of a flagrant violation of one or other of the above undertakings, we are bound immediately to come to the help of the injured party, if we are satisfied that the violation constitutes an unprovoked act of aggression, and that immediate action is necessary. In this case we are the sole judge as to whether our obligation is applicable.

(4) If either France, Belgium or Germany refuses to submit a dispute to peaceful settlement or to comply with an arbitral or judicial decision, we are bound to comply with any proposals which the Council may make as to the steps to be taken. In this case our assent is necessary to the Council's decision.

(5) There is no provision in the treaty which defines precisely what amount of action constitutes "coming to the assistance" of the aggrieved Power. There can, however, be no doubt that the employment of armed force in some form is meant.

(b) The Treaty of Locarno contains no provision under which any of the parties can withdraw from it. It remains in force (under Article 8) until a year after the Council, acting on the request of one of the parties, has decided by at least a two-thirds majority that the League of Nations ensures sufficient protection to the parties to the treaty. There is no provision for termination by notice because insecurity has increased.

(c) It has been suggested that Germany's withdrawal from the League would have the effect of terminating the Treaty of Locarno. There is no provision to this effect in the treaty; the only provision for its termination being that referred to under (b) above. On the other hand, the treaty did not come into force, under Article 10, until Germany had become a member of the League, and there can be little doubt that the treaty was concluded on the assumption that Germany would, during its continuance, be a member of the League, and that France, at any rate, considered, before the conclusion of the treaty, that Germany's membership of the League was an essential condition, and there are some provisions of the treaty which assume Germany's membership of the League and might be difficult to operate if she were not a member.

1933

In these circumstances it might be argued that Germany's withdrawal from the League, if it ever actually occurs, would cause such an essential change in the circumstances contemplated by the framers of the Treaty of Locarno as, if not automatically to terminate the Treaty, at any rate to entitle any party to give notice that it would no longer consider it as applicable. The question whether, and if so in what circumstances, such a change of conditions justifies such action in relation to a Treaty which is in force and cannot be terminated by unilateral action, is much disputed, but even assuming such a principle to exist, it seems very doubtful whether the change of conditions resulting from Germany's withdrawal from the League would bring this case within the principle. The main provisions in Article 1, under which the maintenance of the inviolability of the Franco-German and Franco-Belgian frontiers is provided for, and in Article 2, whereby Germany and Belgium and Germany and France undertake not to go to war with each other except in certain specified circumstances, are unaffected. The provisions of Article 4, under which the Council of the League is to determine whether a casus foederis has arisen, can be worked, even though Germany is not a member of the League. The provisions which it might be difficult to work are (i) those relating to the exceptions to the undertaking not to go to war, some of which assume that the Covenant procedure for the settlement of disputes is applied, and (ii) some of the provisions dealing with the settlement of disputes between Germany and Belgium and/or France, which involve action by the Council of the League. It does not seem, however, that these difficulties need be insuperable, especially in view of Article 17 of the Covenant, under which Germany, though not a member, could be invited to accept the obligations of membership of the League for the purposes of a particular dispute. The provisions in question could certainly be worked if Germany were prepared to let the League machinery operate as provided in the Treaty.

(d) But there is a distinction between Germany's withdrawal and Germany's notice that she intends to withdraw. Under Article 1, paragraph 3, of the Covenant, Germany's notice to withdraw from the League does not take effect till two years after the notice is given, and then only provided that all her international obligations and all her obligations under the Covenant have then been fulfilled.

H. W. M.

Foreign Office, October 20, 1933.

(2)

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, November 2, 1933.

WITH reference to my letter of the 1st November,⁽¹⁾ requesting your advice with regard to the obligations of His Majesty's Government under the Treaty of Mutual Guarantee, drawn up at Locarno, in which you were asked whether you concurred in the opinion of the Secretary of State's legal advisers that the withdrawal of Germany from the League of Nations would not afford His Majesty's Government any legal ground for holding that their obligations under this treaty were automatically, or could be by notice, terminated, I have the honour to state that, as the result of further consideration, the Secretary of State considers it desirable that the exact question submitted to you should be somewhat differently formulated, and that the questions upon which your opinion is desired should be expressed as follows:—

1. In the event of Germany ceasing to be a member of the League of Nations, would His Majesty's Government be able to hold that their obligations under the Treaty of Mutual Guarantee were thereby automatically, or could be by notice, terminated?
2. In the event of the answer to the first question being in the negative, would the obligations of His Majesty's Government under that treaty, while remaining in full force, so far as the guarantee given to France and Belgium is concerned, be in any way modified as regards the corresponding guarantee given to Germany?

⁽¹⁾ See (1) above.

In connexion with the second of the two questions stated above, I am directed to submit to you the following considerations: In support of the view that, in the event contemplated, a distinction should be drawn between the effect of Germany's withdrawal upon the obligations of His Majesty's Government towards France and Belgium on the one hand and towards Germany on the other, the principal arguments would appear to be:—

- (a) That Germany's membership of the League of Nations was clearly contemplated as the basis upon which His Majesty's Government entered into the treaty, such membership resulting in Germany being bound by all the provisions of the Covenant, including those prohibiting any recourse to war against any other member of the League, and those dealing with the settlement of disputes with any other member, and that, if Germany is not bound by all these provisions of the Covenant, the risks of His Majesty's Government under their treaty are increased;
- (b) That if Germany is not a member of the League of Nations certain provisions of the actual treaty itself, which are all based upon recourse to the Council of the League, are made more difficult of operation;
- (c) That Germany, having voluntarily taken the step of leaving the League and thus increasing the burden of His Majesty's Government under the treaty and its practical difficulties of operation, should in consequence be held not entitled to the benefit of calling upon His Majesty's Government to implement the guarantee to Germany under the treaty.

With regard to (a), the enclosed memorandum (Paper C) indeed shows that the fact that Germany, like all the other parties to the treaty, would be bound by all the provisions of the Covenant of the League, was stressed at the time when the treaty was concluded and when it was submitted to Parliament as being a consideration of great importance in connexion with the obligations which His Majesty's Government was assuming thereunder. On the other hand, so far as the matters actually guaranteed by His Majesty's Government under the treaty are concerned (violation of the western frontier of Germany, articles 1 and 2; the settlement by peaceful means of disputes between Germany on the one hand and Belgium and France on the other, article 3, guaranteed by His Majesty's Government in articles 4 and 5), it will be seen that the treaty itself provides for the application to these matters of the procedure of the Covenant of the League of Nations. Therefore, so far as the specific matters guaranteed by His Majesty's Government under the treaty are concerned, it would appear that the obligations of His Majesty's Government are not increased or altered by Germany ceasing to be a member of the League of Nations, unless this fact renders these provisions of the treaty practically unworkable. This is the point referred to above as point (b).

In connexion with this point (b), it may be desirable to add further observations supplementary to those contained in my letter of the 1st November. As it has already been stated, the submission of certain questions to the Council of the League and the decision of the Council upon those questions is the basis of those provisions of the treaty upon which His Majesty's Government's obligations depend. (See in this connexion article 3, paragraph 3; article 4, paragraphs 1 and 2 and the last sentence of paragraph 3, article 5, second paragraph.) These questions, when submitted to the Council, would be questions which were the subject of a dispute between France or Belgium on the one hand and Germany on the other, and they would therefore be submitted to the Council under article 15 of the Covenant, and be dealt with by the Council in accordance with the procedure of that article. That procedure is that the Council considers the question in the presence of all the parties to the dispute and, if any parties to the dispute are not members of the Council, they have the right to appoint a representative to take part in the Council proceedings for this purpose under article 4 of the Covenant. The decision of the Council, in order to be effective for the purposes of the treaty, would be one arrived at in accordance with paragraph 6 of article 15, namely, a decision which is unanimous (excluding for this purpose the parties to the dispute). Article 17 of the Covenant provides that in the event of a dispute between a member of the League and a State which is not a member of the League (an article which would apply in the event of such a dispute taking place when Germany was not a member of the League), the State not member of the League shall be invited to accept the obligations of membership for the purposes of such dispute upon such conditions as the Council might deem just. If such invitation is accepted, the provisions of articles 12 to 16 inclusive shall be applied with such modifications as may be deemed necessary by the Council. In the event of a question arising under the Treaty of Mutual Guarantee, which has to be submitted to the Council when Germany is not a member of the League, the Council would be bound under this article to invite Germany to accept the obligations of membership for the purposes of this dispute and, in the view of the legal advisers of the Foreign Office, the effect of the provisions of the treaty would be to make it obligatory for Germany to accept this invitation. Further, there does not appear to be anything in the Covenant to prevent Germany, although not a member of the League, herself referring a matter covered by the treaty to the Council and declaring that she is willing to accept the obligations of article 17. Once Germany has accepted the obligations of a member of the League for the purposes of a matter covered by the treaty, as it is thought she would be obliged by the treaty to do, it would seem that the effect of article 17 is to enable the Council to deal with the matter applying the procedure of article 15 in exactly the same manner as if Germany were a member of the League.

If this view of the position is correct, it does not appear that the specific provisions of the Treaty of Mutual Guarantee are rendered unworkable by reason of the fact that Germany is not a member of the League of Nations.

In considering the hypothesis that His Majesty's Government's obligations to Germany, as guarantor of the treaty, might be terminated by Germany's ceasing to be a member of the League of Nations, while their obligations to France and Belgium remain in full force, it is desirable to consider its effect on the situation under the treaty. The first consideration is whether under this hypothesis all Germany's obligations under the treaty must be regarded as still being in full force. It would appear that Germany's obligations must be regarded as all remaining in force, because any other view involves the consequence that it was open to any of the parties to terminate its obligations under the treaty at any time after two years' delay by ceasing to be a member of the League, a result which appears to be in complete contradiction with article 8 of the treaty. Such a view would entitle Germany to benefit by taking this step of ceasing to be a member of the League of Nations, i.e., release herself from the obligations of the treaty to respect the integrity of her western frontier and settle her disputes with France and Belgium by peaceful means, obligations which the treaty contemplates should only be terminable by the decision of the Council of the League.

On the other hand, to hold that Germany is still bound by all her obligations under the treaty, while not entitled to invoke some or all of its benefits, produces a result which appears to be so contrary to the whole reciprocal basis of the treaty that it seems difficult to hold that it is a proper interpretation of the treaty. Moreover, since no distinction is made in the treaty, it seems hardly possible to hold that Germany would merely become disentitled to invoke the guarantee of the United Kingdom and Italy under articles 4 and 5, while still being able to invoke against France and Belgium their more extensive obligations under all the articles of the treaty.

Further, to hold that, upon Germany's ceasing to be a member of the League of Nations, France and Belgium are able to invoke the guarantee of His Majesty's Government, while Germany is not, is to make a total and radical change in the whole character of the treaty, and of His Majesty's Government's obligations thereunder. The treaty, which was framed and expressly accepted by His Majesty's Government upon the basis that it would apply equally to Germany on the one hand and France and Belgium on the other, assumes instead the nature of a Treaty of Alliance with France and Belgium.

Further, the argument already indicated in paragraph 2 of my letter of the 1st November, that the negotiators of the treaty must be deemed to have known that it was possible for any party to cease to be a member of the League under article 1, paragraph 3, of the Covenant, and that, consequently, it was open to them, if they desired that their obligations should be affected by such an event, to insert express provisions to this effect in the treaty, appears to apply with no less force to the hypothesis raised in the second question now submitted to you than it does to the issue raised in the first question.

I have, &c.

R. F. WIGRAM.

Enclosure in (2)—Paper C.

Note on the International Discussion respecting the necessity of German Membership of the League of Nations as a condition of the entry into force of the Locarno Treaty.

1. ON the 24th March, 1925, statement by Mr. A. Chamberlain in the House of Commons:—

"It is essential to such an agreement (i.e., Treaty of Mutual Guarantee) in my opinion that Germany should enter the League of Nations, taking her place as she would assuredly do in the Council of the League on a footing of equality, both of obligations and of rights, with the other great and small nations."

2. Extract from Mr. A. Chamberlain's despatch No. 797 to His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires, Berlin, of the 30th April, 1925:—

"I finally said that I must repeat to him (the German Ambassador in London) quite clearly that, as I have told Lord D'Abernon from the first, it was a condition sine qua non of the pact for us, no less than for France, that Germany should be ready, if the pact was successfully negotiated, to become a member of the League."

3. Extract from Mr. A. Chamberlain's despatch No. 1841 to His Majesty's Ambassador, Paris, of the 25th May, 1925:—

Mr. Chamberlain pointed out to the French Ambassador in London that "if Germany joined the League—which was our basis of the whole conception of the pact—she would automatically undertake obligations not to go to war without submitting the matter in dispute either to judicial arbitration or to the consideration of the Council of the League."

4. Extract from Mr. A. Chamberlain's speech in the House of Commons on the 24th June, 1925:—

"We hold it to be essential that at least contemporaneously with the coming into force of any new mutual arrangement of this kind, Germany should enter the League of Nations and accept the obligations while receiving the rights of every other member of that society, and thus take her proper place and have her proper influence in the comity of nations and in the councils of Europe."

5. Extract from Mr. A. Chamberlain's despatch No. 2539 to His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires, Paris, of the 27th July, 1925:—

"Concerning the entry of Germany into the League, I think it important to repeat that Germany's entry is an essential condition of the new settlement. . . . The conditions of entry are determined by the Covenant and have already been stated by the Council of the League. It is not for the Allies to enter into a discussion of the arguments which Germany adduces against the Council's decision. It is for Germany to decide whether those considerations outweigh the solid advantages which membership of the League will give her, but, in any case, the Allies are unable to contemplate a mutual guarantee on any basis except that of common membership of all the parties in the League."

6. Extract from French Government's note to German Government of the 24th August, 1925:—

"The Allies are convinced that membership of the League of Nations would provide Germany, once she has entered the League, with the most efficacious method of establishing her requirements as other States have done in regard to their own interests. The entry of Germany into the League of Nations is the only solid basis for a mutual guarantee and a European settlement. . . . So far as they are concerned, the Allied Governments can only adhere to their former statement and repeat that the entry of Germany into the League of Nations, under the same conditions as are prescribed for everybody, remains, in their opinion, the basis of any understanding of security."

7. Extract from note from His Majesty's Government to German Government of the 29th September, 1925:—

"With reference to that part of the declaration which deals with Germany's entry into the League of Nations, His Majesty's Government note with satisfaction that the German Government raise no objection to this essential condition of any mutual pact."

Foreign Office, November 2, 1933.

(3)

Report of the Law Officers of the Crown.

1. In our opinion, His Majesty's Government would not be entitled, in the event of Germany ceasing to be a member of the League of Nations, to hold that their obligations under the Treaty of Mutual Guarantee were thereby automatically or could be by notice terminated. It is a matter of some difficulty to determine the precise effect which Germany's withdrawal from the League has upon her position in regard to the Treaty of Locarno, and we refer to this in our answer to the second question. But we are of opinion that neither by invoking the somewhat uncertain doctrine of rebus sic stantibus, nor by relying on the principle of frustration, could it be held that the treaty was automatically terminated or terminable by notice.

2. The obligations of His Majesty's Government towards Germany in the event contemplated must, in our opinion, depend to some extent upon the position taken up by Germany. The withdrawal of Germany from the League undoubtedly creates a situation which was not intended to arise. The third recital refers to the guarantees as "supplementary guarantees within the framework of the Covenant." Article 10 makes Germany's membership of the League a condition precedent. Further, the various pronouncements made at or about the time of making the treaty as to the underlying necessity of German membership of the League, make it quite plain to our view that the treaty was devised to fit in with the Covenant of the League. The provisions of the treaty involve the use of machinery provided by the Covenant (see particularly articles 3 and 4). On the whole, however, we have, after some hesitation, formed the opinion that the withdrawal of Germany from the League would not make any of these provisions of the treaty unworkable in their literal sense, though, so far as article 4 is concerned, the references to the Council would be to a Council of which Germany was not a member, as she was intended to be. Whether Germany, by ridding herself of the obligations of the Covenant, would produce such a material alteration in the intended risk and general position as to justify His Majesty's Government in declining to be bound by her guarantee to Germany is a question the answer to which must depend on political rather than strictly legal considerations. If the alteration is not of real importance in the matters covered by the treaty, the mere fact of an alteration in the intended position would not, in our view, justify His Majesty's Government in declining to be bound. It seems to us clear that Germany could not merely by ceasing to be a member of the League be absolved from her undertakings under the treaty. If, however, she were to evince an intention to regard herself as absolved from her undertakings or were to declare expressly that to be the case, we think that His Majesty's Government would then be entitled to choose whether they would treat such an intention or declaration as a final breach of the treaty, and themselves as no longer bound by their guarantees.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
DONALD SOMERVELL.

*Law Officers' Department,
November 3, 1933.*

NETHERLANDS

[W 3693/72/29/1933]

No. 4.

[March 31, 1933].

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 8, 1933.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir John Simon, to seek your advice on the question of the interpretation of the term "Coast of Guinea" in article 5 of the British-Netherlands Convention of the 25th February, 1871. This question arises as follows:—

Interpretation of term "Coast of Guinea" in British-Netherlands Convention of Feb. 25, 1871.

2. In June last notes, copies of which are enclosed (Paper A), were received from the Netherlands Minister, claiming that under article 5 of the above-mentioned convention Netherlands goods imported in Netherlands vessels were entitled to receive the benefit of the British preferential tariff which was put into operation in Sierra Leone last April. In a later note of the 3rd August last, a copy of which is also enclosed (Paper B), a similar claim was made by the Netherlands Minister in regard to the preferential tariff introduced in the Gambia. A reply to the Netherlands Minister's notes was returned on the 10th August (Paper C), disputing these claims. In a rejoinder, dated the 24th August last (Paper D), the Netherlands Minister contested the view advanced in the reply of the 10th August so far as Sierra Leone was concerned, and adumbrated a similar claim in regard to Nigeria; but he indicated by implication that the claim in regard to the Gambia would probably not be pursued. No reply has yet been returned to the Netherlands note of the 24th August.

3. The convention of 1871 is printed as an appendix to Parliamentary Paper C 670, of which a copy is enclosed (Paper E), and it will be observed that the relevant paragraph of article 5 reads as follows:—

"Netherlands subjects, Netherlands vessels and goods imported or exported in Netherlands vessels shall be treated on the Coast of Guinea on the same footing as British subjects, vessels and goods in all that regards commerce, navigation, duties of import or export, local dues, trade duties, prohibitions, impositions, warehousing, bounties and drawbacks, without any distinction as to the respective flags under which articles of lawful commerce may be imported or exported, or as to place of origin, departure or destination."⁽¹⁾

4. The question on which your advice is sought before a reply is returned to the Netherlands Minister's note of the 24th August relates to the interpretation of the term "Coast of Guinea," which is used throughout the convention of 1871, in both the English and the Dutch texts. There is no question but that this term covers and includes the Gold Coast Colony. The Netherlands Government, however, as has been stated, contend (contrary to the view taken by His Majesty's Government) that it also includes Sierra Leone and possibly the Gambia; and a question also arises as to whether it includes Nigeria. A map of Africa is enclosed herewith (Paper F), and a map of the Gold Coast will be found in Paper E. No definite inference should be drawn from the descriptions of territories given therein, but it will be seen that the term "Guinea" occurs twice in the West African coastline, once in the north, in the shape of French and Portuguese Guinea, which lie between the Gambia and Sierra Leone, and again further south, in the shape of the Gulf of Guinea, on which both the Gold Coast Colony and Nigeria are situated. These facts, amongst others, are urged by the Dutch Government in support of their case.

⁽¹⁾ There is an error in the opening line of the above version, as, according to the original signed text, there should be a comma after the words "Netherlands vessels" the first time they occur; but this point does not affect any of the matters raised in this reference.

5. In order to consider the above-mentioned points, it will be desirable to explain the circumstances which led up to the conclusion of the convention of 1871. Apart from the Island of Goree, off Cape Verde, which the Dutch owned from 1617 until its cession to the French at the Peace of Nimwegen, 1678, the only settlements possessed by Holland in West Africa were certain forts along the coast of what is now the Gold Coast Colony. Great Britain also, in addition to settlements at Lagos and in Sierra Leone and the Gambia, acquired settlements on the Gold Coast for purposes of trade, and similarly Denmark acquired Gold Coast settlements. Thus, from the 17th until the middle of the 19th century, the Dutch and Danish forts on the Gold Coast stood side by side with the English, the respective spheres of trade being intermixed. The first half of the 19th century, however, saw a considerable extension of British power on the Gold Coast, and in 1850, with a view to placing the administration on a sounder basis, steps were taken to buy Denmark out. This was effected by a convention, which was signed in London on the 17th August, 1850, under which the Danish possessions were ceded to Great Britain. A copy of this convention is enclosed (Paper G).

6. It was soon clear, however, that, if any satisfactory administration was to be established on the Gold Coast, an arrangement must also be reached with the Dutch, and on the 5th March, 1867, a convention was signed, to take effect from the following January, under which the Sweet River, flowing into the sea between Cape Coast Castle and Elmina (see the map in Paper E), was made the boundary line, all the Dutch forts to the east of that river being ceded to Great Britain, and all the British forts to the west being ceded to the Dutch. A copy of this convention is also enclosed (Paper H). The partition thus effected improved the British position on the Gold Coast; but the Dutch authorities became increasingly involved in troubles with the native peoples, who defied their authority in that section of the coast allotted to them. Negotiations were thereupon opened with the Netherlands Government, and resulted in the cession to Great Britain of all the Dutch possessions on the Gold Coast by the convention of 1871, article 5 of which is the subject of this reference.

7. It should be added that in the first part of the 19th century the British settlements on the Gold Coast were placed under the Government of Sierra Leone, which became a Crown Colony in 1808; and that Sierra Leone, the Gold Coast and the Gambia then formed, for administrative purposes, a single Colony under the name of the West African Settlements. In 1850 the Government of the Gold Coast was made into a separate Administration, but in 1866 it was again placed under the supervision of the Governor-in-chief of the West African Settlements, whose headquarters were at Freetown in Sierra Leone. This was the position when the convention of 1871 was concluded, and the Netherlands Minister bases one of his arguments on the administrative connexion between the Gold Coast and Sierra Leone. A final separation was effected in 1874.

8. As stated above, the question which has now arisen is that of the interpretation of the term "Coast of Guinea" which is used in the British-Netherlands Convention of 1871. The matter is one of some complexity. Certain departmental memoranda which have been written on the subject are enclosed (Papers J, K and L). It seems clear that the expression "Coast of Guinea" is one to which different meanings may legitimately be attached. In this connexion attention is drawn to a Foreign Office memorandum on the subject, a copy of which is enclosed (Paper J). In its widest sense, as used by certain geographers and historians (see Papers K and L), it may be said to include the whole coastline of West Africa from Senegal to the Cameroons and even further, and it would then include the Gambia, Sierra Leone and Nigeria, as well as the Gold Coast. In a narrower sense it might be regarded as confined to the littoral of the Gulf of Guinea, in which case it would include Nigeria and the Gold Coast. On the other hand, His Majesty's Government regard the term as being in the present connexion of still more restricted meaning and as being limited solely to the Gold Coast. This interpretation is derived, not from geographical considerations, but from the sense in which, according to the view taken by His Majesty's Government, the term "Coast of Guinea" was intended to be used by the contracting parties at the time when they concluded the convention of 1871. This, and not geographical considerations, constitutes, it is suggested, the true criterion in the present connexion.

9. From a study of the 1871 convention, together with the previous convention of 1867, there appear to be grounds for supposing that the term "Coast of Guinea" was intended to be used as synonymous with the Gold Coast. The following considerations support this view:—

(i) The preamble of the 1871 convention begins by referring to "the mixed dominion exercised on the Coast of Guinea by Great Britain and the Netherlands." In fact, however, this mixed dominion existed only on the Gold Coast, and it may therefore be argued that the intention of the convention in granting rights to the Netherlands in the "Coast of Guinea" was to refer to the territory in which the contracting parties had hitherto exercised a mixed dominion, i.e., the Gold Coast.

(ii) The preamble goes on to state that this mixed dominion "has occasioned to the native populations much harm, which did not cease after the interchange of territory stipulated by the Anglo-Dutch Treaty of the 5th March, 1867." The treaty of 1867, however (Paper H), referred in terms to the Gold Coast, and it seems reasonable to suppose that the territory which is referred to in the preamble of the 1871 convention is the same as that dealt with in the previous treaty. The two treaties dealt with the same matter and had the same object, viz., that of removing administrative difficulties on the Gold Coast.

(iii) It is pertinent to recall also that the convention of 1850 (Paper G) between Great Britain and Denmark having the same object, under which the Danish settlements on the Coast of Africa were ceded to Great Britain, refers to "all the forts and possessions belonging to the Crown of Denmark situated on that part of the Coast of Africa which is called the Gold Coast or the Coast of Guinea." The Netherlands Government must have been aware of the terms of this treaty.

(iv) On the Dutch side the only obligation undertaken in the convention was the cession, effected by article 1, of Dutch "rights of sovereignty, jurisdiction and property . . . on the Coast of Guinea." Since such rights in fact existed only on the Gold Coast, it is reasonable to suppose that by "Coast of Guinea" was meant Gold Coast.

(v) Moreover, as the obligations on the Dutch side in fact related only to the Gold Coast, it may be presumed that the corresponding British obligations also related to that coast only. The natural presumption is that as the Dutch ceded, under article 1, territories situated only on the Gold Coast, the commercial rights which they received in return under article 5 were also only in respect of that coast. It is submitted that clear words, such as do not exist in the convention, would be necessary to support the contention now put forward by the Dutch Government that, whereas Holland only ceded territories on the actual Gold Coast, she was to receive national treatment in respect of commerce over an extent of coast and hinterland many times greater than that in regard to which the cessions were effected.

(vi) An examination of the correspondence leading up to the convention of 1871 has revealed a number of points which strongly support the view taken by His Majesty's Government. As this correspondence is voluminous, copies of it are not enclosed; but it can be seen, if required. It is thought that the following comments and extracts may be sufficient.

It appears that on the British side the term "Gold Coast" was as a rule used in the negotiations. Thus, the Dutch can have been under no misconception as to the British intention. It is true that the Dutch, for their part, usually referred to the Coast of Guinea, but in such a way as to lead strongly to the inference that by that term they understood the Gold Coast, and the Gold Coast only. Thus, in a note, dated the 8th December, 1870, to the Dutch Government, the British Minister at The Hague, Vice-Admiral Harris, began with reference to the third article of the convention relative "to the Gold Coast . . . &c." The Dutch reply to this note, dated the 3rd January, 1871, began: "La note que vous avez adressée sous la date du 3 décembre dernier à mon prédécesseur, touchant le remboursement de l'indemnité mentionnée à l'article 3 de la convention relative à la Côte de Guinée . . ." Other examples abound in the correspondence, tending to show that the Dutch identified the two terms. Thus, in the same note they refer to "le budget de la Côte de Guinée," by which they clearly mean their budget in respect of their Gold Coast possessions, since they had no others in West Africa. It appears, too, that the Dutch Gold Coast Governor styled himself indifferently "Governor of the Coast of Guinea" and "His Netherland Majesty's Commissioner for the Gold Coast." The latter title appears in despatches addressed to the British Administrator, e.g., those printed on pp. 9, 10 and 20 of Parliamentary Paper C 670 (Paper E), whereas in a despatch to the Dutch Minister for the Colonies, dated the 8th January, 1871, he signs himself "Le Colonel Commissaire du Gouvernement néerlandais, Gouverneur de la Côte de Guinée, C.T.M. Nagtglas." Again, in a letter dated the 29th August, 1871, from the Dutch Foreign Minister to the British Minister at The Hague, reference is made in the first paragraph to the "conventions de la Côte de Guinée" (the plural is apparently intended to include the previous convention of 1867, which in terms related solely to the Gold Coast), while in the fifth paragraph the reference is to "la convention de la Côte d'Or," the context making it plain that the later 1871 convention is intended. Here, then, the Dutch Government clearly admit that the convention was about the Gold Coast. Another instance occurs in regard to a letter dated the 28th March, 1870, from the British Minister to the Dutch Foreign Minister, in which, referring to a recent massacre of Dutch subjects by hostile natives, he said "foreigners cannot consider their lives safe in the Netherlands Settlements on the Gold Coast." In reply, the Dutch Foreign Minister acknowledged receipt "de votre office du 28 courant . . . touchant les affaires de la Côte de Guinée," but, in a further letter, he said "Assurément les méfaits dont il s'agit sont très regrettables. Ils prennent leur origine dans l'animosité qui existe malheureusement depuis si longtemps entre les diverses peuplades de la Côte d'Or." It would be tedious to multiply examples: the matter may be summarised by saying that throughout the correspondence the Dutch reply to British notes referring to the Gold Coast with communications, which, though they as a rule specify the Coast of Guinea, clearly identify the two terms. Yet the natural expectation would be that had the Dutch understood and intended to use the term "Coast of Guinea" in a wider sense that that in which it was evidently understood on the British side (particularly coming after the convention of 1867), they would have made that fact clear.

1933

(vii) Further points emerge from the correspondence which appear to be almost conclusive in regard to the present question. These points may best be introduced as follows. One of the present Dutch contentions (see their note of the 24th August last) is that the acquisition of special commercial rights on the Gold Coast only, would not have been a sufficient quid pro quo for the cession of their possessions. But the correspondence shows (a) that in reality the Dutch Government was anxious to rid itself of these possessions at almost any reasonable price; and (b) that the major consideration which moved the Dutch Government was the grant to them of certain rights in regard to Sumatra and Surinam by conventions entered into concurrently with the convention of 1871 relative to the Gold Coast. It appears in the first place that the Dutch possessions on the Gold Coast had for some time been a source of anxiety to Holland on account of the hostility of the natives and the inability of the Dutch local authorities to control them. The lives of the local Dutch residents were not secure and serious massacres had occurred. It was in these circumstances that on the 14th January, 1870, the British Minister at The Hague wrote to Lord Clarendon as follows (extract):—

"In conversations which I have had with the Minister for the Colonies respecting the settlements on the Gold Coast, transferred to the Dutch under the convention of 1867, M. de Waal, alluding to the difficulties which his Government had to encounter, owing to the hostility of the natives in some portions of them, has stated his opinion, shared, as he said, by his colleagues, that it would be advisable, both in the interests of economy and for the benefit of the settlements themselves, that they should be ceded for an equivalent to some Great Power, who could rule them with a strong hand, and under one consistent system of policy as regards the Ashantees and other native tribes. "M. de Waal said he could not make any proposal of the kind officially to me, as the King and the Council of State considered such a measure at present inopportune; but he hinted at [sic] an arrangement under which, by paying the value of fixtures and stores, we might hereafter be put in possession of their settlements."

Thus it appears that at this early stage the Dutch Government contemplated a cession on the sole condition of a payment for the Dutch stores and fixtures.

After further correspondence, the British Minister at The Hague wrote to the Foreign Office as follows (1st July, 1870):—

"With reference to my despatches, No. 52, dated the 12th May, and No. 61, dated the 3rd June, both confidential, the Minister for Foreign Affairs has informed me that the King of the Netherlands has, in accordance with the advice of his Ministers, and with the tenor of a report from the Council of State, given his consent to the cession of the Dutch settlements on the Coast of Guinea to Great Britain.

"His Majesty has expressed a wish that it should not be in the form of a sale, but on the grounds of mutual goodwill, good policy as regarded by the natives, as well as for the advantages of commerce generally

"The Minister repeated the statement made to me on a former occasion, that all that they would ask for would be an indemnity for the value of their stores and fixtures on that coast.

"The Minister for the Colonies informs me that he had some time ago instructed the Dutch Governor to cause a valuation to be made of them, but that Colonel Nagtglas had replied that, from the manner in which they were scattered, it would be nearly impossible to do otherwise than to make a rough estimate. M. de Waal, incidentally, but unofficially, mentioned the sum of £80,000.

"Both the Ministers reverted to the wish expressed in my despatch, No. 61, that the three conventions—that relating to Sumatra, to the emigration of coolies to Surinam, and to the cession of their settlements on the Coast of Guinea—should be signed at the same time, with a preliminary note or preamble setting forth the motives of goodwill and sound policy which recommend the conventions. I am promised a draft of this document for the consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

"Both Ministers considered that this mode of proceeding would facilitate the passing of the conventions through the Chambers.

"The note to me respecting the cession is being drawn up at the Foreign Office."

From this it appears that payment for stores and fixtures was still the only formal condition, but that the Dutch Government attached importance to the concurrent signatures of the Sumatra and Surinam Conventions. These conventions will be referred to more fully presently.

Shortly after, the Dutch Government appear to have decided to ask, in addition, for commercial rights in the ceded territories, and on the 11th July, they addressed the British Minister at The Hague as follows (extract):—

"Dans nos conversations amicales il a été souvent question des dissensions sanglantes qui se reproduisent périodiquement parmi les populations de la Côte de Guinée, et des moyens de mettre un terme à un état de choses qui paralyse tant les efforts tentés de commun accord, par les deux Gouvernements, que les mesures qu'ils prennent séparément, afin d'assurer le bien-être durable de ces populations.

"En vue de cet intérêt humanitaire, nous n'avons pu méconnaître que le meilleur moyen de la garantir et de préserver la paix de constantes atteintes, ce serait de réunir lesdites populations sous la domination exclusive d'un des deux États.

"Le Gouvernement néerlandais a pris cette idée en sérieuse considération et, après l'avoir soumise au Roi, il est autorisé à croire que la réalisation n'en serait pas impossible; il serait même disposé à céder à la Grande-Bretagne les droits que les Pays-Bas ont sur la Côte de Guinée, pourvu :

"1. Que les avantages commerciaux dont jouissent actuellement les sujets néerlandais dans ces contrées leur soient garantis aussi pour l'avenir, et qu'une protection suffisante soit assurée à tous ceux qui vivent actuellement sous le drapeau néerlandais.

"2. Que le principe, d'après lequel un terme serait mis à toute domination mixte sur la Côte de Guinée, reçoive une application plus large que par le passé dans l'Archipel des Indes-Orientales, et que le Gouvernement britannique, afin de prévenir les difficultés inséparables de toute domination mixte et de rendre justice aux effets salutaires que la domination néerlandaise a eus pour la sécurité et le développement du commerce et de la navigation dans ces parages, se déclare disposé à reconnaître expressément au Gouvernement des Pays-Bas la liberté d'étendre sa domination dans les différentes parties dudit Archipel, du moment que ses intérêts et ceux des populations qu'il est appelé à protéger rendront cette extension nécessaire ou utile.

1933

"3. Que la convention concernant l'émigration de travailleurs libres de Colonies anglaises aux Indes-Orientales dans la Colonie de Surinam, convention sur laquelle l'accord a déjà été établi entre les deux Gouvernements, comprenne une stipulation d'après laquelle les Pays-Bas jouiront, sous le rapport de la durée et pour tout ce qui regarde toutes les autres conditions de cette émigration, du traitement accordé ou à accorder par la Grande-Bretagne à la nation étrangère la plus favorisée."

This was transmitted to the Foreign Office and thence to the Colonial Office under a covering letter in the following terms:—

"Sir,

Foreign Office, July 13, 1870.

"With reference to my letter of the 5th instant, I am directed by Earl Granville to transmit to you, confidentially, for the Earl of Kimberley's information, copy of a further despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at The Hague, respecting the proposed cession to Great Britain of the Netherlands possessions on the Gold Coast. It will be seen from this despatch that it is now proposed to attach to this cession conditions which, it appears to Lord Granville, cannot be entertained by Her Majesty's Government; and it would seem to be not improbable that these conditions are proposed with a view to delay the signature of the Sumatra Convention, the stipulations of which, in favour of British commerce, are not very palatable to the Netherlands Government. There can be little doubt that, even without any convention with Great Britain, the Dutch possessions on the Gold Coast will be abandoned. The authorities on the spot have recommended this step; it has been decided on by the Government, approved by the Council, and, after considerable hesitation, assented to by the King. It would seem, therefore, to be unwise to enter into any negotiations for the acquisition of this territory, except on the terms of the cession being unconditional. The usual guarantees would, of course, be given for the maintenance of the rights of Netherlands subjects; and if the Colonial Office are disposed to take at a valuation the relinquished stores and fixtures, provision would be made for this arrangement which might be advantageous to both parties.

"I am to enclose a draft of a reply in this sense which Lord Granville proposes to return to the Minister at The Hague, and I am to request that you will move Lord Kimberley to state, as soon as may be convenient, whether he approves of this reply, and what terms he would be disposed to make respecting the stores and fixtures in case of the withdrawal of the Dutch authorities.

"I am, &c.

"ARTHUR OTWAY.

"The Under-Secretary of State,
Colonial Office."

The reply referred to in the concluding sentence of the above letter, which was duly approved of by the Colonial Office, was as follows:—

"Sir,

Foreign Office, July 14, 1870.

"It was reported by you in your despatch No. 71, of the 1st instant, that you had been informed by the Netherlands Minister for Foreign Affairs that the King of the Netherlands had consented to the cession to Great Britain of the Dutch settlements on the Coast of Guinea, and that it had been stated to you, that no return would be asked for the cession, but an indemnity for the value of the stores and fixtures relinquished by their present possessors.

"Her Majesty's Government, having this report and the offer alluded to in it under their consideration, learned with considerable surprise from the note from the Minister for Foreign Affairs, enclosed in your No. 5 of the 11th instant, that the Netherlands Government, far from making the proposed cession unconditionally, were prepared to attach to it conditions the consideration of which would involve the reopening of negotiations which have been concluded by mutual consent, and the disturbance of arrangements upon which the two Governments have come to a definitive agreement.

"The terms of the convention respecting the emigration of coolies to Surinam have, after mature discussion, been finally settled, and the two Governments have, after long deliberation, definitely agreed on the terms of the convention respecting Siak; in addition to which Her Majesty's Government have consented to append to the latter convention a declaration respecting the Kingdom of Acheen, couched verbatim in the form suggested by the Netherlands Government. Full powers would have been sent to you before this, to enable you to sign these conventions as Her Majesty's plenipotentiary, but that the Netherlands Government expressed a wish that a third convention, that respecting the cession of the Gold Coast, should be signed simultaneously with the other two. It now appears, however, that the Netherlands Government propose, as a condition to the signature of this third convention, that fresh provisions should be inserted in the Surinam Convention, and that the provisions of the Siak Convention should be extended so as to include a revision of the policy which dictated the treaty of 1824, and a general consideration of the relations between the two countries as regards the extension of their eastern possessions.

"To these suggestions I have to reply that Her Majesty's Government are not disposed to enter upon fresh negotiations on these subjects or to reopen those already closed. The two conventions have been fully discussed between the two Governments, and the Netherlands Government have expressed themselves as satisfied with the shape which they have finally assumed. The alterations, suggested with a view to their favourable reception by the Netherlands Chambers, have been accepted by Her Majesty's Government, and no further obstacle to their signature appears to exist.

"As regards the cession of the Netherlands possessions on the Gold Coast, I have to observe that Her Majesty's Government would not feel justified in allowing their acceptance of the protectorate over those settlements to be hampered by any further conditions than engagements to take the relinquished stores and fixtures at a valuation, and to guarantee to Netherlands subjects the same protection and commercial advantages as they have hitherto enjoyed. If the Netherlands Government are prepared to cede their possessions on these terms, Her Majesty's Government would readily agree to a convention in which they should be embodied; but, if further conditions are required, Her Majesty's Government would prefer that the question of the Gold Coast should be deferred, and that immediate steps should be taken for the signature of the two conventions respecting which the negotiations are closed.

"I have to request you to read this despatch to M. Roest van Limburg.

"I am, &c.

"GRANVILLE.

"Admiral Hon. E. A. J. Harris, &c. &c."

It will be seen from the concluding paragraph of this despatch (which was to be read to the Netherlands Foreign Minister) that His Majesty's Government agreed to grant commercial rights to Dutch subjects in return for the cession, but that it was clear that these rights were to be only in respect of the Gold Coast. The paragraph in question begins with the words: "As regards the cession of the Netherlands possessions on the Gold Coast," and agrees to guarantee to Netherlands subjects the same protection and commercial rights as they have hitherto enjoyed." The meaning seems evidently to be as they have hitherto enjoyed in the "ceded territories"—at any rate, Dutch subjects had not previously enjoyed any special rights elsewhere in West Africa.

When the terms of the above despatch were communicated to the Dutch Government, they wrote to the British Minister on the 12th August, 1870, accepting the British conditions and enclosing a draft convention. With the exception of one article, not relevant in the present connexion, this draft was in the same terms as that eventually signed, and article 5 was identical. In the circumstances it would seem difficult to suppose that the Dutch can have been intending to regard article 5 as conferring any rights outside the Gold Coast.

The further fact that in Dutch eyes a major part of the consideration for the cession lay in the signature of the Sumatra and Surinam Conventions is emphasised by subsequent correspondence. Thus, on the 30th September, 1870, the British Minister at The Hague wrote to Lord Granville as follows (extract):—

1933

“With reference to my despatch No. 62, dated the 23rd instant, recording the substance of my conversation with M. Lansberg on the subject of your Lordship's objections to certain portions of the draft of convention proposed by the Netherlands Government for the cession of their settlements on the Gold Coast, and of the concessions which the latter were disposed to make, I have now the honour to enclose copy of a note which I have received from the Minister for Foreign Affairs, in which it is stated that his Government accepts your Lordship's declaration that the ratifications of the conventions relative to Sumatra and Surinam must stand and fall together. On the other hand, the Dutch Government asks for the same terms respecting the conventions of Sumatra and the Gold Coast. The Minister in his note goes at great length into his reasons for this request, and I may repeat to your Lordship what has been stated to me confidentially, that the whole drift of this argument to be used in presenting the three conventions together to the States General is to secure the passing of those relative to Sumatra and the Gold Coast, the success of which, if proposed singly, might be greatly compromised. That this Government are in earnest in their wish to get them through I have reason to believe from the concessions which they have made.”

The relevant part of the note from the Dutch Government referred to in the above despatch is as follows:—

“Les motifs pour lesquels le Gouvernement du Roi doit tenir à présenter simultanément à l'approbation des États-Généraux les deux conventions ont une importance qui ne saurait échapper à la sagacité de votre Excellence.

“En effet, ces conventions règlent non seulement, toutes les deux, des questions territoriales, mais elles contiennent en outre des stipulations qui en rendent l'examen et la discussion simultanés recommandables sous plus d'un rapport. D'abord, il est question des relations futures des deux États avec des contrées restaurées par le même traité (celui du 13 août 1814), sous la domination des Pays-Bas.

“Ensuite, si d'une part l'arrangement concernant la Côte de Guinée met fin à l'influence néerlandaise sur ce territoire, d'autre part la convention concernant Siak peut être considérée dans un sens politique comme offrant une compensation, en facilitant la consolidation de l'influence néerlandaise dans l'île de Sumatra.

“Or, l'occasion et la facilité d'indiquer cette compensation seraient perdues pour le Gouvernement des Pays-Bas, ou du moins ne pourraient être utilisées avec une égale chance de succès, si un retard dans la conclusion de la convention relative à la Côte de Guinée l'obligeait à présenter cette convention à l'approbation des États-Généraux expériment, et à discuter et réfuter de la même manière les observations et les objections que l'abandon de ladite côte par les Pays-Bas, considéré comme mesure isolée, ne manquerait pas de rencontrer.

“Je pourrais, pour faire ressortir l'existence d'une véritable solidarité entre les deux conventions, me borner aux considérations qui précèdent. Mais il ne sera peut-être pas entièrement superflu, M. le Vice-Amiral, de vous faire remarquer qu'une partie du projet de convention concernant la Côte de Guinée, notamment l'article 5, a été calquée sur la partie analogue de la convention de Siak.

“L'article indiqué en dernier lieu, après avoir été rédigé expressément en vue de l'état de choses dans le Royaume de Siak et dépendances, a été inséré sans modifications dans la convention sur la Côte de Guinée, parce qu'on savait que le Gouvernement britannique l'approuvait. Aussi Lord Granville l'ayant retrouvé dans la même convention ne l'a-t-il cité que pour y adhérer. Si la convention relative à la Côte de Guinée avait été rédigée uniquement en vue des intérêts des Pays-Bas sur cette côte, la rédaction proposée aurait été probablement différente. Telle qu'elle est, pour pouvoir la défendre efficacement devant les Chambres, il faudra se prévaloir de son analogie avec la rédaction de l'article correspondant de la convention sur Siak.

“Mais si, pour toutes ces raisons, le Gouvernement des Pays-Bas vient à son tour exprimer le désir que le Gouvernement britannique ne perde pas de vue la connexion entre les deux conventions que je viens de citer, il resterait à examiner s'il existe réellement des obstacles sérieux qui s'opposent à la réalisation de ce désir.”

It should be explained in connexion with the above that, although the three conventions relating to the Gold Coast, Sumatra and Surinam were signed at different times,⁽²⁾ the ratifications bringing each into force were exchanged on the same day, viz., the 17th February, 1872, so that they became operative together. There is a close analogy between these conventions. By the Sumatra Convention Great Britain agreed to make no objection to the extension of Dutch dominion in the Island of Sumatra, receiving in return commercial rights analogous to those conferred on Holland by article 5 of the Gold Coast Convention. By the Surinam Convention the Dutch were given the right to recruit labour for Surinam from British India. In this latter connexion, it is significant that on the 2nd November, 1871, a protocol was added to the (as yet) unratified Gold Coast Convention, by which it was provided that, if at any time the British Government allowed the recruitment of labour in the British possessions on the “Coast of Guinea” for use in other British Colonies, such recruitment for use in Dutch Colonies should also be permitted. The inter-connexion between the three conventions seems therefore clear.

(viii) In conclusion, in support of the British case, it appears further that, after the conclusion of the 1867 treaty, maps were prepared in connexion with it by the Dutch authorities, and these were stated to be of “the British and Dutch possessions on the Coast” of Guinea; but, in fact, they only covered the Gold Coast area, whereas Great Britain at least had possessions outside that area. It seems clear that by Coast of Guinea the Dutch understood and referred only to the Gold Coast.

10. The Dutch counter-arguments, as evidenced in the further note from the Netherlands Minister of the 24th August last, appear to be as follows:—

(a) It is alleged that the term Coast of Guinea has a recognised signification as covering the whole West African coast from Portuguese and French Guinea, which lie north of Sierra Leone but south of Gambia, to the Cameroons. As already stated, the term, in fact, appears to have no definite meaning, though, as ordinarily used, it no doubt covers more than the Gold Coast. But even according to the Dutch view, the term would scarcely cover the Gambia (which lies to the north of French and Portuguese Guinea); and this, it will be observed, the Netherlands note of the 24th August in effect admits.

(b) It is stated that there is no reason to suppose that the term Coast of Guinea, as used in the convention of 1871, has a meaning other than the ordinary one. Apart from the fact that the term has no definite ordinary meaning, His Majesty's Government, for the reasons given above, believe that it is clear from the wording of the convention and the surrounding circumstances that the parties were referring to the area in which they had exercised mixed dominion, i.e., the Gold Coast only.

(c) The arguments in the second paragraph of the Netherlands Minister's note of the 24th August are difficult to follow; they seem only to be intelligible or pertinent on the assumption that the entire Gold Coast was possessed by the Dutch, and ceded by them in the convention of 1871. In fact, only part of the Gold Coast was in Dutch possession. In the view of His Majesty's Government the reference to “Netherland Guinea” in article 4 of the convention is simply to that part of the Gold Coast which was Dutch, and not, as the Dutch argument seems to imply, to the entire Gold Coast.

⁽²⁾ The Gold Coast Convention was signed on the 25th February, 1871; the Sumatra Convention (State Papers, vol. 61, p. 19) on the 2nd November, 1871; and the Surinam Convention (State Papers, vol. 60, p. 22) on the 8th September, 1870.

⁽³⁾ In the letter of the 28th July from the Foreign Office to the Colonial Office “Coast of Guinea” in this passage is misquoted as “Dutch Guinea.”

1933

(d) The argument in the third paragraph of the same Dutch note is that the convention did not contemplate that the grant of commercial rights to the Dutch was to be limited to that part of the coast which included the ceded territory. Yet, in the same paragraph, the unsoundness of this contention is impliedly admitted, for it is pointed out that in return for the cession it was necessary for Holland "to obtain a guarantee that, with the disappearance of these rights and properties, the equality of conditions which up to that time Dutch trade had enjoyed on the Coast of Guinea should not likewise disappear"; yet the only part of the "Coast of Guinea" in which the Dutch had hitherto enjoyed these trading conditions, at any rate as of right, and the only part of the West African Coast in which they stood to lose any rights by the cession, was the Gold Coast, since it was here and here only that they had any possessions and could claim any rights. In any event the Dutch contention seems quite at variance with the position as revealed by the correspondence already quoted.

(e) Finally, it is argued that at the time of the convention of 1871 the Gold Coast was not a separate Colony, but was under Sierra Leone, and that even if the term Coast of Guinea did not include the whole coast line from Guinea to the Cameroons, it must have included Sierra Leone. It is, of course, true that at the time the Gold Coast was, in common with other West African settlements, administered through a Governor-in-chief, with headquarters in Sierra Leone, but it was a separate sub-Administration, with its own Legislative Council and local authorities, and since it was also a separate geographic and economic unit, it is submitted that the fact that Sierra Leone and the Gold Coast had a common Governor-in-chief has no necessary bearing on the matter. The Dutch argument really implies that, even if the convention did only apply to the Gold Coast, Sierra Leone was united to, and therefore part of, the Gold Coast, a patent absurdity.

11. The Secretary of State would be obliged if you would consider this matter, and if you would favour him with your opinion on the points mentioned in the next paragraph, bearing in mind that the Netherlands Government may press for international arbitration, and that international courts are somewhat more disposed than English ones, in construing documents, to admit evidence based on extraneous circumstances, such as previous treaties, travaux préparatoires, &c. The only definite pronouncement made by the Permanent Court of International Justice on this latter question is that preparatory documents are not admissible when the meaning of a treaty is clear on the face of it. By implication, however, the court would seem to admit that such documents may be considered in cases of ambiguity, and it has, in fact, shown a disposition to look at preparatory documents, though, in the cases where it has done so, it has held that, in fact, they merely confirmed the already clear meaning of the treaty (see Publications of the Court, Series A, No. 16, the Lotus case; Series B, No. 14, pp. 28 and 31, European Commission of the Danube; Series B, No. 12, p. 22, Article 3 (2) of the Treaty of Lausanne; Series B, Nos. 2-3, p. 41, Competence of the International Labour Organisation; Series A, Nos. 20-21, p. 30, Serbian Bonds).

12. The points on which your opinion is requested are—

- (a) Whether the scope of article 5 of the British-Netherlands Convention of the 25th February, 1871, can be regarded as confined to the Colony of the Gold Coast;
- (b) If not, whether it can be regarded as confined to the Colony of the Gold Coast and Nigeria, i.e., to the littoral of the Gulf of Guinea; or
- (c) Whether it must be regarded as extending to Sierra Leone.

13. As already stated, you will observe from the Netherlands Minister's note of the 24th August that the Netherlands Government will probably not persist in contending that the Colony of the Gambia is part of the Coast of Guinea, or claim for Netherlands goods the benefit of the British preferential tariff which has recently been introduced in that Colony. It would be of value, however, if you would also say whether, in your opinion, any claim on the part of the Netherlands Government based on article 5 of the convention of 1871 that Netherlands goods should receive national treatment in the Gambia could be successfully resisted.

14. Sir John Simon would also be glad of any further observations on the case generally which you may feel disposed to offer. As some delay has occurred in replying to the Netherlands Minister, and a further note has recently been received from him pressing for an early reply, Sir John Simon would be glad if the matter could be considered as soon as is conveniently possible.

I have, &c.

C. HOWARD SMITH.

List of Papers.

- Paper A. Netherlands Minister's Notes of the 29th June and the 4th July, 1932 [W 7499/7499/29].
 Paper B. Netherlands Minister's Note of the 3rd August, 1932 [W 8892/7499/29].
 Paper C. Foreign Office reply to Netherlands Minister of the 10th August, 1932 [W 8915/7499/29].
 Paper D. Netherlands Minister's Note of the 24th August, 1932 [W 9581/7499/29].
 Paper E. Parliamentary Paper C. 670 [Parliamentary 1525].
 Paper F. Map of Africa.
 Paper G. Anglo-Danish Convention signed in London on the 17th August, 1850 [Treaty 349].
 Paper H. Anglo-Dutch Convention signed on the 5th March, 1867 [Treaty 499].
 Paper J. Foreign Office Memorandum of the 25th July, 1932 [W 8449/7499/29].
 Paper K. Colonial Office Memorandum of the 21st July, 1932 [W 8449/7499/29].
 Paper L. Colonial Office Memorandum of the 1st September, 1932 [W 11322/7499/29].

Report.

(a) We are of opinion that the scope of article 5 of the British-Netherlands Convention of the 25th February, 1871, must be regarded as confined to the Colony of the Gold Coast. In coming to this conclusion we have been influenced chiefly by the terms of the convention itself. The expression "Coast of Guinea" is used in the preamble as denoting, in our opinion, the Gold Coast. The alternative is to read the expression in the preamble in its purely geographical sense, but that would make it convey no more than some such general expression as "the West Coast of Africa," or any other geographical term covering a far wider range than was relevant to the matter in hand. The same observations apply to the use of the expression in article 1. In article 5 the expression "the Coast of Guinea" must, in our opinion, be read as having the same meaning as in the earlier parts of the convention.

Consideration of the Danish Convention of 1850 and of the Netherlands Convention of 1867, together with the maps prepared in that connexion and of the correspondence leading up to the convention in question, all appear to us to confirm the construction which we put upon the convention when considered alone.

(b) and (c). These questions do not arise. If, contrary to our opinion, the expression denotes the whole length of coast line to which in some context or other the word "Guinea" is applied, it would most probably be found to include Sierra Leone, but not Gambia. From any point of view, therefore, we are of opinion that a claim that Netherlands goods should receive national treatment in the Gambia could be successfully resisted.

T. W. H. INSKIP.

F. B. MERRIMAN.

Law Officers' Department,
March 31, 1933.

PERSIA.

[E 6833/1273/34]

No. 5.

[November 9, 1933.]

(1)

*Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.*Status of Basidu.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, October 26, 1933.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir John Simon, to request the favour of your advice on a question on which it is desired to reach an urgent decision, in connexion with the proposed early resumption of negotiations for a general treaty settlement with Persia.

2. The question on which your opinion is desired is the status of a small area known as British Basidu at the north-western corner of the Persian island of Qishm at the mouth of the Persian Gulf. This area, the boundaries of which have never been definitely demarcated, contains, apart from a native village, a few store-houses, guard-houses and other buildings, a flag-staff and a British-Indian cemetery. For more than a hundred years the British flag has been flown from the flag-staff; from 1823 to 1883 the area was in regular use as a naval station, and was occupied by a British garrison of varying size. In 1883 the garrison was removed, although the station continued in use for naval purposes, principally as a coal depot. In 1913 the naval station was transferred to the neighbouring island of Henjam, and since that time Basidu has been regarded as of value only as a possible alternative to Henjam (which is used by His Majesty's ships only on sufferance), or as a pawn for use in eventual treaty negotiations with Persia, and has not been in regular occupation. The flag has continued to fly there in the charge of a native caretaker, and British warships have at irregular intervals landed detachments, which, notwithstanding the uncertainty as to the exact boundaries, are understood to have performed a ceremony described as "beating the bounds."

3. In the course of recent negotiations with Persia for a general Anglo-Persian treaty settlement, His Majesty's Government had expressed their willingness, provided that a satisfactory treaty were concluded, to transfer the British rights at Basidu to Persia by an article in the proposed treaty. The terms of such an article have already been discussed and agreed upon (subject to the conclusion of a satisfactory treaty) with the Persian Government (see Paper C). It was intended to reopen the general negotiations with Persia in the near future, but certain recent events have led the Admiralty to take the view that for strategic reasons it might be preferable to transfer the naval station back to Basidu from Henjam, and that, accordingly, it may be undesirable to effect the proposed transfer of the British rights at Basidu to Persia.

4. The question whether His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom should attempt to maintain the existing position at Basidu must depend to a large extent on the legality of that position, and it is on this question that your advice is urgently requested. Although it is clear from the attached historical note (Paper B) that rights of a fairly extensive character have, in fact, been exercised by His Majesty's Government within the concession during the period of its occupation, the precise nature and extent of those rights is not known; but, as far as it has been possible to ascertain, the Persian officials stationed in the neighbouring village of "Persian Basidu," situated outside the concession area, appear to have made no attempt until very recently to collect taxes, to conscript natives of "British Basidu," or to interfere in its affairs in any way. Order appears to have been maintained when necessary by the British naval or military authorities.

5. The concession is held by His Majesty's Government under a written grant in very general terms made in 1820 by the then Imam of Muscat (see paragraph 21 of Paper B), confirmed in a subsequent Anglo-Muscati Agreement of 1864 (see paragraph 43 of Paper B) as having been freely made by the original grantor on behalf of himself, his heirs and successors.

6. There are two main points at issue: The first is whether the Imam of Muscat, when he made the original grant in 1820, did so as Sovereign of the island of Qishm, on which Basidu is situated (thus being entitled to transfer the sovereignty over any part of the island to a foreign Power), or merely as tenant of Qishm, and so of Basidu, from the Persian Government. The second point is, on the assumption that the rights derived from the original grant amounted to something less than full sovereignty, what rights, if any, His Majesty's Government can legitimately claim at Basidu (a) in virtue of the original grant, and (b) by prescription or otherwise in view of the history of their continued occupation as described below.

7. The question whether there is any reliable basis for a claim by Muscat to have held the island of Qishm, and so Basidu, in full sovereignty at the time when the grant was made is examined in the India Office memorandum, of which a copy is attached (Paper A). The conclusion reached by the India Office in that memorandum, on a review of the history of the island (in so far as this is on record) since 1720, and of the relevant facts, is that there is no substantial foundation for a claim to sovereignty by Muscat, and that it would be difficult, if not impossible, on the available evidence, to maintain such a claim. The Foreign Office agree with this view.

8. The Admiralty, whilst agreeing with the statement of facts as set forth in Papers A and B, nevertheless cannot associate themselves with the conclusions drawn by the India Office in the former document. They feel that, on the facts stated in the memorandum at Paper B, there is evidence that, in the view of one of the parties to the settlement of 1794, namely, Muscat, the effect of the conquest of the islands of Qishm and Hormuz was to transfer the sovereignty of these islands to Muscat in addition to the transfer of the lease of the remaining dependencies of Bandar Abbas. In their view, the only important evidence on the Persian side is the Persian refusal to lease the island in 1801 (Paper B, paragraph 7), the Persian protest in 1805 against the recovery of Bandar Abbas and its dependencies for the Imam of Muscat by a Muscati-British force (Paper B, paragraph 8), and the correspondence of 1820 (Paper B, paragraphs 22, 24, 25, 31 and 32). In these circumstances, the conclusion that they would draw is that the evidence is insufficient to settle the matter.

9. In connexion with the second point mentioned in paragraph 6 above, the following considerations may be relevant:—

(a) Notwithstanding the fact that the Persian Government protested in 1820 against the stationing of a British detachment in the Island of Qishm, which they claimed, in opposition to the claims of the Imam of Muscat, as Persian territory, and the fact that the detachment was withdrawn in 1822 in the interest of maintaining friendly relations with Persia, though specifically without prejudice to the question of the title to the island, the detachment was reinstated at the end of 1822. No protest was made at the time or since by Persia, and the British occupation of the area appears to have been unchallenged and unquestioned until, in 1923, the Persian Government revived the question of the basis of British rights in it, though even then they did not formally challenge those rights.

(b) In 1855, when the Imam of Muscat was granted a fresh lease by Persia of Bandar Abbas and its dependencies, including the island of Qishm, which formally recognised Qishm Island as Persian territory, the lease granted by the Persian Government contained the following articles:—

"On the following conditions, we entrust the Government of Bandar Abbas, the Islands of Qishm and Hormuz . . . to His Highness Syad Saeed Khan, the Imam of Muscat and Oman. . . ."

"ARTICLE 13.

"As long as Bandar Abbas, the above-mentioned two islands, Shermal, Minab, and their dependencies, are in the hands of the Imam of Muscat, he should not allow any officers of foreign Governments to go there. He should also promise to protect these places by land and sea, providing for every port having an anchorage some ships bughlas, and other vessels of war. He should further promise to protect all the boundaries of the above-mentioned places from all interference and intrusion of strangers, whether in an amicable or hostile manner. He should not at any time allow any ship, bughla, or other vessels of war, or any hostile person, armed or otherwise, Arab or foreign, to approach or get a footing at Bandar Abbas or the Persian territory with hostile intentions or other pretexts.

“ARTICLE 14.

“The Imam of Muscat, notwithstanding these conditions, has not the right of letting Bandar Abbas and the above said places to any foreigner or others. He can only himself hold them, appointing one of his relatives for the management thereof who would act in accordance with these conditions.”

It will be observed that despite the fact that the Island of Qishm is specified as one of the areas covered by the lease; that Basidu and its anchorage are situate in that island; and that at the date of the lease there was undisguised British occupation of the station at Basidu, as evidenced by the flying of the British flag, the undisguised maintenance of a considerable station, coal depots, hospital, &c., no reference to the British concession occurs in the lease, the terms of article 13 of which are prima facie inconsistent with the retention of that concession by His Majesty's Government; but that despite this His Majesty's Government continued to occupy the concession without interference or protest by Persia or Muscat.

(c) In 1857 the war between Great Britain and Persia was terminated by the Treaty of Paris. Article 2 of that treaty provides that “peace being happily concluded between their said Majesties, it is hereby agreed that the forces of Her Majesty the Queen shall evacuate the Persian territory subject to conditions and stipulations hereafter specified.” Article 14 of the same treaty provides that, in certain events which duly occurred, “the British troops shall, without delay, be withdrawn from all ports, places and islands belonging to Persia. . . .” Despite the terms of the articles quoted, the British concession of Basidu remained in British occupation and was used as a naval station by British armed forces. No protest appears at any stage to have been made by Persia against its continued occupation.

(d) In 1864 a Telegraph Agreement was under negotiation between His Majesty's Government and Muscat. Sir Lewis Pelly, then Political Resident in the Persian Gulf, who handled the negotiations with Muscat, reported that while the title of His Majesty's Government to Basidu had “of course for many years been a bona fide one . . . the present seemed a convenient opportunity for giving to our title the sanction of a written confirmatory deed.” He accordingly arranged for the insertion in the agreement, with the concurrence of the Sultan of Muscat, of an article formally confirming the rights of His Majesty's Government. The relevant articles of the agreement, articles 5 and 6, are as follows:—

“ARTICLE 5.

“Nothing in these articles shall be held as conferring any dominion or sovereign right on the part of the British Government over the territory of Muscat through which the line may pass, neither of any additional dominion or right on my part as Sultan of Muscat, over territory which I may hold in lease from the Shah of Persia.

“ARTICLE 6.

“In like manner nothing in these articles shall be held as invalidating or derogating from the title of the British Government to the station of Bassador [i.e., Basidu], that station having been freely granted to the British Government by my late illustrious father of blessed memory, the late Imaum Syed Saeed bin Sultan, on behalf of himself, his heirs and successors.”

The agreement is a public document, which has at no stage been treated as secret, and which has appeared in a collection of treaties which is on public sale and has been republished on various occasions (though its circulation is admittedly limited) since 1865. This reference to the position of Basidu has not, so far as can be traced, at any stage produced complaint or criticism from Persia.

The terms of article 6 of this agreement quoted above appear to furnish important evidence of the fact that the somewhat vaguely-phrased original grant of 1820 (paragraph 21 of Paper B) quoted above was not in the nature of a revocable lease, but was intended to be a grant in perpetuity.

(e) In 1866 the lease of Bandar Abbas and its dependencies referred to in (b) above, which was for twenty years, came to an end. A fresh lease was granted by Persia to a member of the Muscat ruling family, but as a dependent of Persia and not as representing that family. The lessee not having complied with his obligations under the lease, the Persian Government made preparations in 1868 forcibly to eject him. At this stage the Sultan of Muscat demanded, under threats of force, that the lease should be made over to him. He was prevented by His Majesty's Government from using forcible measures against Persia, and as the result of British mediation, a fresh lease for eight years of Bandar Abbas and its dependencies (again including specifically Qishm) was granted by Persia, in 1868, to the then Sultan of Muscat and his descendants. The lease was on the same general lines as the re-lease of 1855 referred to in (b) above. It was, however, more specific, both in the obligations which it imposed on the lessee, and in its enumeration of the territories covered by it. The lease, however, contained, like the re-lease of 1855, no reference to Basidu. But its thirteenth and fourteenth articles ran as follows:—

“13th.

“So long as Bandar Abbas and the above-mentioned two islands [Qishm and Hormuz] and Shumeel and Minab and their dependencies are in the hands of the Imam of Muscat, he should not allow officers of other Governments to go there. His Highness should protect these places by sea and land, providing for every port having an anchorage some ships, bughlas, and other vessels of war.

“He should protect all the boundaries of the above places from all interference and intrusion of strangers, whether under friendly pretext or otherwise. He should not, under any circumstances, allow any foreign ship, bughla, or man-of-war, the property of an Arab or Arabs, or of any foreign Power, whether with or without ammunition, to anchor within the limits of the anchorage ground of the said territories.”

“14th.

“His Highness the Imam of Muscat, notwithstanding these conditions, has no right to let the said Bandar Abbas and the said places to any other Government, but His Highness should, according to these conditions, send one of his own people or servants to manage Bandar Abbas and the aforesaid places, who must act according to the terms of these conditions.”

As will be seen, the articles quoted, like articles 13 and 14 of the re-lease of 1855 (which they reproduce and amplify), are difficult to reconcile with the continued maintenance, without protest from Persia, of a British naval station, continually used by British forces, at Basidu in the Island of Qishm. But no protest of any kind against the retention of that station or the use of its anchorage by His Majesty's armed forces appears to have been made by Persia; nor, when on the deposition of the Sultan of Muscat at the end of 1868 the lease was automatically determined, and fresh leases of the same areas (including the Island of Qishm) were made by the Persian Government to Persian subjects, was any attempt made, as far as can be traced, to object to the presence of the British concession, or to exercise jurisdiction, or collect taxes, within its area.

(f) Between 1863 and 1868 the local Persian authorities appear on at least two occasions, but without success, to have asked for the surrender of fugitives from justice who had taken refuge in the British concession. On no occasion do they appear to have endeavoured to claim or enforce any rights within that concession.

(g) In 1905 the coal agent at Basidu was instructed to inform a Persian customs officer who had interfered that he had “no business in British territory, and that if he persisted he should not be allowed to come within British territory."

1933

(h) Throughout the war of 1914-19, in which Persia was a neutral, Basidu was part of the British war area and was used to such extent as was necessary for war purposes by His Majesty's Government without protest from Persia. Little importance can, however, be attached to this, the station of Henjam, which is admittedly Persian territory, having been similarly used, and British troops having freely operated elsewhere on Persian soil from time to time during the war.

(i) In 1930, the Director of Customs at Lingah was informed in writing by the local British naval officer in command that the territorial waters of the concession were British territorial waters, and was required (a demand with which in fact he complied without delay, though it is not clear whether his prompt compliance was the result of acceptance of British claims or of the completion of the work on which he had been engaged) to remove his dhow from British territorial waters (i.e., the territorial waters of the British concession area) to Persian waters. No protest was received against the action of the local British authorities or the claim to British sovereignty over or control of the concession area and its territorial waters which the letter in question constituted. There is no evidence, however, to show whether the British naval officer's communication was or was not communicated to the Persian Government.

(j) From 1908 until 1932 a statement appeared in the Persian Gulf Pilot to the effect that Basidu was "a British possession." This publication, which is an official one prepared by the Admiralty, is on public sale, but it must be borne in mind that the Persians are not a seafaring nation, and it cannot be regarded as certain that the Persian Government were aware of this fact. The statement has recently been amended to say that Basidu is "in British possession."

10. As will be seen from the incidents to which reference is made in the preceding paragraph, His Majesty's Government, even on the assumption that the rights derived from the original grant amounted to something less than full sovereignty, are able, in considering their legal position and rights at the present day in Basidu, to point to unchallenged occupancy of over a century, and to a long series of acts to which no exception has been taken by Persia. You are requested to consider whether the cumulative effect of these circumstances can be regarded as establishing: (a) The full sovereignty of His Majesty's Government at Basidu by prescription; or (b) a title to their continued occupancy on existing terms; or (c) justification for the surrender, or modification of the terms of occupation, of the area, by His Majesty's Government, only (i) on their own conditions, or (ii) in return for a substantial quid pro quo.

11. On the other hand, in considering the question of the rights and privileges exercised in the past by the British authorities in the concession area, and in assessing the importance to be attached to the fact that the exercise of these rights and privileges has not been challenged by the Persian Government, it may be material to bear in mind that during the nineteenth century and until recent years the authority of the Persian Government and their officials, not only at Basidu, but throughout the Persian area of the Persian Gulf, was of a most shadowy character, and that British predominance in the Gulf was such that whatever the Persian Government and their local officials may have believed to be the true legal status of the concession, it is possible that they would not, in practice, have ventured to question the British de facto position. Moreover, until quite recently, the authority of the central Government in Persia was so weak that many apparent derogations from Persian sovereignty, which have now been brought to an end, were allowed to pass unchallenged. On the other hand, while their effective control was small, on repeated occasions during the period now under consideration they took steps, either in correspondence, or (in two cases) by force, to maintain or assert their claims to sovereignty over other territorial areas in the Gulf. It is relevant to add that between 1820 and 1871 attention was particularly focussed on the position of Bandar Abbas and its dependencies. It is a matter for your appreciation to what extent, if at all, the above considerations may affect the argument set out in paragraphs 9 and 10. Nevertheless, whatever the attitude of the Persian Government may have been in the past, they have now definitely intimated in a written note that they regard the whole area of the Island of Qishm, including British Basidu, as being under Persian sovereignty.

12. I am accordingly to request you to take the above facts and the attached papers into your consideration and to favour Secretary Sir John Simon with your opinion on the following questions:—

(a) Can British Basidu be held to be British territory in full sovereignty—

(1) In virtue of the grant of 1820?

This involves the question whether the Island of Qishm and so Basidu are to be regarded as having been held in full sovereignty by the Imam of Muscat at the date of that grant, or whether the grant in question is to be regarded as having been made by the Imam as a tenant of Persia, so that the rights of His Majesty's Government are to be regarded as subject to the overriding rights of Persia.

(2) By prescription or otherwise?

(b) If not, is British Basidu to be considered as held in such conditions that Persia is only entitled to request that His Majesty's Government should surrender it by agreement?

(c) If the answers to the two preceding questions are in the negative, would His Majesty's Government be bound to surrender British Basidu to Persia unconditionally and immediately, if so requested by the Persian Government?

(d) If British Basidu is not considered to be held in full sovereignty, can His Majesty's Government claim on any other grounds the right to occupy the concession with armed forces, to exercise jurisdiction over the area and adjoining territorial waters, if necessary to establish fortifications therein, and in general to use the area without restriction—

(i) in time of peace,

(ii) in time of war between the United Kingdom and a third party,

(iii) in time of war between Persia and a third party?

(e) If the right of occupation, jurisdiction and user is not complete, what are the extent and nature of the limitations upon such rights in each of the three cases mentioned in (d) above? In particular, would it be justifiable, in the event of a serious attempt by Persia to interfere with the exercise of these rights within the British area or its territorial waters, to resist such interference and forcibly or otherwise to exclude Persian officials from the area or its territorial waters?

13. Sir John Simon will also be grateful for any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer.

14. The question whether negotiations for a general treaty settlement with Persia can usefully be resumed or not must depend to a large extent on a decision on the present question. Pending that decision it has been necessary to delay the return to Persia of His Majesty's Minister at Tehran, and as Sir Reginald Hoare was expected to return with instructions as to the resumption of negotiations before the end of October, further delay may seriously affect Anglo-Persian political relations. In these circumstances Sir John Simon would be grateful if he could receive your opinion at a very early date.

I have, &c.

G. W. RENDEL.

List of Papers.

Paper A.—Memorandum by the India Office.

Paper B.—Historical Note.

Paper C.—Draft Treaty Article regarding Basidu.

1933

122

PERSIA

Enclosure 1 in (1).

PAPER A.

MEMORANDUM BY THE INDIA OFFICE.

Status of Basidu.

THE memorandum attached sets out in some detail the relevant facts since 1720, in so far as they are on record, bearing on the status of the British concession at Basidu, in the Island of Kishm, in the Persian Gulf. The concession in question is held under a written grant of 1820 from the Imam of Muscat, at that period in effective possession of Kishm. The essential point in issue is whether the Imam in making the grant in question in 1820 did so as sovereign of Kishm or in his capacity as a tenant of Persia.

2. The matter was closely investigated in 1821 by an officer specially deputed to the Persian Gulf consequent on Persian protests against the landing of a British detachment in the Island of Kishm under the authority granted by the Imam. Great difficulty was even at that period experienced in reaching any positive conclusion as to the strength or weakness of the Imam's claims to sovereignty. The difficulty in establishing the true facts is hardly less to-day. A survey of the correspondence as a whole and of the history of the Island of Kishm, in which Basidu is situated, in the century preceding 1820 tends to suggest that the basis for the Imam's claims is unsubstantial.

1720-94.

3. According to Lorimer's Gazetteer of the Persian Gulf, which is the accepted authority on the history of the Gulf States, and which is based on exhaustive local researches some thirty years ago by an officer of the I.C.S. of great experience, it does not appear that the Arabs of the Oman Coast were much in evidence in the neighbourhood of Bandar Abbas, or anywhere on the Persian side of the Gulf, before the Afghan invasion of Persia which began in 1720. Consequent on the Afghan invasion in that year the Arabs of the Trucial Coast (also described on this occasion as "the Muscateers") established themselves in Basidu, in the Island of Kishm, in which they were attacked and defeated by a British naval force in April 1727. But Nadir Shah of Persia in 1737 not merely overran the South Persian coast, and so reimposed an effective Persian control over areas such as the Island of Kishm, but extended his conquests across the Gulf, and in 1737-38 occupied the Sultanate of Muscat, from which Persia was expelled only in 1744.

4. In 1747 the Persian Governor of Bandar Abbas and its dependencies entered into an alliance with the Jowasimi Arabs of the Trucial Arab coast; consequent on which those Arabs appear to have established themselves between 1750 and 1765 in various posts in the Island of Kishm. But they were expelled about 1765 from Kishm and the other dependencies of Bandar Abbas by Sheikh Abdulla, who had been appointed ruler of that area by the Persian Vakil in South Persia, and they had not regained their position so late as 1780.

5. From the above, it will be seen that there appears to have been no Arab connexion of importance (as distinct from piratic raids) with the South Persian coast, and with islands such as Kishm, at any rate for a considerable period prior to 1720; that between 1720 and 1794 Arab invaders (apparently normally from the present Trucial Oman and not from the Muscat Imamate) were established for varying periods, the total of which does not appear to have exceeded some twenty years, in Kishm Island or in Basidu; that during the bulk even of that period they were in occupation as the mercenaries of the local Persian ruler; and that there is no suggestion at any stage of an abandonment by Persia of her claims to sovereignty over Bandar Abbas and its dependencies, including Kishm. It would appear difficult, if not impossible, on the facts recorded to base any Muscat claim to sovereignty over Kishm on the history of that island between 1720 and 1794.

PERSIA

123

1794-1820.

6. In the year 1794 the Imam of Muscat defeated the Bani Ma'in rulers⁽¹⁾ of Kishm and Ormuz, and, consequent on this victory, was able to secure the transfer to himself by Persia of the revenue lease of Bandar Abbas and its dependencies. Precisely what was covered by the term "dependencies" is not very clear. But there seems a very strong probability, almost amounting to a certainty, that it included the Island of Kishm and so Basidu. Further, while the Imam appears to have secured the lease as a result of his victory over the Bani Ma'in, it is to be noted that he secured from Persia a lease and not a grant, that a substantial annual rental was paid for the lease and that, according to Lorimer, "a surety for payment seems to have been required by the Persian Government from the Saiyed and to have been provided by him in the person of a Persian merchant or banker named Haji Khalat." The rulers of Muscat temporarily lost control of some, if not all, of the areas covered by the lease, on the death of Saiyed Sultan in 1804, and while they were to some extent reinstated with British support in 1805 and again in 1809, the available records do not make it clear whether they, in fact, exercised effective dominion even as tenants of Persia in the whole of the area covered by their revenue lease of 1794 so late as 1818. In the latter year the pirate Arabs of the Trucial Coast, who are not under Muscat control, were apparently proposing to establish themselves at Basidu as a stronghold which could be held against the Egyptians, and were led to abandon this intention largely because of the defeat by one of the East India Company's ships of one of their squadrons towards the end of that year.

7. This record suggests that, while the ruling family of Muscat did, indeed, secure from Persia in 1794 a revenue lease which almost certainly included the Island of Kishm, their effective occupation of that island prior to the grant in 1820 by the Imam, quoted in paragraph 21 of the memorandum attached, was subject to lengthy interruptions. It would be as difficult in these circumstances to base any claim by Muscat to absolute ownership or sovereignty in Kishm on the history of the period 1794 to 1820 as it would to base a similar claim on the history of the island in the period 1720 to 1794.

Correspondence of 1819 to 1822.

8. When the Government of Bombay decided in 1819 that in the interests of the suppression of piracy it would be advantageous to establish a central station in the Gulf and that the Island of Kishm was geographically the best situated for this purpose, the question of the status of the island at once came up for consideration. The correspondence which passed between the local government, their officers in the Persian Gulf and the Tehran Legation, the relevant extracts from which are contained in the memorandum attached, makes it clear that the views of the Government of Bombay as to the uncertainty of the Persian title to Kishm were sincere and real, and that when they finally so far deferred to the claims of Persia as to arrange that the British detachment should be removed from Kishm, they did so formally without prejudice to the claims of the Imam of Muscat over that island. The leading document on the subject is the report of the 14th August, 1821, by Dr. Jukes, who was specially sent from Bombay to investigate this, among other aspects of the Kishm question; the report, in view of its importance, is given in full in paragraph 29 of the memorandum attached. Dr. Jukes, while elaborating the arguments in support of the Muscat claim, and in particular emphasising the statement made to him by the confidential secretary to the then Imam of Muscat that "neither Kishm, Ormuz nor Larak are specified on the receipts annually granted by the Persian Government for the stipulated sum paid to them," and the Imam's statement that "the islands of Kishm, Ormuz and Larak belonged exclusively to the Imam," admits that he was unable "to obtain a sight of the old Persian Furmauns by which His Highness the Imam farms Bandar Abbas from the Sovereign of Persia, in order to ascertain what places are particularly specified as constituting its dependencies. I think it unlikely that such an important document . . . should not be in existence; it is possible that it may have been mislaïd at the time I was at Muscat, or it might have been intentionally withheld . . . Dr. Jukes rightly concludes that "the claims of Persia to the Islands of Kishm, Ormuz, &c., seem to rest entirely upon their being considered as dependencies of Bandar Abbas [and not on Persian claims as to suzerainty over Muscat itself]. These points I have not yet been able to ascertain, but it is quite evident that the Imam is not disposed to acknowledge the right of Persia to the islands in question, and it is, I believe, the universal law of nations to claim as a right that which they have obtained by the sword."

⁽¹⁾ Arabs, but Persian subjects.

1933

9. Dr. Jukes's premature death in November 1821, and the fact that a modus vivendi was for the moment reached with Persia in regard to the future of the British detachment, appears to have prevented any more exact examination of the rival claims of Muscat and of Persia to the overlordship of Kishm being proceeded with. As will be seen, his remarks are by no means conclusive on the point now in issue. The Muscat claims to which he refers were unsupported by any documentary evidence, though this should not have been difficult to produce; in so far as those claims are based on right of conquest (i.e., presumably on the forcible occupation by Muscat in 1794 of Bandar Abbas and its dependencies), they appear to be vitiated by the fact that the Imams of Muscat used their victory merely to secure a revenue lease and not a grant in sovereignty of the areas affected. Finally, in estimating the importance of Dr. Jukes's report, the comments on it of Mr. Lorimer, who in matters such as this speaks with authority, are relevant. He says: "As his (Dr. Jukes's) investigations were conducted chiefly under the auspices of Oman officials, whose statements he would be inclined to accept, his report dated the 14th August, 1821, can hardly be regarded otherwise than as an ex parte document, but as such it is of interest."

10. The general effect of the correspondence which is set out in extenso in the accompanying memorandum is to suggest that there was in 1819 some degree of genuine doubt as to where the true title of Kishm lay, but that such doubts were based on statements made by the Imam of Muscat unsupported by any written document such as the text of the firman granting the revenue lease. On the facts available it is, I suggest, difficult to feel that the Muscat claim has been established, or that it has any solid foundation either in history or in law.

Period 1823 to 1928.

11. It may be convenient briefly to refer to the more important points bearing on the question of title between the reoccupation of Basidu by His Majesty's Government in 1823 and the reassertion of a Persian claim in 1928. The most important are the terms of the re-lease of Bandar Abbas and its dependencies (including Kishm) by Persia to Muscat in 1855; articles 2 and 14 of the Treaty of Paris of 1857; the reference to Basidu in the Telegraph Agreement of 1864 with Muscat, the terms of the further lease granted to Muscat by Persia in 1868, and the Government of India's pronouncement as to the status of Basidu in 1868.

12. While the Government of India's pronouncement is of much importance as indicating the considered view taken by them at that period, it is conceivable that it may have been made without close enquiry into the claims of Muscat to sovereignty in Kishm—an issue which was probably, in their view, of little active importance, since in 1855 Muscat had abandoned any independent rights she might have had in Kishm to Persia; and it cannot, of course, by itself have any decisive value. Of greater importance are the firmans of 1855 and 1868, the terms of the Treaty of Paris of 1857 and the Telegraph Agreement of 1864; and the facts that—

- (a) The re-lease by Persia to Muscat of Bandar Abbas and its dependencies, including specifically Kishm, in 1855 makes no reference to the British station at Basidu, although certain articles of the re-lease are so worded as to appear as being inconsistent with the retention by His Majesty's Government of military forces and stations in Basidu.
- (b) The Treaty of Paris provides for the evacuation by British troops in certain events which come to pass of "all ports, places and islands" belonging to Persia. Basidu was not, however, evacuated, nor does it appear that our failure to evacuate led to any remonstrance from Persia.

- (c) The Telegraph Agreement between His Majesty's Government and Muscat of 1864 specifically saves the title of His Majesty's Government to Basidu, "that station having been freely granted to the British Government by my late father . . . on behalf of himself, his heirs and successors."
- (d) The re-lease of Bandar Abbas of 1868 repeats and, if anything, emphasises the articles in the lease of 1855 referred to above.

13. It is noteworthy, moreover, that in the period 1823–1928 not only does it appear that there was no challenge even in general terms by Persia to our special position or rights in Basidu, but that we appear in 1905 and again in 1930 to have referred without contradiction to the concession as British territory in communications to the local Persian customs officials.

Conclusion.

14. The general impression left as the result of a close investigation of the relevant correspondence is that the claims of the Imam of Muscat to have held Kishm, and so Basidu, in sovereignty at any recent period are probably ill founded, and that it would be difficult to fight a case on the material at our disposal; that, on this assumption, the grant to us of the Island of Kishm (ultimately in practice restricted to the occupation of Basidu) in 1820 was made by the Imam in his capacity of a tenant of Persia; that, this being the case, Persia must be regarded as having tacitly confirmed in 1855 and again in 1868 the grant of the concession, though without specifically prejudicing her own claims in regard to sovereignty; and that, in the circumstances, such rights as we may possess in the area and such title as we may be able to claim to it must be based on—

- (a) Unchallenged occupation for over a century.
- (b) The tacit recognition by Persia of our position constituted by the phrasing of the Persian leases to Muscat of 1855 and 1868, articles 2 and 14 of the Treaty of Paris of 1857, article 6 of the Anglo-Muscat Telegraph Agreement of 1864, and such minor incidents as the assertions made apparently unchallenged by us from time to time that the station was British territory and its waters British territorial waters. It is for the Law Officers to advise, if the view suggested above as to the status of British Basidu is accepted as correct, whether we can decline to evacuate the concession save on our own terms in view of the length of the period of uninterrupted and unchallenged occupation, and the degree of recognition of our special position, which the minor incidents referred to above might be held to constitute; and to say what, if any, rights we are entitled to exercise in it, and in particular whether we are justified in regarding it as British territory and its waters as British territorial waters, so long as we remain in possession.

J. G. L.

India Office, October 18, 1933.

Enclosure 2 in (1).

PAPER B.

BASIDU: HISTORICAL NOTE, 1720–1928.

Period between 1720 and 1800.

ACCORDING to Lorimer's Gazetteer, the Arabs of the Oman Coast do not appear to have been much in evidence in the neighbourhood of Bandar Abbas or, indeed, on the Persian side of the Gulf before the Afghan invasion of Persia which began in 1720. About 1720 certain islands, including apparently Kishm, were seized by the "Muscateers." A Persian army under Lutf Ali Khan was sent into the interior of Bandar Abbas, but returned north to Kirman in consequence of the Afghan invasion of Persia without having effected anything, the Arab invaders apparently remaining in possession.

1933

Lor. i, 96, 185,
631.

2. In April 1727 a British naval expedition exacted compensation from the Jowasimi Sheikh Rashid (probably the Sheikh of Ras-el-Khaimah) for losses occasioned to the East India Company's factory at Bandar Abbas by the establishment by the Jowasimis of a naval port at Basidu.

Lor. i, 84, 88,
632.

3. In 1737 Nadir Shah of Persia crossed the Gulf and overran Oman, from which the Persians were finally expelled only in 1744. In 1747, on the decease of Nadir Shah, Mullah Ali Shah, who had been Governor of Bandar Abbas and its dependencies under him, called in the assistance of the Jowasimi Arabs to help him to maintain his position against inter alios the hereditary ruler of Lar, and appears to have entered into a sort of alliance with them which subsisted at least until 1763. It is probably (according to Lorimer) consequent on this that the Arabs of the Oman Coast obtained a foothold on the Island of Kishm.

Lor. i, 135.

In June 1760 the Jowasimi, who appear by then to have established themselves at Kishm and Luft in the Island of Kishm, and also at Lingah and Shanas on the coast of the mainland to the west, assisted Mullah Ali Shah to seize the town of Bandar Abbas, the fort of which was then held by the Khan of Lar. In 1763 Mullah Ali Shah is reported as being in possession of the fort of Kishm, the record stating also that he had spent all his substance in the three previous years in subsidies to Ras-el-Khaimah. In the same year a treaty was concluded between the Bani Ma'in on the one side and Mullah Ali Shah and the Jowasimi Arabs on the other, one provision of which was that the revenues of Kishm should be equally divided between the three parties in future.

95.
Lor. i, 632.

Lor. i, 633,
Lor. i, 135, 110
Lor. i, 633,
1825

4. About 1765 Kerim Khan, Zand, the Persian Vakil of this area, had appointed Sheikh Abdullah of the local tribe or family of the Bani Ma'in (elsewhere described by Lorimer as an Arab tribe, but Persian subjects) as ruler over Bandar Abbas, Ormuz and Kishm, and this sheikh, who was still ruling in 1780, succeeded about 1765 in expelling the Jowasimi and other intruders from his dominions, and was able during his lifetime to keep them at a distance. In 1777 the Sheikh Sagar of Ras-el-Khaimah, on his accession, married a daughter of Sheikh Abdullah and so adjusted his differences with the Bani Ma'in family.

5. In 1769 Kerim Khan, Zand, demanded and was refused a renewal of the tribute paid by Oman during the time of Nadir Shah, and hostilities arising from this refusal continued for some years after this date.

Lor. i, 144.

6. In 1794 Saiyid Sultan, a new ruler of Muscat, found himself strong enough to add Gwadar and Chahbar on the Makran Coast to his dominions proper, and consequent on his defeat of the Bani Ma'in rulers of Kishm and Ormuz, to secure the transfer to himself by Persia from the Sheikh of the Bani Ma'in, a Persian vassal, of the revenue lease of Bandar Abbas and its dependencies. The dependencies at this stage included, according to Lorimer (who had of course before him the Muscat claim to Kishm and Ormuz referred to in Dr. Jukes's report of August 1821, quoted in paragraph 29 below), Minab and the islands of Kishm, Ormuz and Henjam: the lease, "if it was formally granted," appears to have been granted (probably, according to Lorimer, because it could not be refused) either by Agha Muhammad Khan, Qajar, or by Lutf Ali Khan Zand. The actual rental was probably not more at first than 4,000 dollars, the amount at which it still stood in 1821. A surety for its payment seems to have been required by the Persian Government from the ruler of Muscat, and to have been furnished by him in the person of a Persian merchant and banker named Haji Khelat.

Lor. i, 148.
Lor. i, 421-29

Lor. i, 422.

Lor. i, 175.

Lor. i, 180.

7. In 1800-01 Captain Malcolm, when adjusting the Commercial Treaty with Persia, endeavoured, but unsuccessfully, to obtain from Persia a cession of the islands of Kishm, Henjam and Kharag.

8. In 1804, on the death of Saiyid Sultan of Muscat, the Persian port of Bandar Abbas and its dependencies, which he held on lease from Persia were seized by the Bani Ma'in. In June 1805 a joint Muscati-British expedition which had been organised against the Jowasimi pirates of the Trucial Coast, before taking action against them, recovered by force Bandar Abbas and its dependencies for the Imam of Muscat.

Lor. i, 438-9,
633.

The steps thus taken for its recovery subsequently evoked a strong protest from the Persian Government as an act of hostility against themselves. Later in July of the same year the allies blockaded a considerable Jowasimi flotilla in the anchorage of Kishm.

9. In 1806 the Ruler of Muscat kidnapped the head of the Bani Ma'in, whom he carried off to Muscat and detained until Kishm and Ormuz should be delivered up as a ransom for his release, but the Sheikh of Ras-al-Khaimah, by throwing a force into the town of Kishm, made it impossible for the Bani Ma'in to comply with these terms.

Lor. i, 439.

10. In 1809 the Jowasimi were driven out of Lingah and Charak by the Persians, and were compelled to retire to Basidu, while in the same year the Jowasimi stronghold of Luft in Kishm was captured by the British and handed over intact to an agent of the Ruler of Muscat.

Lor. i, 184,
643;
Lor. i, 647,
1930.

11. The sequence of events in Kishm, and at Basidu between 1809 and 1818 is by no means clear, but in the latter year the Jowasimi pirates are reported to have entertained the idea of forming a settlement at Basidu, to which they could retire if attacked by the Egyptian invaders of the Gulf area. The execution of this scheme is believed to have been frustrated largely by the defeat in December 1818 of a Jowasimi squadron by the East India Company's ship Antelope.

Lor. i, 658.

Lor. i, 657.

12. In 1819 Gulf policy was under discussion at Bombay. The Government of Bombay appear to have inclined to a scheme under which the Ruler of Oman should be placed in charge for the future of the Pirate or Trucial Coast and the islands of Bahrein, and should in return authorise the formation of a British settlement on the Island of Kishm, and even defray the cost of maintaining it.

Lor. i, 659.

13. It may be noted that the Chief Secretary, Bombay, an expert official who had made a special study of Persian Gulf subjects, while agreeing as to the establishment of a British station at Kishm, "to this end would have negotiated with the Government of Persia rather than that of Oman." He was overruled by the local Government, but Mr. Lorimer remarks: "It cannot be doubted that he stood on firm ground when he insisted that his (the Imam of Muscat's) claim to sovereign rights over Kishm as against Persia, was probably ill-founded."

Lor. i, 660,
note.

14. The Government of Bombay on the 28th October, 1819, indicated to Major-General Sir William Grant Keir that they were of opinion that the

Précis, § 235 (?)
Lor. i, 1936.

"occupation by the British Government of a central and commanding station in the Persian Gulf was indispensable in connexion with the permanent suppression of piracy, nor is the Governor in Council aware of a more eligible station than the Island of Kishma for that purpose."

"It is understood that the Island of Kishma, as well as Angar, which is contiguous to it, belongs in full sovereignty to the Imam of Muscat, and should the reports that may be received from you and the other persons to whom the consideration of this important subject has been confided, be favourable to the measure now suggested, the necessary negotiation will be opened for obtaining possession of the spot that may be fixed upon for forming the establishment."

15. In a despatch of the 15th December, 1819, to the Government of India, the Government of Bombay remarked with reference to the same point:—

Précis, § 206.

"(10) We anticipate, however, some opposition on the part of the Persian Government to that measure [forming of a British establishment in the Persian Gulf], since it would be difficult we apprehend to satisfy that power that our views were limited to the professed object of our policy, the more especially as the Persian Government has manifested some degree of alarm at our contemplating the occupation of the Island of Bahrein."

"(11) With a view to allaying these alarms and of enabling the British Envoy at Tehran to afford to the Persian Government an explicit and candid exposition of the objects to which the expedition is exclusively directed, and of the ultimate plan which we contemplate for the permanent suppression of piracy, our President has addressed a letter to Mr. Willock [Chargé d'Affaires at Tehran], of which the enclosed is a copy, which we trust will produce the effect of conciliating the Government of Persia to the arrangements which we have submitted to your consideration, or to any other which your Lordship may be pleased to prescribe, and in particular to our permanent occupation of Kishma."

(*) The reference is to the Government of India Persian Gulf Précis (1801-1853).

1933

Précis, § 207.
Lor. i, 1937.

16. The despatch of the 15th December, 1819, to the Chargé d'Affaires at Tehran, to which reference is made in the preceding paragraph, after explaining in some detail the considerations weighing with the local Government, added:—

“(8) The Imam of Muscat having asserted a positive claim to the sovereignty of the Island of Kishma, this Government has not hesitated in fixing upon that station as a rendezvous for the expedition. The occupation by the British Government of a more commanding station in the Gulf being considered to be indispensable to enable us to exercise a more immediate and efficient control over it than can be done either from Bushire or Bussora, the possession of that island would be an important object either permanently in full sovereignty, or temporarily until the beneficial effects which the presence of a British force in the vicinity of the piratical ports may be expected to produce, in reforming their habits, may enable us to relinquish the possession. The latter expedient should, in my opinion, be preferred only on a failure of obtaining the cession of Kishma in perpetuity.

“(9) I entertain no doubt that the cession of Kishma might be obtained from the Imam of Muscat provided His Highness's pretensions to it be indisputable, but I believe that the sovereignty of the island was at one time claimed by Persia, and under any circumstances I am satisfied that the Supreme Government would not, unless on extreme emergency, be inclined to take any measure regarding the occupation of that island which you might conceive to be permanently injurious to our general interests at the Court of Tehran.

“(10) You must be the best judge whether we are required either by justice or policy to negotiate the previous consent of Persia, or whether we may content ourselves with the simple explanation of our views and intentions; in either case, after the above exposition of the motives which impel us to depart from the principles which governed our interposition in the expedition of 1810, and which its entire failure in eradicating piracy has imposed upon us. I must leave to your experience, judgment and address to adopt the line of conduct which may most effectually reconcile the important object of eradicating piracy with the maintenance of the good understanding that so happily exists between His Majesty's Government and the Court of Persia.”

Précis, § 207A.

17. A copy of this despatch was also sent to Sir W. G. Keir, with the remark that—

“(4) By the eighth paragraph you will perceive the nature of the relations which it appears to the Governor in Council to be expedient that we should form with the Imam of Muscat. . . .

“The ninth and eleventh paragraphs relate to the interests of Persia, and you will be guided in the prosecution of your operations or your negotiations with the ports and islands which may be disposed to acknowledge its allegiance by the communications you may receive from the Envoy at Tehran. . . .

“(7) It is the intention of the Governor in Council to reduce the force under your command at as early a period as practicable leaving, as you are authorised to do, one battalion of native infantry and a detail of artillery should you judge it necessary at Kishma or any other eligible island with the view of overawing the Arab tribes.”

Précis, § 235A.

18. Sir W. G. Keir's reply to the Government of Bombay's despatch of the 28th October, 1819, referred to in paragraph 14 above does not appear to have discussed the question of the status of Kishm, but he repeated (paragraph 17) in strong terms an earlier recommendation that the eventual removal of the British detachment “should be to the Island of Kishm. All that I have learned since offering that recommendation has tended to confirm my opinion of that island being the most favourable situation in every respect, and if no other circumstances existed than those of political expediency, I should be disposed to urge that the removal should take place immediately” (despatch dated the 1st April, 1820).

19. In the light of the despatch referred to in the preceding paragraph, the Governor of Bombay instructed Captain Thompson, the commander of the garrison at Ras-al-Khaima, that its removal to the Island of Kishm, to the occupation of which the consent of the Imam of Muscat was to be obtained, if not already conceded, had now been approved (Bombay letter dated the 17th April, 1820). With this letter was enclosed a letter to the Imam from the Governor, the text of which is not available.

20. On the 15th May, 1820, Captain Thompson reported that he had despatched the Mercury with the Governor's letter to the Imam, and also his own letter to His Highness, for the purpose of obtaining his consent to the occupation of the Island of Kishm. In a letter of the 29th May, Captain Thompson reported that the Mercury had returned on that date from Muscat bearing the full consent of the Imam to the removal of the troops to Kishm, and an open letter to the sheikh of that island directing him to afford every assistance to the embarkation and conveyance of the troops.

21. The material portions of the Imam's letter to the Governor of Bombay are as follows:—

“With regard to the observations made by you, connected with the removal of the troops from Ras-al-Khaima to Kishm, God knows that the island in question, and all other territories appertaining to me and subject to my authority, appertain also to the Honourable Company, and that I do not reckon these dominions as appertaining to me, but as appertaining to the Honourable Company.”

21A. The Imam's letter is, as will be noted, in very general terms, and couched in hyperbolic language not unusual in oriental communications, and which would, indeed, on a strict interpretation, cover not only Kishm, but Muscat itself. On the other hand, the letter was with specific reference to a request (the terms of which are not on record) for the removal to Kishm of the British detachment stationed in the Gulf.

22. The Persian Government, on a communication being made to them in accordance with the instructions referred to in paragraph 16 above, made it clear that they by no means welcomed the idea of a British occupation of Kishm or any other island in the Gulf. The Shah refused a personal interview to the Chargé d'Affaires, and communicated his instructions on the point through his Ministers. These were to the effect (Tehran despatch of the 10th May, 1820) that when the proposal had been previously made (in 1800-01) for the cession of an island in the Persian Gulf, the Shah had not been prepared to entertain it; that His Imperial Majesty considered that a proposal of such importance as the present was one which ought to originate either from His Britannic Majesty, from the East India Company, or from the Governor-General of India; that according to the Persian Ambassador at London, the Prince Regent intended to send an Ambassador to Tehran, and that it would be preferable that a discussion should be deferred until the Ambassador's arrival. “His Majesty was surprised that the Imam of Muscat should claim the sovereignty of the Island of Kishm. It was contended that the Imam held the Government of Gambnun [Bandar Abbas], and of its dependencies, of which Kishm was one, under the supreme authority of the Sovereign of Persia, and the records of the Empire would establish this fact.”

23. In their despatch of the 3rd October, 1820, No. 1485, to Sir Henry Willock, at Tehran, the Bombay Government, after notifying the transfer of the British detachment from Ras-al-Khaima to Kishm, remarked:—

“(3) I have already had the honour of informing you that any claims which Persia might possess to the sovereignty of the Island of Kishm would receive the most candid consideration from the Government, but I do not consider it politic on our part to renew the discussion. Should any proofs of its claim be produced by the Government of Tehran, I would suggest your referring them to this Government, and should hope that during the period that must be occupied by the requisite investigation, the King of Persia will have leisure to observe the good effects arising from our occupation of this land, and be induced to consent to our retaining it, even if he should establish his right to demand its evacuation.”

24. On the 20th December, 1820, Sir Henry Willock reported to the Government of India that, consequent on strong representations from the Prince-Governor of Fars as to the dangers of the occupation of a part of Kishm by the British detachment, the Persian Government had demanded, in a strongly worded

[10221]

Précis, § 236.

Précis, § 237.

Précis, § 238.

Lor. i, 1936.
Précis, § 241.

Précis, § 242.

Lor. i, 1938.

Précis, § 246.

1933

note dated the 9th December, 1820, of which the following is an extract, the immediate departure of the British detachment from that island :—

Précis, § 249.

“ His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires likewise stated that after punishment of the Joasmis it would be necessary still to keep some British troops in the Persian Gulf to prevent a recurrence of piracy, and that the Imam of Muscat (who on that part of Persia is the Governor of Bandar Abbas and its dependencies) was willing to allow of a British settlement on the Island of Kishm or Henjam. To this was answered that, first, Muscat is a dependency of Persia, and as the Imam has not the power of permitting the residence of British troops at Muscat, much less can he grant a permission at Kishm and Henjam, which are dependencies of Bandar Abbas. At this time we have heard that a British force has landed at Kishm. The state of affairs does not require the presence of British troops. We do not know on what account the troops from India have settled in the Persian Gulf. In short, orders will be issued by His Majesty to His Royal Highness the Prince of Fars, to send a person to the troops on Kishm desiring them immediately to leave it, and we now request His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires to direct the Officer Commanding at Kishm to return to India with his troops, and to write to the Honourable Governor of Bombay, or to whomever it may be necessary, with a view to avoiding such acts, which are contrary to the spirit of the treaty between our two States.”

25. The Governor of Bombay, Sir Mountstuart Elphinstone, noted on this correspondence as follows :—

Précis, §§ 250-56.

“The King of Persia's claim to Kishm does not appear to be strengthened by his present arguments, but on the contrary to be weakened by His Majesty making it in part depend on his sovereignty over Muscat, a pretension which seems to be entirely untenable.

“The King of Persia's alarm at our occupation of Kishm appears, however, to be serious and unfeigned, and on this ground the Honourable the Governor would be disposed to give up the measure if it were not one of urgent necessity.

“It is believed also that the British Government has in some measure countenanced the claim of the King of Persia to Kishm by requesting from His Majesty in the year 1799 the cession of that island. The application seems not (? but) to have originated in an erroneous notion of His Majesty's rights, but it ought to make this Government more delicate in its conduct at present.”

Lor. i, 1939.

26. Apparently at the beginning of 1821 a Vakil of the Prince Governor of Shiraz visited Kishm, consequent on unfounded allegations that the British were building forts there, to prohibit their construction. He satisfied himself that there was no foundation for the report, and undertook to assure his master that the British detachment had evidently no other duty than that of checking piracy.

Lor. i, 1940.
Précis, § 279.

27. In May 1821 Dr. Andrew Jukes was deputed to the Persian Gulf by the Government of Bombay with a view to allaying the suspicions of the Persian Government in regard to the retention of the British force on the Island of Kishm. The following extracts from his instructions bear on the question of the title to the island.

“(1) You are already informed of the doubts which are being entertained in regard to the sovereignty over the Island of Kishm to which the Governments of Persia and Muscat assert pretensions. The former having recently betrayed the strongest apprehensions at our occupation of it, and preferred a formal demand for the removal of the detachment, as you will perceive from the accompanying despatch dated the 20th December from His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Tehran the Honourable the Governor in Council determined to despatch you on a mission to the Persian Gulf with the view of allaying these unfounded claims or of adopting such measures as the exigencies of the case may render expedient. . . .

“(3) Equally solicitous has the Governor-in-Council been to ascertain the justness of the claim which the Imam of Muscat advanced to the sovereignty of Kishm, the result of Captain Sadleir's enquiries leading the Governor to believe those claims to be well founded. The detachment was transferred from Rasool Khima to that island with the sanction of the Imam. This document will enable you to draw from the Government of Persia a statement of the grounds on which her pretensions to Kishm may be founded, and which may be as untenable as her claim to tribute from Muscat which the Imam has refused to pay and Persia has been unable to exact since the death of Shah Abbas.

“(7) Should it appear impossible to avoid hostilities by other means you are empowered to propose to the Prince that the detachment should be withdrawn from Kishm to Muscat pending the negotiation regarding the ultimate fate of it. You will explain that this concession originates in the reluctance of this Government to disturb the friendship subsisting between the British and Persian nations, especially on a point which has not been decided by the Governor-General-in-Council; that the removal of the troops is not to be interpreted into a recognition of the King of Persia's title to Kishm nor to act as a restraint on our reoccupying the position, if the decision of the Supreme Government, or any other cause, should render such a course expedient.”

(Bombay Government letter to Dr. Jukes, No. 98 of May 16, 1821.)

28. On the 14th August, 1821, Dr. Jukes submitted to the Government of Bombay the following note on the origin of the Muscat title to Kishm, Ormuz, &c., which, in view of its importance, is reproduced in full.

29. Report, dated the 14th August, 1821, of Dr. Jukes, Political Agent, Kishm, as to the origin of the connexion of the Imams of Muscat with Kishm, Ormuz, Bandar Abbas, and other parts of the Persian coast near that place:—

“The Persian Ministers having expressed their dissatisfaction at the small detachment of British troops being stationed on the Island of Kishm, and considering that it was likely to become a subject of future discussion between myself and the Persian Government, I have lost no opportunity of obtaining every information I could collect from the best authorities as to the sovereignty of the island, both at Muscat and Kishm, and although the information I have obtained is not so complete and satisfactory as I could wish, I beg leave respectfully to submit it to the consideration of the Honourable the Governor-in-Council.

“(2) The Bini Maainee tribe originally resided at Koong on the Persian coast, and it is now about seventy or eighty years since Sheikh Abdulla Maainee took the Island of Kishm from Mulla Aly Shah, who was then chief of the island, on behalf of the Persian Government; and Sheikh Abdulla afterwards farmed Bandar Abbas and its dependencies from Nadir Shah.

“(3) The Bini Maainee tribe remained in possession of the island for many years, and after Nadir Shah's death, continued to pay tribute to the present reigning family of Persia, for Bandar Abbas and its dependencies which they still retained.

“(4) About twenty-six or twenty-seven years ago the inhabitants of Kishm, being dissatisfied with the tyrannical system adopted towards them by Mulla Hussan Maainee, their Chief and Governor, solicited His Highness Syed Sultan, the Imam of Muscat, to take the islands under his government and control; the Imam proceeded accordingly with an army, and by force of arms took possession of the islands of Kishm, Bandar Abbas and Ormuz from Mulla Hussein, and it has ever since remained under the general control of the Imam of Muscat.

“(5) Syed Sultan, notwithstanding he had taken these places by force of arms from Mulla Hussein Maainee, continued to farm Bandar Abbas and its dependencies from the Persian Government, as the Bini Maainee tribe had done before him, and his son Syed Saeed, the present Imam of Muscat, continues to do the same; he pays 4,000 tomans annually for the town and dependencies of Bandar Abbas, including Meena Humeel and Khumeer. Syfe-bin-Mubhaun, an Arab chieftain, is at present Governor of Bandar Abbas, on the part of His Highness the Imam, and his younger brother is the Governor of Ormuz. Sheikh Abdul Rahman Maainee, the Governor of Kishm, is related to his Highness by marriage, so that the government of all the principal places farmed by the Imam of Muscat is entirely in the hands of the Arabs at present, and I do not know whether the Persian Government would venture to risk the attempt of taking these places forcibly from them, under any circumstances, but as the Imam has several ships, and could command the sources (? services) of a great number of buggalas and boats belonging to the different Arab tribes in the Gulf, it is almost certain, I think, that the Imam would be able to retain the islands of Kishm, Ormuz and Larak, in spite of every exertion of the Persian Government.

1933

"(6) The whole of the Persian shore of the Gulf is in the possession of different Arab tribes, and though they may have little differences and quarrels among themselves, they would cordially unite to repel any attack the Persians might make to accept or subdue any one of them.

"(7) It is quite impossible that the Arab tribes and the Persians can ever cordially blend their interests and act in concert together. The habits of the people are very different, the independence of an Arab sheikh submits reluctantly to the Persian yoke, and the difference of religious feeling effectually prevents anything like a cordial co-operation between them.

"(8) I regret extremely that neither at Muscat nor at Kishm have I been able to obtain a sight of one of the old Persian furmauns by which His Highness the Imam farms Bandar Abbas from the Sovereign of Persia, in order to ascertain what places are particularly specified, as constituting its dependencies. I think it unlikely that such an important document as the grant, or furmaun of the King of Persia, by which His Highness the Imam farms so large a portion of territory and for which he pays 4,000 tomans annually should not be in existence; it is possible it might have been mislaid at the time I was at Muscat, or it might have been intentionally withheld, but I was expressly informed by Syed Abdul Kahir, His Highness's confidential secretary, that neither Kishm, Ormuz nor Larak are specified on the receipts annually granted by the Persian Government for the stipulated sum paid to them; and in reply to a series of questions which I wrote out to be answered at Muscat, and which I know were carried by Syed Abdul Kahir to His Highness the Imam himself, it was expressly declared that the islands of Kishm, Ormuz and Larak belonged exclusively to the Imam.

"(9) It appears to me extreme presumption in the Persian Government to declare that even Muscat itself is a dependency of Persia, and the information I have obtained satisfies me that Muscat never was tributary to that State; perhaps the pretensions of Persia may be grounded on the following circumstances, which I obtained in detail from what must be considered the highest authority, the Imam himself:—

"(10) About seventy-eight years ago, Sultan-bin-Syfe Gaarubi was Imam of Muscat and the Province of Oman; he made himself very unpopular by his tyranny, and was removed from the Government by the general voice of the people; he went and sought the aid of Nadir Shah, then Sovereign of Persia, to reinstate him in his Government; Nadir Shah complied with his request, and sent an army back with him to restore him to influence and to power. This army landed at Ras-sul-Khima, and, after much hard fighting, they succeeded in marching through the country as far as Muscat, which place alone seems then to have been retained by the adherents of Sultan-bin-Syfe, while all the Province of Oman remained unsubdued.

"The independent Arabs now advanced and surrounded Muscat, and the Persian army was reduced to considerable difficulties. About this time intelligence of the death of Nadir Shah reached them, the Persians made certain proposals to the Arabs, which were finally agreed to, and the Persian army returned back to Bandar Abbas without effecting the object of their coming.

"(11) In this state of affairs Ahmed-bin-Saed, the grandfather of the present Imam of Muscat, and then a chieftain commanding at Sohar, assumed the Government of Oman and was proclaimed Imam.

"(12) The claims of Persia therefore to the islands of Kishm, Ormuz, &c., seem to rest entirely upon their being considered as dependencies of Bandar Abbas. This point I have not yet been able to ascertain, but it is quite evident that the Imam is not disposed to acknowledge the right of Persia to the islands in question, and it is, I believe, the universal law of nations to claim as a right that which they have obtained by the sword. Persia, with equal presumption, claims the Island of Bahrein because it was once tributary to it, though it has thrown off the yoke, and paid no tribute for these thirty years. Persia may with equal justice lay claim to Delhi at the present day because Nadir Shah once conquered and plundered it.

"(13) In my discussions, therefore, with the Persian Ministers, I think I shall be able, in point of right, to support all the measures the British Government have adopted in occupying the Island of Kishm; when I consider, however, the very heavy expense of supporting the establishment, the impossibility of employing the troops on any active service in the Gulf for four months in the year on account of the excessive heats, the sickness that has prevailed there ever since the hot weather commenced, and the inefficiency of the force arising from that cause alone, I confess I feel more doubts than I have heretofore done as to the expediency and utility of the measure; but, as I am aware that different sentiments have been, and probably still are, entertained by those who are far more competent to decide than I am, I beg to offer such a hint with extreme diffidence and with the most perfect conviction of the fallibility of my own judgment."

30. Dr. Jukes's report, while of great value, is, as will be observed, by no means conclusive. Mr. Lorimer comments that, "as his investigations were conducted chiefly under the auspices of Omani officials, whose statements he would naturally be inclined to accept, his report, dated the 14th August, 1821, can hardly be regarded as other than an ex parte document, but as such it is of interest." Lor. i, 1940.

31. Dr. Jukes subsequently proceeded to Shiraz, in a letter dated the 25th October, 1821, from which he refers to the Prince Governor, in the course of discussion, as having made some observations regarding the Island of Kishm being one of the dependencies of Fars, and that the Imam was only a subject of his. The prince, however, added that he had personally no objection to the British detachment remaining in Kishm, since, in view of Dr. Jukes's explanations, it appeared to have the peace and tranquillity of the Gulf for its only motive, and that he would so inform the Shah. Lor. i, 1941.

32. The Persian Government, however, maintained their opposition to the maintenance of a British detachment in Kishm, and the Government of Bombay accordingly referred the general question to the Government of India, in a despatch of the 9th March, 1822, No. 469. In the matter of the title of Muscat to Kishm, they remarked that, while Kishm seemed much the most satisfactory station from the point of view of suppressing piracy, however desirable it might be to retain the island we could not overlook considerations of justice and policy towards Persia; the King of Persia had not yet shown any proof of his title whatever to Kishm, except its alleged authority [sic], on which ground he had also claimed Muscat and the whole Province of Oman. Even the arguments mentioned by His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires do not establish the claims of Persia. Sir John Malcolm on his first mission solicited a grant of Kishm from Persia, which was refused. If it had since appeared that Persia had no title to the territory so solicited, what should prevent our applying to the right owner? Still less did a casual expression of one of the Imam's officers destroy his master's right, if he ever had one. The Governor of Bombay in Council was not acquainted with the nature of the Imam's rights either to Bandar Abbas or Kishm, but supposing them equal, there seemed abundant reason why he should waive his claim to Bandar Abbas, an integral part of Persia, and within reach of Agha Mahomed Khan's army; and retain it to Kishm, which was probably beyond the reach of that monarch's power. A claim, however, to which His Majesty's Minister at Tehran attached importance ought not to be hastily set aside, and supposing the King of Persia to possess any reasonable ground of pretension to the island, it would be unfriendly, at the least, to oppose it by military occupation. It seemed incumbent on us to avoid giving the Shah this ground of disquiet, if we could do so without a very serious sacrifice of our own interests. . . . It remained to be considered how far our withdrawing would affect the Imam, to whose interests his zeal and fidelity to the alliance required that we should pay every attention. Lor. i, 1943.

33. The Government of Bombay's opinion was, therefore, that we should ultimately retire from Kishm; if we were to retire we should, however, they thought, take advantage of the time allowed by the King of Persia's own proposal, and in the interim apprise the Imam of the probability of our withdrawing from the Persian Gulf. Précis, § 279A.

34. To Persia we might say that the time the Shah had allowed for a reference to England would probably be sufficient for the purpose, as our occupation was only to be temporary; and that at all events the decision of His Majesty's Government would, of course, be binding on the authorities in India;

1933

Lor. i, 1943.

but in this and in all other communications the utmost care should be taken to avoid pronouncing an opinion on any claim which the Imam of Muscat might possess to Kishm.

Lor. i, 1944.

35. These views were approved by the Government of India, but owing to a sudden change of atmosphere at Tehran, which led the Chargé d'Affaires to ask for his passports, action was not taken on them; and rumours that the Shah had demanded a substantial increase in the rent payable by Muscat for Bandar Abbas and its dependencies (including Kishm) led to steps being taken to reinforce the garrison of Basidu—steps countermanded in June 1822 on the restoration of good relations with the Shah, but too late to prevent the Chargé d'Affaires from acting on instructions to notify them to the Persian Government.

Précis, § 284.

36. On the 1st September, 1822, Sir H. Willock accordingly informed the Persian Government that it had been found necessary to augment the detachment on the Island of Kishm as a temporary and precautionary measure, and received a reply in general terms.

P.G. 13, p. 118.

36A. While in the circumstances described above, Basidu was evacuated by British troops in February 1822, it proved impossible to secure an equally convenient naval station in the Gulf. Basidu was accordingly reoccupied by His Majesty's Government in 1823, from which year until 1878 it remained the headquarters of the British naval squadron in the Persian Gulf. No protest against its reoccupation appears at the time to have been made by Persia.

Lor. i, 1946-8.

37. On the 3rd September, 1822, Captain Bruce, the Resident at Bushire, reported to the Governor of Bombay the unauthorised agreement which he had concluded in the preceding month with the Prince of Shiraz, in regard to Bahrein and Gulf questions. The agreement, which inter alia embodied an arrangement in regard to the Island of Kishm, on the basis of Persian sovereignty, was at once formally disowned by the Government of Bombay, while the Persian Government, on their side, subsequently instructed the Prince of Shiraz that he had exceeded his powers in entering into discussion with the Resident. The Government of Bombay, in a letter of the 1st November, 1822, to the Resident, No. 1491, intimated to Captain Bruce that he had acted without authority and was removed from his appointment as a punishment. In informing him of the disavowal of the treaty which he had concluded with the Prince of Shiraz and criticising its terms, they remarked: "It admits the claim of the King of Persia to Kishm contrary to all history, to the protections (? protestations) of His Highness the Imam of Muscat and to the repeated declarations of this Government. It thereby admits the occupation of that island without the King of Persia's consent to have been an unjust aggression, and it agrees to admit a Persian force into Kishm, and to make over to the Persians the island which we received from the Imam."

Précis, § 289
Lor. i, 1948.

38. The Governor of Bombay simultaneously addressed a letter to the Prince Regent of Fars, in which, after repudiating the treaty, he remarked:—

"With regard to Kishm, I had long since applied to the Most Noble the Governor-General for his consent for the withdrawal of the detachment, and having now obtained it, the troops have been ordered to return, and the island to be made over to the Imam of Muscat, from whom it was received by the British Government; but in doing so this Government is actuated by considerations of its own convenience; and with respect to the claims of the Government of Persia on that island they have not as yet been proved."

39. The instructions issued by the Government of Bombay, in their letter of the 12th November, 1822, No. 1584, to Captain Bruce's successor as Resident at Bushire, remarked:—

Lor. i, 1948-9.
Précis, § 291.

"(4) The effect of Captain Bruce's proceedings is calculated to impress the Imam of Muscat and the Sheikh of Bahrein with an apprehension that, instead of observing a perfect neutrality in the Gulf and limiting our interference to a control of all measures likely to lead to a renewal of piracy, founded on Major-General Sir William Keir's treaties, we have thrown our whole influence in the scale in favour of Persia in support of its general views of supremacy over every island and possession in the Gulf of Persia.

"(5) The enclosed letters from the Hon. the Governor to the Imam of Muscat and the Sheikh of Bahrein are intended to remove any doubts or apprehensions which the conduct of Captain Bruce may have excited in that respect. . . .

"(6) You will also explain to them that our views have not at all changed by withdrawing our troops from Kishm, which is to be restored to the Imam of Muscat as the Power with whose permission we occupied it. . . .

"(8) You will refer to the whole tenor of our communications to the Persian Government and of our conduct since the occupation of Kishm and our negotiations with the Arab States for proof that the permanent suppression of piracy, and the conservation of the peace of the Gulf by the friendly interposition of our power and influence, has been alone the ruling principle of that policy. You will explain that it is our determination to persevere in that policy notwithstanding the removal of our troops from Kishm, which has been restored to the Imam of Muscat, under whose sanction we occupied it; and that the pretensions to its sovereignty remain precisely in the same state as at the period when that sanction was granted. . . ."

Period 1823 to 1928.

40. Between 1823 and 1826 the Persians endeavoured, but without success, to dispossess the Imam of Muscat of his revenue lease of Bandar Abbas and its dependencies. Between 1846 and 1848 a second attempt of the same nature was avoided by gifts by the Imam of Muscat to the Persian negotiators. In 1852-54, in the absence of the Imam of Muscat in Zanzibar, the Muscati Governor of Bandar Abbas was expelled by Persia, but the lost districts were subsequently forcibly recovered by the Imam. The Imam was, however, unable to hold them, and an agreement was finally reached between Persia and Muscat in 1855, under which a fresh lease for twenty years was granted to the latter, which involved not only the payment of an increased rent to Persia by the ruler of Muscat, but the specific recognition as Persian territory of the Island of Kishm.

Lor. i, 449
Lor. i, 460.

41. The Persian firman of 1855 specifies in its preamble that the Islands of Kishm, Ormuz, &c., are Persian territories leased on certain terms to the Imam of Muscat. The firman contains no specific reference to Basidu. Article 13 runs as follows:—

Aitchison xii,
p. cxxxix,
Appendix xiv

"As long as Bandar Abbas, the above-named two islands, Sernal, Minab, and their dependencies, are in the hands of the Imam of Muscat, he should not allow any officers of foreign Governments to go there. He should also promise to protect these places by land and sea, providing for every port having an anchorage some ships. . . . He should further promise to protect all the boundaries of the above-named places, from all interference or intrusion of strangers, whether in an amicable or hostile manner. He should not at any time allow any ship . . . or any hostile person, armed or otherwise, Arab or foreign, to approach or get a footing in Bandar Abbas or the Persian territory, with hostile intentions or other pretexts."

Article 14 proceeds that:—

"The Imam of Muscat, notwithstanding these conditions, has not the right of letting Bandar Abbas and the above-said places to any foreigner. . . ."

42. Article 2 of the Treaty of Paris, of the 4th March, 1857, on the conclusion of the Anglo-Persian war, provided that "the forces of Her Majesty the Queen shall evacuate the Persian territory, subject to conditions and stipulations hereafter specified."

Article 14 of the same treaty provided that "as soon as the stipulations in regard to the evacuation by the Persian troops of Herat and the Afghan territories, as well as in regard to the reception of the British mission at Tehran, shall have been carried into full effect, the British troops shall, without delay, be withdrawn from all ports, places and islands belonging to Persia." Despite this, not only did the naval station at Basidu remain in British occupation, but no evidence has been traced of any complaint on this score by Persia, nor does any request for its evacuation appear to have been made.

Aitchison xii,
p. 81, No. xviii.

42A. In 1864 the Resident in the Persian Gulf emphasised that Persia had "tacitly acknowledged our right to possession, because when at the conclusion of the war between Muscat and Persia in 1856 the treaty (under which the present lease obtains) was entered into, Persia raised no objection to the presence of our flag or to undisguised maintenance of a considerable station, coal depots, hospital, &c., at Bassidore."

Letter from Sir L. Pelly
dated
October 22,
1864.

1933

136

PERSIA

43. The telegraph agreement of 1864 between Muscat and Great Britain, which has never been secret, contains the following article:—

“Article 6.

Aitchison,
vol. xii, p. 228

“In like manner nothing in these articles shall be held as invalidating or derogating from the title of the British Government to the Station of Bassadore, that station having been freely granted^(*) to the British Government by my late illustrious father of blessed memory, the late Imaum Syed Saeed-bin-Sultan, on behalf of himself, his heirs and successors.”

This article had been deliberately inserted at the time by the Political Resident, who remarked:—

Précis, § 145.

“Government will observe that article 6 relates to our station at Bassadore. Our title to that station has, of course, been for many years a bona fide one, but on telegraphic and general considerations the present seemed a convenient opportunity for giving to our title the sanction of a written confirmatory deed.”

Lor. i, 480.

44. In 1866 the lease of 1855-56, which was for twenty years only, and was limited to Sultan Said and his son, automatically came to an end. The Persians accordingly transferred the lease to a member of the Al-bu-Said family, but as a dependent of Persia, and not as representing the Sultans of Oman. The lessee having withheld the revenue due from him, steps were taken by Persia in 1868 for his forcible removal. This led to a demand by the Sultan of Muscat, backed by a threat of force, for the transfer to him of the lease. As the result of British mediation (His Majesty's Government refusing to allow the Sultan to blockade South Persian ports) the lease was accordingly renewed for a period of eight years in favour of Sultan Salim and his descendants. “In the course of the discussions the Sultan claimed Henjam and Larak as dependencies of Oman irrespective of the Bandar Abbas lease; nor was his claim to the islands either abandoned or disproved.” The re-lease in question, dated the 4th August, 1868, follows the firman of 1855 in making no reference to Basidu, but contains provisions in its 13th and 14th articles substantially identical with those quoted in paragraph 41 above from that firman. Article 13 emphasises that no foreign ships shall under any circumstances be permitted “to anchor within the limits of the anchorage ground of the said territories.”

Lor. i, 2047.

45. On the deposition of Sultan Salim at the end of 1868, the lease granted by Persia in September of that year was automatically determined, and was never thereafter renewed in favour of Muscat.

Lor. i, 2106.

Government of India to Government of Bombay, September 8, 1868.

46. The surrender of fugitives who had taken refuge in the Basidu concession appears to have been demanded by Persia on various occasions between 1863 and 1868, but never granted, Government regarding it “as virtually British territory,” and no extradition agreement existing with Persia. In September 1868, the Government of India on an examination of the legal position of the settlement which had been raised by a demand for the surrender of a slave who had taken refuge in the concession, informed the Government of Bombay that in their opinion “the station in question cannot properly be considered as British territory. It is perfectly true that we have occupied Bassidore either as a naval or coaling station for nearly half a century. But the island has always been treated by us as a dependency of Bandar Abbas, and Bandar Abbas and its dependencies, including this Island of Kishm, and, consequently, Bassidore, have been leased to the Sultan of Muscat by the Shah of Persia in circumstances with which Government of Bombay is perfectly familiar. . . . As the British Government holds possession of the town of Bassidore by permission of the Sultan of Muscat, while that potentate derives his lease of Kishm, which includes Bassidore, from the Shah of Persia, it follows necessarily that Kishm must still be considered as Persian territory.

“There may be some obscurity as to the exact nature of our derivative title to the town of Bassidore, and it may have been thought that our rights over the town existed by continued usage or that we had obtained a prescriptive title; but in looking closely into the question it becomes evident that our rights are subordinate to those of Muscat, which again, admittedly, are entirely subordinate to those of Persia, and always have been so treated up to this very hour.”

(*) The reference is to the letter quoted in paragraph 21 above.

PERSIA

137

46A. The opinion expressed by the Government of India in 1868 has since held the field, and was maintained by them in 1875.

In 1901 the Political Resident was instructed by the Government of India “that no official of the Persian Government can be permitted to reside in any part of the station at Basidu without the express sanction of the British Government.”

G/I to Pol.
Res., July 9,
1901.

47. In 1905 the coal agent at Basidu was instructed by the Resident, Sir Percy Cox, to warn a Persian customs officer who had interfered that “he has no business in British territory, and if he persists he should not be allowed to come within British territory.”

P.G. 13, p. 119.

48. In November 1926 the Foreign Office remarked in a letter to the India Office that, in view of the effect on the status of Henjam of admitting the Persian claim to Basidu, “it would be dangerous to allow doubt to be cast on the validity of the British rights to Basidu, which rest on undisturbed occupation over a long period.”

F.O. to I.O.,
November 6,
1926,
P. 3547/26.

49. In 1928 consequent on a suggestion that the Persian Government were likely to make an armed descent on Basidu, the Chargé d'Affaires at Tehran was instructed to make representations to the central customs authorities and, if necessary, to warn the Persian Government that any molestation of British Basidu, “which has been a British station for 100 years, would be a complete negation of Minister of Court's promise to Sir R. Clive.”^(*) The Senior Naval Officer was simultaneously instructed to resist by force in the last resort, should this prove necessary, any landing of armed Persians in Basidu.

50. In February 1930 on a Persian customs patrol dhow carrying a customs officer from Lingah to examine the books of the mudir at Persian Basidu, and anchoring off the British area, the officer in charge of the guard in British Basidu, Lieutenant Gretton, requested the official from Lingah “to move his vessel out of British waters.” The Persian official stated that he had not had any instructions from Tehran as to anchoring in territorial waters, that he did not know that he had anchored in British waters, and that he had anchored in the same place several times before without protest. He added that he was prepared to move if he had a written request from the commanding officer of H.M.S. Ormonde or from Lieutenant Gretton. The latter (who was subsequently informed by the senior naval officer that his action in raising the question with the Persian official was impolitic) then, with the approval of the commanding officer of H.M.S. Ormonde, “sent a letter to the Persian customs official in the following terms (in English and Persian):—

P. 2556/30.

“I have to inform you that your customs dhow is anchored within the territorial waters of His Britannic Majesty. I therefore request that you will cause your dhow to be moved into Persian waters as soon as this can be done. This will be effected by moving your dhow about 800 yards to the south-eastward.”

The dhow in due course removed itself on the completion of its work in Persian Basidu. No protest against the claim that the territorial waters of British Basidu were British appears to have been made.

51. In December 1932 His Majesty's Minister at Tehran informed the Foreign Office that “the archives have now been examined, and I am quite confident that no admission of the weakness of our position at Basidu has ever been made to the Persian Government in writing.”

Sir R. Hoare
to Mr. Rendel,
December 1,
1932,
P.Z. 359/33.

J. G. L.

India Office, October 18, 1933.

(*) To maintain the status quo in the Persian Gulf during the continuance of treaty negotiations.

[10221]

T

Enclosure 3 in (1).

PAPER C.

Draft Treaty Article regarding Basidu.

"ARTICLE 5.

"1. SA Majesté le Roi cède à Sa Majesté impériale le Schah tous les droits qu'il avait sur Bassidou et les biens qu'il y possédait.
 "2. Il reste entendu que les autorités de Sa Majesté impériale le Schah feront respecter les tombeaux dans le cimetière britannique de Bassidou et prêteront leur concours à toute personne dûment autorisée par le représentant en Perse de Sa Majesté le Roi pour assurer le maintien desdits tombeaux."

(2)

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, October 31, 1933.

IN paragraph 11 of the letter which I addressed to you by direction of Secretary Sir John Simon on the 26th October, regarding the nature of the British rights in the area known as "British Basidu" at the north-western corner of the Persian Island Qishm, at the mouth of the Persian Gulf, it was stated that the Persian Government had now intimated in writing that they regard the whole area of the Island of Qishm, including "British Basidu," as being under Persian sovereignty.

2. There are, in fact, three notes in question: one of the 21st September (Paper D), one of the 19th October (Paper E), and one of the 24th October (Paper F). As will be seen, the Persian Government in their note of the 21st September specifically refer to Persian sovereignty over the area of the British concession, while appearing to question the right of His Majesty's Government to maintain armed forces there. The notes of the 19th and 24th October claim that His Majesty's Government have no territorial rights or jurisdiction in the concession area, and in effect that the area is subject to ordinary Persian jurisdiction. It will be observed that the notes also contain references to various recent incidents, with the details of which it is unnecessary to trouble you, since, so far as can be judged, they are not relevant to the legal issues on which you were asked to advise in my letter of the 26th October.

3. Shortly after the delivery of this note, the Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs made a statement in the Persian Majlis or Parliament on the question of Persian rights in Basidu, which is summarised in Mr. Mallet's telegram No. 282, of which a copy is also enclosed herein (Paper G). The instructions which were eventually sent to Mr. Mallet regarding the further action to be taken accordingly contained the following passage:—

"... You should simultaneously inform the Persian Government orally that His Majesty's Government have learned with surprise of the Minister's statement in the Majlis; that they cannot but contrast it with steps taken by them with regard to the flag incident, out of respect for Persian feelings, to avoid publicity as far as possible; and that, while not wishing to enter into detailed discussion of Minister's statement, you must, under instructions, make it clear that His Majesty's Government are unable to accept many of the points contained in it, and add that, in particular, the allegation that many protests have been made by the Persian Government regarding Basidu during past years appears to be entirely without foundation."

I have, &c.

G. W. RENDEL.

List of Papers.

- D. Tehran telegram No. 222, September 21, 1933.
- E. Tehran telegram No. 271, October 20, 1933.
- F. Persian Chargé d'Affaires to Sir John Simon, October 24, 1933.
- G. Tehran telegram No. 282, October 23, 1933.

Enclosure 1 in (2).

D.

Mr. Mallet to Sir John Simon.—(Received September 21.)

(No. 222.)

(Telegraphic.) R.

Tehran, September 21, 1933.

MY telegram No. 219.

At noon to-day I received note from Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs to the effect that a number of British marines had recently landed with guns and machine guns at Basidu contrary to rights of Persian sovereignty. Persian Government registered a protest against this irregular action and surprise in view of desire for good relations which has always animated them. They earnestly request me to use my good offices to get British troops to leave Basidu and prevent recurrence of such events in the future.

See my immediately following telegram.

Enclosure 2 in (2).

E.

Mr. Mallet to Sir John Simon.—(Received October 21.)

(No. 271.)

(Telegraphic.) R.

Tehran, October 20, 1933.

MY telegram No. 265.

Note signed by Minister for Foreign Affairs, dated 19th October, just received as follows:—

"I have received with utmost surprise your note of 15th October regarding inexplicable treatment given to Mudir of Customs at Basidu while latter was performing his duties and his removal to Bandar Abbas.

"2. It is a source of great surprise that claim which was maintained by His Britannic Majesty's Government to a coal store at Basidu has gradually assumed another aspect, and that His Britannic Majesty's Government have now taken action as if they were the owners thereof and are preventing exercise of sovereign rights of Persia in that place, and have even called it a special British area and consider its territorial waters as being outside Persian jurisdiction.

"3. The authorities of the Imperial Government do not know why status quo has been invoked in this connexion and with what justification British naval authorities have taken this action, since the Imperial Government have not recognised, will not recognise, any British area or any sort of proprietary right of the British Government at Basidu.

"4. I am astonished to the utmost degree that at a time when all Powers are invited to respect rights of others such action has been taken by British naval authorities in infringement of the sovereign rights of Persia, that British naval forces have had recourse to armed intervention, have arrested a Persian official within Persian territory and waters while in performance of his duties, and have imprisoned him in a man-of-war and removed him from his post to another place, and that you have reported this to me as if it were a usual matter.

"5. In view of foregoing, I now record in the name of the Imperial Government the strongest possible protest against armed intervention on the part of British naval forces in Persian territory, irregular treatment of Mudir of Customs at Basidu and use of term special British area which has been repeatedly mentioned in note under reply; I bring to your notice the fact that Customs Mudir at Basidu and Customs Ferrash have been sent back to their post, and the Imperial Government earnestly call upon the British Government for immediate redress for this behaviour on the part of British officials and their punishment."

(Repeated to India, No. 104; Bushire, No. 118, for communication to the senior naval officer.)

[10221]

T 2

Enclosure 3 in (2).

F.

Persian Chargé d'Affaires to Sir John Simon.Imperial Persian Legation, London, October 24, 1933.

Sir,

I HAVE the honour to state that I am instructed by my Government to bring to the notice of your Excellency the following contents of a note, dated the 16th instant, addressed to His Britannic Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Tehran by his Excellency the Minister for Foreign Affairs, in reply to the former's note of the 15th idem, regarding the conduct of certain British naval officers towards the Director of Customs at the port of Basidu, and in removing him to Bandar Abbas:—

"It is with great surprise that I have received your note of the 15th instant regarding the inexplicable conduct on the part of certain British naval officers towards the Director of Customs whilst on duty at Basidu, and his subsequent removal to Bandar Abbas. It is also surprising that the pretensions of His Britannic Majesty's Government to the use of a coaling station at Basidu should have gradually assumed another form, giving rise to certain proceedings that amount to an infringement of the territorial rights of Persia, going even so far as to regard Basidu as a 'special British station,' thereby excluding any recognition of the adjacent waters being within the sphere of Persian administration.

"2. Moreover, the Persian Government is at a loss to comprehend the application of the term, status quo, in this connexion, or the grounds upon which the British officers concerned can justify their action.

"3. The Imperial Persian Government does not recognise, or has ever recognised, the possession by His Britannic Majesty's Government of any territorial rights at Basidu, or any claim to jurisdiction over the district.

"4. I am further surprised that, at a time when nations are enjoined to respect the rights of others, this action should have been taken by the British naval authorities, which undoubtedly is an infringement of Persia's territorial rights, and, moreover, that they should have exerted armed interference within Persian territory, causing the arrest of a Persian official engaged upon his lawful duties, having him removed to a warship and then banishing him to another place. It is still more surprising that you should have reported the matter as if it were quite a normal proceeding.

"5. In view of the foregoing statement, I beg leave to make, on behalf of my Government, a most emphatic protest against the intrusion of British naval forces into Persian territory, and their unaccountable conduct regarding the Director of Customs, on the pretext that Basidu is a 'special British station,' as you have reiterated in your note.

"6. I beg to inform you that the Director of Customs and his commissionaire have since returned to their former duties at Basidu, and that the Imperial Persian Government earnestly request that His Britannic Majesty's Government should make due restitution for the conduct of the British officers and take such disciplinary measures against them as the occasion would seem to demand."

I have, &c.

F. NOURY ESFANDIARY.

1933

Enclosure 4 in (2).

G.

Mr. Mallet to Sir John Simon.—(Received October 24.)

(No. 282.)

(Telegraphic.)

Tehran, October 23, 1933.

MY telegram No. 272.

In reply to question in Majlis yesterday, Minister for Foreign Affairs stated that news of arrest of mudir was correct, and explained that in days of Persia's weakness British Government had, without any authorisation from Persian Government, had a naval coaling depot at Basidu, with regard to which present Persian Government had made many protests during past few years. After reciting details of incident, Minister stated that he had received note from British Legation complaining of acts done by mudir in the course of his legitimate duties. He quoted principal passage, the only omission of importance being reference to previous warning given to mudir. This protest had given intense astonishment to Persian Government. He had immediately protested to British representative, and had sent similar instructions to Legation in London. Minister then recited principal point of Persian reply (see my telegram No. 271), and ended by declaring that Basidu was an integral part of Persia, that Persian Government did not, and would not, recognise either a British area or British territorial waters or any right of possession, and that Government would defend rights of Persia in this case as they had, under the guidance of the ruler of the kingdom, in all other matters.

(Repeated to Government of India, No. 112; Bushire, No. 128; and senior naval officer, No. 16.)

(3)

Report of the Law Officers of the Crown.

(a)—1. In our opinion the Imam of Muscat was not in a position at the time of the grant of 1820 to cede sovereignty over the Island of Qishm or any part of it. We doubt very much whether the Imam intended by the grant to do more than give his consent to the removal of British troops from another place to the island for a particular purpose, namely, that of checking piracy. But in any case, the facts as narrated in Papers A and B fall far short of the evidence which we think any tribunal would require before being satisfied that at the material date the sovereignty of the Island of Qishm was in the Imam of Muscat. The high-water mark of Muscat supremacy seems to have been reached in 1794, when it is to be noted the victors used their victory—not to claim sovereignty by right of conquest—but to obtain a revenue lease from Persia in respect of territories which, we assume, included Qishm. Between 1794 and 1820 nothing is recorded which, in our opinion, altered the position thus brought about. We therefore answer the first question in the negative.

2. The nature and duration of the occupation of British Basidu have not been such as, in our opinion, to establish a claim to the area in question as British territory by prescription or otherwise. So far as the principle of prescription is concerned, there is a substantial body of opinion amounting to a balance of authority in favour of including prescription among the methods of acquiring sovereignty over territory. It is generally recognised that in order to establish such a title, there must have been a continuous and undisturbed exercise of sovereignty over a sufficient period, but there is great uncertainty as to what is a sufficient period. In some circumstances a period of fifty years has been regarded as sufficient. In the case of the dispute between the United States of America and Mexico in 1910 concerning the Chamizal tract, the period relied on by the United States was from 1848 until the year 1895, but no opinion was expressed by the International Boundary Commission as to the sufficiency of that length of time, their view being that, in any event, upon the evidence adduced it was impossible to hold that the possession of the territory in question by the United States was "undisturbed, uninterrupted and unchallenged" so as to found a prescriptive title.

In the present case we cannot regard the occupation which followed the grant of 1820 as amounting to an exercise of sovereignty. The occupation, in our opinion, continued to be occupation under the grant of the Imam down to the time when, as we are informed in Paper B (paragraph 45), the lease granted by Persia in September of that year was automatically determined and was never thereafter renewed in favour of Muscat. We have not overlooked the fact that notwithstanding the provisions of the firman of 1855 (articles 13 and 14) and the undertaking contained in the Treaty of Paris of 1857 (articles 2 and 14) Basidu remained in British occupation without complaint by Persia. This is strong evidence in support of a prescriptive title or, as it might be put, of estoppel against Persia by reason of unchallenged possession. Article 6 of the Telegraph Agreement of 1864, moreover, was deliberately inserted in order to put on record the British title to Basidu. On examination, however, an argument based on this article breaks down as it clearly refers the British title to the grant of 1820 and not to length of uninterrupted possession amounting to an exercise of sovereignty. So far as the occupation of Basidu, notwithstanding the firman of 1855 and the Treaty of Paris, is concerned, this is not sufficient in our opinion in the conditions of the time to make the British occupation of Basidu take the form of the exercise of British sovereignty.

It becomes necessary therefore to consider the history of the occupation from 1868 down to the present date. We are informed that the British flag has continued to fly there without interruption, that Basidu was occupied by a British garrison down to 1883, and thereafter down to 1913 as a naval station, principally for the purposes of a coal depot, and that from 1913 to the present time British naval parties have engaged in "beating the bounds" of the somewhat indeterminate territory known as British Basidu. If at or shortly after 1868 a piece of territory had been occupied with a clear intention to exercise sovereignty, and this had not been challenged at any time during a period of fifty years thereafter, we think there would have been a strong case for claiming sovereignty by prescription. These, however, are not the facts here. The occupation after 1868 was a continuation of the same nature as the previous occupation which, for the reasons we have given, did not take the form of an exercise of sovereignty.

We have taken into consideration all the facts put before us, including the incidents which have taken place in recent years, and we have come to the conclusion already expressed that there is not sufficient evidence to establish a British title to Basidu either by prescription or otherwise.

(b) and (c). We cannot see any reason, if our answers to the first two questions are accepted, for claiming that British Basidu should only be surrendered on terms. It is either British or it is not, and there is nothing in the nature of a lease to justify occupation if the Persian Government insist on their right.

(d) and (e). We see no grounds on which His Majesty's Government can claim the right, apart from agreement, to occupy British Basidu and exercise jurisdiction over the area in question and adjoining territorial waters, either in time of peace or time of war.

The question submitted to us as to a prescriptive title is difficult and the answer is not entirely free from uncertainty. The arguments in favour of a prescriptive title, or of estoppel preventing Persia from asserting a national title over the disputed territory, are in our opinion sufficiently strong (although we do not think they would prevail in the event of a reference to an international tribunal) to strengthen the hands of His Majesty's Government in any negotiations they may think proper.

We have, &c.

T. W. H. INSKIP.

DONALD SOMERVELL.

Law Officers' Department,
November 9, 1933.

TURKEY

[E 6008/408/44/1933]

No. 5⁴.

[Board of Trade.]

[January 30, 1933.]

Case for joint opinion of the Attorney-General, Mr. G. T. Simonds and Mr. J. H. Stamp.

THE following papers are sent herewith:—

- (A) Brief and previous papers in the Action: Whittall v. Administrator of German Property.
- (B) Copy Order of the 20th December, 1932.
- (C 1, C 2 and C 3) Copy Transcript of Shorthand Notes of Argument (three days).
- (D) Copy Transcript of Shorthand Notes of Judgment.
- (E) Copy Transcript of Shorthand Notes of Application to settle Minutes of Order.
- (F) Copy Letter from Mr. R. C. Owen-Wells of the 16th December, 1932.
- (G) Copy Memorandum by Maitre Biliotti on the Judgment dated the 10th December, 1932.

Claims of British nationals against Turkish Government: As to their being entitled to benefit of second charge on proceeds of German property.

The effect of the judgment would appear to be as follows:—

That the plaintiffs are entitled by virtue of the Treaty of Peace Order, 1919, to the benefit of the second charge on the assets in the hands of the Administrator of German Property for securing payment to them of the amounts due on the 10th January, 1920, such amounts being then ascertained or thereafter to be ascertained in respect of their claims against the Turkish Government existing on the 10th January, 1920, with regard to their property, rights and interests in Turkish territory arising out of the acts of the Turkish Government or its agents, such as are defined as exceptional war measures or measures of transfer in paragraph 3 of the annex to Part X, section IV, of the Treaty of Versailles so far as such claims were, when they arose, recognised by Turkish municipal law as valid and so far as such claims have not been or will not be satisfied.

Further, that the amount of such claims, including claims in respect of requisitions, must be ascertained by reference to the sums in Turkish currency (piastres) by which the Turkish Government might have satisfied the sum on the 10th January, 1920, converted into English currency at the average rate of exchange on that day.

Further, that, so far as such claims relate to requisitions, the debts due by the Turkish Government became due at the date of the taking of the goods.

Counsel will recollect that the plaintiff's claim related to sixteen different items of damage alleged to have been suffered by them which are set out in paragraph 3 of the amended statement of claim (Document 1 in the brief bundle), and that five of these items, as set out in paragraph 3 (a) of the statement of claim, were, by agreement between the parties, selected as raising the questions of principle which it was desired to have determined in the action. The court has further ordered that the plaintiffs and defendant are at liberty to apply in chambers for an enquiry in regard to any questions that may arise as to the application of the declarations contained in the order to the matters alleged in paragraphs 3 and 3 (a) of the statement of claim.

An opinion has been obtained from Maitre Biliotti (who, counsel will remember, was the Turkish barrister who advised on behalf of the defendant with regard to the Turkish laws relating to the subject-matter of the action and as to their effect (see Document "A" in the brief bundle)) as to the result of the judgment in relation to the particular items in paragraph 3 (a) of the statement of claim (see Document "G").

As regards item 3 (a) (i)—requisitions made while Turkey was engaged in the war in respect of which proper mazbattas or requisition notes were given—Maitre Biliotti is of opinion that it would not be possible for the plaintiffs to prove that legally they were creditors of the Turkish Government on the 10th January, 1920, for a higher amount than the amount stated in the mazbattas.

1933

So far as claims of the nature of this claim are concerned, it would seem that they would come within the judgment, and that the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover out of the German assets any amount which has not been otherwise satisfied, but that, as in the case of requisitions where mazbattas were given, the amount stated on the mazbattas as being due to the plaintiffs was invariably allowed in full by the Paris Commission, and as the rate of exchange was at 109 piastres to the £ by the Paris Commission, whereas the rate of exchange on the 10th January, 1920, was 398 piastres to the £, it would seem that, although only a dividend of 55 per cent. of the amount was paid by the Paris Commissioner to the plaintiffs, they have, owing to the difference in the rate of exchange, received more than they would have received had they been paid in full by the Turkish Government on the 10th January, 1920.

Item 3 (a) (ii) of the claim relates to requisitions which were alleged to have taken place without the issue of any mazbattas. Counsel will note that Maitre Biliotti deals very shortly with these requisitions on p. 3 of his memorandum, but he has already previously dealt fully with such claims on p. 34 of his opinion (Document "A" of the brief bundle). From a perusal of this opinion it would appear that the question as to whether the claimants would have any claim against the Turkish Government as at the 10th January, 1920, depended on the nature of the evidence which they could have brought before the Turkish court, and it is suggested by Maitre Biliotti that there is no evidence that the plaintiffs would have succeeded in proving that the requisitions alleged had taken place, or would have overcome the opposition of the Turkish State to any such claim, and he goes on to state that, in fact, the plaintiffs have done nothing in order to collect any evidence and have given no justification whatever of their inaction. From this, however, it would appear that had the plaintiffs been in a position to present irrefutable evidence to the Turkish courts with regard to the requisition of their goods by a Turkish authority having power to requisition and the value thereof, they might, under Turkish municipal law, have had a claim which might have been recognised by the Turkish courts, although they had no mazbattas to support such claim. If this is a correct view of the position, it obviously raises matters for very serious consideration. Counsel will recollect that the evidence in support of such claims in paragraph 3 (a) of the claim which was submitted to the Paris Commission is set out in Document 18 of the brief bundle, and it is a matter for consideration as to whether the documents contained in that bundle would be evidence of such a nature as would be considered by the British courts to be sufficient to prove the claim against the Turkish Government, or whether, in order to establish a claim under Mr. Justice Maugham's judgment, it would be necessary for them on any enquiry which might be held thereunder to call verbal evidence which would be subject to cross-examination in order to support a claim that they might have in regard to requisitions made by the Turkish Government in respect of which no mazbattas were given. If it were necessary for the plaintiffs to call such evidence verbally, the prospect of them being able to do so would, at this late date, seem to be small.

A further point, however, which has been raised both in the memorandum by Maitre Biliotti and in the letter from Mr. Owen-Wells, whom counsel will recollect was the British agent in Constantinople, is the possibility of some admission as to liability being obtained from the Turkish authorities by connivance. In considering this aspect of the case, it must, of course, be recollected that it might be possible for a Turkish court to make the declaration that as at the 10th January, 1920, the plaintiffs had under Turkish municipal law a good claim against the Turkish Government in respect of particular items, such as the one set out in paragraph 3 (a) (ii) of the claim, without thereby placing any liability on the Turkish Government to discharge such a claim owing to the right to such a claim having been subsequently destroyed by the terms of the Treaty of Lausanne; or, on the other hand, it might be possible that some scheme might be devised whereby the Turkish authorities would grant a certificate formally admitting such claims in full and at a greater amount than was allowed by the Paris Commission, and it would appear to be a matter for consideration as to whether, if such a position were to arise, the British courts would accept such a declaration or such a certificate as evidence of the position under Turkish municipal law, or would insist on expert evidence being called on the question. It may be that the British courts would not consider such a declaration on the ground that the Turkish courts would have no jurisdiction to make such a declaration, having regard to the fact that there can now be no claim against the Turkish Government which Turkey could be made legally liable to discharge having regard to article 58 of the Treaty of Lausanne, and that such a declaration would, in fact, be merely in the nature of evidence and not a genuine finding of a court in an action, but, in view of the suggestions contained not only in Mr. Owen-Wells's letter, but in Maitre Biliotti's opinion, it becomes necessary to put this suggestion before counsel.

With regard to item 3 (a) (iii) of the claim, it is presumably open to the defendant to contend on any enquiry which may be instituted that requisitions before the Ottoman Government entered the war did not arise out of acts of the Turkish Government such as are defined as "exceptional war measures" or "measures of transfer" in the Treaty of Versailles.

Counsel will recollect that in paragraph 3 of the annex to Part X, section IV, of the Treaty of Versailles "exceptional war measures" includes measures of all kinds, legislative, administrative, judicial or others, that have been taken or will be taken hereafter with regard to enemy property.

It is submitted that, until Turkey entered the war against Great Britain, British subjects were not an enemy, and that requisitions made before the date of the entry of Turkey into the war would not, therefore, be included in acts of the Turkish Government as are defined as "exceptional war measures" under the Treaty of Versailles.

In view of the judgment, it is an important consideration as to whether this argument would be open to the defence on an enquiry.

Item 3 (a) (iv) of the claim relates to the informal requisition of a house and store from about the 1st August, 1914, to the 12th August, 1924, in respect of which no mazbattas were given, but which was damaged during the occupation. No claim was made in respect of the damage within one month of the return of the property as is required by Turkish law. Maitre Biliotti points out that the Ottoman law provides that neither rent nor compensation is payable in respect of the occupation of real property, and it only authorises a claim for repairing deterioration caused by the occupation if such claim is made within one month from the restoration of the property. As no such claim has been made, there would not appear to have been any "amount due" on the 10th January, 1920, within the meaning of the judgment.

Item 3 (a) (v) of the claim appears to be ruled out by the terms of the judgment.

Although at first sight it would not appear that the plaintiffs are likely to be able to prove on an enquiry under the judgment that they are entitled to claim any substantial amount from the funds in the hands of the German Administrator, it has to be borne in mind that this action was instituted as an action in the nature of a test case in order to obtain declarations which would cover not only this case, but all claims of British nationals in Turkey who suffered damage there during the war, and it may be that there are such British nationals who may have had a legal claim against the Turkish Government under Turkish municipal law on the 10th January, 1920, with regard to requisitions of their property who did, in fact, receive no compensation from the Paris Commission, but if the present judgment is allowed to stand it is difficult to see how they could establish their claims without proving to the satisfaction of the British courts that the particular items would come within the terms of the judgment, having regard to the nature of the evidence which they possess in a particular case with regard to the requisitioning of the property. Having regard to the form of the judgment, it is difficult to see how it can be regarded as affecting claimants other than the plaintiffs. This aspect of the case, however, is a matter which needs careful consideration in considering whether an appeal should be lodged against the judgment.

Counsel will recollect that for the purpose of the arguments on principle and for the purpose of the hearing, the facts appearing by the relevant files were accepted as being conclusively established, but it is not admitted that such evidence of facts are to be accepted as evidence which would establish a claim against the Turkish Government (see bundle 21, brief bundle, pp. 1 and 9).

There is also a further matter, namely, whether the judgment could in any way be applied not only to claims by British nationals in Turkey, but also to claims by British nationals in Austria or Bulgaria, i.e., as to whether the judgment in this case would be applicable to claims arising in Austria or

1933

Bulgaria, having regard to the fact that both in the Austrian treaty and the Bulgarian treaty an article similar to article 297 of the Treaty of Versailles was included, or whether the decision in the judgment that municipal law is applicable as well as treaty law is limited to the case of Turkey, having regard to the fact that there is no article similar to article 297 of the Treaty of Versailles in the Treaty of Lausanne. There is no evidence available with regard to what is the municipal law in Austria or Bulgaria, but if it is considered that the judgment would affect these countries as well as Turkey, there might be a considerable number of further claims which would be made against the funds in the hands of the administrator.

It would appear that it will probably be contended on behalf of the plaintiffs on an enquiry under the judgment that the sums which were paid to the plaintiffs by the Sumner and Paris Commissions were not payments in respect of the debt due by Turkey, in view of the fact that these payments were merely ex gratia payments by a third party, and that the amount due by the Turkish Government in respect of the acts done under exceptional war measures or measures of transfer have consequently not been otherwise satisfied either in part or in whole. Counsel is referred to p. 3 of the transcript of the shorthand notes of the application to settle the form of order (Document "E"), and to the remarks of Mr. F. P. M. Schiller, K.C., on this point. It would seem that the meaning of the words "otherwise satisfied" must depend on the interpretation of the Treaty of Versailles, and although the Turkish Government is primarily the debtor, it is not a question to be decided by Turkish law. Presumably, Mr. Schiller is depending on the principle that payment by a third person is not sufficient to discharge a debt unless it is made by him as agent for and on behalf of the debtor, and with his prior authority or is subsequently ratified by the debtor (see Halsbury's Laws of England, second edition, Vol. 7, p. 240, paragraph 329).

In considering this it may be pointed out that article 58 of the Treaty of Lausanne under which the Allies renounced all pecuniary claims by their nationals for loss or damage suffered, Turkey renounced in favour of the Allies the right to the sum of £5 million, and also agreed not to claim from the British Government repayment of the sums for the warships, which were the sums handed over to the Paris Commission by the Allies for compensating their nationals. It is submitted that it might be possible to contend that the payments by the Paris Commission were made with the prior authority of the Turkish Government, apart from the fact as to whether the words "otherwise satisfied" under the Treaty of Versailles could be held to mean "otherwise satisfied on behalf of the debtor."

The chief risk, which there would appear to be in appealing against the judgment, is that the Court of Appeal might find that the date at which payment of any claims against the assets in the hands of the German Administrator must be paid, is earlier than the 10th January, 1920. If on appeal it was held that the date of payment must be reckoned at the date when the goods were requisitioned by the Turkish Government, or that the payment must be made at a pre-war rate, this might entail payment of the balance of 45 per cent., which was not met by the payments by the Paris Commission.

Counsel will note that it is suggested in Mr. Owen-Wells's letter of the 16th December (Document "F") that this date should not be earlier than the date of the Treaty of Lausanne.

With regard to the finding of the court that the amounts became due at the dates when the goods were requisitioned, it is submitted that this is really a question of Turkish law, on which no evidence was called at the hearing of the case upon which such finding could be based.

It is not known whether the plaintiffs will appeal against the judgment, and their course of action may be guided by the question of available funds. As counsel are aware the plaintiffs are resident out of the jurisdiction, and although the sum of £550 was ordered to be lodged in court as security for costs, this sum has now been paid out to the plaintiffs under the terms of the judgment, no order having been made as to costs in the action. If the plaintiffs appeal, a further application for security for costs can be made, and it would undoubtedly be more satisfactory if an appeal is to be lodged that the plaintiffs should appeal, when the defendant, if thought advisable, could lodge a cross appeal, but it seems advisable, in view of the uncertainty of the position, that the defendant should be in a position to give notice of appeal at the latest time before the expiry of the time for appealing in the event of the plaintiffs not doing so. The order was entered on the 30th December, 1932, and it would appear that the last day for giving notice of appeal is the 9th February, 1933 (order 58, rule 15).

Counsel are asked to advise—

- (1) Whether an appeal should be lodged against the judgment on behalf of the defendant, and if so
- (2) to settle the form of notice of appeal, and
- (3) whether, in the event of the plaintiffs giving notice of appeal, a cross appeal should be lodged.

Joint Opinion of the Attorney-General, Mr. G. T. Simonds and Mr. J. H. Stamp.

1 and 2. We do not think that in this case notice of appeal should be given on behalf of the defendant. We are not satisfied that the judgment of Maugham, J., is correct, though there is much to be said for the view taken by him, that the second charge under the Treaty of Peace Order, 1919, covered any amounts due from the Turkish Government under Turkish Municipal Law in respect of matters which would have given rise to claims against the Turkish Government under a treaty with Turkey in the form of the Treaty of Versailles. If such a treaty had been concluded a new liability would have arisen with regard to the same claims, and other amounts might have become due in respect of them, but in the meantime there was an actual independent liability under Turkish law, and amounts were in truth and in fact due in respect of such liability which may well be held to fall within the words of article 297 of the Treaty of Versailles and the annex thereto. In view of the weight of these considerations and of the answers given to the later questions put to us, we do not think it expedient to appeal, but we do not advise that the judgment should be accepted as a correct interpretation of the treaty in the event of other claims of a similar character being made.

We do not think that the plaintiffs will establish their contention that the payments made by the Paris Commission did not in the circumstances in which they were made operate in whole or in part in satisfaction of the claims under the Treaty of Peace Order and having regard to the lower rate of exchange applicable under the order these payments appear likely to cover the whole liability.

The principle of the judgment plainly applies to claims against other enemy Governments if there are any such claims in a like position.

In our opinion certificates of a Turkish court would not be admissible to establish claims here; in our opinion, the facts would have to be proved by admissible evidence and expert evidence would have to be called to prove that the facts gave rise to a valid claim under Turkish law. Of course, where there were regular mazbattas, the claim would have arisen directly under them, and it would only be necessary in such cases to prove that the mazbattas are such as would be recognised under Turkish law without the facts lying behind them.

In our opinion a contention would on any enquiry be open that claims under requisitions made before Turkey entered the war was not within the charge, but we regard the success of the contention as very doubtful.

We doubt whether it will be possible to establish a claim in respect of item 3 (a) (iv). It appears that in such a case no right arose under Turkish law until the property was restored in a damaged condition; and this did not take place until the 12th August, 1924, long after the date at which the Treaty of Peace Order, 1919, speaks.

On the whole it does not appear likely that any serious liability can result from the order obtained by the plaintiffs.

3. If the plaintiffs appeal we think that it will be worth while for the defendant to give notice under order 58, rules 6 and 7, that he will contend that the order should be varied by negating any charge except for claims under the Lausanne Treaty.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
G. T. SIMONDS.
J. H. STAMP.

January 30, 1933.

1933

No. 5^B.

THE DATE GARDENS IN IRAQ OF THE SHEIKHS
OF KOWEIT AND MOHAMMERAH

SCOPE OF UNDERTAKINGS GIVEN BY H.M. GOVERNMENT IN 1914

CASE FOR THE OPINION OF THE
LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN
and Opinion thereon dated 29th March 1933.

THE DATE GARDENS IN IRAQ OF THE SHEIKHS OF KOWEIT AND MOHAMMERAH

Scope of undertakings given by H.M. Government in 1914

CASE FOR THE OPINION OF THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN

1. This case raises certain questions respecting the nature and scope of undertakings given by His Majesty's Government in 1914 to the Sheikh of Koweit and Mohammerah (documents 1 and 2 in the Appendix, pp. 8 and 9), upon which the Treasury desire to have the opinion of the Law Officers.

2. Certain aspects of the problems raised by these undertakings were submitted to the Law Officers in May, 1930, by the Colonial Office. The questions then submitted related in the main to issues which had arisen as between His Majesty's Government and the Iraqi Government.

The question which now falls to be considered is whether in the circumstances hereinafter described any legal obligation rests on His Majesty's Government vis-a-vis the Sheikh himself.

3. The circumstances in which the undertakings in question came to be given can, so far as they are relevant to the present question, be stated shortly as follows:—

4. In 1914 His Majesty's Government were desirous of obtaining the assistance of the Sheikh of Koweit and Mohammerah against Turkey, and letters were accordingly addressed to them by the Resident and Consul-General in the Persian Gulf, in which the nature of the assistance desired was indicated and certain promises were made in return. The letters, documents 1 and 2 in the Appendix, were in different terms but for present purposes it is necessary only to quote the following extracts. In the letter to the Sheikh of Koweit dated 3rd November, 1914, the following passage occurs:—

“Furthermore I make to you, on behalf of the British Government, certain promises concerning Your Excellency personally, viz.:—

“(1) That your gardens which are now in your possession viz. the date gardens situate between Fao and Qurnah shall remain in your possession and in possession of your descendants without being subject to the payment of taxes or imposts.”

In the letter to the Sheikh of Mohammerah dated 21st November, 1914, it was stated:—

“Further the date gardens which you now possess on the Turkish side of the Shatt-el-Arab shall remain in full possession of you and your heirs and immune from taxation.”

The reason why a variant of the expression “immune from taxation” appears in the letter to the Sheikh of Koweit is explained in paragraph 13 below.

to a bargain involving relief from taxation claims that he has performed all that he has promised to do, may perhaps be regarded as of general application.

12. In the present case there can be little doubt that the Istihlak is a "tax" strictly so called; and the question therefore appears to be whether on their true construction and having regard to the circumstances in which and the persons to whom they were given the undertakings given to the Sheikhs extend to taxation not levied on the gardens themselves as such but on their produce. Do they, for example, extend only to taxes creating a liability which arises from the simple fact of occupation or ownership of land, or do they include also a tax creating liability which only arises if the landowner chooses to export or sell some part of the produce of that land, and then payable not by the landowner as such, but by the seller or exporter.

13. It is important to examine the actual language used in the undertakings given to the two Sheikhs. When the drafts were under consideration in 1914 the wording approved for both letters was "The date gardens which you now possess . . . shall remain in the full possession of you and your heirs and be immune from taxation". An authenticated copy of the actual Arabic letter received by the Sheikh of Koweit has been obtained. The words in this which correspond to "immune from taxation" in the English draft are Arabic words which are literally translated "without there being upon them anything in the nature of taxes or imposts". Evidently Colonel Knox, the writer of the Arabic letter, used two more or less synonymous Arabic words to give the sense of taxation quite generally and comprehensively. (There is no reason to suppose that the Arabic of the letter sent to the Sheikh of Mohammerah is not the same as that of the letter sent to the Sheikh of Koweit in the particular, but as copy of it is not available here, the copy sent herewith follows the original English draft). It will thus be seen that the pledge in regard to taxation is quite general and not expressed as limited to particular kinds of taxes. At the same time it seems clear that this exemption is not a personal exemption simpliciter in the sense that it implies that the Sheikh is entitled to reside in the gardens and claim to be exempt from all taxation of every kind which may be imposed on persons resident in Iraq; it is quite definitely linked up with the possession of the gardens and it seems reasonable therefore to limit it to taxation the liability to which is closely connected with the gardens themselves.

14. It is necessary to consider very closely the exact nature of the tax recently imposed. It may be regarded on the one hand as merely a trader's tax in the sense that it is primarily a tax on produce sold or exported; or on the other it may be regarded as merely a variant of the earlier form of tax based on the value of the land under cultivation and therefore as bearing a very close resemblance to that tax.

15. Admittedly the earlier form of tax fell within the terms of the undertaking and the question is therefore whether in all the circumstances the present tax can be regarded as so far divorced from the land itself as to bring it outside the terms used by the Resident in his letter. As has been explained above, the new tax is not levied on the landowner as such and may indeed not be paid by the Landowner himself at all except in so far as he may by reason of its existence have to accept a lesser price for his produce. It is therefore a tax on produce, but not on the produce as such of any particular garden or plantation; nor does the produce attract the tax until it has been severed and has been sold or exported. But since neither of the Sheikhs is resident in Iraq, the whole of the produce of their gardens (other than that consumed by the resident cultivators) does in fact attract the tax in the process of being sent to their places of residence for the consumption of their families and retainers.

16. Two views of the matter may it is thought conceivably be taken: (1) that the undertaking ought to be beneficially construed in the light of the practical effect of the new tax; and that as the Sheikhs are necessarily resident elsewhere than in Iraq, and since the produce of their gardens will with only trifling exceptions, always and necessarily attract the tax, because the produce is always and necessarily exported from Iraq for their consumption, the tax in their case is in fact a tax upon the produce of their gardens and therefore within the undertakings; and (2) that the undertakings are limited to taxes levied on the land itself and upon the ownership or occupation of the land, and the Istihlak tax is not a tax on land but on produce as such, divorced from the ownership or occupation of land, and therefore not within the terms of either undertaking.

17. To turn now to the second question which affects only the gardens in the possession of the Sheikh of Koweit. It appears that certain legal proceedings have been instituted against him in the Iraqi Courts at the suit of private persons claiming to be entitled to part of the gardens in his possession. In one such case the Court of Cassation at Baghdad has decided on appeal in favour of the plaintiff; and further proceedings of a similar nature are pending. It is therefore necessary to consider whether the pledge given to the Sheikh in 1914 imposes on His Majesty's Government any obligation in respect of such portions of the gardens in his physical possession in 1914 as the Iraqi Courts may decide are not the Sheikh's property. It is clearly beyond the power of His Majesty's Government to maintain the Sheikh in physical possession of property in Iraq which may be declared by the Iraqi Courts not to belong to him, and any liability must therefore be for payment of compensation.

18. The answer to this question would seem to depend on whether the undertaking given in 1914 ought, on its true construction, to be regarded as applying to a given area of land of which the Sheikh was at that time in physical possession or whether it relates only to such portions of that area as legally belong to him; in other words, has the pledge that certain gardens "shall remain in his possession" any application to property of which the Sheikh is dispossessed by the ordinary process of law, and as the result of a judgment in the Iraqi Courts? It is thought that the circumstances in which the pledge was given must be taken into account.

19. The general history of the case is contained in the accompanying Memorandum by the Political Agent, Koweit, document No. 4 in the appendix, p. 16. The essential points are, firstly, that from 1899 onwards His Majesty's Government were anxious to establish their political position in Koweit in the face of claims by the Turks that the Sheikh was an Ottoman subject; that with this end in view H.M.G. entered into secret engagements with the Sheikh; that in the years 1907 and following the Sheikh made certain large purchases of land in the then vilayet of Basra; that the Turkish authorities, apparently with a view to bringing pressure to bear on the Sheikh, refused to allow him to arrange for the necessary appearance before the Tapu department, with a view to declaring the validity of the sale, as was required by law, or to allow him to take possession, unless he registered himself as a Turkish national; that consequent on an appeal by the Sheikh to H.M.G. he was instructed not to take out Turkish nationality papers, but to have the stamped deeds secretly registered in the British Consulate at Basra; and that general discussions over this and other points affecting the status of Koweit proceeded between

H.M.G. and the Turkish Government until 1911, when they became merged in negotiations for the regularisation of the various questions in issue between H.M.G. and the Turkish Government in this area. Those negotiations culminated in the Anglo-Turkish Convention signed by the representatives of both parties on 29th July 1913. A section of the Convention in question regularised the position of the Sheikh of Koweit vis-a-vis both the Turkish and British Governments; and, with the history of the dispute which had taken place over the date gardens in view, one of the articles of the section in question provided that the Sheikh should enjoy in full security and in accordance with Ottoman Law the rights of private property which he possessed in the Vilayet of Basra. This convention had not been ratified, however, when war broke out with Turkey in 1914.

20. From the copy of the Judgment given by the Court of Cassation in Baghdad which is also enclosed (document No. 5 in the Appendix, p. 19) it will be seen that the failure of the Sheikh to take the formal steps necessary in regard to the registration of the documents of title with the Turkish authorities before the War, as described above, is one of the grounds on which he may be adjudged not to be the lawful owner of the gardens of which he is in possession and that it appears to have been strongly urged upon the Court. It is not clear whether this omission was or was not in itself a vital point in the decision already given, in the sense that but for this point the decision would have been in favour of the Sheikh, but it may well be thought in view of the history of matter prior to the giving of the undertakings, which is set out in the Memorandum of the Political Agent (No. 4, p. 16) that to the extent to which it was vital in that case or may be vital in any similar case which may be brought against the Sheikh hereafter, His Majesty's Government cannot refuse to recognise an obligation to compensate the Sheikh for any loss which he may have suffered as the result of his refusal to take the necessary steps to register his title because that involved his acceptance of the position of a subject of Turkey, and that would have been contrary to the policy which His Majesty's Government were urging upon him. It is clear that the question of the registration of his title to the gardens and the then recent difficulties created by non-registration must have been fresh in the minds of the Sheikh and the Political Resident at the time when the undertaking to the Sheikh was given in 1914. In this connection it may be significant that the first draft of the letter to be sent to the Sheikh in 1914 read: "your date gardens between Fao and Gurneh shall remain in the full possession of you and your heirs . . .", and that the Government of India deliberately directed the replacement of the words "your date gardens" by the words "date gardens which you now possess". It was in consequence of this change in the draft made by the Government of India that the pledge in the letter sent to the Sheikh of 3rd November actually reads:—"Your gardens which are now in your possession".

21. The Law Officers will also see from the Memorandum by Mr. E. Alexander (Acting Judicial Adviser to the Iraq Government) No. 6 in the appendix, p. 21, that there are grounds for doubting whether the decision of the Court on the question of the application of certain laws relating to the period of time necessary to prevent a title by adverse possession is correct. The question is one of Ottoman law on which English lawyers can scarcely express a definite opinion, but information obtained from an expert on the subject appears to afford some ground for holding that the doubt is well founded and that if the appropriate law had been correctly applied the Sheikh would not have been deprived of his land. The question may then arise whether the obligations of His Majesty's Government are affected in any way by the correctness or otherwise of the decision of the Iraqi Courts. The Sheikh does not hesitate to allege something akin to a conspiracy to deprive him of his gardens on political grounds, and the Law Officers may be of opinion that in these circumstances it is incumbent on His Majesty's Government to examine for themselves the basis of any decision against the Sheikh; and that if, as the result of that examination, in the course of which opinions would of course be obtained from experts in Ottoman law, it should be decided that the decision against the Sheikh is contrary to the justice of the case, His Majesty's Government come under a legal obligation to compensate the Sheikh for property which was then in his possession, but of which on this basis he has been wrongfully deprived.

THE LAW OFFICERS are requested to advise:—

1. Whether having regard to the terms of the undertakings given in 1914, the imposition of the Istihlak tax on the produce of the date gardens of the Sheikh of Koweit and the Sheikh of Mohammerah involves any breach of those undertakings and whether as a result any obligation rests on His Majesty's Government to compensate the Sheikhs.

2. Whether His Majesty's Government are under any obligation to compensate the Sheikh of Koweit in respect of any portion of the gardens in the possession of his predecessor in 1914 of which he may be deprived in consequence of a Judgment of the competent Iraqi Courts.

3. Whether it is material for the purposes of the last question to consider

(a) whether the basis of the judgment of the Iraqi Courts is the failure by the Sheikh to register certain documents in 1914; that failure having been admittedly due to the fact that the Sheikh, in accordance with the wishes of His Majesty's Government, refused to declare himself a Turkish subject, or

(b) whether the Judgment of the Iraqi Courts is or is not in accordance with the justice of the case; that is to say whether in the event of His Majesty's Government being of opinion that the decision of the Iraqi Courts is wrong, any liability to compensate the Sheikh arises.

4. Generally on the case.

APPENDIX

INDEX.

- 1 & 2. The letters dated 3rd November, 1914 and 21st November, 1914, from the Political Resident in the Persian Gulf to the Sheikhs containing on behalf of His Majesty's Government the undertakings referred to in this Case:
3. Copy Iraqi Law for the collection of "Istihlak" or Land Produce duty:
4. Memorandum by Political Agent, Koweit:
5. Judgment given by the Court of Cassation at Baghdad in respect of one of the gardens of the Sheikh of Koweit;
6. Memorandum by Mr. E. Alexander, Acting Judicial Adviser to the High Commissioner, Iraq.
7. Letter to the Agent to the Sheikh of Koweit dated 14th June, 1915.

DOCUMENT 1.

Letter dated 3rd November, 1914, from Political Resident in the Persian Gulf to the Ruler of Kuwait and Dependencies, Kuwait.

After compliments,

In continuation of previous letter intimating the outbreak of war between the British Government and Turkey, I am ordered by the British Government to convey to your Excellency gratitude for your loyalty and your offer of assistance, and to request you to attack Umm Qasr Safwan and Bubiyan and to occupy them. You should endeavour, afterwards, in co-operation with Shaikh Sir Khazal Khan, Amir Abdul Azin bin Saud and other reliable Shaikhs to liberate Basrah from Turkish possession. Should this prove to be beyond your ability, you should make arrangements, if possible, to prevent Turkish reinforcements from reaching Basrah or even Qurnah, until the arrival of the British troops whom we shall send, please God, as soon as possible. I also hope that two of our men-of-war will reach Basrah before the arrival of your troops there. And though it should be your highest aim, in this connection, to liberate Basrah and its people from Turkish rule, still we request that you should use your utmost endeavour in preventing troops and others from plundering the merchandise belonging to British merchants in Basrah and its dependencies, to protect the European residents of Basrah and to safeguard them from loss and oppression. In return for your valuable assistance in this important matter, I am ordered by the British Government to promise to Your Excellency that if we succeed therein—and we shall succeed therein, please God—we will not return Basrah to the Turkish Government, and we will not surrender it back to them at all. Furthermore I make to you, on behalf of the British Government, certain promises concerning Your Excellency personally, viz. :—

(1) that your gardens which are now in your possessions, viz., the date gardens situate between Fao and Qurnah, shall remain in your possession and in possession of your descendants without being subject to the payment of taxes or imposts;

(2) that if you attack Safwan, Umm Qasr and Bubiyan and occupy them, the British Government will protect you from any consequences arising from that action;

(3) that the British Government does recognise and admit that the Shaikhdom of Kuwait is an independent Government under British protection.

I request that you will be good enough to read the enclosed letter and transmit the same to the Amir of Najd at the earliest convenience. I have addressed a letter to the Shaikh of Mohammerah similar to this I am writing you.

I am confident of your old-established friendship with the exalted Government, and I believe that Your Excellency will use your endeavour in these important matters, in every respect.

I avail myself of this opportunity to assure you of my high esteem, and may you continue to remain preserved and salaams.

(Signed) S. G. KNOX,

Resident and H.B.M.'s Consul General in the Persian Gulf.

DOCUMENT 2.

Letter dated the 21st November, 1914, from the Political Resident in the Persian Gulf to the Shaikh of Mohammerah and its Dependencies, Mohammerah.

After compliments,

With reference to the assurance conveyed to Your Excellency in my letter No. 307 dated 15th October, 1910 (11th Shawwal 1328) and having regard to the further valued services and co-operation which Your Excellency has rendered to the British Government and to British interests in Arabistan and the Shatt-al-Arab, I am now authorised to assure Your Excellency personally, and to do so by this writing, that whatever change may take place in the form of the Government of Persia, and whether it be Royalist or Nationalist, His Majesty's Government will be prepared to afford you the support necessary for obtaining a solution satisfactory both to yourself and to us in the event of any encroachment by the Persian Government on your jurisdiction and recognised rights or on your property in Persia. In like manner they will safeguard you to the best of their ability against any unprovoked attack by a foreign power or against any encroachment by such power on your jurisdiction and recognised rights or on your property in Persia. These assurances are given for yourself and for your successors from among your male descendants, and shall hold good so long as you and they do not fail to observe your and their obligations towards the Persian Government provided that the nomination of your successors from among your male descendants shall be subject to confidential consultation with, and the approval of His Majesty's Government, and so long as you and they shall continue to be guided by the advice of His Majesty's Government and to maintain an attitude satisfactory to that Government.

Vis-a-vis the Persian Government, we shall do our best to maintain Your Excellency in your present state of local autonomy.

Further, the date gardens which you now possess on the Turkish side of the Shatt-al-Arab shall remain in full possession of you and your heirs and immune from taxation.

(Signed) P. Z. COX,
Lieut.-Colonel,

British Resident in the Persian Gulf, and H.M.'s Consul-General for Fars, etc.

DOCUMENT 3.

LAW FOR THE COLLECTION OF LAND PRODUCE DUTY, IRAQ.

Article 1.

The Land Tax shall be changed in favour of the Istihlak Duty, which shall be assessed and collected on land produce in accordance with the provisions of this Law. The Minister of Finance shall announce such change by Notification to be issued before the maturity of the produce to which such change applies.

Article 2.

The Method of Assessment and Collection of rent on Miri unalienated Lands in respect of land-rent (Mallakiyah Share), and also the Method of Assessment and Collection of Water charges on alienated and (Miri) unalienated flow lands and the method of making compensation in the case of Auqaf land the Miri dues in respect of which are allotted to a specific purpose, shall be made the subject of a special law.

Article 12.

Persons who pay the istihlak tax as provided under Article 11 above shall be authorised to deduct the istihlak tax from the sale proceeds of produce at the rate specified in this law, and shall be indemnified against any claim for any amount deducted in accordance with the provisions of this law.

Article 13.

The authorities concerned shall receive the istihlak tax on land produce against printed receipts with serial numbers in the following manner:—

- (a) Tax on land produce stored in places of istihlak determined under Article 4 (a) shall be collected within such period as specified in Instructions.
- (b) Tax on transported land produce may be collected at any Railway Station or Port.
- (c) Tax on land produce exported abroad from Iraq shall be collected at the Customs Offices before exportation; if istihlak tax has not already been collected thereon.

Article 14.

In case payment of the istihlak tax is refused, the authorities concerned shall dispose of such quantity of produce as is sufficient to meet payment of the tax demanded.

Article 15.

The authorities concerned, with a view to scrutinizing the accuracy of transactions, may weigh the produce subject to payment of consumption tax and compare the types and quantities thereof with books and other documents, and may also audit and examine such books as are maintained by owners of places of istihlak.

Article 16.

This law shall not apply to land produce subject to consumption tax which have been produced during the years preceding the date of its coming into force; provided that

- (1) Every owner of place of istihlak submits to the authorities concerned a statement, on a date to be specified by Regulation, showing types and quantities of land produce stored in his premises.
- (2) Every person who owns land produce stored outside places of istihlak and intended for sale submits a statement, showing types and quantities of such produce and the places where stored, to the authorities concerned within a period to be specified by Regulation:

This in case the produce subject to istihlak tax and owned by each person exceed 50 tons, otherwise such produce must be transported to places of consumption or Customs Offices within such period as specified by Regulations.

All produce regarding which a statement is not submitted and also produce which is not transported to Customs Offices or places of istihlak within the specified period shall be ineligible to the exemption provided for under this Article. In which case the istihlak tax shall be collected when it is brought to places of istihlak.

Article 17.

1. The sale, purchase and storage of produce subject to istihlak duty is hereby prohibited in any place other than the places of consumption within the centres of consumption determined under Article 4 above. The running of places of consumption outside centres of consumption for the purpose of selling produce to consumers is also prohibited. There is nothing in this Article to prevent any person from removing, selling to other than consumers, any produce of his stocked in his own stores situated outside the centres of consumption. By consumers are meant persons who buy the produce liable to istihlak tax with the object of consuming it directly without sending it to any place of istihlak or export and by non-consumers are meant persons who buy the produce for commerce and with the intention of sending it to a place of istihlak or export.

2. Produce shall be considered contraband if sold, purchased or stored contrary to the first clause of this Article, and the authorities concerned shall seize such produce.

Article 18.

Whoever in contravention of this law or any Regulations, Ministerial Instructions or permit issued thereunder:—

- (a) Conducts a place of consumption;
 - (b) Smuggles taxable land produce, stocks, stores, or transports same, to places other than those specified, with the intention of sale, contrary to the provisions of Article 17, or
 - (c) Receives or retains contraband land produce knowing or having reason to believe the same to be contraband
- commits an offence against this law and shall, for every such offence, be punished by the authorities concerned with fine equivalent to half the value of the produce in respect of which the offence is committed. Every fine imposed under this Article shall be in addition to the tax imposable under this law and the place of istihlak run without permit, shall be closed down.

Article 19.

If seizure of contraband produce is ordered by the authorities concerned, then they shall notify the offender, in writing in accordance with the usual procedure, within a period not exceeding 10 days, requiring immediate payment of the fine and istihlak tax, and thereafter:—

- (1) If the offender does not forthwith pay the fine and in addition thereto the istihlak tax within 10 days from the date of service of the notification or give such security for payment as the authorities concerned shall consider satisfactory, then the order issued for the collection of the fine shall be final. The authorities concerned shall sell the contraband produce by public auction and recover, from the sale proceeds thereof, the fine together with the istihlak tax and any other expenses incurred on the sale transaction.
- (2) If the offender, within 10 days from the date on which he was notified to pay the fine and istihlak tax, applies to the authorities concerned that his case be referred to a Criminal Court, the said authorities shall do so within a period not exceeding 15 days from the date of such application and shall postpone all actions in connection with the sale of the produce; pending issue of Court decree in this respect.
- (3) If the offender pays or gives security accepted as satisfactory by the authorities concerned then the seized produce shall be released, or, if he is not satisfied with the order issued by the authorities concerned, then he may apply within 10 days from the date of making the payment or giving the security to the authorities concerned for the submission of his case to a Criminal Court.

The authorities concerned shall do so within a period not exceeding 15 days from the date of submission of such application.

(4) The offender may directly apply to the Criminal Magistrate within 10 days from the date of his application.

Article 20.

No person claiming any right of ownership of or interest in or connection with the seized produce, even if not implicated in the offence committed, shall have a claim against the Government in respect of seizure according to the provisions of this law, but his right to claim damage or loss against the person who has such produce in his possession at the time of committing the offence will not thereby be prejudiced.

Article 21.

If it is proved to the authorities concerned that land produce subject to istihlak tax is being sold or stocked or stored for with the intention of sale in places other than those duly permitted, contrary to the provisions of Article 17 above, the authorities concerned or the official authorised by them may without a warrant from a magistrate

(1) enter accompanied by a police official, a Mukhtar and another person, and when a Mukhtar is not available by other two inhabitants of the Mohallah at any time by day or by night, any land, building, enclosed place and in case of resistance break open any door and remove any obstacle to the entry upon or into such places;

(2) take possession of any land produce subject to consumption tax so stocked or stored and all goods, packages and coverings in or among which produce is concealed.

Provided the right to enter and search under this Article shall not be exercised in respect of a dwelling house unless a warrant for that purpose shall first have been obtained from a Magistrate.

Article 22.

Every owner of a place of istihlak in contravention of the provisions of this law or any Regulations, Ministerial Instructions or permit issued thereunder who—

(a) abstains from maintaining the register as provided under Article (6) of this law;

(b) with intent to evade payment of the istihlak tax fails to record the quantities and types of produce brought into the place under his charge in the ^{register} ~~book~~ or statements or records inaccurate quantities and types of produce in the register or statements to be furnished to the authorities concerned shall be deemed to have committed an offence against the provisions of this law. In such a case, the authorities concerned may:—

(i) cancel the license of such place as the owner thereof abstains from maintaining the required register, and

(ii) seize the produce in respect of which the offence was committed, and impose a fine equivalent to half the value of such produce, under Articles (17) and (18) of this law.

The offender shall, in addition, be liable to prosecution and shall, after conviction, be punished under the Penal Code.

Article 23.

Every finance official who fails to carry out the duties entrusted to him under this law or any regulations, or Ministerial Instructions issued thereunder, and whoever in contravention of the provisions of this law or any Regulations, Ministerial Instructions issued thereunder fails to report to the authorities concerned any breach of the provisions of this law, or fails or to take the action required by this law in respect of such breach shall be dismissed from his post by order from the Minister of Finance, and shall not be re-employed in Finance appointments. The Minister of Finance may issue an order for the prosecution of the official who has committed any of the contravention set forth above before a Criminal Court for trial under the Penal Code and for the refund of the loss sustained by the Treasury thereby. The decision of the Minister of Finance for dismissal or for prosecution shall be considered final and issued under the State Officials Disciplinary Law No. of 1929.

Article 24.

In any Judicial or Administrative proceedings in connection with an offence against this law, a report signed by the authorities concerned or by the official duly authorised shall, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be deemed (sufficient) evidence of the facts therein stated and the burden of proof shall lie on any person seeking to disprove the truth of such statement.

Article 25.

No claim for damages shall lie against the authorities concerned for any act or order made in good faith by them in pursuance of any duty imposed or any authority conferred by this law or by any regulations, Ministerial Instructions or orders made thereunder.

Article 26.

A reward not exceeding in the aggregate one half of the fine may be granted by the Minister of Finance to any person or persons who have been instrumental towards detecting the offence which has given rise to the imposition of such a fine provided that the fine had been confirmed in all stages of the case, also provided:—

(a) the Director General of Revenue may award a maximum amount of Rs.250/-.

(b) the Mutasarrif in the Liwa may award a maximum amount of Rs.150/-.

(c) the Qaimmaqam in the Qadha may award a maximum amount of Rs.50/-.

Such rewards may be awarded to officials with the previous sanction of the Minister of Finance provided that no such rewards shall be given to officials of the grade of Qaimmaqam and above.

Article 27.

(a) If any agreement or iltizam of legal validity and of specified duration and amount payable in respect of the tax already collected at places of istihlak due on produce subject to istihlak tax be in existence at the time of the coming into force of this law, the amount therein specified may continue to be collected throughout the period covered by such agreement or iltizam instead of istihlak tax.

(b) Agreements and iltizams referred to in para. (a) above may be cancelled with the assent of both parties.

(c) Agreements based on tathlith, tarbi, or takhmis shall be cancelled and the istihlak duty shall be collected the produce affected in accordance with this law.

Article 28.

If any contract which has been entered into before the date of coming into force of this law or any agreement which was made before the coming into force of this law and is based on local practice and custom as between mallak, sarqal and fallah, prescribed the proportions in which the crops subject to Istihlak duty or the proceeds thereof shall be divided (between owner, sarqal and fallah), any party to the contract may claim that the division be amended so that he shall obtain benefits thereunder as near as may be in the proportions whereby he would have benefited under the original terms of the contract.

2. Amendment or cancellation of a contract under Clause (1) above shall be in the jurisdiction of a Civil Court. A fee not exceeding Rs.25 shall be payable by the applicant for amendment.

3. The Court shall take into consideration local custom and all other circumstances in order to assess the portions of the shares of the different parties which become subject to istihlak duty.

Article 29.

The Minister of Finance may issue instructions for the application of this law.

Article 30.

1. This law, in so far as the types of land produce covered by the Notification referred to in Article (1) above are concerned, shall come into force from the date of the publication of the notification in the Government Gazette.

2. The provisions of the laws and regulations now in force shall be applicable to such types of land produce as are not covered in the Notification of the Minister of Finance referred to in Article (1) above.

Article 31.

The following laws and all regulations issued thereunder and also any laws or regulations which either specifically or impliedly conflict with the provisions of this law, shall be deemed to be repealed with effect from the date of application of this law to the produce specified in the Notification laid down in Article 30 (1) of this law.

(List.)

DOCUMENT 4.

Memorandum by the Political Agent, Kuwait.

Note on a conversation which the Honourable the Political Resident in the Persian Gulf had with the Shaikh of Kuwait on 25th October, 1931, regarding the new Iraq "Istihlak" tax, with special reference to the effect such tax would have on the Kuwait properties on the Shatt-al-Arab, if it were enforced.

In the course of a general conversation on this subject and in reply to several questions put by the Honourable the Political Resident, the Shaikh made the following points.

Under the old system, a garden owner had to pay his tax according to the number of "jaribs" he owned, and not according to the number or size of his date trees. This shortly was the system in force in Turkish times in Basrah.

In the Muntafik and some other Liwas, the system was different, and a tax was levied on each date tree a garden owner possessed, and to encourage the owner to cultivate the ground under the trees, which improved the country side and incidentally the palm-tree itself, a reduction was made in the rate of tax taken per tree in accordance as the garden was "amar" (cultivated) or "kharab" (uncultivated).

In Basrah therefore if a man had a large garden and a small area under dates he stood to lose as compared to the man who had a small or even similar sized garden which was all under dates.

It was the discontent caused by the above system which probably brought the new proposed tax into the sphere of practical politics.

Actually there was method in the Turks "madness" for behind the idea was the desire to encourage landlords who were careless garden owners like the "Saadun" families to put down an increased number of date trees each year, by penalizing the man with a large area and few trees in favour of the man who took the trouble to grow the maximum number of trees possible on his plot of land.

2. When asked how the collection of the new tax would work in the case of an ordinary garden owner who lived on his property, the Shaikh replied that as far as he understood the proposed new law which he had read, the garden owner would, after cutting down his dates, put what he, his family and fellaheen required for their own personal use, on one side. This would not be subject to taxation. The balance he would collect on his "sif" i.e., the river bank, until he could find a buyer. Such buyer coming along, would pay cash down for what he bought, and remove the dates, either for export by dhow or steamer. As such buyer would eventually have to pay the "ashur" or 10 per cent government date tax, he naturally would deduct this amount from the price paid for the dates, i.e., the market price, while each year is fixed by a committee for the whole of the Basrah date area, and would still further have to allow for his own profit, after deducting carriage expenses to dhow or ship, packing, etc.

It was of course the buyer's business also to keep in touch with the Customs authorities, take out necessary documents, and pay the "Ashur" tax. The garden owner had no responsibility in this direction at all. Should, on the other hand, the garden owner in question be faced with a bad year, and be unable to find a buyer at all, then his produce remained with him, and was either thrown into the river, or sold for a song, to wandering shepherds, Bedouin or other migrating elements, who during the date season are usually to be found camped on the desert side of gardens seeking what they can pick up cheap or steal.

The garden owner in this case pays nothing to Government and the latter loses the "Ashur" tax due from his dates.

3. The Political Resident then asked the Shaikh how he thought the new law would work if applied to the five great Kuwait properties situate on the lower reaches of the Shatt-al-Arab.

The Shaikh without hesitation replied that it would fall harder on himself than, if he had to pay the ordinary "jarib" taxation, as used to exist.

4. When asked to explain how he arrived at this conclusion, the Shaikh pointed out:—

(a) That he was not in the same position as the resident garden owner, for he was both an absentee landlord, and worse, resided outside Iraq. Actually he employed only "fallahs" (or gardeners) in the gardens and these were the only persons who resided there. Hence under the new law only these resident fellaheen would be entitled to take their share of dates free of taxation, while he and the remaining 100 branch families of the al-Subah who resided in Kuwait would presumably have to pay the "Ashur" taxation on the large stores of dates, garden produce, fruit, wood, palm fronds, barley, fodder, lucerne grass, etc., which was annually brought to Kuwait for their own use, under the plea that they had been exported from the garden areas, and also out of Iraq.

In this connection the Shaikh pointed out that the amounts brought to Kuwait by himself did not merely include that share of the garden produce which he and the 100 junior families of the al-Subah (numbering some 1,000 souls, I suppose), had a right to, in their capacity as joint shareholders in the estates, but included the annual free food ration of his body-guard and paid "fidawi" land forces numbering some 500 men who with their families all received half their pay in kind and half in cash. The former apart from rice (obtained in India), was practically all obtained from the produce of his Shatt-al-Arab estates.

(b) Again in the matter of the date produce which the Shaikh "exported" overseas to India, the Red Sea, Zanzibar, etc., the Shaikh pointed out that he came under a different category to the ordinary garden owner of Basrah or the well-known Arab and European merchants who annually bought up and exported dates from Basrah seeing that in a sense he was both owner and exporter. And while the latter class, both Arab and Europeans, purchased direct from individual garden owners and paid cash down for the produce, he as Shaikh of Kuwait sold nothing to these exporting merchants but instead dealt with his own merchants of Kuwait who nearly all owned regular fleets of dhow, "East Indian men" which made annual voyages to either India, the Red Sea, East Africa or Zanzibar, taking as outward cargoes Basrah dates, and bringing back ship-loads of wood, beams, spices, rice, building material, etc. The system under which this export business was conducted was as follows:—

The Shaikh, who it must not be forgotten runs his estate on our old feudal lines, annually and before the dates are ripe sends for his leading Kuwait merchants (largely also pearl dealers) and enquiries if any of them will take up cargoes of dates from his estates. The response is generally good, and that part of the produce of the gardens previously earmarked for overseas export, is now sold to these local merchants. The method of sale is as follows:—The dates are sold by the gosara (basket) at the rate prevailing at Basrah, but no cash passes hands, instead the buyers sign documents promising to pay the Shaikh his money, after one, two or three voyages (i.e., years), as the case may be, and only after they have disposed of their return cargoes. These signed documents are deposited with the Shaikh, who recovers his money gradually, and by a method which bears easily on his merchants and keeps his overseas dhow trade alive. Under this method dhow captains on behalf of their principals do the actual trading and with the money which they realise from the sale of the dates they carry, they buy their return cargoes.

In bad trading years as at present return cargoes fetch little, and often merchants have to ask the Shaikh for an extension of the period of repayment. The latter naturally assists more often than not, for his policy is literally to be the "father of his people."

5. Taking therefore the above two systems (paragraph 4 (a) and (b) for dealing with the produce of his date gardens in Iraq, it was clear, the Shaikh pointed out, that he himself would have to find the "Ashur" tax both in the case of:—

(a) Dates and garden produce exported to Kuwait for state purposes.

(b) Dates exported to foreign countries by Kuwait dhow owners.

In the former case, because, according to the letter of the law, the goods would be taxable, he being the owner-exporter of the produce, and in the latter case because the merchants exporters (the dhow owners) would not be paying for the dates till they returned from India, etc., and had disposed of their return cargoes. They would naturally expect the Shaikh to pay the Iraq date-tax on the top of the credit he had given, they promising to pay same back on settlement day.

6. Even if it could be arranged by negotiation with the Iraq Government that the produce sent to Kuwait (for family and state use), paragraph 4 (a), should be exempt from taxation, the Shaikh pointed out that much irritating accounting and checking by officials at both ends would be involved, and he did not see how in any case, he could avoid having to deposit large guarantee sums to the various Iraq officials in control, which would only be released after documents had been received from Kuwait to say that the goods had arrived. The conforming to such cumbersome and irritating methods before he could get the produce of his own gardens to Kuwait was in view of the Shaikh unthinkable, especially as it would lay Kuwait open to the danger of perpetual demands from rapacious junior Iraq officials for largesse, etc.

(Sgd.) H. R. P. DICKSON,
Lieut.-Colonel.
Political Agent, Kuwait.

Dated 21st November, 1931.

DOCUMENT 5.

Translation of a decree No. 66/932 dated 9th May, 1932, issued by the Court of Appeal, Baghdad, for service on Shaikh Ahmad Jabir Al Sabah, Ruler of Kuwait.

Appellor: Shaikh Ahmad Al Jabir Al Sabah (Defendant).
Represented by Lawyer Iskandar Mansur Effendi.

Appellee: Rafiah daughter of 'Ali Pasha Al Zuhair (Plaintiff).
Represented by Lawyer Kamal Effendi Al Sanawi.

The Iraqi Court of Revision, formed of Daud Effendi Samrah, Vice-President, and 'Abdullah Effendi Salam and Antoine Effendi Shammas, Members, empowered to adjudicate in the name of His Majesty the King of Iraq, met in its capacity as a Court of Appeal on 9th May, 1932, and passed the following judgment:—

The Plaintiff submitted a complaint to the Court of First Instance, Basrah, stating that she owns certain shares of a plot of land which is situated at Faddaghiyah, the boundaries of which are known, transferred to her from her father and mother. As the Defendant is opposing her she requests that he should be prohibited from opposing her and that he should pay the (court) fees.

On 30th December, 1931, the court in question issued a judgment in the case No. 77/31 prohibiting the Defendant from opposing the Plaintiff in (the administration of) her 17 shares out of 216 shares, and what has been transferred to her from the 16 shares, belonging to her mother Shafiqah, out of 120 shares of the plot of land under dispute, and compelling him to pay the fees as it has been proved in the Khaqani register that the Plaintiff and her brothers and sisters own 85 shares, and that the Plaintiff's mother owned 27 shares which, at the death of the latter, have been transferred to her heirs including the Plaintiff. It has been proved that the person now administering the land is the Defendant who bases his ownership on an ordinary document of sale. This document cannot be recognised as it includes the sale of immovable property while the seller was not the only guardian of the Plaintiff. Therefore the effect of this sale by her cannot be recognised.

The Defendant appealed against this judgment on the grounds that Lawyer Agob Effendi had attended the hearing in his capacity as the Agent of the Plaintiff at the time when the latter had dismissed him, thus his participation in this case, in accordance with a special (ordinary) power of attorney, is illegal; that he (the Defendant) administered the land for a period exceeding the "period of prescription" provided for in the Indian Law of Limitation which was in force in Basrah, which makes the hearing of the case illegal; that he had bought the shares belonging to the Appellee from her mother Shafiqah, her guardian; and that he administered the land prior to the date of the document of sale, and therefore the non-hearing of his personal (oral) evidence was illegal. Moreover the civil "period of prescription" as well passed this "tasarruf". In case the land is considered as miri land the Land Law should be applied thereto. The sale, which was made in accordance with the power of attorney, was effected with the permission of the Sharia Court. Had the sale been regarded as illegal, a judgment should have been passed to the effect that the money received by the Appellee through her guardian should be refunded. In view of the above the Appellor demanded that the judgment be reversed and the Plaintiff's case rejected, and that the Appellee should pay the court fees etc.

The following is the summary of the written statement in reply: The Indian Law of Limitation does not apply to this case. Moreover the period between the dates of its enforcement and repeal is less than the "period of prescription", and the request made by the Appellor to hear his evidence regarding "tasarruf" and the application of the "period of prescription" is not reasonable as he based his "tasarruf" on an ordinary document of sale which states that the Appellee owns these shares. This confession refutes the "period of prescription." As the sale of miri land effected without the permission of the Mamur of Khagani register is considered illegal, the "tasarruf" of the Appellor is also illegal, and in this case the provisions of the Land Law cannot be applied. As the Appellor did not raise a case in the past demanding that the price should be refunded, he has no right now to claim that price. As regards the sale permission deed, it cannot now be considered as he (the Appellor) did not present it in the Court of First Instance. The independence of one of the guardians in the administration of the property of minors is invalid. In view of the above it is requested that the judgment from which this appeal has been lodged should be approved and that the Appellor be charged to pay the court fees etc.

On the date fixed for the trial, Lawyer Iskandar Mansur Effendi, Agent of the Appellor, and Lawyer Kamal Effendi Al Sanawi, Agent of the Appellee, appeared before the Court and repeated the contents of their written statements respectively. The case having been heard the Court withdrew for discussion. As a result of the examination of the case by the Court of Appeal the important objections raised by the Appellor have been summarised as follows:—

(1) That the hearing of the case was attended by Agob Effendi, as Agent of the Appellee, after withdrawing her power of attorney in his favour.

(2) That under both the Civil and Indian Laws the period of prescription has lapsed in this case.

The first objection is out of the question because Lawyer Agob Effendi attended the hearing in accordance with another power of attorney which was unobjectionable. The lady who made this power of attorney in favour of her Agent did not raise any objection, and at the same time no objection to this was raised in the Court of First Instance.

As regards the second objection, it appears that the administration of this land by the Appellor was based on the sale agreement dated 21st Muharram, 1327. After examination and taking into consideration the date on which the Indian Law of Limitation was repealed, it appears that the "period of prescription" did not elapse. The sanad produced falsifies the allegation made by the Appellor in respect of his "tasarruf" which he demanded to prove by evidence, because the Appellor was allowed possession of this land from the date of the sanad. As regards the civil "period of prescription", it is considered that, although a period of time has passed on the "tasarruf" of the Defendant (Appellor) before the case has been raised, this "period of prescription" is of no value as long as the Appellor has clearly admitted the ownership by the Appellee of the land under dispute. This admission is made in a sale document which states that he (the Appellor) purchased the plot of land under dispute from the guardian of the Appellee. As such sales are not recognised, and as the judgment of the Court prohibiting the Appellor from opposing the Appellee in administering the shares under dispute is correct, the judgment appealed is hereby confirmed and the Appellor is ordered to pay the court fees together with 9 dinars, wages of the lawyer for one sitting, plus I.D. 11/250, wages for drafting the statement in reply. This decision is issued unanimously under Articles 196 and 198 of the Code of Civil Procedure and Article 24 of its Supplement, and declared to both parties in open Court this 9th day of May, 1932.

Certified true copy.

(Signed).....Chief Clerk.

(Seal of the Court of Appeal, Bgd.)

Court Fees.

Appeal fees	...	...	...	I.D. 37/875
Stamps	...	...	...	0/188
Lawyers' wages	...	...	...	9/000
Wages for preparing the statement in reply	...	...	...	11/250

Total ... I.D. 58/313

(Fifty-eight dinars and three hundred and thirteen fils only.)

(Signed).....Chief Clerk.

(Seal of the Court of First Instance, Basra.)

Date across stamp: 25th May, 1932.

DOCUMENT 6.

Memorandum by Judicial Adviser to the High Commissioner, Iraq.
Subjects (1) The Sheikh of Kuwait and the Bashiya Garden land suit.

(2) The possession of the Fadaghiyah garden by the Sheikh of Kuwait.

1. With reference to your letter dated 1st August, 1932, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice have both mentioned this matter to me and requested me to furnish all available information. I am therefore in a position to supply you with fuller comments than I would feel justified in doing if I acted only on the terms of Secretary of State letter dated 6th February, 1926.

2. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice realise that in your opinion the good name of the Law Courts is involved

(12) Translation copy of a letter from Ministry of Tapu to Ministry of Finance signed by the Prime Minister produced on 4.5.31. (probably 4.7.31).

(13) A letter from Mr. Dobbs dated 14th June, 1915.*

(14) An additional petition by the plaintiff dated 9.7.31.

12. In civil case No. 77 of 1930 of the Basrah Court of First Instance, Rafia bint Ali Pasha Al Zuhair, sued Sheikh Ahmad Jabir Al Sabah (Sheikh of Kuwait). She claimed that she was the owner of one share out of ten of a certain garden in Fadaghiyah. This we know is the Bashiya garden. She alleged that defendant took possession and prevented her from obtaining her share, she set out her title which was based on Sanad Khakani, that this was Miri land and any sale on such Miri land must have a special authority from Mamur of Tapu vide section 36 of Land Law. She claimed an order to prevent interference with her enjoyment.

Note: That the nearest approach to this kind of relief in England Law is for an injunction to restrain etc.

The defence dated 26.10.1930 briefly denied that the Sheikh of Kuwait took the land by force and laid certain preliminary objections which were not important. On 28.1.1931 the main grounds of defence was filed. The defendant first queried the amount of the shares shewn to be in ownership of plaintiff. No point turns on this now and it was not raised in the Court of Appeal. It merely concerns whether the plaintiff inherited one tenth or inherited 17 out of 216 shares. The third ground sets out the case for the defendant namely that his grandfather Sheikh Mubarak Al Sabah bought the shares belonging to Shafiq Khanim and her children Hassan, Bahija, Najiya, Rafia (the plaintiff in the case) and Kamila children of Ali Pasha Al Zuhair for 3033 lira and 30 kurush on behalf of herself as principal and as guardian (wasi) on behalf of the children, as proved by Sanad of sale dated 21st Muharram 1327. The defendant then referred to a condition of sale that if the business of Tafweeth i.e. transfer in Tapu were delayed, that delay would not form any ground to cancel the sale, he then stated that there was a delay in registering due to political matters because the Ottoman Government considered that the Sheikh of Kuwait had bought these lands for the benefit of the British Government (sic) vide letter No. 504 dated 14.6.1915 from Abdul Aziz Effendi el Salim el Badar, agent of defendant and for this reason the Government of Turkey sent a code telegram to Dafterkhana of Tapu Basra not to register.

Note:—I have set out this ground at a length because it contains what is the real reason for the delay in registration.

On 3.2.1931, plaintiff replied to this defence, the important points being the following:—

(a) So far as the minor children were concerned, no permission was given by the Qadhi.

Note:—I mention this because the formalities of the sale by the "Wasi" are given as one of the grounds in the judgment of Court of First Instance Basrah dated 30.12.1931, but this point was not pressed in the Court of Appeal, which decided the case on other points.

(b) Proved that this is Miri land and the sale of Miri land without the permission of Mamur of Tapu was not allowed in 1327 under Article 36 of the Land Law.

(c) That a sale outside Tapu must be registered under section 1 Law of Transfer of Possessions of Immovable Property Act.

The defendant made a rejoinder to this dated 12.2.31 which adds nothing to the matter but on 24.2.31 he filed a petition giving the reasons why the sale was not registered in Tapu. He said that this was not done because the Turkish Government wanted a declaration that the Sheikh of Kuwait was a Turkish subject whereas he is independent under the protection of Britain. On the 4th of May 1931 (probably an error for 4.7.1931) defendant put in letter from Dafterkhana Istana to Dafterkhana Basra ordering him to do the registration on the lines of the communication from the Prime Minister. He also filed a translation of letter from Prime Minister Mahmud Shawkat Pasha to Ministry of Finance Istana ordering it to carry through the business of Sheikh of Muhammara and that of the Qaimmaqam of Kuwait if they admit that they were Turkish subjects and agree to have this endorsed in the Sanads. During the hearing on 9.7.31 the plaintiff filed an argument in writing which recapitulates the points on which he relies.

* Document No. 7.

13. I have set out at length the points made by plaintiff and defendant because at the rehearing no additional pleadings were filed and the case proceeded on these original proceedings and on the arguments recorded in the "dhabt" i.e. record of the case. You will notice that there does not appear to be raised the matter of limitation on which you have laid so much stress but in fact in the second hearing this point was expressly raised and recorded in the "dhabt" and formed the main grounds of appeal taken in the second appeal.

14. At this stage I will set out the dates of the different decisions. They are:

14.4.31 claim dismissed by Mr. Hooper for lack of prosecution. This is a very ordinary step in a case and I see no reason to comment on the remarks of the defendant's agent to the effect that at that date i.e. before judgment, Mr. Hooper was convinced of the justice of defendant's case and for that reason plaintiff withdrew her power of attorney from her advocate and allowed the case to be dismissed for default. If Mr. Hooper really was unwise enough to shew his intentions before giving final judgment, it is quite understandable why the plaintiff dropped the case but I really have no grounds on which to say that this was the reason why the plaintiff dropped the case. There may be a dozen reasons.

On 6.5.31 the plaintiff applied to continue the case by opposition to the judgment of dismissal. The case was heard on the 7th of July 1931 by the Vice-president and the judgment was given on 15.7.1931, in favour of the defendant i.e. of the Sheikh of Kuwait dismissing the case on the ground that an action must firstly be filed to cancel the deed of sale of the 21st Muharram before any action could be filed based on ownership claiming mana' mu'aradha. So far as the allegation of the Sheikh of Kuwait against the bona fides of the Iraqi judges is concerned, I cannot see that he can complain of this judgment in his favour but I now draw your attention to fact that although Mr. Hooper was known to be leaving Basrah no application was made to me as President Court of Cassation by Mohammed Effendi Wasfi, the Sheikh's advocate, to transfer the case to another court. If the Sheikh's agent had then any reason to suspect an intrigue either with lawyers or with Government officials I find it difficult not to suppose that he would have gone to the British Consul and information brought to me or after I went on leave to Mr. Drower who acted for me.

15. I attach copy of judgment of the Civil Court of First Instance Basrah which I paraphrase as follows: "The defendant relies on a contract of sale which purports to transfer ownership to him. The plaintiff relies on inheritance through the person who made the Sanad of sale. Therefore the plaintiff cannot claim ownership until he has cancelled the sale, she must therefore first file an action to cancel the Sanad. If that succeeds, she may then claim in respect of the share of the estate which she has inherited as the owner and may then file an action claiming (Mana' mua'radha) i.e. prevent the defendant from interfering with her property". For the benefit of any lawyer who may be consulted I should explain that this is what the Turks call a judgment on a preliminary ground. Such judgments caused much scandalous delay and section 20 of the amended Civil Procedure Regulation was framed to curtail these judgments on preliminary points, but, unfortunately it left it to the discretion of the court and this case is an instance of the trouble which results when a judge does not give judgment on the merits as well as on preliminary objections.

16. Against this judgment an appeal was filed before the Court of Appeal C.A.148 of 1931.

The plaintiff appellant:

- (a) challenged the correctness of the order of dismissal,
- (b) referred to section 36 of the Land Law and the judgment of the Court of Cassation of Constantinople dated 13.1.1931 with reference to the sale made outside Tapu by the Sanad of 21st Muharram 1327 relied on by defendant respondent.
- (c) Urged that the sale of the minor' property without leave of the Qadhi is valid.

The advocate for defendant respondent maintained that the decision was correct and he also claimed that in view of the long possession of this land the Law of limitation applies. I was present at the hearing of this appeal. A fairly complete note was prepared for me and I concurred with the judges. In this judgment the court held that the decision to reject the claim on the single ground that the plaintiff must first file an action to cancel the deed of sale is wrong, in particular as it will appear clear that this deed is null and void as a transfer of property being made outside Tapu vide sec. 1 Immovable Property Act and without permission of the Mamur as required under section 36 of the Land Law and as this transaction was not one merely voidable but is actually null and void, no separate action to cancel it is required before the court can treat it as being non-existent. The case was therefore remitted for re-hearing on its merits. As this decision was given by Turkish trained judges and is framed in language which presupposes that the decision is a technical document for lawyers, the following observations will assist you in realizing what is the theory of Turkish Law regarding unregistered sale of Miri land in areas where the Tapu offices function.

In Turkey there is a difference between transfer of mulk (firagh) and transfer of miri (tafweeth). In Miri lands there is always an ultimate ownership in Govt. which may be resumed and section 36 of the Land Law preserved the right of Government to interfere with the free disposal of such Miri land by insisting that the permission of Ma'mur concerned i.e. the Tapu Ma'mur should be obtained. Further such transfer is legally effected in the Tapu Office only, therefore, unless and until, a transaction affecting Miri land was registered in Tapu and the consent obtained, usually by endorsement of the Mamur Tapu, that transaction was null and void in the year 1327 and in the eyes of the Law did not exist to pass property. The consent of the Mamur Tapu does not appear to be necessary any longer since 1329 but that does not concern the efforts to register this sale.

17. Before going on with the proceedings I will say a word as to why the Tapu Mamur refused to give his consent. The Law of the Ottomans is not in favour of immovable property being held by foreigners. Even in the case of Mulk land e.g. houses and small gardens it is only allowed on condition that the foreigner submitted to the laws and courts of the country and as regards Miri land it was forbidden. The Turkish attitude in this matter throughout has been that no sale to foreigners will be allowed and the Government Mamur was forbidden to allow this transfer. Under the orders of the Turkish Prime Minister, however, they stretched a point as regards the known attitude of the Sheikhs of Muhammara and Kuwait towards the Turkish State and offered to allow them to register their sales if they admitted that they were Turkish subjects.

18. The Court of Appeal disposed of the first appeal on the 9th of November 1931 and papers went back to Basrah and on the 14th of December the Iraqi Vice-President fixed the 23rd of December for the re-hearing. Since the proceedings in this part of the case have been attacked because no British judge sat, I must point out that Mr. Lloyd was President of the Basrah Court and was in Basrah from 1st of December. All British judges know that they should sit if possible in foreigners cases and I cannot believe that any application was made to Mr. Lloyd to sit in this case and must therefore presume that the advocate Muhammed Wasfi Effendi and Abdul Aziz Effendi Al Salim Al Badar took no steps to draw the attention of the British President to the case. I have read the "dhabt" and it is quite clear that the following points were raised in argument by the Sheikh of Kuwait's advocate.

(a) That in this case limitation ought to run under section 144 schedule 1 the Indian Limitation Act and that the period has elapsed.

(b) If the Indian Limitation Act does not apply, limitation runs under the Law of the country and also has elapsed.

On 30th December 1931 judgment was given in favour of the plaintiff on the following grounds:—

(a) That the sale as shewn by the deed of 21st Muharram 1327 was null and void under section 1 Possession of Land Law.

(b) Section 1674 of the Majelle lays down that in view of the admission of the right of the plaintiff's ancestor no prescription can be pleaded.

NOTE:—This is the important decision as to limitation and will be discussed later on.

(c) That at any event a sale by one "Wasi" will be invalid.

19. On this judgment appeal is made to the Court of Appeal; 2nd appeal No. 66/932. Iskender Mansour Effendi appeared for the Sheikh as appellant. It is alleged that I was deliberately kept in ignorance of this case. Iskender Mansour is an advocate who often comes to Baghdad on appellate work and is quite well aware that he may at any time have access to the President if he wishes to apply to him. He made no effort to secure my presence in the case. The case was heard on the 9th May. There were 5 cases in the list including one concerning a foreigner on which I sat. The parties in the appeal by the Sheikh of Kuwait were described:

Appellant: Al Sheikh Ahmad Al Sabah, Advocate Iskender Effendi Mansour.

Respondent: Rafia bint Ali Zuhair, her advocate Kamal Effendi Al Sinawi.

I note that you apprehend that this omission to inform me that it was a foreigner's case was intentional. In view of the extremely sharp nature of your conjectures I have asked the Minister to hold special enquiry vide my letter to the Minister dated 16.8.32 copy attached. I will only observe that the grounds of appeal filed by Iskender Mansour do not state that the Appellant was the Sheikh of Kuwait nor does the copy of the judgment of the First Instance filed with those grounds state that but the Sheikh is described by the title of His Highness and the advocate's Power of Attorney state that he was the Ruler of Kuwait.

20. The judgment of the Court of Cassation sets out the grounds of appeal fully. They are as follows:—

(a) Limitation in this case should be in accordance with para. 144 Schedule 1 of Indian Limitation Act, that the period under this is 12 years, and that 12 years of actual possession had passed before Basrah Law Repeal Act of 1920 took effect and appellant claims to prove this by proving possession before the sale deed was made.

(b) If Limitation under the Indian Limitation Act is not good then the Appellant has been in possession for the necessary period under the Law of the country and section 20 of the Land Code applies which gives prescription of 10 years.

(c) Appellant has enjoyed this possession by virtue of a legal sale not in opposition to the wishes of the seller. Although the sale by the one "Wasi" yet it was with permission of the Qadhi and if the court cancels sale I ask for the recovery of the price.

The plaintiff respondent took the points already discussed in the Law Court and in particular laid emphasis on section 1674 of the Majelle claiming that once an admission of the right of plaintiff's ancestor had been made a defence of limitation cannot succeed and he also relied on section 1 of the Transfer of Immovable Property Law.

As to Limitation under the Indian Limitation Act the period runs from date of Sanad 13-2-1909 to 30th Sept. 1920 i.e. eleven years seven months and a half.

The defendant appellant submitted a further statement of grounds of appeal of which the important points are:—

(a) The possession exceeded 12 years under the Indian Limitation Act.

(b) That the Qadhi had given valid permission.

(c) That no permission of Mamur Tapu was required.

The judgment of the Court of Cassation holds that:—

(a) In as much as the Sanad of sale stated that possession of the seller continued up to the date of sale, the possession of the buyer for the purpose of Limitation runs from the date of the Sanad i.e. 21st Muharram 1327 and that 12 years has not expired under the Indian Limitation Act before the Basrah Law Repeal Act.

(b) Under the Law of the country the admission of a right to titled entirely prevents a subsequent setting up of Limitation under section 1674 of the Majelle.

(c) The sale deed is null and void.

I have examined the points of limitation under the Majelle i.e. Law of the country, and there is ample authority from the remarks of Ali Haidar the Jurist that if a defendant admits that the origin of his possession has derived from the plaintiff or his ancestor the defendant cannot plead prescription but must prove some other means of acquisition e.g. sale. In this case he tried to prove such sale but as the sale was unregistered he cannot rely on this as a transfer of property; as long ago as 1318 all such transactions outside Tapu were forbidden regarding Mulk and Miri land by Iradah Saniyah.

21. I come now to answer your specific questions:—

(a) As to limitation: I have set out the view taken by the Court of Cassation and I see no reason to suppose it is wrong except that the view that possession under the Indian Limitation Act only runs from the date of the Sanad is a point on which I am a little doubtful; There is, however, much to be said for the view followed by the Court of Cassation that the written admission in the Sanad of sale as to possession commencing with the date of the Sanad is conclusive against the purchaser even though the Sanad itself as a disposition of property is null and void.

A reference to the Sanad shews that it contains admission that the land is under the possession of seller up to the date of the Sanad and will be possessed by the Sheikh of Kuwait.

(b) As to copy of plaint and defence: I have already stated that in the re-hearing at Basra separate written pleadings were not filed but that the "dhabt" a court record shews clearly that the point of limitation was argued. I have supplied copies of all the pleadings.

(c) I have explained how I did not come to sit in this case.

(d) See next paragraph.

22. Your question (d) presumably refers to the two gardens Bashiya and Fadaghiyah. I do not see what the Sheikh can do to contest the decision already given as regards the claims of Rafia to 1/10th of the Bashiya garden, but if he wishes to apply for a review the grounds are well known vide section 27 of the Amended Civil Procedure Regulations. Clearly I cannot possibly advise to his chance of success.

As regards the Fadaghiyah garden I remind you of the distinction between this garden and the Bashiya garden; namely, that it appears from the letter of Sir Henry Dobbs dated 14th of June 1915 that a Sanad Khakani has been issued to the Sheikh of Kuwait. If an action is filed as regards the Fadaghiyah garden the following points will certainly arise:—

(a) Is the Sanad Khakani a valid disposition in Tapu?

(b) If Valid so far as the Government is concerned was it made with the consent of the seller or her heirs?

(c) If there were minors with interests in the garden when does the period of prescription cease. I will here observe that Sir Henry Dobbs' letter shews that the entry in the register was made without the consent of the heirs of the sellers.

Under Turkish Law it is possible to file suit to declare void a transaction in Tapu and the point will be taken that it is essential that in such transactions the seller or his agent must be present and admit the sale. As regards prescription for such suit I am unable to say how far prescription may run as the claimant appears to have been a minor at the time of the sale. If a minor the period of minority must be added to the period of prescription which I am informed is 15 years. In answer to your question I can therefore say that it is doubtful whether the Sheikh can successfully contest the claim, assuming the period of prescription is not completed.

23. As regards legislation, this depends on the general conditions surrounding this case. In this matter the Iraq Government stands in the shoes of the Turkish Government. The same objection to foreigners holding Miri land prevails. The Turkish view confirmed by the courts was that this transaction is null and void but the Mamur of Tapu would, on behalf of the Government, allow registration, as the sellers agreed, on condition that the purchaser declare himself to be a Turkish subject. I do not see that any political consideration can possibly destroy the legal results of such failure to register.

The Law as to limitation laid down under section 1674 of the Majelle is peculiar to English ideas but to me it seems logical.

There have been many different decisions as regards necessity or non-necessity of registering land in different parts of Iraq but I am of the opinion that as far as the transactions in land at Basra is concerned section 36 of the Land Law certainly applied as to permission of Mamur Tapu and since the Irada Saniyah of 1318 there have been many decisions insisting that sales must be registered or they have no validity. The first part of section 1 of Law to dispose of Immovable Property 1329 lays this down and applies in Iraq according to many decisions. The Unregistered Sales Confirmation Proclamation 1919 affirms this in its Preamble.

24. Generally I am of the opinion that, even if the omission to inform me of the case, was intentional, the grounds given by the Court of Cassation will be accepted by the Iraq Government as being valid grounds for determining this claim and unless there is some treaty obligation I do not think that the Iraq Government will admit any liability. The argument may be expressed as follows:—

Minor children are not bound until they reach majority. They may take any legal steps to recover what they think is their patrimony. The sale by ancestor of plaintiff is null and void. If there is a legal flaw in the title of the purchaser from their father and mother they may recover the estate even though it has enormously increased in value unless they are time barred. They were not time barred at the date of the Basrah Law Repeal Act and under the Civil Law no prescription can be good as the Sheikh admitted he held his titles from the ancestor of Plaintiff.

I will put the matter in another way. The Sheikh of Kuwait has induced the British Government to guarantee his possession of lands to which he cannot (presumably) establish his legal title.

I draw attention to the following:—

It is in fact clear from the conditions of the deed that he was aware of the necessity of registration and aware that there were difficulties he endeavoured against the express provisions of the Law to ensure that the sale should not be considered null.

25. As to the promise by the British Government, the Iraq Government, so you inform me, don't admit this promise to be binding on the Iraq Government. If there is a dispute between the two Governments, presumably the matter will go to the Hague Court. If the Hague Court holds that this is an international obligation of Iraq, then, the Iraq Government may have to pass a law expropriating those persons who establish their claims in those gardens.

If the Hague Court holds that there is no international obligation on the Iraq Government it seems to me that this becomes a matter between the British Government and the Sheikh of Kuwait and it is for the British Government to decide whether the Sheikh should be compensated.

26. I notice that the Sheikh of Kuwait refuses to employ Mr. Mirza Mohammed. It will be extremely difficult for the High Commissioner to get legal opinion unless some advocate of standing is employed and I am of the opinion that it is advisable to obtain the advice of an experienced local advocate. It may be that the ruling on limitation under the Indian Limitation Act can be attacked and the ruling that article 20 of the Land Code is subject to the overriding provisions of article 1674 of the Majelle may be challenged by the advocate.

27. The Political Resident of the Gulf asked about the claim to be independent of the Law Courts. All I can say is that the Sheikh of Kuwait can raise the point in the 3 cases filed at Basrah. When a foreign potentate possess land in another country it is easy to believe that the court will not admit that an action affecting immovable property can be excluded from their jurisdiction.

28. The Court gave no order regarding the point raised on appeal that a refund of the purchase price should be claimed. There is nothing to prevent the Sheikh claiming to recover this. No doubt the court did not decide this as it would mean an adjournment for payment of the court fees on the claim.

29. The court did not go into the point whether the second guardian should have joined in the sale. There may be a good deal of substance in the argument that when there are two "Wasis" both must join, failing which a disposition by one can be upset.

30. I cannot recommend any legislation except to alter the application of the Majelle, to possession of land under article 20 of the Land Code.

31. Finally do not let it be supposed that I am in favour of the present Civil Code known as the Majelle nor of the provisions of the Land Code. I have frequently pressed for the revision of both the Majelle and Land Code and you will find my comments in my annual reports especially for 1923, 1924, 1926 and 1931, copies of which should be in your office.

(Sgd.) G. Alexander,
A/G Judicial Adviser,

20th August, 1932.

DOCUMENT 7.

Copy Letter by Sir H. Dobbs, Revenue Commissioner, Basrah, to the Agent of the Sheikh of Koweit, dated 14th June, 1915.

I promised you that I would send you a written reply to the application presented by you on the 16th May, 1915, for the registration in the Tapu Department of the sale to the Sheikh of Koweit of a certain Estate in Fadaghiya. The shares in the Estate were as follows:—

(1) Estate Called Bashiya.		Shares.
Ahmad Pasha ez Zuhair	...	36
Abdul Bagi son of Ali Pasha	...	34
Shafiq mother of Abdul Bagi	}	146
5 daughters
1 son Hassan

(2) Estate Comprising 6 holdings and 3 river frontage holdings.

Ayesha wife of Ahmad Pasha ez Zuheir, sole proprietors. In 1326 A.H. (1324 Ottoman Year) Ahmad Pasha acting on his own behalf in regard to the 36 shares in Bashiya and as agent of Abdul Bagi for his 34 shares and also agent for Ayesha for her whole estate, covenanted to sell the shares to the Sheikh of Koweit as follows:—

		Shares.	Piastres.
Ahmad Pasha	36	...	£T 769-12½
Abdul Bagi	34	...	£T 706-62
Ayesha, whole estate	...	...	£T 44217-33

At the same time Shafiq on behalf of herself and 5 daughters and minor son covenanted to sell her 146 shares in Bashiya to the Sheikh for £T 3304-37 piastres. Ahmad Pasha was at that time starting for Constantinople and he received from the Sheikh of Koweit before starting a hawala on Bombay for £T 10,000 in part payment. He left a power of attorney with Abdul Wahab Pasha

Kartas, empowering him on behalf of himself and Abdul Bagi and Ayesha to complete the transaction of the sale by Tapu registration and thereon to receive the balance of the purchase money. Thereafter you, as agent for the Sheikh of Koweit and Abdul Wahab as agent for Ahmad Pasha and Abdul Bagi and Ayesha, went before the Mudir of the Tapu to register the sale. But the Mudir of Tapu in an order dated 9 Shabat 1324 refused to register the sale owing to orders received from Constantinople, that no more sales of land in the name of the Sheikh of Koweit were to be registered. After this you and Abdul Wahab went before the British Consul at Basrah and privately registered before him a deed of sale of the Estate—in so far as the holdings of Ahmad Pasha and Ayesha were concerned. Nothing was registered before the British Consul as regards the holdings of Abdul Bagi and Shafiqah and her daughters and minor son. Abdul Wahab received from you the balance of the purchase money viz. £T 38706 and handed the Estate over to the Sheikh of Koweit, in whose name it stands in the Muhasibi registers, though not in the Tapu registers. The Sheikh of Koweit has during the last few years been paying the Miri tax on the Estate to the Ottoman Government, which must be held to have by receipt of the tax, acquiesced in the transfer of the Estate to the Sheikh of Koweit.

Now that Ottoman authority has been removed from Basrah and that the British Military authorities have reopened the Tapu Department the former difficulty about Tapu registration of the sale of the Estate has been removed, and you ask for formal registration. But in the meanwhile Ahmad Pasha ez Zuhair has died in Constantinople, but his death has of course cancelled the first power of attorney given to him by Ayesha and Abdul Bagi and the second power of attorney given by him to Abdul Wahab. Ayesha herself and the heirs of Ahmad Pasha are most of them in Constantinople, and they refused before the War to answer letters sent from Basrah asking them to appoint another agent for the completion of the sale before the Tapu Department. They have an agent in Basrah Ahmad ez Sani, but he holds authority only to arrange about the produce of their lands in Basrah and about the payment of taxes to Government and not for such matters as the registration of a deed of sale. The position is accordingly this. Under the Tapu Law the sale of land cannot be registered and finally validated unless the owner and the buyer appear before the Tapu Department in person or by authorised agent and testify to the fact of the sale and to the giving and receipt of the purchase money. The present owners of the shares of Ahmad Pasha and Ayesha cannot now themselves appear before the Tapu and have failed to appoint an authorised agent for the purpose. Nor is there any prospect of their intentions being discovered before the end of the War. But the Tapu Department has satisfied itself by an inspection of the papers signed before the British Consul at Basrah that there was a formal sale and delivery of the shares of Ahmad Pasha and Ayesha in the Estate and that the sale for those shares was paid; and in the peculiar circumstances this would justify the Tapu Department in granting a Tapu Sanad in respect of the sale of these shares.

There remains the question of the shares of Abdul Bagi and Shafiqah and of her five daughters and minor son. If these persons are now prepared to appear before the Tapu in person or by authorised agent and testify to the sale of their shares, you should call upon them to do so. The whole transaction can then be completed and Tapu Sanads granted for the whole portion of land in question.

Usual ending.

(Sgd.) H. Dobbs,
Revenue Commissioner, Basrah.

OPINION OF THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN

1. In our opinion if His Majesty's Government themselves, while in control of the Government of Iraq, had imposed the Istihlak Tax on the produce of the date gardens of either of the Sheikhs, it would have been a breach of the undertakings given in November, 1914. On this basis, we think that an obligation rests on His Majesty's Government to compensate the Sheikhs for the imposition of the tax by the present Government of Iraq.

2. Yes.

3. We think that the test is whether the then Sheikh of Koweit was, at the date of the undertaking, de facto in possession of the portions of the gardens affected by the judgment. We are of opinion that it is not material to consider either of the two alternatives.

4. We have nothing to add.

(Sgd.) T. W. H. INSKIP.

(Sgd.) F. B. MERRIMAN.

Law Officers' Department,

29th March, 1933.

1933

THE DATE GARDENS IN IRAQ
OF THE SHEIKHS OF KOWEIT
AND MOHAMMERAH

SCOPE OF UNDERTAKINGS GIVEN
BY H.M. GOVERNMENT IN 1914

CASE FOR THE OPINION OF THE
LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN and Opinion thereon dated
29th March 1933

1934

THIS DOCUMENT IS THE PROPERTY OF HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office

CONFIDENTIAL

(14697)

REPORTS BY THE
LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1934

1934

(ii)

LIST OF REPORTS

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked 1^A, &c.

GENERAL.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
1 ^A	Law Officers... [Board of Trade]	Apr. 6, 1934	Reservation to British vessels of trade between ports in the United Kingdom and inter-Colonial and inter-Imperial trade, and meaning of the expression "Coasting Trade"	1

IRAQ.

1	Law Officers...	Jan. 23, 1934	Date gardens in Iraq of Sheikhs of Koweit and Mohammerah	21
---	-----------------	---------------	---	----

NETHERLANDS.

2	Law Officers...	Jan. 30, 1934	Anglo-Netherlands Treaty of 1824: Interpretation of articles 2 and 3	27
---	-----------------	---------------	---	----

PERSIA.

3	Law Officers...	July 31, 1934	Bahrein: Persia's rights of sovereignty or suzerainty	35
---	-----------------	---------------	--	----

(iii)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS)

1934

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.

Cases cited are indicated by italics.

ACT—ISL.

A.

Act—See Navigation Acts.
Arbitration—Possible submission to, of Iraqi Government's obligation to implement assurances given by His Majesty's Government to Sheikhs of Koweit and Mohammerah, 21–24.

B.

Bahrein—Persia's claim to sovereignty, 35–102.
Historical memorandum, 41–86.

C.

Cabotage—Meaning of, 6–7.
Coasting Trade—Meaning of expression, 2–3, 5–7, 9–10, 12.
Reservation to British vessels of trade between ports of the United Kingdom and of inter-Colonial and inter-Imperial trade, 2–12.
Situation in foreign countries having overseas dependencies, 12–17.
Dominions, existing law and contractual obligations, 19–20.
Commerce—See Trade.

D.

Duties—On goods on the criterion of origin, as opposed to flag and nationality; position under Anglo-Netherlands Treaty of 1824, 27–34.
Imposition in Malay States and India; position as regards Dutch goods, 27–34.

I.

Immunity—Of foreign sovereign from process in a foreign State; exception as regards ownership of land, 22–24.
Importation—See Duties.
Iraq—Date gardens of Sheikhs of Koweit and Mohammerah; Iraqi Government's obligation to implement assurances of His Majesty's Government, 21–24.
Islands—Bahrein, Persian claim to sovereignty, 35–102.

8008 [11921]

JUR—PRO.

J.

Jurisdiction—General immunity of a foreign sovereign from process in a foreign State; exception as regards ownership of land, 22–24.

K.

Koweit, Sheikh of—Date gardens in Iraq, 21–24.
International status of, 22–24.

L.

Land—Ownership within territory of foreign State forming exception from general immunity from process of a foreign sovereign, 23–24.

M.

Malay States—Applicability of Anglo-Netherlands Treaty of 1824 to, 31–34.
Imposition of tariffs by rulers; position of His Majesty's Government under Anglo-Netherlands Treaty of 1824, 32–34.
Mohammerah, Sheikh of—Date gardens in Iraq, 21–24.
Most-favoured-nation clause—Extension to treatment to which most favoured nation is entitled, whether actually claimed or not, 9, 11.

N.

Navigation Acts—Restrictions on coasting and colonial trade, 2, 7.
Restriction of colonial trade to national vessels, 28.

O.

Origin—Meaning of, as applied to goods, 27.
Dutch claim that Anglo-Netherlands Treaty of 1824 prevents discrimination between goods of British and Dutch origin, 27–34.

P.

Possession—Word does not include protectorates and protected States, 31.
Protected States—Not included in term "colony or possession," 31.
Protectorates—Not included in term "colony or possession," 31.

a

1934

(iv)

SHI—TRA.

S.

Shipping—Restriction of colonial trade to national vessels, 2-12, 28.
See also Coasting Trade.

Sovereignty—Persia's claim to sovereignty over Bahrein, 35-102.

Basing of claim by a Power to territory on basis of absence of consent to that territory's earlier detachment, 36, 38, 94-95.

T.

Tariffs—See Duties.

Taxation—Date gardens in Iraq of Sheikhs of Koweit and Mohammerah, 21-24.
See also Duties.

Territory—Claim of Power to sovereignty over territory on basis of absence of consent to that territory's earlier detachment, 36, 38, 94-95.

Trade—See also Coasting Trade.

Reservation to British vessels of inter-Colonial and inter-Imperial trade, 2-12.
Policy of His Majesty's Government as regards relaxation of restrictions on colonial trade, 28.

TRE—VES.

Treaty—See also Most-favoured-nation clause.
Interpretation of treaties by subsequent diplomatic correspondence, 30.

Treaties not applicable to protectorates or protected States under expression "colony or possession," 31.

Navigation articles of commercial treaties; exclusion of carrying trade between ports of either contracting party, 2-5, 8-9.

United Kingdom treaties which do not include coasting trade exception, 8, 11.
Great Britain and Iraq, 1922 and 1930, international obligations assumed by Iraqi Government, 21-26.

Anglo-Netherlands Treaty of 1824; interpretation of articles 2 and 3, 27-34.
Ditto; applicability to Malay States, 31-34.

V.

Vessels—See Coasting Trade.
See Shipping.

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.: 1934

GENERAL.

[W 3740/291/50/1934]

No. 1^A.

[Board of Trade.]

[April 6, 1934.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

THE following documents are sent herewith :—

- (1) Annex I.—Coasting Trade : Summary of General Situation in Foreign Countries having Overseas Dependencies.
- (2) Annex II.—Coasting Trade : Existing Treaty Provisions of United Kingdom Treaties and Agreements with Countries having Overseas Dependencies.
- (3) Annex III.—Coasting Trade in the Dominions.
- (4) Annex IV.—Second General Conference on Communications and Transit, 1923. [W 2758/291/50/1934]

1. Among the possible remedies for the present situation of British shipping, consideration is being given by His Majesty's Government to the possibility and desirability of reserving to British ships—

- (a) Trade between ports of the United Kingdom, hereinafter referred to as United Kingdom trade.
- (b) Trade specified in (a), and trade between ports of the United Kingdom and ports of the Colonies and between ports of the Colonies, hereinafter referred to as inter-colonial trade.
- (c) Trade specified in (a) and (b), and trade between ports of the United Kingdom and ports of the Dominions, between ports of the Colonies and ports of the Dominions and between ports of the Dominions, hereinafter referred to as inter-Imperial trade.

Trade between or with protectorates, protected States and mandated territories (all of which are technically foreign countries), has been excluded from the purview of this case.

2. The question as to which the Law Officers' opinion is desired relates to the compatibility of the suggested action with the treaty obligations of His Majesty's Government, and it seems necessary to set out the situation in some detail.

3. Until about a century ago it was the common practice of maritime nations to reserve the trade between any ports in their dominions to national vessels. Further, the so-called "colonial trade" was frequently reserved to national

8008 [11921]

B

Reservation to British vessels of trade between ports in the United Kingdom
and Inter-Colonial and Inter-Imperial trade, and meaning of the expression
"Coasting Trade."

vessels. The position so far as the United Kingdom was concerned is thus described in Pulling's The Shipping Code:—

"Under the form the Navigation Acts had assumed in 1847, no produce of Asia, Africa or America could be imported for consumption in the United Kingdom from Europe in any ships, the object being that the trade should be direct and in British bottoms. The whole of the coasting trade of the United Kingdom was restricted to British ships, and the colonial trade was prohibited to all foreign ships unless under the sanction of a special Order in Council. Various restrictions were imposed on imports except in British ships. Differential dues and restrictions on importations could be imposed by Order in Council on the ships of any foreign country which imposed similar restrictions on British trade. It is to be observed that, with the exception of restrictions on exportation from this country to certain British possessions, the prohibitions of the Navigation Acts were entirely restricted to imports. This necessarily followed from certain important trading Powers having anticipated Great Britain in the enactment of navigation laws, their refusal to receive our goods except in their own ships preventing the possibility of the British Parliament effectually restricting exportation in this direction."

4. This being the position, the commercial treaties concluded during this period naturally did not confer on the ships of other parties the right to carry goods between ports in the British Empire. The articles dealing with navigation in such treaties frequently gave only the right to carry goods between the territories of the two contracting parties, and it was the common practice to exclude from the operation of the treaty the carrying trade between ports in the dominions of either contracting party. As an example may be quoted the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with Portugal of the 3rd July, 1842:—

"Article VIII (2).—In like manner, Portuguese ships shall be allowed to proceed direct from any port of Her Most Faithful Majesty's Dominions to any Colony of Her Britannic Majesty"

"Article IX (2).—In like manner, Portuguese ships shall be allowed to export from any Colony of Her Britannic Majesty to any place not under the dominion of Her said Majesty, any goods not generally prohibited"

"Article X.—It is hereby declared that the stipulations of the present treaty are not to be understood as applying to the navigation and carrying trade between one port and another situated in the dominions of either contracting party, if such navigation and trade should in those dominions be reserved by law exclusively to national vessels"

Similarly, Article X of the Treaty with Austria of the 3rd July, 1838, provided as follows:—

"Article X.—The present treaty does not include the navigation and carrying trade between one port and another, situated in the dominions of one contracting party, by the vessels of the other, as far as regards the carrying of passengers, commodities, and articles of commerce; this navigation and transport being reserved to national vessels."

5. Such Orders in Council as were made under the Navigation Acts for the purpose of allowing foreign ships to take part in the colonial trade appear to have given only the right to carry goods between the territory of the other party and ports in British Colonies.

6. It will be seen, therefore, that under the régime of the Navigation Acts there was no question of the ships of any foreign country possessing a treaty right to carry goods between two or more British ports, wherever situated.

7. The Navigation Acts were repealed in 1849 (12 and 13 Vict., c. 29) subject to a reservation of the coasting trade. What was intended by the phrase "coasting trade" in this connexion is shown by the following extracts from an Act of 1853 (16 and 17 Vict., c. 107):—

"CLII.—No goods or passengers shall be carried coastwise from one part of the United Kingdom to another, except in British ships.

"CLXIII.—No goods or passengers shall be carried from one part of any British Possessions in Asia, Africa or America to another part of the same Possession except in British ships.

"CCCXXVIII.— . . . or if the Legislatures of any two or more Possessions, which for the purposes of this Act Her Majesty in Council shall declare to be neighbouring Possessions, shall present addresses or a joint address to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to place the trade between them on the footing of a coasting trade, or of otherwise regulating the same, so far as relates to the vessels in which it is to be carried on, it shall thereupon be lawful for Her Majesty, by Order in Council, so to authorise the conveyance of such goods or passengers, or so to regulate the trade between such neighbouring Possessions, as the case may be, on such terms and under such conditions as to Her Majesty may seem good."

8. Since the repeal of the Navigation Acts maritime nations have generally abandoned the policy of reserving to national ships the trade between any ports in their dominions. The navigation articles of modern commercial treaties normally give the ships of the other party the right to participate in such trade, subject to a right to reserve the coasting trade to national vessels. This is the case with regard to a large number of treaties concluded by the United Kingdom, and it is the existence of these treaties which necessitates the present reference to the Law Officers. The question of the meaning to be attached in modern conditions to the phrase "coasting trade" in these treaties is the main question which arises in the present case. In the case of the United Kingdom, however, not only has the trade between the mother country and the colonies been open to foreign shipping since the repeal in 1849 of the Navigation Acts, but the coasting trade of the United Kingdom itself has been similarly open since 1854 (17 and 18 Vict., c. 5), and, consequently, there has been no need to decide to what extent the trades in question could, under our commercial treaties, be closed to foreign shipping as being coasting trade.

9. The so-called "Navigation Articles" of existing treaties with many foreign countries prescribe national treatment in practically every respect for ships of the high contracting parties (which are defined, in the case of British ships, so as to cover ships registered in any part of the Empire, and not merely in the United Kingdom), i.e., treatment on the same footing as ships of the other contracting country, together with a supplementary provision for most-favoured-nation treatment. Provision is also made against "flag discrimination," i.e., the differential treatment of goods in respect of customs duties, &c., according to the flag of the vessel by which they are imported. Typical examples of such "Navigation Articles," taken from the Anglo-German Commercial Treaty of 1924, read as follows:—

Article 1.—"There shall be between the territories of the two contracting parties reciprocal freedom of commerce and navigation. The subjects or citizens of each of the two contracting parties shall have liberty freely to come, with their ships and cargoes, to all places and ports in the territories of the other to which subjects or citizens of that contracting party are or may be permitted to come, and shall enjoy the same rights, privileges, liberties, favours, immunities and exemptions in matters of commerce and navigation as are or may be enjoyed by subjects or citizens of that contracting party."

Article 3.—"The two contracting parties agree that in all matters relating to commerce, navigation and industry, any privilege, favour or immunity which either of the two contracting parties has actually granted or may hereafter grant to the ships and subjects or citizens of any other foreign country shall be extended simultaneously and unconditionally, without request and without compensation, to the ships and subjects or citizens of the other, it being their intention that the commerce, navigation and industry of each of the two contracting parties shall be placed in all respects on the footing of the most favoured nation."

Article 18.—"Each of the two contracting parties shall permit the importation or exportation of all merchandise which may be legally imported or exported, and also the carriage of passengers from or to their respective territories, upon the vessels of the other; and such vessels, their cargoes and passengers shall enjoy the same privileges as, and shall not be subjected to any other or higher duties or charges than, national vessels and their cargoes and passengers or the vessels of any other foreign country and their cargoes and passengers"

Article 19.—"In all that concerns the stationing, loading and unloading of vessels in the ports, docks, roadsteads and harbours of the territories of the two contracting parties, no privilege or facility shall be granted by either party to vessels of any other foreign country or to national vessels which is not equally granted to vessels of the other party from whatsoever place they may arrive and whatever may be their place of destination."

Article 20.—"In regard to duties of tonnage, harbour, pilotage, light-house, quarantine or other analogous duties or charges of whatever denomination levied in the name or for the profit of the Government, public functionaries, private individuals, corporations or establishments of any kind, the vessels of each of the two contracting parties shall enjoy in the ports of the territories of the other treatment at least as favourable as that accorded to national vessels or the vessels of any other foreign country."

At the same time, the German treaty, in common with all our other treaties containing analogous provisions (with the exceptions noted in paragraph 17 below), contains a clause excepting the coasting trade from the provisions of the treaty, or at least from the provisions regarding "national" treatment of shipping. This excepting clause appears in the Anglo-German Treaty in the following form:—

Article 21.—"The provisions of this treaty relating to the mutual concession of national treatment in matters of navigation do not apply to the coasting trade, in respect of which the subjects or citizens and vessels of each of the contracting parties shall enjoy most-favoured-nation treatment in the territories of the other, provided that reciprocity be assured."

Of the articles of the treaty with Germany quoted above, article 18 appears to be the most relevant to the question under consideration. Under this article it would not be possible to prevent a German ship from landing in the port of Liverpool a cargo brought from (a) Glasgow, (b) Ceylon or (c) Canada, unless trade between Liverpool and (a), (b) and (c) respectively is covered by the words "coasting trade" in article 21.

10. The general situation as regards the admission of British ships to, or their exclusion from, the trade between the ports of foreign countries with Overseas Possessions is summarised in Annex I to this case. In Annex II counsel will find a note of the existing provisions of United Kingdom treaties and agreements with foreign countries having overseas possessions.

11. The situation as regards the exclusion by other countries with overseas possessions of foreign ships from trade between different parts of their dominions, and the treaty position of His Majesty's Government in relation thereto, may be further summarised as follows: The only cases where trade between the component parts of the whole of a considerable colonial empire is reserved to national ships are the United States (though, as regards the Philippine Islands and the Virgin Islands, the law reserving the trade has not yet been put into operation) and (theoretically at any rate) Portugal. In the case of the United States, His Majesty's Government possess no relevant treaty rights, and therefore the question whether trade with America's overseas possessions can, for treaty purposes be regarded as coasting trade, does not, so far as His Majesty's Government is concerned, arise, but Her Majesty's Government protested (unsuccessfully) in 1898 against the idea that trade between United States ports and those of Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands and the Hawaiian Islands could properly be declared to be coasting trade, on the ground that such a measure "would go far beyond anything which has hitherto been regarded as coasting trade." In the case of Portugal, the exception in article 12 of the 1914 treaty refers not to coasting trade but to "the trade between any ports within the territories of either party"; accordingly, there can be no doubt as to Portugal's right under the treaty to reserve such trade to national vessels, and the question whether it can properly be regarded as "coasting trade" does not arise so far as His Majesty's Government is concerned. In the case of Japan, where His Majesty's Government enjoy national treatment, subject to the exception of the coasting trade, the trade between Japan proper and Korea, Formosa, Kwantung and Sakhalin, and also with Japanese mandated islands in the Pacific, is regarded as coasting trade and closed to foreign vessels. Korea, Formosa and Sakhalin are not regarded under Japanese law as an integral part of Japan, but rather as overseas possessions, and Kwantung is a territory held under lease from China. Geographically, however, all these territories are situated generally in the same area. In the case of France, where the rights of British shipping are subject to the exception of the coasting trade, the only trade with overseas possessions which appears to be reserved is that with Algeria (which is in law an integral part of France), and in that case His Majesty's Government agreed specifically that this step should not be regarded as precluded by their treaty. In the case of Spain, where His Majesty's Government enjoy national treatment in matters of navigation subject to the exception of the coasting trade, the trade between Spain, the Spanish North and North-West African possessions, and the Balearic and Canary Islands (as well as certain foreign ports⁽¹⁾), is reserved, but not that between Spain and the other Spanish colonial possessions. Of these possessions, the Balearic and Canary Islands, and Ceuta and Melilla in North Africa, but not the others, are apparently regarded as forming part of the territorial entity known as Spain.

In these circumstances, it may be said that the extent to which His Majesty's Government can be regarded as having acquiesced in trade with overseas possessions being regarded as coasting trade is distinctly limited, and confined to cases where geographical considerations could be adduced in support of such a measure.

12. The most important instance of the reservation to national vessels of trade with overseas possessions being those of the United States of America and Portugal, it may be convenient to state the treaty position in regard to those two countries of States other than the United Kingdom, so far as it has been possible to ascertain it.

The following countries appear to have national treatment in the United States, except as regards coasting trade:—

Colombia (1846).	Germany (1923).
Denmark (1826).	Italy (1871).
Estonia (1925).	Turkey (1929).

In each of these treaties, except that with Italy, the provision excepting the coasting trade contains an additional phrase to the effect that the coasting trade is to be regulated according to the laws of the respective high contracting parties. In the case of the treaties with Estonia, Germany and Turkey, at any rate, which were concluded after the enactment of all the existing United States legislation defining the coasting trade, this phrase would apparently preclude any complaint against the definition of the coasting trade contained in American law as it stood at the time when the treaty was concluded.

In the case of Portugal, the provision in the treaty with the United Kingdom containing the exception as regards trade between any ports in the Portuguese dominions does not appear in the treaties with other countries.

The shipping provisions grant general most-favoured-nation rights, or in two or three treaties a provision is included to the effect that (Estonian) shipping in Portugal and the adjacent islands is granted a reduction of 25 per cent. on the shipping dues and is granted most-favoured-nation treatment in the Portuguese colonies.

13. When the question of closing inter-Imperial trade to foreign vessels was discussed at the Colonial Conference of 1907 it was made clear that His Majesty's Government were not prepared to take such action, viewing the proposal on its merits and apart from the complications introduced by treaty engagements or the limitation of legislative power. Mr. Lloyd George (then President of the Board of Trade) stated in one passage: "Apart altogether from the question of reservation, it is clear that the assimilation of our world-wide 'inter-Imperial trade' to mere coasting trade could not be effected without a considerable departure, not only from our own long-established practice, but also from the practice of other nations, except perhaps Russia and the United States. The term 'coasting voyage' used in its natural sense implies a voyage from one port to another in the same country without the vessel touching, for purposes of trade, at any intermediate port not belonging to that country, and if this definition be accepted as accurate there would seem to be grave difficulties in the way of the extension of regulations affecting such voyages to long overseas voyages involving in many cases calls at intermediate ports."

⁽¹⁾ Spain's claim to include trade with ports in Portugal and with Gibraltar as Spanish coasting trade is unique, though it does not seem to have been challenged under commercial treaty rights.

14. Finally, in this connexion reference must be made to the Conference on Communications and Transit held under the auspices of the League of Nations at Geneva in November and December 1923, at which maritime coasting trade was one of the subjects discussed. An attempt was made to secure agreement upon a definition of the term "maritime coasting trade," and the Japanese delegation proposed that, if maritime coasting trade were not defined by the conference the following article should be incorporated in the Statute on the International Régime of Maritime Ports:—

"The transport of passengers or goods between two ports placed under the sovereignty or authority of the same State which is effected across the ocean and which may in practice be assimilated to ocean navigation, shall not be regarded as maritime coasting trade within the meaning of the present statute."

This proposition was not accepted. The French representative stated—

"It will be very difficult for certain States represented at the conference to sign the convention if a definition is adopted which changes the meaning of the term 'coasting trade' as it is understood in the various countries."

As will be seen from Annex IV, the conference was unable in this connexion to do more than recommend that all States, including those which are not members of the League of Nations, should refrain from an abusive extension of the scope of "maritime coasting trade."

15. It has not been possible to discover in textbooks on international law much material as to the question of the meaning of the term "coasting trade" in commercial treaties. It was, however, dealt with at some length in Oppenheim on International Law (Third Edition), paragraph 579 (Volume I, pp. 745 to 749). This paragraph, which is based on an article by the same author in the Law Quarterly Review, XXIV (1908), pp. 328 to 334, is as follows:—

"579. The meaning of the term coasting trade in commercial treaties must not be confounded with its meaning in international law generally. The meaning of the term in international law becomes apparent through its synonym cabotage—that is, navigation from cape to cape along the coast combined with trading between the ports of the coast concerned, without going out into the open sea. Therefore, trade between Marseilles and Nice, between Calais and Havre, between London and Liverpool, and between Dublin and Belfast is coasting trade, but trade between Marseilles and Havre and between London and Dublin is not. It is a universally recognised rule of international law that every littoral State can exclude foreign merchantmen from the cabotage within its maritime belt. Cabotage is the contrast to the overseas carrying trade, and has nothing to do with the question of free trade from or to a port on the coast to or from a port abroad. This question is one of commercial policy, and international law does not prevent a State from restricting to vessels of its subjects the export or the import to its ports, or from allowing such export or import under certain conditions only.

"There is no doubt that originally the meaning of coasting trade in commercial treaties was identical with its meaning in international law generally, but there is likewise no doubt that the practice of the States gives now a much more extended meaning to the term coasting trade, as used in commercial treaties. Thus France distinguishes between cabotage petit and grand; whereas petit cabotage is coasting trade between ports in the same sea, grand cabotage is coasting trade between a French port situated in the Atlantic Ocean and a French port situated in the Mediterranean, and—according to a statute of 21st September, 1793—both grand and petit cabotage are exclusively reserved for French vessels. Thus, further, the United States of America has always considered trade between one of her ports in the Atlantic Ocean and one in the Pacific to be coasting trade, and has exclusively reserved it for vessels of her own subjects; she considered such trade to be coasting trade, even when, before the Panamá Canal was built, the carriage took place, not exclusively by sea around Cape Horn, but partly by sea and partly by land across the Isthmus of Panamá. Great Britain has taken up a similar attitude. Section 2 of the Navigation Act of 1849 (12 & 13 Vict., c. 29) enacted that 'no goods or passengers shall be carried coastwise from one part of the United Kingdom to another, or from the Isle of Man to the United Kingdom, except in British ships,' and thereby declared trade between a port of England or Scotland to a port of Ireland or the Isle of Man to be coasting trade exclusively reserved for British ships, in spite of the fact that the open sea flows between these ports. And although the Navigation Act of 1849 is no longer in force, and this country now does admit foreign ships to its coasting trade, it, nevertheless, still considers all trade between one port of the United Kingdom and another to be coasting trade, as becomes apparent from Section 140 of the Customs Consolidation Act of 24th July, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict., c. 36). Again, Germany declared by a statute of the 22nd May, 1881, coasting trade to be trade between any two German ports, and reserved it for German vessels, although vessels of such States could be admitted as, on their part, admitted German vessels to their own coasting trade. Thus trade between Königsberg in the Baltic and Hamburg in the North Sea is coasting trade.

"These instances are sufficient to demonstrate that an extension of the original meaning of coasting trade has really taken place, and has found general recognition. A great many commercial treaties have been concluded between such countries as established that extension of meaning and others, and these commercial treaties no doubt make use of the term coasting trade in this its extended meaning. It must, therefore, be maintained that the term coasting trade or cabotage as used in commercial treaties has acquired the following meaning: 'Sea trade between any two ports of the same country, whether on the same coast or different coasts, provided always that the different coasts are all of them the coasts of one and the same country as a political and geographical unit, in contradistinction to the coasts of colonies or dominions of such country.'

"In spite of this established extension of the term coasting trade, it did not include colonial trade until nearly the end of the 19th century. Indeed, when Russia, by ukase of 1897, enacted that trade between any of her ports should be considered coasting trade, and be reserved for Russian vessels, this did not comprise a further extension of the conception of coasting trade. The reason was that Russia, although her territory extended over different parts of the globe, was a political and geographical unit, and there was one stretch of territory only between St. Petersburg and Vladivostok. But when, in 1898 and 1899, the United States of America declared trade between any of her ports and those of Porto Rico, the Philippines, and the Hawaiian Islands to be coasting trade, and consequently reserved it exclusively for American vessels, the distinction between coasting trade and overseas or colonial trade fell to the ground. It is submitted that this American extension of the conception of coasting trade, as used in her commercial treaties before 1898, is inadmissible, and contains a violation of the treaty rights of the other contracting parties. Should these parties consent to the American extension of the meaning of coasting trade, and should other countries follow the American lead, and apply the term coasting trade indiscriminately to trade along their coasts and to their colonial trade, the meaning of the term would then become 'trade between any two ports which are under the sovereignty of the same State.' The distinction between coasting trade and colonial trade would then become void, and the last trace of the synonymity between coasting trade and cabotage would have disappeared."

16. It may be added that while in the law of the United Kingdom there has been no attempt to extend further the meaning of "coasting trade," by section 8, sub-section (5), of the Pilotage Act, 1913, it is provided that "for the purposes of this section a ship which habitually trades to or from any port or ports outside the British Islands shall not be deemed to be trading coastwise."

17. So far the case has proceeded on the basis that the coasting trade is excepted from the navigation articles of the commercial treaties concluded by His Majesty's Government. There are, however, certain treaties which do not contain the coasting trade exceptions, and it may be, therefore, that the countries concerned have a treaty right to engage even in the United Kingdom trade.

These treaties are—

- (1) The Anglo-Persian Agreement of 1920, article 4 of which reads—

“The rights of most-favoured-nation treatment mutually enjoyed under the Convention by the subjects and commerce of the two contracting States is to be understood as extending to the treatment of ships and boats belonging to such States, which shall, moreover, continue to enjoy equal treatment with national ships and boats in all matters relating to trade and navigation, including port and harbour facilities and charges of all kinds.”

It will be seen that these very explicit provisions are not made subject to any exception for the coasting trade.

- (2) The Anglo-Austrian Treaty of 1924 (articles 1 and 17); and
(3) The Anglo-Hungarian Treaty of 1926 (articles 1 and 12).

The above-mentioned articles of the Austrian and Hungarian treaties are identical with articles 1 and 18 respectively of the Anglo-German treaties already quoted. Neither the Austrian nor the Hungarian treaty, however, contains an exception in respect of the coasting trade.

18. In addition to the above treaty instruments with Austria, Hungary and Persia, attention should, perhaps, be drawn to the exchange of notes—18th/20th September, 1904—with Italy (see Handbook of Commercial Treaties, 1931, pp. 377 to 378). By these notes the Italian Government gave an assurance that the status quo under which the British flag is admitted to the coasting trade of Italy will be prolonged sine die. The notes contemplated reciprocal treatment for Italian ships in the United Kingdom. While, on the one hand, it may be argued that the notes do not place any obligation on this country to keep the coasting trade open, it seems possible to contend that so long as the notes are in existence Italy may claim a right to participate in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom.

19. If Austria, Hungary and Persia, and possibly Italy, or any one of them, can claim national treatment in respect of the coasting trade of the United Kingdom, then the claims of other States under a most-favoured-nation clause have to be considered.

Article 15 of the Commercial Treaty of 1922 with Spain provides—

“The provision of this treaty relating to mutual concessions of national treatment in matters of navigation do not apply to the coasting trade, in respect of which the subjects and vessels of the contracting parties shall enjoy most-favoured-nation treatment.”

Similar provisions appear in the treaties with Estonia, Finland, Latvia, Nicaragua, Roumania, and Siam, and also subject to a proviso regarding reciprocity in the treaties with Germany, Greece and Yugoslavia. The treaty of the 3rd April, 1911, with Japan, as revised by the Supplementary Convention of the 30th July, 1925, provides that “the coasting trade is excepted from the provision of the present treaty, and shall be regulated according to their respective laws. It is, however, understood that the subjects and vessels of either high contracting party shall enjoy in this respect most-favoured-nation treatment in the territories of the other, but this benefit will be claimed only under the condition of reciprocity in the event of such condition being required by the laws of either party, or by the terms of an arrangement with a third party by which special concessions in that respect may be granted to that third party.”

The exchanges of notes with Albania (10th June, 1925), Bulgaria (12th November, 1925) and Lithuania (6th May, 1922) provide that vessels of these various countries shall enjoy in the ports, rivers and territorial waters of the United Kingdom treatment not less favourable than that favoured to British vessels or vessels of the most-favoured-nation country, subject, however, to the right of His Britannic Majesty's Government to reserve the coasting trade to British vessels. The treaty with Poland of the 26th November, 1923, contains in article 4 a similar provision. The general most-favoured-nation article in the treaties with the Argentine Republic of 1925 (article 2) and with Venezuela of 1925 (article 2) would cover coasting trade. Article 7 of the treaty of 1848 with Liberia (conditional form of most-favoured-nation treatment) probably also covers coasting trade. It will be seen, therefore, that the right to most-favoured-nation treatment as regards the coasting trade in the United Kingdom depends on the interpretation to be given to the varying terms of the provisions in the treaty instruments, but it seems possible to say that if it is held that any country can claim national treatment in this respect there are other countries which can definitely lay claim to such treatment by virtue of the most-favoured-nation rights.

20. So far as Persia, Austria and Hungary are concerned, they have never exercised the right to national treatment so far as the coasting trade of the United Kingdom is concerned, and the question arises whether national treatment must be claimed or enjoyed in actual practice before another State entitled to most-favoured-nation treatment can claim that right. In March 1906 the Board of Trade submitted a case for the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. Rowlatt, in which (inter alia) they were asked to advise whether the right claimable by subjects of nations is an absolute right by reason of the operation of the most-favoured-nation clause, or whether the right is one which is claimable only if and when the subjects of States who have been granted national treatment have claimed and had granted to them the particular privilege then under consideration, and the following advice was given on the 11th April, 1906⁽²⁾ :—

“This must depend upon the true construction of the particular most-favoured-nation clause upon which it may arise, but, speaking generally, we are of opinion that the right extends to the treatment to which the most favoured nation is entitled, whether actually claimed or not. On the other hand, the treatment accorded in actual practice would be very material upon the construction of the treaty upon which it depends.”

Since that time His Majesty's Government have consistently acted on that advice.

21. In this connexion, it is important to note that, unlike the Anglo-Persian agreement (which can be denounced at twelve months' notice), the Austrian treaty and especially the Hungarian treaty have some time still to run before they can be denounced (in the case of the Hungarian treaty not till the 26th July, 1937).

22. In the light of the observations set out above, the Law Officers are asked to advise whether, having regard to our treaty obligations with other nations, it is possible to reserve to British ships—

- (a) United Kingdom trade.
- (b) Inter-Colonial trade.
- (c) Inter-Imperial trade.

23. The first matter for consideration which is applicable to all three categories would appear to be the position created by the absence of the coasting trade exception in the agreement with Persia and in the treaties with Austria and Hungary, and by the exchange of notes with Italy. If these nations are entitled to participate in British coasting trade (whatever may be the meaning of that term), does the provision in treaties and agreements with other nations conferring most-favoured-nation treatment prevent His Majesty's Government from closing coasting trade to those other nations?

24. The second matter for consideration would appear to be the meaning of the term “coasting trade” in relation to the three different categories. In this connexion, it should be noted that His Majesty's Government, as well as the Governments of many other countries which would be affected by a reservation of coasting trade, are parties to the optional clause of the Permanent Court of International Justice, and, moreover, many of the commercial treaties concerned contain a provision for arbitration in the case of disputes as to their interpretation or application. In the event, therefore, of any of these countries disputing the legitimacy of the action of His Majesty's Government, the question of the meaning to be given to the expression “coasting trade” would be decided by an International Tribunal.

25. It has not proved possible to discover any case in which an international tribunal has had occasion to consider the meaning of the expression “coasting trade,” nor (see paragraph 14 above) is much assistance to be derived from the text-books on international law. In these circumstances, the decision of such a tribunal would presumably be based mainly on the practice of nations, and particularly of this country, and from this point of view the most relevant considerations would seem to be as follows: (a) The fact that at the time when it was usual to exclude foreign shipping from trade between any ports under the same sovereignty such exclusion was not based on a contention that the trade in question was coasting trade (paragraphs 3 to 6 above); (b) the fact that in the case of the United States, which is the only one which, from a geographical point of view, approximates to the proposals now under consideration, the question whether trade between all the American possessions could properly be regarded as coasting trade did not, so far as His Majesty's Government were concerned, arise, but, nevertheless, they are on record as having protested against the action of the United States Government (paragraph 11); (c) that, with the exception of Japan and (theoretically at any rate) Portugal, where the term "coasting trade" is not used in the treaty with His Majesty's Government and other countries possess only most-favoured-nation rights, no other State attempts to treat trade between the whole of its overseas possessions as coasting trade (paragraph 11); (d) that certain other countries who have a treaty right as against the United States to national treatment, with the exception of the coasting trade, have apparently not protested against the extension given by the United States to the term "coasting trade," though the extent of their treaty rights is, at any rate in some cases, uncertain (paragraph 12); (e) the case of Spain, where the trade with some colonies is reserved, and (anomalously) that with certain foreign ports (paragraph 11); (f) the statement of the position of His Majesty's Government made by Mr. Lloyd George in 1907 (paragraph 13); (g) the resolution of the Second General Conference on Communications and Transit, 1923 (paragraph 14 and Annex IV).

⁽²⁾ Confidential 9007, p. 10.

1934

26. So far as the United Kingdom trade is concerned, it would seem that no difficulty can arise. In the light of the observations set out above, there appears to be little or no possibility of a contention that coasting trade, as the expression has been understood internationally for a long time past, does not cover the trade defined as coasting trade in section 140 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876.

27. So far as inter-Colonial trade or inter-Imperial trade is concerned, similar considerations would appear to apply to trade between ports of any particular Colony or Dominion. It is also suggested that it is a matter for consideration whether it is legitimate to apply the term to trade between different colonies in a defined geographical area, e.g., trade between the different colonies in the West Indies, or on the West Coast of Africa (cf. 16 and 17 Vict., c. 107, section 328, quoted in paragraph 7 above).

28. Looking, however, at inter-Colonial trade in its wider sense, is it possible to apply the term "coasting trade" to trade between the mother country and the various colonies, or to trade between different colonies which have no geographical connexion? So far as this country is concerned, we have up till now in our own legislation restricted the meaning of the expression, and in the case of the United States of America have protested against the extension of the meaning of coasting trade.

29. So far as inter-Imperial trade is concerned, the present constitutional position of the Dominions as defined in the declaration of 1926 gives rise to a further serious question whether, on the assumption that inter-Colonial trade is covered by the expression "coasting trade," the principle upon which this conclusion is based is the fact that the colony and the mother country are under the same Sovereign, or whether it is the fact that the colony is subordinate and subject to the jurisdiction of the mother country. If the latter is the principle, it does not cover inter-Imperial trade. If this be the case, the position of the Irish Free State needs consideration. Before the creation of the Irish Free State trade between Great Britain and Southern Ireland certainly came within the generally accepted view of coasting trade, and the question arises as to whether, by reason of the creation of the Irish Free State, trade between Great Britain and Southern Ireland has now ceased to be "coasting trade."

It will, of course, be realised that the decision to reserve inter-Imperial trade on a reciprocal basis would not be reached without an agreement with the Dominions, or a resolution at an Imperial Conference, and that a decision even to proceed unilaterally in the United Kingdom, so far as ships trading with the Dominions are concerned, would necessitate previous consultation with the Dominions.

The Law Officers of the Crown are requested to advise—

- (1) Whether any, and if so which, of the following countries, Austria, Hungary, Italy and Persia, have the right under the treaty provisions applicable to them to engage in the United Kingdom trade, as defined in paragraph 1 (a) of this case.
- (2) Whether, in the event of question (1) being answered in the affirmative, but its being possible to show that the country or countries concerned had not claimed or exercised their right, a country possessing a treaty right to most-favoured-nation treatment in regard to the coasting trade could claim the right to engage in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom.
- (3) Whether (apart from any difficulties arising from the answers to questions (1) and (2)) an international tribunal would hold that His Majesty's Government were entitled to reserve to British ships, as being "coasting trade" within the meaning of the relevant treaty provisions—
 - (a) Inter-Colonial trade, as defined in paragraph 1 (b) of this case.
 - (b) Inter-Imperial trade, as defined in paragraph 1 (c).
- (4) Generally on the case.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

(1) We think the answer is yes. No explanation is given as to why there is no clause excluding coastwise trade in the three treaties with Austria, Hungary and Persia. The fact, however, that the exclusion is expressed in other treaties and the fact that Italy expressly allows British vessels to take part in her coasting trade make it, in our view, impossible to argue that such exclusion can be implied in the absence of an express provision to that effect. It is very arguable that articles 1 and 18, for example, of the German treaty standing alone would on their true construction deal only with trade to and from the respective countries and that therefore the privileges referred to in article 18 do not extend to coastwise trading. The presence of article 21 in the German treaty would, however, in our opinion, prove fatal to such an argument.

(2) We think the answer is yes. We agree with the previous opinion of the Law Officers and Mr. Rowlatt cited in paragraph 20 of the case that, "speaking generally . . . the right extends to the treatment to which the most favoured nation is entitled, whether actually claimed or not." We think that the point is perhaps more precisely covered if the words "or exercised" are added after the word "claimed." The wide words used, for example, in article 3 of the Anglo-German treaty of 1924, in our opinion, supports this view. If the other view was held, a very anomalous position might arise. Coastwise traffic might be forbidden to the countries who had no treaty right to engage in it, but had most-favoured-nation clauses on the ground that, say, Austria had never exercised the right which she had and would still have, so long as her treaty lasts, to engage in that traffic. If Austria proceeded to send one ship to do one coastwise voyage, all the other countries could then presumably claim the same right to engage in the traffic. It cannot, of course, be suggested that Austria and the other three countries have lost their right under the treaty because they have not so far exercised it.

(3) (a) and (b) We think the answer to both questions is no. An international tribunal would probably give a somewhat extended meaning to coastwise trade so as to cover (1) cases where the continuous area of one country has ports in different seas, e.g., France, and (2) where one country or one country and one or more of its dominions or possessions are in the same maritime area, so that the voyage is more like a coasting voyage than an ocean voyage. To extend it, however, to cover either colonial or Imperial trade would, in our opinion, make nonsense of the expression "coasting trade," and we do not think any tribunal would give it this meaning. There are further forcible reasons stated in the case which would make it very difficult for this country to put forward any such contention.

1934

(4) The third question submitted to us and our answers are general. It may well be that the expression "coasting trade" occurring in a particular context in a treaty would have a perfectly clear meaning, either more or less extended than the meaning of the same expression in a different context in treaty between different high contracting parties. The opinion we have above expressed must therefore be read as being subject to qualifications which may be required in particular cases not brought to our attention.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
D. B. SOMERVELL.

*Law Officers' Department,
April 6, 1934.*

Annex I.

Coasting Trade: Summary of General Situation in Foreign Countries having Overseas Dependencies.

Belgium, Denmark, The Netherlands, Italy.

In the case of Belgium, Denmark and the Netherlands, there are practically no reservations on the coasting trade or on the territorial trade. In the case of Italy, though the coasting trade of Italy itself and that of some of her overseas possessions is reserved, the trade between them is not reserved.

In these cases, therefore, the question of the meaning of "coasting trade" does not arise.

France.

By article 4 of the Navigation Act of the 21st September, 1793, foreign vessels may not transport from one French port to another any commodities, products or merchandise, grown, or produced or manufactured in France or in French colonies and possessions, under penalties laid down in article 3. A decree of the 9th July, 1869,⁽¹⁾ repealed articles 3 and 4 in the French colonies, where the Act was still in force.

The French law of the 30th January, 1893, as amended by a law of the 19th April, 1906, defined the terms long distance navigation ("navigation au long cours"), international coasting trade ("cabotage international"), and French coasting trade ("cabotage français").

Vessels of all nationalities may participate in long-distance voyages and international coasting trade, although, as regards the latter, French vessels are granted certain advantages over foreign vessels.

French coasting trade embraces voyages from one French port to another, including ports in Algeria.

When Algeria was made an integral part of France and the trade between them was reserved by a law of 1889, Her Majesty's Government agreed specifically that, subject to receiving most-favoured-nation treatment, this step should not be regarded as precluded by the convention with France of 1882. This convention (which has just been denounced by France) provides that British vessels shall enjoy in France and Algeria the same treatment as national vessels, the coasting trade, however, being specifically exempted (articles 7 and 9). It would appear, therefore, that the exemption made in article 9 was not intended to cover trade between France and Algeria, and it was presumably for this reason that it was considered necessary to make the special arrangement of 1893.

By a French law of the 20th October, 1919, Tunisian and Moroccan vessels⁽²⁾ were assimilated to French vessels for the purposes of article 4 of the Navigation Act of 1793, and of the law of 1889 (navigation between France and Algeria).

⁽¹⁾ "Les produits de toute nature et de toute provenance peuvent être importés par tous pavillons dans les divers établissements français d'outre-mer où l'acte de navigation du 21 Septembre 1793 est encore en vigueur. Les produits chargés dans ces mêmes établissements peuvent être exportés pour toute destination et par tout pavillon."

⁽²⁾ Tunis and Morocco (French zone) are French protectorates.

By the law of 1919, therefore, Tunisian and Moroccan vessels may participate in the French coasting trade proper, but there appears to be nothing to prevent foreign vessels participating in the trade between Tunis and Morocco and French ports.

Information has, in fact, been received from British representatives abroad concerned, that trade between France and the protectorates of Tunis and Morocco is open to foreign vessels, though it appears that the cargo carried by foreign vessels is not accorded the preferential treatment accorded to goods carried in French bottoms, and, as regards trade between France and Morocco, British participation rarely occurs owing to the intensive service maintained by French companies. The coasting trade in Morocco and Tunis is open to British vessels.

Spain.

The national coasting trade is defined in article 33 of the law of the 14th June, 1909, as "that which is carried on by national vessels directly between the Spanish ports of the Peninsula, North and North-West African possessions, and the Balearic and Canary Islands, as well as that carried on by them between the said ports and that of Gibraltar, and those of the coasts of Portugal and Morocco, where Spain has consulates." Article 2 of the law reserved national coasting trade between Spanish ports exclusively for vessels of national flag and construction.

The provisions of article 2 of the law were suspended in 1916, but the prohibition in respect of foreign vessels was restored by a decree of the 3rd November, 1923, which provided that the coasting trade shall be strictly regulated in accordance with the law of the 14th June, 1909, with certain exceptions which related to vessels of foreign construction introduced into Spain between 1909 and the date of the decree of 1923. A Royal decree law of the 21st August, 1925, reproduces the definition of national coasting trade contained in the law of 1909, as well as the reservation to national vessels of national coasting trade between Spanish ports.

Therefore, trade between Spanish ports of the Peninsula is reserved generally for Spanish ships, no distinction being made between voyages between ports on one and the same coast, and voyages between ports on the coasts which are separated from one another. An exception is made, on the basis of reciprocity, as regards carriage by foreign transatlantic vessels of cabin passengers and luggage.

The trade between Peninsula ports and ports in the Balearic and Canary Islands and Spanish ports on the north and north-west coast of Africa is similarly reserved for Spanish ships. Foreign vessels were permitted under regulations of 1913 to carry fruit from the Canary Islands to other Spanish ports, and also goods until such time as a Spanish line can undertake the traffic, but the Royal decree of 1925 appears to restrict the traffic to Spanish vessels.

Nothing is said in the laws or regulations regarding trade between Spain and Spanish possessions in other parts of Africa.

His Majesty's Government enjoy national treatment in matters of navigation (articles 1, 14, 16 and 17 of the treaty of the 31st October, 1922), but the coasting trade is excepted (article 15), subject to His Majesty's Government receiving most-favoured-nation treatment.

Portugal.

A decree of the 23rd January, 1905, reserved to national shipping maritime traffic—

- (1) Between Portuguese ports and between these and the Azores, or from one port in the Azores to another.
- (2) Between Portuguese possessions bordering the Atlantic and the ports of Portugal, the Azores and Madeira.
- (3) Between the ports of any of the Portuguese possessions on the Atlantic (excluding the coastal zone within the Congo conventional basin).

The decree also provided that maritime traffic between Portuguese ports east of the Cape of Good Hope and between these ports and any ports in the Portuguese possessions on the Atlantic, the Azores, Madeira or Portugal was open to all national and foreign vessels. Traffic between the inland ports of Mozambique (exclusive of the Zambesi) and between such ports and the ocean ports of the province was reserved to the national coasting services of the province.

1934

By a decree of the 25th September, 1922, maritime traffic between Portugal, the adjacent islands and the Portuguese Colonies was reserved to the Portuguese flag, as well as traffic between the ports of the Colonies or between one and the other, provided that such traffic was regularly served by national vessels.

As regards shipping between Portugal and the Colonies and between one Colony and another, His Majesty's Ambassador at Lisbon was informed in 1925 that the above decree of 1922 had not yet been put in force in the Colonies, and that consequently the provisions of the decree of 1905 held good.

The enforcement of a Mozambique decree of 1924 reserving the coasting trade of Mozambique to Portuguese vessels has been postponed from time to time in recent years, as Portuguese shipping has apparently not been adequate to take over the coastal traffic.

Article 12 of the treaty between the United Kingdom and Portugal of the 12th August, 1914, provides that "notwithstanding anything in this treaty, either of the contracting parties reserves the right to confine to national vessels the trade between any port within its territories." In this case, therefore, the meaning of the term "coasting trade" does not arise.

Japan.

From 1911 onwards, Japanese coasting trade has been restricted to vessels of Japanese nationality, and apparently the reservation is applicable, not only to trade round Japan proper, but also to trade with Chosen (or Korea), Taiwan in Formosa, the Kwantung Leased Territory and Karafuto in Sakhalin. It should also be noted that the Japanese mandated territories in the Pacific are held under "C Mandates," by which they are subject to Japanese law as if they were integral parts of Japanese territory. There is no doubt that trade with all those territories is regarded by Japan as coasting trade.

The extent to which British vessels may participate in the coasting trade of Japan is determined by the following:—

(1) The Japanese Shipping Law, namely, Law No. 46 of 1899, revised by Law No. 68 of 1905, of which article 3 is as follows:—

"None but Japanese vessels may call at unopened ports, or convey cargo or passengers between Japanese ports. However, this prohibition does not apply when there is a special provision in laws or treaties, when an attempt is made to escape disaster by sea, or capture, or when the special permission of the competent Minister has been obtained."

(2) The Korean Shipping Ordinance, namely, Ordinance No. 7 of the 7th April, 1914, issued by the Government-General of Korea, of which article 3 is as follows:—

"None but Japanese vessels, as described in article 1 above, may call at unopened ports or convey cargo or passengers between any ports. However, this prohibition does not apply when there is a special provision in laws or treaties, when an attempt is made to escape disaster by sea or capture, or when the special permission of the Governor-General of Korea has been obtained."

(3) The Formosa Ships' Nationality Regulations, namely, Ordinance No. 4 of the 21st May, 1898, issued by the Government-General of Formosa, revised by Ordinance No. 19 of October 1900, and by Ordinance No. 15 of November 1901. Article 5 of the ordinance is as follows:—

"None but Japanese vessels within the meaning of article 1 of the Shipping Law, and vessels having certificates of ships' nationality or ships' licences in accordance with these regulations, may call at unopened ports or convey cargo or passengers between any ports in Formosa. However, this prohibition does not apply . . . (as above, substituting Governor-General of Formosa for Governor-General of Korea)."

(4) The Kwantung Province (Liaotung Leased Territory) Ships' Nationality Ordinance, namely, Ordinance No. 35 of the 30th December, 1911, issued by the Kwantung Government, revised by Ordinance No. 23 of October 1914, and by Ordinance No. 3 of April 1919. Article 3 of the ordinance is as follows:—

"None but Japanese vessels within the meaning of article 1 of the Shipping Law, and Japanese vessels within the meaning of this ordinance, may call at unopened ports in the Province of Kwantung or convey cargo or passengers between any ports in the Province of Kwantung. However, this prohibition does not apply when . . . (as above, substituting Governor-General of Kwantung)."

(5) The Anglo-Japanese Treaty of Commerce and Navigation of 1911, article 21, which is as follows:—

"The coasting trade of the high contracting parties is excepted from the provisions of the present treaty, and shall be regulated according to the laws of Japan and the United Kingdom respectively. It is, however, understood that the subjects and vessels of either high contracting party shall enjoy in this respect most-favoured-nation treatment in the territories of the other.

"Japanese and British vessels may, nevertheless, proceed from one port to another, either for the purpose of landing the whole or part of their passengers or cargoes brought from abroad, or of taking on board the whole or part of their passengers or cargoes for a foreign destination.

"It is also understood that, in the event of the coasting trade of either country being exclusively reserved to national vessels, the vessels of the other country, if engaged in trade to or from places not within the limits of the coasting trade so reserved, shall not be prohibited from the carriage between two ports of the former country of passengers holding through tickets, or merchandise consigned on through bills of lading to or from places not within the above-mentioned limits, and while engaged in such carriage these vessels and their cargoes shall enjoy the full privileges of this treaty."

The Board of Trade memorandum enclosed in Foreign Office despatch No. 39 of the 29th January, 1925, to His Majesty's Ambassador at Tokyo, enumerates four heads under which information is desired as to British participation in the coasting trade of Japan. The present position under these four heads is as follows:—

(i) Treaty Rights.—The statement enclosed in the Board of Trade memorandum correctly defines the present position, and Japan has at the moment no treaty with any other Power under which the vessels of that Power enjoy better treatment than British vessels, and which His Majesty's Government could claim for British vessels under a most-favoured-nation clause.

(ii) Domestic Law in regard to Coasting Trade.—The Japanese Laws and Ordinance in regard to coasting trade have been given above. Their effect is that—

- The coasting trade between ports in Japan proper is reserved to Japanese vessels, with the exceptions mentioned in article 21 of the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation as given above.
- Trade between ports in Japan proper and ports in Japanese overseas territories is likewise reserved to Japanese vessels, with the same exceptions.
- Trade between ports in different Japanese overseas territories is reserved to Japanese vessels, with the same exceptions.
- The coasting trade between the ports of each separate overseas territory is reserved to Japanese vessels, with the same exceptions.

(iii) The Actual Position.—The actual position in practice does not differ from the legal position as indicated in (i) and (ii) above.

(iv) The Extent to which British Shipping participates.—British vessels have enjoyed for many years and do, in fact, at present enjoy the exceptions granted under article 21 of the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation. They regularly carry between ports in Japanese territory passengers travelling on through tickets to or from points outside Japanese territory, and cargo on through bills of lading to or from points outside such territory.

1934

Although not definitely so stated, there is no doubt that the words "port" and "ports" in article 21 of the treaty quoted above mean "open port" and "open ports" respectively, and that the exceptions provided by the said article do not allow British vessels to enter unopened ports. But this is not material, as all commercial ports of consequence in Japan are now open ports.

As regards the Japanese mandated territory of the Marianne, Caroline and Marshall Islands, no specific regulations on the subject of coasting trade have been published, but the Japanese authorities state verbally that they apply in the islands the same regulations as obtain elsewhere in Japanese territory.

United States of America.

The United States has always considered trade between one of her ports in the Atlantic Ocean and one in the Pacific Ocean to be coasting trade, and has exclusively reserved it for vessels of her own subjects.

On the annexation by the United States in 1898 of Hawaii, Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands, it was thought that the United States might extend this principle to these newly acquired overseas possessions. His Majesty's Government possessed no relevant treaty rights in the matter, but, nevertheless, representations were made by them to the United States in 1898 on the subject. It was there stated that, "if such a measure were to be applied to ports in islands at a distance from the mainland of the American continent, it would go far beyond anything which has hitherto been regarded as coasting trade," and the consequent hardship to the commerce of the United Kingdom and British Colonies was pointed out. In their reply, the United States Government contended that trade between San Francisco and New York by way of the Straits of Magellan, which had for many years been regarded as coasting trade in so far as the laws restricting such trade to United States vessels was concerned, is very much greater than that between islands at a distance from the mainland of the American continent. Also, under the treaty of 1815 with Great Britain (article 3), United States vessels were not permitted to carry between Calcutta, Madras and Bombay, and London or Liverpool. "Should Congress see fit to restrict to national vessels the trade between Honolulu and San Francisco, such a measure would be well within what has hitherto been regarded both by the United States and Great Britain as coasting trade." The United States Government were aware that Great Britain had abandoned the principle involved in article 3 of the treaty of 1815, "but the reasons which led to that change of policy by Great Britain do not at the present time suggest a corresponding change of policy on the part of the United States." Finally, the United States Government referred to the impending action by the Russian Government to restrict trade between the Asiatic and European ports of Russia to Russian vessels.

By a law of the 20th April, 1900, the trade between Hawaii and the United States of America was declared to be coasting trade and the same principle was applied to Porto Rico about the same time.

A section of the United States Merchant Marine Act, 1920, provided that, from and after the 1st February, 1922, the coastwise laws of the United States "shall extend to the island territories and possessions of the United States not now covered thereby" (of which the most important were the Philippine and Virgin Islands), but if adequate shipping service was not established by the 1st February, 1922, the President was given power to extend the period allowed for the establishment of such service.

The period has been extended from time to time as regards the Philippine Islands and the Virgin Islands, and the application of the law to those two territories awaits a presidential proclamation certifying that adequate shipping facilities exist to deal with the trade.

At the time of the passing of the above Act of 1920 it was pointed out by the Board of Trade that it had long been the practice of the United States to reserve to national vessels trade between Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, and that it did not appear that any objection could be taken to this extension.

The following quotation from a volume entitled Shipping and Shipbuilding Subsidies, by Jesse E. Saugstad, and issued by the United States Department of Commerce in 1932, is of interest. On pp. 75 to 78 of that book are set out certain observations of the late Mr. Eugene Tyler Chamberlain, formerly United States Commissioner of Navigation:—

"The words 'coasting trade' derive their import not solely from geographical facts now or at the time of the ratification of the treaties; jurisdiction over terminal ports and its implications also determine their meaning. Some of the steps by which these implications in the words 'coasting trade' have superseded the narrow geographical meaning conveyed originally by the word 'cabotage' or trade from headland to headland have been set forth in the quotation above (i.e., the quotation from Oppenheim on International Law set out in paragraph 15 of the case). Indeed, so subordinate is the geographical meaning that nations generally recognise that a ship is not engaged in the coasting trade or cabotage while employed along a coastline under one jurisdiction in discharging or taking on cargo at two successive ports if the cargo is from a foreign port, and the trade accordingly is a matter involving the co-operation of two national jurisdictions. Such considerations impelled the United States to apply its system of legislation for the trade between ports on its coasts for its successive acquisitions of territory, including Alaska, which, like Hawaii or Porto Rico, is a political unit with the United States; but surely it is no more a geographical unit with it than is either of those islands. The policy was followed under the form of an application of the coasting trade law, of which the commercial and political essence was and is the recognised right to reserve it to national ships. In 1898 the coast of Hawaii was as much a coast of the United States for commercial purposes as was the coast of California. Trade originating in California and destined for Hawaii was as much trade between the coasts of the United States as was trade originating in California and destined for Alaska, or for the State of Washington, and was not improperly in 1900 described and regulated as 'coasting trade.'"

Annex II.

Coasting Trade: Existing Treaty Provisions of United Kingdom Treaties and Agreements with Countries having Overseas Dependencies.

(NOTE.—Wherever national treatment is prescribed, most-favoured-nation treatment is normally provided also and specific mention is not, in such cases, therefore, made of it below.)

Belgium.

Exchange of notes of 1898 continues "system actually applied" to subjects and goods (not shipping) on condition of reciprocity: but modifications may be made if applied to all countries.

Applies to United Kingdom, Irish Free State, Newfoundland, India and certain Colonies.

Denmark.

No treaty provisions affecting coasting trade, except that it is considered to be covered by the general most-favoured-nation provisions of article 40 of the treaty of 1670. Article 1 of 1824 convention provides national treatment in respect of duties and charges levied on vessels; the convention applies to the United Kingdom and Irish Free State only, and to Denmark, but not to her colonies (article 6).

France.

Treaty 1882. National treatment (articles 7 and 8), but coasting trade excepted (article 9).

Applies to the United Kingdom and Irish Free State.

[11921]

D

Italy.

Treaty 1883. National treatment (articles 1, 5—which covers importation into ports of “dominions and possessions” of both parties—6 and 7); coasting trade excepted (article 8), but an exchange of notes of 1904 prolongs the status quo, sine die.

Applies to the whole Empire.

Japan.

Treaty, 1911. National treatment (articles 6, 16, 17, 19), but coasting trade excepted (article 21, modified by article 2 of supplementary convention of 1925, which prescribed most favoured nation, subject to a possible requirement of reciprocity).

Applies to United Kingdom, Canada, Irish Free State, Newfoundland and Colonies.

The supplementing convention of 1925 applies to United Kingdom and Colonies, but not Dominions or India.

(As to coasting trade, see minutes of meeting of British and Japanese representatives, p. 397 of Treaty Handbook.)

Netherlands.

Treaty, 1824: Article 2 provides that Dutch subjects and vessels shall not pay, at British ports in the East, duties more than twice what British subjects and vessels pay, and vice versa; also that duties on imports and exports at a British port in Ceylon or India, on Dutch bottoms, shall not be more than twice the duties paid by British subjects and on British bottoms. (Applies to United Kingdom Possessions in Eastern Archipelago, India and Ceylon.)

Treaty, 1837: Article 1 most favoured nation (coasting trade not specifically mentioned). Applies to the United Kingdom and Irish Free State.

Convention of 1851, supplementing 1837 treaty; article 1 gives national treatment as regards dues on vessels from whatever place arriving, and as regards duties, charges, restrictions or prohibitions on goods imported or exported in the vessels of the parties. Article 3 provides that if either party restricts the privileges regarding commerce and navigation which it then granted by law, the other party may withdraw from the convention at six weeks' notice. (Applies to the United Kingdom and Irish Free State.)

(NOTE.—Our then existing law reserved the coasting trade of the United Kingdom and Possessions, but not the trade between them.)

Norway.

See Sweden.

Portugal.

Treaty, 1914. National treatment as regards “freedom to come, &c.” (article 1) and freedom to import and export goods and passengers to and from the parties’ “respective territories” on the vessels of the other (article 11). Most favoured nation in other respects (articles 3, 11, 13, 14). Article 12 reserves the parties’ right to confine to national vessels “the trade between any ports within its territories.”

Applies to Portugal, Madeira and Azores, but not to other Portuguese territories except on notice given (article 21).

Applies to United Kingdom and Newfoundland.

Spain.

Treaty, 1922. National treatment (articles 1, 14, 16 and 17), but coasting trade excepted, subject to most favoured nation (article 15).

Applies to United Kingdom, Canada and various Colonies.

Sweden.

Treaty, 1826 (with Sweden and Norway): most favoured nation (article 9). (Applies to United Kingdom, Dominions (except Australia), India, and all Colonies.)

Coasting trade is open on conditions of reciprocity under the Exchange of Notes of 1854 with Sweden and Norway, which applies to the United Kingdom and Irish Free State only.

United States of America.

Treaty, 1815. National treatment as regards duties and charges on vessels, but only in the United States of America and His Majesty’s territories in Europe (article 2). Reciprocal freedom for shipping to come to ports in the United States of America and British territories in Europe to which other foreigners are admitted, but subject to laws of the two countries (article 1). No provision giving unconditional most favoured nation for coasting trade; indeed, it is provided that United States ships are excluded from the coasting trade of various British territories (article 3).

Applies to United Kingdom, Irish Free State, India and Colonies in Europe and East Indies. The navigation of the St. Lawrence is opened to United States citizens, and of certain other rivers to British subjects and United States citizens, by the treaty of 1871 (article 26). Applies to United Kingdom and Canada.

Maritime Ports Convention, 1923.

Parties undertake, subject to reciprocity, to grant to each other’s vessels equality of treatment with their own vessels or those of any other State, in their maritime ports—as regards access, use of port, facilities, dues, &c.

The convention does not apply to maritime coasting trade; but the conference passed a resolution recommending that all States should refrain from inequitable economic measures, such as, in particular, an abusive extension of the scope of the maritime coasting trade (see Annex VI).

The convention has been ratified by twenty-three countries (Austria, Belgium, the United Kingdom, Newfoundland, Southern Rhodesia, and most British Colonies, &c., Australia (except dependencies), New Zealand (including Western Samoa), India, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Estonia, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Iraq, Italy, Japan, Netherlands, Norway, Siam, Sweden, Switzerland, Yugoslavia).

Act of Algeciras, 1906.

Article 69 provides that the coasting trade of Morocco shall (except as regards the carriage of certain sorts of animals) be open to vessels of all nationalities. The obligation is unilateral.

Annex III.

*Coasting Trade in the Dominions.*1. Existing Law.Australia.

The coasting trade is not reserved to British ships. British ships, in order to engage in the Australian coasting trade, have either (i) to obtain a licence and comply with Australian conditions as to wages, &c., or (ii) to obtain a permit which does not carry such conditions. All foreign ships have to obtain a licence on the lines of (i).

Canada.

The coasting trade is reserved to British ships.

India.

The coasting trade is open.

Irish Free State.

Coasting trade open.

[11921]

New Zealand.

The right to engage in the coasting trade is given to all nations, but vessels engaged in it must comply with New Zealand rates of wages and manning scale.

The Customs Law Act of 1908 provides that the Governor-General may by Order in Council, so far as treaty engagements permit, prohibit or restrict the engaging in coastwise trade in New Zealand by vessels of any country which prohibits or restricts British ships from engaging in its coastwise trade (cp. the United Kingdom Customs Consolidation Act of 1853, referred to in paragraphs 3 and 27 of the memorandum).

Union of South Africa.

Coasting trade open; but the South African Government retains the right to reserve it (see article 19 of the German-South African Treaty of 1928).

2. Contractual Obligations of the Dominions.

The following list comprises only treaties which provide for national treatment; those treaties which provide only for most favoured nation have not been included, as not being immediately relevant. (All the treaties enumerated contain exceptions for "coasting trade").

(a) Adherence of Dominions to United Kingdom Treaties.

Applies to—

Colombia and Venezuela, 1866 ...	Dominions, except Australia and India.
Germany, 1924 ...	Southern Rhodesia.
Italy, 1883 ...	Dominions (except Canada and certain ports of Australia and South Africa) and India.
Japan, 1911 ...	Canada, Irish Free State, Newfoundland.
Lithuania, 1922 ...	Irish Free State.
Netherlands, Supplementary Convention of 1851 ...	Irish Free State.
Nicaragua, 1905 ...	New Zealand, Irish Free State.
Persia, 1920 ...	Dominions (except Australia) and India.
Portugal, 1914 ...	Newfoundland.
Siam, 1925 ...	India.
Spain, 1922 ...	Canada.
Sweden and Norway, Exchange of Notes of 1854 ...	Irish Free State.
Turkey, 1930 ...	Southern Rhodesia.
Yugoslavia, 1927 ...	Southern Rhodesia.

(b) Independent Obligations of Dominions.

Canada and France: May 12, 1933. Coasting trade excluded. (Not yet in force; not ratified.)

Irish Free State and Germany: May 12, 1930 (similar to South Africa-Germany).

Irish Free State and France: June 23, 1931. Reciprocal most-favoured-nation treatment in regard to coasting trade. (Not yet ratified and not in force.)

The only case where a Dominion is under an independent obligation to grant national treatment in matters of navigation to a foreign country appears to be the South African-German Treaty of 1928; this contains an exception for "coasting trade."

1934

IRAQ

[E 541/274/93/1934]

No. 1.

[January 23, 1934.]

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, November 25, 1933.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir John Simon, to invite a reference to the opinion given to the Treasury on the 29th March last by the then Law Officers of the Crown in the matter of the date gardens in Iraq of the Sheikhs of Koweit and Mohammerah. Copies of the case submitted to them and of their opinion⁽¹⁾ are enclosed for convenience of reference (Paper A).

Date gardens in Iraq of Sheikhs of Koweit and Moham-merah.

2. In view of that opinion it has become necessary to consider whether it would be desirable to submit to arbitration the question whether the Iraqi Government are bound under their treaty obligations towards His Majesty's Government to assume responsibility for implementing the undertakings given in 1914 by His Majesty's Government to the two sheikhs. This question formed the subject of an opinion⁽²⁾ given by your predecessors to the Colonial Office in 1930, copies of which are enclosed (Paper B), but the situation has changed in certain respects since that opinion was given, and Sir John Simon is accordingly anxious to have the benefit of your opinion as to the prospects of such an arbitration in the circumstances as they now exist.

3. The most important change in the situation is that, while the arbitration contemplated in 1930 would have taken place under the treaty of the 10th October, 1922 (Paper C), the situation is now governed by the treaty of the 30th June, 1930 (Paper D), which, in accordance with article 7 thereof, has now replaced the treaty of 1922. It follows from this that the provision under which the case would have to be referred to arbitration would be article 10 of the 1930 treaty instead of article 17 of that of 1922, while the provision under which it would be contended that the obligations of His Majesty's Government towards the two sheikhs had devolved upon the Government of Iraq would be the second paragraph of article 8 of the later treaty instead of articles 10 and, possibly, 4 of the earlier one.

4. Under article 17 of the 1922 treaty, His Majesty's Government had a right to refer the present question to the Permanent Court of International Justice without the agreement of the Government of Iraq. The effect of article 10 of the 1930 treaty is that the dispute must be submitted either to the Council of the League of Nations or to some form of arbitration. For the purposes of this reference, Sir John Simon thinks that it may be assumed that the Iraqi Government would agree to the question being referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice, but, as Iraq has not signed the optional clause, the reference would have to be by special agreement and not by a unilateral written application (see article 40 of the statute of the court). The terms of a special agreement for this purpose would, of course, be a matter for negotiation with the Iraqi Government; but, before these negotiations are opened, Sir John Simon would be glad to know whether, in existing circumstances, you agree with the view expressed by your predecessors in 1930 that any reference to the Permanent Court should, if possible, be framed in the widest possible terms so as to cover all the grounds on which it might be held that the obligation to implement the undertakings given by His Majesty's Government to the two sheikhs has devolved on the Iraqi Government.

5. The question then arises whether those grounds have been affected by the developments which have occurred since 1930. As stated above, the relevant provision of the 1930 treaty is the second paragraph of article 8, which replaces article 10 of the 1922 treaty. Paragraph 3 of the reference by the Colonial Office to your predecessors, dated the 17th May, 1930,⁽¹⁾ shows that, while the under- given by His Majesty's Government to the two sheikhs were mentioned to the Iraqi Government after the signature of the 1922 treaty, they were not included in the list of the commitments referred to in article 10; and paragraph 4 of the same reference states what occurred in regard to these undertakings in connexion with the abortive treaty of 1927. After the signature of the 1930 treaty, but before its submission to the Iraqi Parliament, the British High Commissioner in Iraq addressed a note (Paper E) to the Iraqi Prime Minister, in which he referred to the method to be adopted for dealing with these commitments of His Majesty's Government in the list of international obligations devolving upon Iraq under article 8 of the new treaty, and he proposed, in the event of certain negotiations for the possession of the sheikhs' properties not having reached finality before the communication of this list to the Iraqi Government, to insert mention of these obligations towards the sheikhs in the list, but to append a footnote to the effect that, in the event of these negotiations proving unsuccessful, the question would need to be discussed further between the two Governments. The Iraqi Prime Minister replied on the same day (Paper F) that this procedure was acceptable to the Iraqi Government. Accordingly, on the 18th October, 1930, the High Commissioner addressed a letter to the Iraqi Prime Minister (Paper G) in which he referred to the correspondence of the 19th August and enclosed a list of "international instruments referred to in the second paragraph of article 8" of the new treaty, in which the undertakings entered into with the two sheikhs were included, with a footnote in the terms which had been agreed upon. It will be seen, therefore, that, while the undertakings given to the two sheikhs were never officially communicated to the Iraqi Government under article 10 of the 1922 treaty, and while the communication made in 1927 was in connexion with negotiations for a new treaty, which has never come into force, the obligations in question were included in the list officially communicated to the Iraqi Government of the commitments devolving on Iraq under article 8 of the 1930 treaty. To this extent the position of His Majesty's Government would seem to be stronger now than it was in 1930, though the effect of this communication, as showing that the obligations in question have now devolved upon the Government of Iraq, may be somewhat weakened by the statement that, in the event of the negotiations for purchase failing (as, in fact, they have so far done), the question would need to be discussed further between the two Governments.

⁽¹⁾ Confidential, 14468 No. 5B.⁽²⁾ Confidential, 13925, p. 15.

6. The reasons put forward in paragraph 5 of the reference to your predecessors of the 17th May, 1930, for suggesting that, apart altogether from the express provisions of any treaty, it might be possible to contend that the responsibility in respect of these undertakings had devolved on the Iraqi Government would appear to be unaffected by subsequent developments.

7. As regards the point suggested in paragraph 8 of that reference relating to the fact that the Sheikh of Kuwait is an independent sovereign, and consequently not subject to the jurisdiction of the Iraqi courts or authorities, the legal position of the sheikh remains what it was in 1930, but the Istihlak tax (see paragraphs 7 to 9 of the recent reference to you from the Treasury (Paper A)) is a tax of rather a different nature from the tax on the gardens which was under consideration by your predecessors in 1930, and levied in a different manner. It is for consideration whether any contention based on the international status of the sheikh could be supported in the case of the Istihlak tax, except in so far as it is levied on dates which never ceased to be the property of the sheikh. It may also be relevant that, in a case affecting the title to a small date garden (Bashiyeh) included in those the position of which is under consideration judgment was given recently against the sheikh in the Iraqi courts, without, so far as is known, his Excellency having either challenged the jurisdiction of the courts on the ground of his sovereign status or explicitly waived his immunity. Efforts, so far unsuccessful, have also been made to serve a writ on him in respect of the most important of the gardens (Faddaghiyeh). It should be made clear, however, that the acceptance of service without protest in the case of the small Bashiyeh garden appears to have been an isolated incident, which cannot, it is arguable, carry the weight of a long dealing extending over a course of years, much less operate as a bar to the sheikh's raising the question of sovereignty, and it should be added that, in the event of the suitors in respect of the Faddaghiyeh garden proving successful in their efforts to serve a writ on the sheikh in respect of that garden, his Excellency would be advised formally to raise a plea of sovereignty in the first place, and, if it is overruled, to submit to the jurisdiction of the Iraqi courts only under protest. In this connexion it may also be observed that, according to some writers, questions arising out of the ownership of land within the territory of a foreign State form an exception from the general immunity from process of a foreign sovereign.

⁽¹⁾ Confidential, 13925, p. 15.

8. There remains the question whether, in the event of an arbitration under the treaty of 1930, it would be possible to rely to any extent, should it be desired to do so, on the provisions of the treaty of 1922. On this point it is suggested that, in order to answer the question whether, under article 8 (2) of the treaty of 1930, the undertakings given to the sheikhs had devolved on Iraq, a court would have to go into the whole previous history of the matter, including what had taken place under the treaty of 1922, and, in particular, the position under article 10 of that treaty. In 1930 it was also proposed to rely to some extent upon article 4 of the 1922 treaty, and it is suggested that some use could still be made of this point, on the ground that Iraq had, during the currency of the 1922 treaty, been under an obligation to ask the advice of His Majesty's Government under article 4 with regard to these undertakings, and had failed to do so.

9. I have accordingly the honour to request you to be so good as to take the enclosed papers into your consideration and to favour Sir John Simon with your opinion upon the following points:—

- (1) Whether, in the event of the matter being submitted to arbitration, there would be a reasonable possibility of its being held that the Iraqi Government are bound to implement the undertakings given to the two sheikhs.
- (2) Whether, in any other respect, the opinion given by your predecessors in 1930 requires modification in the light of existing circumstances.

In dealing with the above questions, you will perhaps be so good as to give your opinion upon the force in the present circumstances of the different arguments suggested in the reference to your predecessors in 1930.

10. Sir John Simon would also be grateful for any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to offer.

I have, &c.

G. W. RENDEL.

List of Papers.

- Paper A: Treasury case submitted to Law Officers, and opinion (March 29, 1933) (E 1735/308/93/33).
 Paper B: Law Officers' opinion given to Colonial Office, 1930 (Confidential, 13925, p. 15).
 Paper C: Treaty of October 10, 1922 (Cmd. 2370).
 Paper D: Treaty of June 30, 1930 (Cmd. 3797).
 Paper E: High Commissioner for Iraq to the Iraqi Prime Minister, August 19, 1930 (Annex 1).
 Paper F: Iraqi Prime Minister to the High Commissioner for Iraq, August 19, 1930 (Annex 2).
 Paper G: High Commissioner for Iraq to the Iraqi Prime Minister, October 18, 1930 (Annex 3).

Report.

1. We answer this question in the affirmative, assuming as we do that the terms of reference will be framed in such a way as to render relevant all the arguments suggested to our predecessors in 1930. The letter addressed by the High Commissioner to the Iraqi Prime Minister of the 18th October, 1930, is an important addition to the material considered by our predecessors, thus strengthening the claim that the Iraqi Government is bound to implement the undertakings in question.

2. Apart from the necessary adjustment consequent upon the substitution of the treaty of 1930 for the treaty of 1922, the opinion of our predecessors does not appear to us, subject to the two points set out below, to require any modification in the light of existing circumstances:—

1934

24

IRAQ

- (i) We do not think any real point can now be made of article 4 of the treaty of 1922.
- (ii) We are doubtful whether it would be desirable or logical to include in the arbitration reference the question whether the Sheikh of Koweit as an independent Sovereign should hold the properties immune from taxation. This has nothing to do with the promises given in 1914. The authorities are not clear, and it seems to us rather a matter for the Sheikh of Koweit to take up.

The force of the different arguments suggested in the reference to our predecessors must depend upon the setting in which those arguments are presented. If the Government of Iraq can be persuaded to submit the question to arbitration under a special agreement drafted in the widest possible terms as suggested, we are of opinion that there is considerable force in the arguments suggested in paragraph 5 of the Colonial Office letter of the 17th May, 1930, addressed to our predecessors, and particularly in the second suggested argument. The arguments appear to us to derive additional force from the list of British international obligations in respect of Iraq mentioned in the memorandum drawn up at the time of the abortive negotiations for a treaty in 1927, and also from the letter to which we have previously referred in this opinion from the High Commissioner to the Iraqi Prime Minister of the 18th October, 1930.

3. Generally, we think that, in default of agreement, a reference to arbitration, even if the result was unfavourable, might improve His Majesty's Government's position with regard to claims for compensation by the sheikhs. It would help to show that His Majesty's Government had used its best endeavours to get the promises implemented by the State having sovereignty over the territories, and on one view this may be the full extent of the promises made, as the undertakings were clearly, we think, contingent on the British Government having the power as a result of the war to implement them.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
DONALD SOMERVELL.

*Law Officers' Department,
January 23, 1934.*

Annex 1 (Paper E).

Sir F. Humphrys to Iraqi Prime Minister.

(Confidential.)

Sir,

London, August 19, 1930.

IN the course of our conversations on the subject of the immunity from taxation enjoyed by the Sheikhs of Mohammerah and Koweit in respect of their date gardens in Iraq, your Excellency and I discussed the method of dealing with this matter in the list of international obligations devolving upon Iraq under article 8 of the Treaty of Alliance signed on the 30th June, 1930, which I have undertaken to communicate to your Excellency before the Iraq Parliament is invited to approve of the ratification of the treaty. As I have informed your Excellency, His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom approve of your proposal that the Iraq Government should open private negotiations with the sheikhs for the purchase of their properties in Iraq.

It is possible, however, that these negotiations may not have reached finality before the time comes for me to communicate the above list to the Iraq Government. In such event, His Majesty's Government propose to insert mention of the obligation towards the sheikhs in the list, but at the same time to append a footnote to the effect that private negotiations are proceeding with a view to the liquidation of this obligation, and that if these are unsuccessful the question will need to be discussed further between the two Governments.

IRAQ

25

I shall be glad to learn from your Excellency that this procedure will be acceptable to the Iraq Government.

I have, &c.

F. H. HUMPHRYS.

Annex 2 (Paper F).

Iraqi Prime Minister to Sir F. Humphrys.

London, August 19, 1930.

Sir,

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's letter of to-day's date, relative to the method of dealing, in the list of international obligations devolving upon Iraq under article 8 of the Treaty of Alliance signed on the 30th June, 1930, with the question of the immunity from taxation enjoyed by the Sheikhs of Mohammerah and Koweit in respect of their date gardens in Iraq.

I have the honour to inform your Excellency in reply that the procedure indicated in the second paragraph of your letter is acceptable to the Iraq Government.

I have, &c.

NOURY SAID.

Annex 3 (Paper G).

Sir F. Humphrys to Iraqi Prime Minister.

(Confidential.)

My dear Prime Minister,

Bagdad, October 18, 1930.

WILL you please refer to your Excellency's letter dated the 30th June, 1930, addressed to me on the occasion of the signature of the new Anglo-Iraq Treaty, asking to be furnished in due course with a complete list of the international instruments referred to in the second paragraph of article 8 of the treaty.

I have now received from His Britannic Majesty's Government a list of these instruments, of which I enclose a copy for your Excellency's information. His Britannic Majesty's Government desire me to explain that, although an exhaustive examination has been made of the various international instruments to which His Majesty's Government are a party, and which involves them in some degree of responsibility in respect of Iraq, it is possible, although unlikely, that the present list may not prove to be exhaustive, and that instruments which would properly fall within the category envisaged in the second paragraph of article 8 may later be found to have been overlooked.

I should also explain that only those instruments have been included in the accompanying list which might be held to involve a continuing obligation on the part of His Majesty's Government after the entry of Iraq into the League of Nations and thus to call for the process of substitution contemplated in the second paragraph of article 8, and that no instruments have been included creating obligations of such a character that they must, in so far as the responsibility of His Majesty's Government is concerned, terminate automatically upon the termination of the mandatory régime.

With regard to item 1 on the accompanying list, I would invite your Excellency's attention to the notes exchanged between your Excellency and myself on the 19th August on the subject of the immunity from taxation enjoyed by the Sheikhs of Mohammerah and Koweit in respect of their date gardens in Iraq.

Yours sincerely,

F. H. HUMPHRYS.

[11921]

E

List of International Instruments referred to in the second paragraph of Article 8 of the Anglo-Iraq Treaty of June 30, 1930.

1. Undertakings entered into with the Sheikhs of Koweit and Mohammerah in 1914 in respect of their date gardens in Iraq.⁽¹⁾
2. The San Remo Oil Agreement, the 25th April, 1920.
3. The Anglo-French Boundary Convention, the 23rd December, 1920.
4. The Treaty Settlement of Lausanne, the 24th July, 1923.
5. The Treaty of Angora, the 5th June, 1926.

⁽¹⁾ Private negotiations are proceeding with a view to the liquidation of this commitment. If these are un-successful, the question will need to be discussed further between the two Governments.

[W 1118/198/29/1934]

No. 2.

[January 30, 1934.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Foreign Office, January 16, 1934.

Gentlemen,
I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir John Simon, to request that you will be so good as to furnish him with your opinion on certain points which have arisen concerning the interpretation of the Anglo-Netherlands Treaty of 1824 relating to commerce with India and the East Indies, a copy of which is attached hereto (Paper A).

Anglo-Netherlands Treaty of 1824 : Interpretation of articles 2 and 3.

2. Article 2 of the treaty runs as follows :—

“The subjects and vessels of one nation shall not pay, upon importation or exportation, at the ports of the other in the Eastern seas, any duty at a rate beyond the double of that at which the subjects and vessels of the nation to which the port belongs, are charged.

“The duties paid on exports or imports at a British port, on the continent of India, or in Ceylon, on Dutch bottoms, shall be arranged so as, in no case, to be charged at more than double the amount of duties paid by British subjects, and on British bottoms.

“In regard to any article upon which no duty is imposed, when imported or exported by the subjects, or on the vessels, of the nation to which the port belongs, the duty charged upon the subjects or vessels of the other shall in no case exceed 6 per cent.”

It will be seen that the terms of this article do not relate to goods of British, Dutch or any other origin,⁽¹⁾ but to goods, of whatever origin, imported by British or Dutch subjects or on British or Dutch vessels, as the case may be. Thus, on the strict wording of the article, it seems that, so long as any duties imposed in a British territory to which the treaty applies are based solely on the origin of the goods and apply equally whether the goods are imported by a British or a Dutch subject, or on a British or Dutch vessel, no violation of article 2 can be involved, even if the rates of duties imposed on goods of Dutch origin should exceed those imposed on goods of British origin by more than the limits laid down in the article (viz., be more than double, or where goods of British origin are free, more than 6 per cent. ad valorem).

3. The Dutch Government are, however, now contending that, upon an interpretation resulting from subsequent diplomatic correspondence, article 2 of the treaty of 1824 prevents discrimination above the limits specified in the article between goods of British and Dutch origin. This correspondence is discussed in paragraph 6 et seq. below. The circumstances in which the present Dutch contention has been put forward are as follows :—

4. Discrimination in the matter of duties on imports based on the flag of the carrying vessel or on the nationality of the importer was the normal practice at the time of the treaty of 1824 (see further below paragraph 6 (i) and (ii)), but such discrimination has long since been abandoned in all British territories, and, indeed, almost universally, and the sole basis of differentiation now is, and for many years has been, the origin of the goods themselves. Until recently the duties imposed in India, Malaya, &c., on goods of Dutch origin (whatever the manner of carriage or import) have never been more than double the duties imposed on goods of British origin (or, where the latter entered free, more than 6 per cent.); indeed, the duties on goods of Dutch origin have in fact always been well within these limits. Thus, on any interpretation of article 2 of the treaty of 1824 the Dutch Government had no cause for complaint. But in the early part of last year the duties on certain classes of goods of foreign origin (including, of course, those of Dutch origin) imported into India and parts of Malaya were raised to a level such that the limits above referred to were exceeded (i.e., to more than double the duties imposed on goods of British origin, or where no duties were levied on the latter, to more than 6 per cent. ad valorem). Thereupon notes were received from the Netherlands Minister in London dated the 23rd May and the 13th June last, respectively, complaining that the new duties imposed in certain parts of Malaya and in India constituted an infraction of the treaty of 1824. Copies of these notes are attached (Papers B and C). A further note, dated the 5th July, was received in regard to India (copy attached, Paper D) and there have been subsequent notes asking for the favour of an early reply. The Netherlands Minister has been informed that the matter is being carefully considered by His Majesty's Government.

⁽¹⁾ The word “origin” here and subsequently is used to denote, in relation to goods, the country in which they are produced or manufactured. It is a question of construction whether the word “origin” in the diplomatic correspondence of the early part of last century, hereinafter to be referred to, bears the same meaning or some other meaning, such as, e.g., the country from which the goods are shipped, whether produced or manufactured there or not.

5. It will be seen that the Netherlands Minister bases himself, not on the literal meaning of article 2, but on an interpretation of it which he claims results from subsequent diplomatic correspondence between His Majesty's Government and the Dutch Government. He states that the former themselves insisted that the article related to goods (by which he means goods according to their origin), as well as to subjects and vessels, and that this view was finally accepted by the Dutch Government in 1836. (In all three of his notes the Netherlands Minister speaks of "British goods" and "Dutch goods." From the context it is clear he intends to denote goods of British and Dutch origin respectively.) The correspondence to which the Netherlands Minister refers started in 1825, and continued with intervals until 1836. It arose out of complaints by British merchants trading in the Dutch East Indies that the provisions of the treaty of 1824 were not being carried out by the Dutch Government. The exact nature of the contentions put forward by His Majesty's Government in their correspondence and of those ultimately accepted by the Dutch Government are questions on which your opinion is desired.

6. It will be seen that the correspondence (copies of which are attached, Paper E) is very confused and, at this distance of time, difficult to interpret with certainty. There are undoubtedly passages in it which appear to support the present Dutch contention, inasmuch as it was urged on the British side that article 2 of the treaty of 1824 was intended to apply to "British goods" and "Dutch goods," respectively. It seems clear that the term "British (Dutch) goods" was regarded as meaning or, at any rate, as covering "origin" in the sense in which the word was used at the time. This is evident from the context and from the use, in certain cases, of such terms as "British (Dutch) produce" and "British (Dutch) manufacture," or "goods imported from Holland" (see, e.g., Documents 8, 12 and 28 in Paper E). It is submitted, however, that it is difficult to base any certain argument, in the sense advanced by the Netherlands Minister, on the use of these terms or on the correspondence in general, for the following reasons:—

(i) The correspondence and the expressions used in it must be appreciated in the light of the conditions under which colonial trade was carried on at and about that time. Under the Navigation Acts of the United Kingdom and similar legislation of other colonial Powers, trade between a mother country and its colonies, or between different colonies of the same mother country, was, in general, restricted to vessels under the national flag, although such vessels might, of course, carry goods of any origin. This condition of affairs may have led to goods carried by a given vessel being identified with the nationality of the vessel or that of the shipper or importer, and it was natural and probably usual, at that time, to describe, e.g., as "British goods," goods produced or manufactured in any country whatever which had been collected for consignment in the United Kingdom and imported under the British flag. Shortly before the conclusion of the treaty of 1824, the restriction of colonial trade to national vessels began to be relaxed, and it then became necessary to conclude treaties whose object was to prevent, or at least to limit (as in the case of the 1824 treaty), discrimination against British ships and traders. Thus the primary considerations of commercial policy at this time were of a mercantile rather than of an industrial nature. For some time to come, and until the great development of British industrial output later in the century, the policy of His Majesty's Government in negotiating treaties applying to oriental territories was to secure rights for British ships and subjects rather than to obtain concessions relating to goods produced in the United Kingdom, as such.

(ii) It is suggested that the above-mentioned considerations are probably sufficient in themselves to explain the confusion of terms in the Anglo-Dutch correspondence of 1825-36, and the apparent identification of goods with the ships they were carried in, of which striking illustrations are afforded, e.g., in the fourth paragraph of Document 28 in Paper E, and again in Document 12 in which the writer, after speaking throughout of "British goods," ends by referring to "all that has been unjustly taken from our merchants upon import under the British flag."

(iii) That His Majesty's Government were not, in fact, intending to suggest any variation of the flag and nationality criterion laid down by the actual wording of article 2 of the treaty, seems clear from Documents 18, 19 and 23 in Paper E.

(a) Documents 18 and 19 may be read together, being the instructions given to the British Minister at The Hague, and the note based thereon addressed by him to the Dutch Government. This note was apparently written in reply to a Dutch note (Document 14), in the last paragraph of which the Dutch Government purported to give way to the British views, and spoke of the taxation of goods according to their origin. In Documents 18 and 19 (see especially Document 19, paragraphs 4 and 5) His Majesty's Government seem to state in clear and explicit language what they conceive to be the position resulting from the Dutch acquiescence. This statement (at any rate as embodied in paragraphs 4 and 5 of Document 19) says nothing about origin, or about British or Dutch goods, as such; it seems to relate solely to importations by British and Dutch subjects and vessels, and recites the rates which His Majesty's Government understand will be levied on such importations.

(b) Equally striking is the British note of the 12th April, 1836 (Document 23), which was apparently called forth by the instructions which, following on their apparent acceptance of the British views above referred to, the Dutch Government gave to their authorities in the East Indies. The gist of these instructions was communicated to His Majesty's Government in two notes (Documents 20 and 21), and the instructions themselves appear to have been promulgated by the Governor of the Dutch East Indies some weeks later (Document 22). These instructions, it will be seen, are directed to the taxation of goods, according to their origin, and an immediate protest against them was made by His Majesty's Government in the note of the 12th April, 1836, already referred to (Document 23), in which it was pointed out that flag and not origin was the proper criterion.

(iv) The British note of the 12th April, 1836 (Document 23), was replied to in a Dutch note of the 2nd May (Document 24), the exact meaning of which is very difficult to grasp. The significant thing is, however, that the views expressed in the British note of the 12th April, 1836 (Document 23), appear ultimately to have prevailed, for, after some further correspondence, the Dutch Government appear to acquiesce in them (see Document 29, especially the latter part) and the tariffs thereupon actually instituted in the Dutch East Indies were, it seems, based on the criterion of flag and not on that of origin (see Documents 30 and 31 in Paper E). Thus, at the conclusion of the correspondence when the Dutch had, as the Netherlands Minister now alleges (Paper B), accepted the British point of view, the tariffs instituted were in no way such as to bear out the present Dutch contention.

(v) If, therefore, as seems to be the case, His Majesty's Government were not, in the correspondence of 1825-36, purporting to do more than press for the literal application of article 2 of the treaty, it becomes pertinent to enquire in what way exactly the Dutch authorities were, according to His Majesty's Government, violating that article. While the correspondence is very confused on this point and many of the British notes extremely vague, there are certain passages which suggest that the dispute was not, as may appear at first sight, a dispute as to whether origin, or whether flag and nationality, constituted the true criterion to be applied under article 2 as regards the levying of duties on goods; but rather that it was a dispute as to whether "goods" in any shape or form were covered at all by article 2. It can be argued from parts of the correspondence (see, e.g., the Dutch notes, Documents 4 and 7 in Paper E) that the Dutch authorities had taken the view that article 2 did not, in referring to ships and subjects, refer to goods imported on those ships or by those subjects, but referred solely to the actual vessels and individuals and did no more than forbid the levying, above the specified limits, of such charges as port dues, landing charges, poll taxes, visa fees, &c. Thus, in the Dutch note of the 26th July, 1825, the Dutch Government refused to admit that their tariff was "En opposition avec le traité, qui ne limite que la différence à faire entre les pavillons respectifs, et laisse d'une part et d'autre une entière liberté pour la fixation des droits d'entrée pour les marchandises." In consequence, the Dutch apparently regarded themselves as free to levy any duties they pleased on goods, whatever their origin and whatever the nationality of the importer or flag of the importing vessel. The British argument, it is suggested, particularly as developed in Document 19 in Paper E (see especially the passages following on the textual quoting of the terms of article 2 of the treaty of 1824, about half-way through the note), was directed to showing that the wording of article 2 was quite inconsistent with any such limited interpretation and it is submitted that the correspondence, in spite of the loose language so liberally used in it, contains no clear or definite evidence that His Majesty's Government intended to go any further, or to claim that origin was the proper criterion to be applied; while Document 23 in Paper E (see subparagraph (iv) (b) above) tends to negative any such view.

7. From the fact (referred to in paragraph 6 (iv) above) that the tariffs finally introduced in the Dutch East Indies were, actually, based on flag, not origin, it appears that, even if the view suggested above is wrong, and His Majesty's Government had really been urging that article 2 of the treaty related to goods according to their origin instead of according to the nationality of the ship or importer, this contention was not accepted by the Dutch. No doubt countries which have entered into a treaty are entitled by subsequent diplomatic correspondence to elucidate the meaning of any article which may be obscure; and the interpretation so arrived at, if definite and clearly agreed upon, is thereafter binding on the parties. In the present case, however, whatever may have been urged on either side in the course of the correspondence, the actual result does not seem to have amounted to more than an agreement that article 2 of the treaty of 1824 did undoubtedly relate to duties on goods. But, having regard to the confused and often contradictory nature of the correspondence, and to the action, in fact, taken by the Dutch as a result of it, it hardly seems possible to maintain that any definite agreed interpretation was ever arrived at to the effect that article 2 related to goods according to their origin.

8. It is further suggested that, if His Majesty's Government were, indeed, purporting to argue that article 2 related to the origin of goods, they were, having regard to the clear wording of the article, urging, not a mere interpretation, but an actual variation of its terms. But it is submitted that only the clearest indication in the correspondence that such was the intention of the parties could operate to vary the clear terms of a treaty, and that the correspondence of 1825-36 was wholly inadequate to effect any such variation.

9. Your opinion is also desired on another point which has arisen in regard to the treaty of 1824. Tariffs similar to those recently introduced in India and the Straits Settlements, and of which the Netherlands Government are now complaining, have been established in the Federated and certain of the Unfederated Malay States, all of which came under British protection subsequent to the treaty of 1824. These States are under native rulers and subject to British protection, but His Majesty does not claim sovereignty or jurisdiction there. Nevertheless, it is evident from the Netherlands Minister's first note (Paper B) that he regards the treaty of 1824 as applying to them. The relevant provisions of the treaty in this connexion are as follows:—

"His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and His Majesty the King of the Netherlands, desiring to place upon a footing, mutually beneficial, their respective possessions and the commerce of their subjects in the East Indies, . . .

"Article 1. The high contracting parties engage to admit the subjects of each other to trade with their respective possessions in the Eastern Archipelago, and on the continent of India, and in Ceylon, upon the footing of the most favoured nation; their respective subjects conforming themselves to the local regulations of each settlement.

"2. The subjects and vessels of one nation shall not pay, upon importation or exportation, at the ports of the other in the Eastern seas, any duty at a rate beyond the double of that at which the subjects and vessels of the nation to which the port belongs, are charged.

"The duties paid on exports or imports at a British port, on the continent of India, or in Ceylon, on Dutch bottoms, shall be arranged so as, in no case, to be charged at more than double the amount of duties paid by British subjects, and on British bottoms.

"In regard to any article upon which no duty is imposed, when imported or exported by the subjects, or on the vessels, of the nation to which the port belongs, the duty charged upon the subjects or vessels of the other shall in no case exceed 6 per cent.

"3. The high contracting parties engage, that no treaty hereafter made by either with any native Power in the Eastern seas shall contain any article tending, either expressly, or by the imposition of unequal duties, to exclude the trade of the other party from the profits of such native Power; and that if, in any treaty now existing on either part, any article to the effect has been admitted, such article shall be abrogated upon the conclusion of the present treaty.

"It is understood that, before the conclusion of the present treaty, communication has been made by each of the contracting parties to the other, of all treaties or engagements subsisting between each of them, respectively, and any native Power in the Eastern seas; and that the like communication shall be made of all such treaties concluded by them, respectively, hereafter."

10. It will be seen that, so far as the preamble and article 1 are concerned, only "possessions" are covered. There is no doubt that a protected State is not a possession, and this view has been maintained by His Majesty's Government in the past. Natives of territories under protection are not British subjects, but only British-protected persons. Further, the powers of His Majesty in respect of such territories are normally regulated and determined by treaty with the native ruler. The question was considered in 1909 in regard to the interpretation of the terms colony and possession in the Anglo-Paraguayan Treaty of 1884. A memorandum prepared in the Foreign Office at the time is attached (Paper F). It will be seen that the conclusion reached was that a protectorate was not a colony or possession, and various opinions of former Law Officers of the Crown are referred to as tending to support this view. The Paraguayan Government were accordingly informed that the treaty of 1884 was not applicable to protectorates. The same view was maintained in 1926 regarding the question whether the Aden protectorate came within the meaning of article 2 of a treaty with Italy concluded in 1883 referring to "Her Britannic Majesty's dominions and possessions." If a protectorate is not a possession à fortiori a protected State is not one either.

11. The same view is apparently taken by the Netherlands Government in regard to these same Malay States, for in April 1918 a note from the Netherlands Minister was received (attached, Paper G) arguing that British protectorates were not covered by article 18 of the Anglo-Dutch Extradition Treaty of 1898. This article provided that the treaty should be applicable to the "colonies and foreign possessions" of the high contracting parties. The Dutch accordingly asked for the conclusion of a special extradition agreement regarding the Federated Malay States, and this was done.

12. It should also be noticed that article 2 of the 1824 treaty only appears to apply to ports in places "belonging" to the party concerned, i.e., possessions.

13. It seems less clear, however, that the Malay States are not covered by article 3 of the Anglo-Netherlands Treaty of 1824 (supra, paragraph 9) on the assumption that, under the treaties at present in force with the native rulers, His Majesty's Government are in a position to control the tariff policy of these States. It should be noticed that article 3 is different from article 2, inasmuch as it appears to be directed against anything "tending, either expressly, or by the imposition of unequal duties, to exclude . . . trade," whereas article 2 merely prevents the imposition of duties above a specified limit. Article 3 also applies to "trade" (i.e., Dutch trade or British trade), and this might mean either origin or flag, or both, though it is possible that on this point article 3 was intended to have the same effect as article 2, whatever that may be.

14. It is clear that the literal terms of article 3 do not do more than forbid the conclusion by one party to the 1824 treaty of agreements with native rulers containing articles tending, either expressly, or by the imposition of "unequal duties" to "exclude" the "trade" of the other party. It is, further, the fact that no treaty between His Majesty's Government and the ruler of a Federated Malay State contains any stipulation having as its object, or as its necessary result, the exclusion of Dutch trade. The native rulers, however, have agreed to accept the advice of His Majesty's Government on commercial matters, and the question therefore arises whether, if His Majesty's Government may not by treaty bind any native ruler to introduce measures tending to exclude Dutch trade, it would not equally be contrary to article 3 of the treaty of 1824 for His Majesty's Government to cause or allow such measures to be taken.

15. It may, of course, be argued that, in so far as article 3 is directed against the imposition of unequal duties, the tariffs until recently imposed in the Federated Malay States on goods of Dutch origin, while not exceeding the limits specified in article 2 of the treaty, have undoubtedly for a long time past been "unequal" in the sense that a preference has been accorded to goods of British origin, and yet the Dutch Government have never till now alleged any violation of the treaty. It may in consequence be possible to maintain that they have tacitly admitted that no circumstances have yet arisen bringing into operation the terms of article 3 of the treaty in respect of the Malay States. It is noticeable that, while the Netherlands Minister in his notes complains of the new tariffs in the Malay States, he does so not on the basis of article 3, but exclusively on the basis of article 2, which, however, appears to apply only to possessions in the strict sense. It must not, however, be overlooked that the emphasis in article 3 must probably be laid on the words "tending . . . to exclude," and that it is only in the event of duties being so unequal that they amount to an exclusion that any violation of the article will occur, i.e., that the question is one of degree. This may explain why the Dutch have not until now complained of the duties in the Malay States, which, although unequal, have not hitherto been so unequal as to exclude. Possibly, in the Dutch view, the criterion of what duties will amount to an exclusion under article 3 is that indicated by article 2, viz., double duties, or, where no duties are charged, 6 per cent.; so that it would only be now, upon the introduction of the recent tariffs, that a case for complaint in regard to the Malay States would arise. Even on this view, however, it is difficult to see why the Dutch case is based not on article 3, but exclusively on article 2, which has no application to the Malay States. Moreover, it does not necessarily follow that double duties would tend to exclude, as the level of the duty is only one of the factors to be taken into account, among others being the relative competitive positions of the industries concerned.

16. His Majesty's Government and the Dutch Government are both parties to the Optional Clause, and the questions dealt with herein may therefore eventually be referred for decision to the Permanent Court of International Justice. Sir John Simon would accordingly be grateful if you would take the above matters into your consideration and if you would furnish him with your opinion on the following points:—

- (1) Whether, on its strict textual interpretation, there is anything in article 2 of the Anglo-Netherlands Treaty of 1824 to prohibit the introduction, in any British territories to which the article applies, of tariffs on goods of Dutch origin at rates in excess of those specified in the article, viz., more than double those on goods of British origin, or, where these enter free, more than 6 per cent. ad valorem, assuming, of course, that such tariffs are based solely on the origin of the goods and do not involve any differentiation in respect of the nationality of the importer or the flag of the importing vessel, i.e., that the same rates are charged on all goods of Dutch origin, whether imported by Dutch, British or other vessels or importers.
- (2) If the answer to (1) is in the negative, whether the subsequent correspondence and action of the parties to the 1824 treaty amounted to an agreed interpretation or modification of article 2 such as to prohibit the introduction of differential tariffs of the kind specified in the preceding question.
- (3) Whether, apart from article 3, there is anything in the treaty to render it (and in particular article 2) applicable in respect of protected States.

- (4) Whether, on the assumption that the British treaties with rulers of the Malay States, while containing no specific provision of the kind mentioned in article 3, have the effect of enabling His Majesty's Government to control the tariff policy of these States, it would be contrary to article 3 for His Majesty's Government to cause or allow the local ruler to take measures of a kind against which the article is directed.
- (5) If the answer to (4) is in the affirmative, (a) whether article 3 is directed against all tariffs other than equal tariffs, or whether it is only directed against tariffs tending by their inequality actually to exclude, and, in the latter event, whether the question of what rates tend to exclude is a question of fact to be determined by all the circumstances of the particular case (see end of paragraph 15 above), or whether it can be held to have been the intention of the parties that rates should be regarded as tending to exclude when and if (and only if) they exceed those specified in article 2, viz., are more than double, or, where there is free entry, more than 6 per cent. ad valorem; (b) whether the differentiation against which article 3 is directed is intended to be differentiation based on the origin of the goods or discrimination based on the flag of the importing vessel or nationality of the importer.

17. Sir John Simon would also be glad of any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to make, and if in this connexion you would take into consideration a telegram from the Government of India, dated the 15th August last, a copy of which is attached (Paper H).

18. In view of the time which has elapsed since the Netherlands Minister's original notes, Sir John Simon would be grateful if this matter could be treated as one of urgency.

I have, &c.

A. W. A. LEEPER.

List of Papers.

- A.—Text of Anglo-Netherlands Treaty of 1824. [Treaty 206.]
- B.—Note from Netherlands Minister of the 23rd May, 1933 [W 5835/5835/29].
- C.—Note from Netherlands Minister of the 13th June, 1933 [W 7075/5835/29].
- D.—Note from Netherlands Minister of the 5th July, 1933 [W 8010/5835/29].
- E.—Correspondence 1825-36 [W 314/198/29/1934].
- F.—Foreign Office memorandum of the 25th January, 1909 [2861/1909].
- G.—Note from Netherlands Minister of the 11th April, 1918 [64993/1918].
- H.—Telegram from Government of India to Secretary of State for India of the 15th August, 1933 [W 9583/5835/29].

Report.

- (1) No.
- (2) The correspondence is confused and inconclusive, and in our opinion it does not amount to an agreed interpretation or modification of article 2. Without going into the earlier letters, the Dutch Minister, in his letter of the 29th April, 1836, states his willingness to accept the consequences of the view that the words "subject and ships" should represent merchandise (bottom of p. 2). Lord Palmerston, in his note of the 5th June, 1836, characterised this as nonsensical. In consequence of Lord Palmerston's note, a further communication is made by Sir Edward Disbrowe on the 29th July, 1836, expressing dissatisfaction with the orders issued and asking that they should be in strict and literal accordance with the second article of the treaty. Document 30, which is communicated to Lord Palmerston by Sir Edward Disbrowe on the 16th December, 1836, indicates that the duties, in fact, being charged were based on the flag without reference to origin.
- (3) No.
- (4) On the whole, yes. The question is whether "unequal duties tending to exclude" would be a breach of the article if imposed not expressly by a treaty, but through powers obtained under a treaty. On the strict letter of the article there would not have been a breach, but we think an International Court would construe the article more broadly and would hold that unequal duties imposed as the result of the control of tariff policy exercised by His Majesty's Government by virtue of a treaty would be within this article.

[11921]

F

In the English translation, the word "profits" should presumably be "ports"; the Dutch word is "havens."

(5)—(a) We think article 3 is directed against tariffs tending actually to exclude, and that whether a tariff or tariffs tend to exclude is a question of fact to be decided in all the circumstances of the case. We do not think the inequalities allowed under article 2 could be taken as a definite criterion. They could be looked at as showing an inequality which both sides were prepared to accept as reasonable for their own territories, but it would be possible to show that greater inequalities did not tend to exclude; whereas in certain circumstances less inequalities might do so. The evidence would, we think, have to show some substantial exclusion.

(b) This is a difficult question. It depends on the construction of the words "duties" and "the trade" of the other party. On the one hand, these words can be construed with reference to article 2, which indicate on this view the "trade" which it was the intention of the parties to protect and the duties which it was intended to cover, i.e., trade by nationals and in national vessels, and duties directed against trade as so defined. This argument is perhaps re-enforced by the word "ports." On the other hand, it could be said that the words are quite general and should receive a general meaning. The difficulty of this latter contention is to give any satisfactory definition of what "the trade" of the United Kingdom or Holland does mean if article 2 is disregarded. Does it mean trade in goods of British or Dutch origin or trade in British or Dutch ships, or trade by British or Dutch merchants and dealers?

We think, on the whole, that article 2 would be looked at to see what "duties" are contemplated in article 3 and what trade was intended to be covered. The answer to the question therefore is that the differentiation contemplated is differentiation based on the flag of the vessel or nationality of the importer.

In view of our opinion, the point suggested by the Government of India does not arise. The fact that in the letter of the 25th December, 1835, the Dutch Government express their willingness to modify their practice only "aussi longtemps que l'industrie de ses sujets n'exigera pas une protection plus efficace" is no doubt important if the Dutch Government continue to seek to rely on the correspondence.

T. W. H. INSKIP.

DONALD SOMERVELL.

*Law Officers' Department,
January 30, 1934.*

[E 5011/2369/91/1934]

No. 3.

[July 31, 1934.]

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, July 23, 1934.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir John Simon, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list, and to request the favour of your opinion on the subject of the rights claimed by Persia in the Archipelago of Bahrein.

Bahrein:
Persia's rights of sovereignty or suzerainty.

2. Bahrein is a small archipelago lying on the Arabian littoral of the Persian Gulf and almost land-locked by the Arabian province of Hasa in the dominions of Ibn Saud, the ruler of Saudi Arabia, and by the Peninsula of Qatar, which is the territory of the independent Arab Sheikh of Qatar. The population of Bahrein is essentially Arab by race, though since the beginning of the present century there has been a considerable influx of Persian nationals.

3. The archipelago is of considerable commercial importance. The pearl banks by which it is surrounded make it the centre of a pearl trade which, in good years, is of very considerable dimensions, while oil has recently been discovered there. Its strategic position in the centre of the Persian Gulf, always important, has become still more so of late years with the development of the air route to India and the possibility that it may be desirable to use the island as a British naval station.

4. A historical memorandum prepared by the India Office, and dealing in detail with the history of Bahrein both before and after 1783 is attached (Paper A). It is conceived that the answers to the question as to which your advice is desired will depend almost entirely on the view taken of the historical facts there set out, and it has therefore been thought necessary to state those facts in detail. The situation may, however, be summarised as follows:—

5. The sheikhdom was for some time prior to 1783 under Persian rule. The Persians were in that year driven out of the islands by Arabs from the mainland of Arabia under the leadership of the direct ancestor of the present ruling house, in whom sovereignty has rested since that date. Claims to sovereignty, or possibly in some cases suzerainty, over Bahrein have repeatedly been preferred by Persia since 1783. They were also preferred by Turkey (suzerain up to the war of the adjoining mainland) with great insistence on a number of occasions between 1847 and 1913, in which latter year the Turkish Government finally recognised the independence of the island; and they have been put forward in the past by Muscat; by Egypt; and by the Wahabi Amirs of the Arab mainland. Tribute was last certainly paid to Persia in 1799. It has at one time or other between 1800 and 1870 been paid also to Muscat, to Egypt, and to the Wahabi Amirs, although in the case of the last-named, at any rate in the more recent period, possibly only in respect of possessions on the mainland of Arabia. Bahrein, at least since 1820, has consistently been regarded as independent by His Majesty's Government, who have been in special treaty relations with its rulers on that basis since that date. Those treaty relations (which have throughout involved contingent liabilities for protection) were strengthened in 1861, while by engagements contracted in 1880 and 1892 the ruling house have undertaken obligations which place their external relations in the hands of His Majesty's Government and preclude them from ceding territory save to, or with the consent of, His Majesty's Government.

6. In 1927, 1928 and 1929 important notes were exchanged between His Majesty's Government and the Persian Government in regard to the latter's claim to Bahrein, of which copies have been communicated to the Secretary-General of the League of Nations for communication to the States Members of the League. Copies of these notes are attached as Paper B. On five other occasions since 1927 the Persian Government have addressed protests to the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, or communicated to him copies of protests against alleged violations of their sovereignty, which they claim over the Bahrein Islands. Copies of the Persian Government's letters to the Secretary-General of the League are attached as Papers C-G. In the first four of these latter cases, His Majesty's Government thought it unnecessary to return replies. In the case of the latest Persian protest (Paper G), His Majesty's Government have drawn the attention of the Secretary-General to their notes to the Persian Government of January 1928 and February 1929 (see Paper B) and requested him to circulate this reply to the Members of the League. In January 1933, the International Bureau of the Universal Postal Union circulated to the members of the union a protest from the Persian postal authorities regarding the proposed issue of Indian postage stamps, surcharged "Bahrein," and in April the bureau circulated the reply of the Indian postal authorities (Paper H).

1934

7. On political and strategical grounds it is regarded as of the first importance to retain the status quo in Bahrein and to continue to reject the claims put forward by Persia. His Majesty's Government, however, are anxious, to enable them to consider how best to deal with any further assertion of the Persian claim, for the advice of the Law Officers as to whether Persia possesses any rights in Bahrein.

8. While the Persian claim has been asserted with great insistence over a very long period of years, the grounds adduced in support of it have varied from time to time and have never been stated by the Persian Government in any very great detail. The fullest expression of the Persian attitude is that contained in the notes of the 26th November, 1927, and the 2nd August, 1928. The various arguments which, from time to time, Persia has advanced in support of her claim are as follows:—

- (1) The history of the islands prior to 1783. Persia contends that an appeal to history shows that prior to this date the islands were from a remote period subject, and tributary, to her.
- (2) The absence of Persian consent to the detachment of Bahrein, admittedly at one stage prior to 1783 a Persian possession, from Persia; and the fact that Persia has never recognised the islands as independent and has consistently urged a claim to them.
- (3) Certain provisions of the treaty (unratified and disavowed by both parties) concluded between Captain Bruce, Political Resident in the Persian Gulf, and the Minister of the Prince Governor of Shiraz, in 1892.
- (4) A gold coin alleged to have been struck at Bahrein in 1817.
- (5) Payment by Bahrein at various stages of "peeshkesh," offerings, or tribute to Persia.
- (6) Flying of the Persian flag by the Sheikh of Bahrein.
- (7) Letters from past rulers of Bahrein admitting Persian suzerainty.
- (8) A note addressed by His Majesty's Government in April 1869 to the Persian Minister in London.
- (9) Closeness of relations at the present day between Persia and Bahrein.

9. The arguments referred to in the preceding paragraph are briefly examined in paragraphs 147-152 of the historical memorandum (Paper A) attached, which suggests the conclusion that they afford no solid basis for a Persian claim to sovereignty or suzerainty over the Island of Bahrein.

10. Apart from the arguments based on historical events, the only important legal consideration which has been advanced by the Persian Government in support of their claim is that contained in paragraph 2 of the note addressed by the Acting Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs to His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Tehran on the 2nd August, 1928 (p. 4, Paper B). You will observe that a detailed reply to this argument was made in paragraphs 5-8 of the note addressed by Sir Austen Chamberlain to the Persian Minister in London on the 18th February, 1929 (pp. 8 and 9, Paper B). Reference may also be made in this connexion to the article entitled "Sovereignty, Seisin and the League" by Sir John Fischer Williams (British Yearbook of International Law, 1926, p. 24).

11. I have accordingly the honour to request you to take the enclosed papers into your consideration, and to advise, in the light of the facts stated in the historical memorandum (Paper A), the various arguments which have been employed on either side in the course of the discussion of this question, and of any other considerations which may appear to you to be relevant, whether, in your opinion, Persia possesses any rights in or over Bahrein, and if so what the nature of those rights is.

12. The question of the future policy of His Majesty's Government in regard to Persia, as to which the Ministerial Middle East Sub-Committee may have to take important decisions at any moment, may be to a considerable extent dependent upon the nature of your opinion on the above point, and Sir John Simon would therefore be grateful if it were possible for you to furnish your opinion at a very early date.

I have, &c.
G. W. RENDEL.

List of Papers.

- (A) Historical memorandum prepared by India Office.
- (B) Notes exchanged with Persian Government between 1927 and 1929.
- (C) Letter from Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs to Secretary-General of the League of Nations, dated the 13th January, 1929, communicating copy of note to His Majesty's Minister at Tehran.
- (D) Copy of letter from Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs to Secretary-General of the League of Nations, dated the 17th January, 1930.
- (E) Copy of letter from Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs to Secretary-General of the League of Nations, dated the 24th July, 1930, enclosing copy of note to His Majesty's Minister at Tehran, dated the 23rd July, 1930.
- (F) Letter from M. Sepahbodi, Persian representative to the League of Nations, to Secretary-General of the League of Nations, dated the 14th October, 1932.
- (G) Letter from Secretary-General of the League of Nations, dated the 12th June, 1934, communicating copy of note from Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs to United States Minister at Tehran, dated the 22nd May, 1934.
- (H) Two circular letters from the Director of the International Bureau of the Universal Postal Union, dated the 26th January, 1933, and the 20th April, 1933, communicating a protest from the Persian postal authorities and the reply of the Indian postal authorities respectively.

Report.

The Persian claim to sovereignty over Bahrein appears to be based upon the view that from time immemorial the islands were Persian territory, and that by virtue of the fact that Persia has never expressly recognised their independence, coupled with various assertions of sovereign right on the part of Persia, and of admissions from time to time of the Persian claims on the part of the rulers of Bahrein and of His Majesty's Government, Persian sovereignty has never been lost.

The facts as narrated in the historical memorandum prepared by the India Office do not, in our opinion, support this view. There is no satisfactory evidence of any kind that at any date before 1783 Bahrein was incorporated in Persian territory. The most that can be said is that there was a period of Persian occupation at the beginning of the 17th century, and that for a short period in the 18th century a de facto control was exercised by a Persian Governor. Whether this control ever acquired the character of de jure sovereignty may be doubted, but, in our opinion, the expulsion of the Persian garrison in 1783 never to return makes it impossible to rely upon what had happened before that event.

The later history of Persian claims to sovereignty over the islands affords no evidence of any recognition either by His Majesty's Government or by any other sovereign power of Bahrein as Persian soil. The Bruce Treaty of 1822 cannot be relied on, while the three treaties of 1809, 1814 and 1857 appear to us to be wholly silent as to Persian rights over Bahrein. The British note of 1869 is the high-water mark of any admission of Persian rights. Even this note, however, falls far short of a recognition of sovereignty, and nothing said or done thereafter gives any support to Persian claims.

[11921]

G

1934

38

PERSIA

Even if Persia were able as a matter of historical fact to show that Bahrein had been Persian territory prior to 1783, the fact that she has never expressly recognised Bahrein's independence affords, in our view, no foundation for her present claim. We agree with the arguments on this point in paragraphs 5 to 8 of Sir Austen Chamberlain's letter of the 18th February, 1929.

Upon a review of all the facts as stated in the memorandum and of the arguments advanced in the course of the correspondence in recent years, we are of opinion that Persia has no rights, either of sovereignty or suzerainty, in or over Bahrein.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
D. B. SOMERVELL.

Law Officers' Department,
July 31, 1934.

39

Paper A.

CONFIDENTIAL.

INDIA OFFICE.

P.Z. 4718/1934.

HISTORICAL MEMORANDUM ON BAHREIN.

INDEX.

	PARAS.	PAGES
I. Geographical situation - - - - -	1-2	1
II. Bahrein prior to 1783 - - - - -	3-4	1
Summary - - - - -	5	2
III. 1783-1820. From the expulsion of the Persians to the conclusion of the Treaty of 1820 with His Majesty's Government - - - - -	6-18	3
Summary - - - - -	19	6
IV. 1820-30 - - - - -	20-25	6
Summary - - - - -	26	8
V. 1830-40 - - - - -	27-35	8
Summary - - - - -	36	10
VI. 1840-50 - - - - -	37-58	11
Summary - - - - -	59	16
VII. 1850-61 - - - - -	60-71	16
Summary - - - - -	72	19
VIII. 1861-67 - - - - -	73-75	20
Summary - - - - -	76	20
IX. Discussions and Incidents, 1868-70 - - - - -	77-97	20
Review of discussions of 1868-70 - - - - -	98	27
X. 1870-80 - - - - -	99-108	28
Summary - - - - -	109	30
XI. 1880-92. From the conclusion of the First to the conclusion of the Second Exclusive Agreement with Her Majesty's Government - - - - -	110-115	30
Summary - - - - -	116	31
XII. 1892-1913. From the Second Exclusive Agreement to the Anglo-Turkish Convention of 1913 - - - - -	117-129	31
Summary - - - - -	130	34
XIII. 1913-34 - - - - -	131-144	34
XIV. Conclusion - - - - -	145-153	37-46
A. Claims to or assertions of sovereignty over Bahrein, 1783 to 1934 - - - - -	146	37-38
B. Basis of the Persian claim - - - - -	147-148	38-44
Review of Persian claim - - - - -	149-152	44-45
C. Attitude of His Majesty's Government, 1820-1934 - - - - -	153	45-46

India Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

P.Z. 4718/1934.

Historical Memorandum on Bahrein.

[The Memorandum which follows deals with the history of Bahrein from the point of view primarily of the political status of the islands at various periods and in particular with the claims to sovereignty over them put forward by Persia at various dates since 1783, and with the correspondence and discussions which have taken place in connection with such claims.]

The principal authorities quoted, apart from original despatches and letters, are the following:—

- (1) Lorimer: "Gazetteer of the Persian Gulf."
- (2) Selections from "Records of the Government of Bombay," Vol. XXIV (1856).
- (3) Aitchison: "Treaties" (1933 Edition), Vols. XI (Persian Gulf) and XIII (Persia).
- (4) "Précis of Correspondence regarding the Affairs of the Persian Gulf" (1801 to 1853), by J. A. Saldanha (1906).
- (5) Sir A. T. Wilson: "The Persian Gulf" (1928).
- (6) Curzon: "Persia."
- (7) Hertslet: "Memorandum on the separate Claims of Turkey and Persia to sovereignty over Bahrein" (1874).
- (8) P.G. 13: "Historical Summary of Events affecting the British Position in the Persian Gulf, 1907-28."

I.—Geographical Situation.

1. The Principality of Bahrein consists of the archipelago formed by the islands of Bahrein, Muharraq, Umm Na'asan, Sitra, and Nabi Salih, and by a number of lesser islets and rocks. Taken altogether these form a compact group almost in the middle of the V-shaped gulf on the Arabian littoral of the Persian Gulf which divides the independent Arab Trucial Sheikdom of Qatar from the coast of Qatif in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia.

Lor. II, 234.

2. The term "Bahrein" formerly embraced the promontory of Qatar and the oases of Qatif and Hasa on the Arabian mainland, as well as the islands of the archipelago, and, according to Lorimer, "some authorities would attribute to it in the past an even more extended application, affirming that it once denoted the whole western side of the Persian Gulf from Ruus-al-Jibal to the mouth of the Shatt-el-Arab."

Lor. II, 233.

II.—Bahrein prior to 1783.

3. The very conflicting evidence available goes to show that Bahrein was subject to Persian rule for a period in the early part of the Christian era, and between A.D. 615 and 723. It is stated to have been conquered by one Keshan bin Abdul Malik, and to have come under the sway of the Oommiyyad Caliphs, in the latter year, and to have remained under the control of the Caliphs until the close of the Abbaside dynasty in the 11th century, when it again became subject to chiefs of its own race. Its mediæval history is obscure, but a writer who visited the islands in A.D. 1051 refers to the fact that half of the pearls taken in Bahrein belong to the Chiefs of Hasa on the Arab mainland. Idrisi, the Arab geographer, writing about a century later, states

Bombay
Selections,
XXIV, 23.
G. of I.
Desp. No. 18
of 22.2.1870,
para. 2.
Wilson,
Persian Gulf,
pp. 85-6.

Wilson,
88-90.

that the island "is governed by an independent chief. The inhabitants of the two shores are satisfied with his justice and piety, and when he dies he is replaced by a person of equal virtue and piety." It was conquered about 1320 by the (Arab) rulers of Hormuz, a kingdom finally subdued by the Portuguese in 1506, but which appears to have been tributary to Persia in at any rate its later days. Bahrein appears at the same date to have fallen under Portuguese control. The Persians have adopted in a recent Note on the subject a statement that it remained under Portuguese control from 1507 to 1622. It would appear, however, that there are at any rate some breaks in the continuity of Portuguese control. An agreement of 1515 between the Portuguese and the Persians, under which the King of Hormuz was to be "ruler of Hormuz in the name of King Dom Manuel, his Lord," provided inter alia that Portuguese shipping should be available to enable the Persians to invade Bahrein and Qatif. In 1522 a revolt stimulated by the King of Hormuz broke out against the Portuguese at Bahrein among other places, but was quelled, and in 1528 endeavours by the Portuguese to quell a subsequent rebellion in Bahrein against the King were beaten off. In 1559 it was temporarily occupied by the Turks, who were, however, driven out by the Portuguese in the same year. In 1602 the Portuguese were forcibly expelled from the islands by the Persians. The Persian occupation was of uncertain duration, and in their Note of 2nd August 1928 they refer to 1622 as the date on which Persia regained possession of Bahrein. They appear in any event to have had a military depôt in Bahrein in 1622. Curzon states that "the Portuguese . . . in 1625 concluded a treaty with Shah Abbas, by which they restored to him all his coast possessions, retaining only the pearl banks at Bahrein. . . ."

4. In or about 1718 the islands were occupied by the Arabs of Muscat, who, however, appear to have maintained their occupation for a short time only. It is not clear whether at the date of this attack the islands were derelict or whether they were held by a Persian garrison. About 1753 the Ruler under the Persian Government of the town of Bushire made a descent upon Bahrein, the chief resident tribe in which (the Huwalah Arabs—at the present day still strongly represented in the islands) was seriously divided by internal feuds, and established his authority there. In this manner the islands again became, at least in name, dependent on Persia. In 1782 the Arabs of Zubarah, on the Arabian mainland, efforts to reduce which had been made by the Governor of Bahrein under the Persians in the years immediately preceding that date, retaliated by a descent on the island of Bahrein. They defeated the Persian Governor, drove him to his fort, plundered and destroyed the town of Manama, and took possession of a Bushire vessel, with which they retired to Zubarah. A counter attack was repulsed, and in the following year the Uttabi Arabs of Zubarah, assisted by contingents from various tribes of Qatar, occupied the Bahrein islands, the Persian garrison of the Manama Fort capitulating on 28th July 1783, after a siege of about two months' duration, and being allowed to return to Bushire.

Summary.

5. It will be seen that while the history of Bahrein prior to 1783 is very obscure, it would appear that Persia for not inconsiderable periods exercised control over the islands. The nature of that control is not, however, very clear; it seems probable that it was only very rarely of a definite character; and even in more recent periods

Wilson, 105.

Wilson, 116.

Wilson, 121.

Wilson, 124.

Lor. I, 841.

Wilson, 140.

Lor. I, 836.

Curzon,
Persia, II,
419.

Lor. I, 837.

Lor. I, 839-
40.

Persian relations with the islands were for a substantial number of years interrupted by Portuguese occupation of or overlordship over them. It is, however, clear that Persia or a Persian vassal was in effective control of the islands during the 30 years prior to the expulsion of the Persians by the Arabs of the mainland in 1783.

III.—1783-1820. From the Expulsion of the Persians to the conclusion of the Treaty of 1820 with His Majesty's Government.

Bahrein pays Tribute to Persia, 1799.

6. Projects by the Persian Government for the re-establishment of its authority in Bahrein between 1783 and 1800 did not materialise. In 1799 the Imam of Muscat declared war on the Uttabis of Bahrein, who, alarmed by his proceedings, opened a correspondence with the Persian Governor of Bushire, in the course of which they stated that the island originally belonged to the Turkish Government, but that it was many—about 70—years since the Turks had been in possession of it.* He, on their offering to become tributary to Persia, proceeded privately to Bahrein and received from them an instalment of revenue on account of the preceding year.

Lor. I, 841.

Muscat occupies and loses Bahrein, 1800-01.

7. In 1800 Bahrein was occupied by the Imam of Muscat, the occupation lasting until 1801, when the Muscat forces were invested by the Uttabis and compelled to surrender and evacuate Bahrein. In 1802 the Imam of Muscat, having obtained some assistance from Bushire, again landed in Bahrein and attacked the Uttabis. The latter had, however, by now secured the support of the Wahabi rulers of Central Arabia and the Muscat project was abandoned.

Bahrein under Wahabi influence, 1803-11.

8. From 1803 to 1809 the Uttabis of Bahrein appear to have been under the influence of the Wahabis, (the Bombay Government declined to take action on an enquiry made by them in 1805 as to whether, if they withdrew from the Arabian mainland and withheld their assistance from the Wahabis, the British Government would give them a ship or two to enable them to remain undisturbed at Bahrein) and they were under strict control by the Wahabi Government during 1810-11.

G. of L.
Desp. No. 18
of 22.2.70,
para. 5.
Lor. I, 842-3.

Dispute with Muscat, 1816.

Persian Envoy to Bahrein, 1816-17.

9. In 1811 the islands were freed from Wahabi rule by the Imam of Muscat, when the Uttabis were restored to power, though according to a claim subsequently made by the Imam, in subordination to Muscat. In 1816 the Uttabis sought the protection of the Wahabi rulers of Central Arabia, and the Imam of Muscat undertook an armed expedition against Bahrein, explaining to the British authorities that he was compelled so to act by the repudiation by the Attabis of his suzerainty, which they had admitted in 1811, by their alliance with the Wahabis and by their piratical practices. The Muscat expedition, to which three Bushire vessels were added by the Persian Government, effected a landing in the summer of 1816, but was signally repulsed and withdrew. Unsuccessful negotiations took place later in the same year between Muscat and the Persian Government with a view to a fresh attempt on Bahrein. Subsequently, but apparently in the same year, a Persian emissary, one Sikander Khan, arrived in Bahrein, who

Bo. Sel.,
XXIV, 372.

* This was, of course, incorrect. Turkey does not appear to have held the island since 1559 and then only for a few months.

accepted presents from the Sheikhs of Bahrein for the Prince of Shiraz and conferred on them in return Persian Robes of Honour.

Teh. Desp.
No. 6 of
16.4.1817.

10. In April 1817 His Majesty's Minister in Persia reported the arrival at Tehran of an agent from the Imam of Muscat, the object of whose mission was credibly stated to be to inform the Shah that His Majesty's Government contemplated the capture of Bahrein, and to ask for armed assistance for the Imam in order that he might thwart their design by taking possession of the island in the name of the Persian Government. His Majesty's representative stated that an agent of the Sheikh of Bahrein was also at Tehran, bearing a letter which stated that as the inhabitants of the island were of the same sect as the natives of Persia, they had always looked up to the Persian monarch as their protector and head, and that they therefore hoped for the assistance of His Majesty to cloak them from the oppressions of the Wahabis. Approval for the grant of the military assistance desired was stated to have been given by the Shah to the Imam, but no action appears to have followed.

Teh. Desp.
No. 10 of
6.5.1817.

11. In 1818, on the appearance of the Egyptians in Hasa, the Sheikh of Bahrein appears to have offered to assist them with sea transport. In February 1819 the Sheikh entered into an agreement with the British Government, with the terms of which he subsequently failed to comply, for preventing the sale of captured British property in his dominions, and in the same year he expressed great indignation at the violation by the British authorities, under a misapprehension as to the nationality of certain vessels, of the neutrality of his port.

Lor. I, 846.

Teh. Desp.
No. 16 of 25.5.1819.

12. On the 19th April 1819 His Majesty's Representative at Tehran reported to the Government of India that the Imam of Muscat had complained bitterly against the non-fulfilment of the engagements contracted with him by the Persian Government for the capture of Bahrein. The Minister added that letters received by him showed that the troops of Ibrahim Pasha, the Viceroy of Egypt, had occupied Bahrein (this appears to have been incorrect) and that the Imam had suggested to the Shah that he should send a messenger to the Pasha asking him to evacuate the island. The Imam is stated to have urged upon the Shah the necessity of endeavouring to recover a possession which according to him "had for ages acknowledged the sovereignty of Persia." He was, however, unsuccessful, and in June 1819 His Majesty's Minister reported that the Shah had "for the present" dropped all intention of taking any steps in pursuit of his pretensions to the sovereignty of the island. It may be added here that the Government of Bombay in a despatch of 21st July 1819 to the Government of India, in which they discussed the desirability of assisting the Imam of Muscat, in return for assistance in connection with the expedition proposed against the Gulf pirates, to establish his claims to Bahrein, referred to an "arrangement some time since concerted" between the Shah and the Imam, whereby the former "had agreed to relinquish all claims to the island of Bahrein in favour of the Imam, under the condition of receiving a portion of its revenues."

BAHREIN SUBMITS TO MUSCAT, 1820.

13. The Persians, at the beginning of 1820, moved apparently by a desire to anticipate any attempt by Muscat to establish control over Bahrein with the support of His Majesty's Government, unsuccessfully requested the Imam to convey their troops to Bahrein. They addressed a similar application, equally unsuccessful, to the Commander of the British Expedition in the Persian Gulf. In the early part of 1820 the rulers of Bahrein made full submission to the Imam of Muscat and agreed to pay him a tribute of 30,000 dollars. An instalment (12,000 dollars) of this tribute appears subsequently to have been actually remitted.

POLICY OF BRITISH GOVERNMENT, 1819-20.

14. The policy to be adopted by the British Government in regard to Bahrein was examined between the Government of Bombay and the Government of India in 1819-20, and was ultimately defined as one of complete neutrality. The transfer of Bahrein to the Imam of Muscat had been contemplated, but this project, so far as the British Government were concerned, was now abandoned. The Government of Bombay suggested that the Sheikh should be informed that so long as he restrained his subjects from piracy he would reap the advantage of a friendly neutrality on the part of Britain, whereas should a piratical spirit manifest itself forcible measures of coercion would be applied to him. They added that the conclusion of an engagement in general terms with the Sheikh "would probably tend to convince the Uttabi Arabs of the integrity of our intentions."

Govt. of Bombay to
G. of I.,
15.12.1819,
paras. 2, 3.

British Offer to Persia of Mediation with Bahrein, 1820.

15. Simultaneously the Government of Bombay, in a despatch to the Chargé d'Affaires at Tehran, remarked that "we mean to avoid all interference in respect of the island of Bahrein. . . . There is, however, reason to believe that provided the Persian Government will consent to the Uttabis continuing in the undisturbed occupation of Bahrein the Sheikh would readily agree to pay them tribute, and for this purpose the mediation of the British Government would be gladly afforded provided it could be employed in such a manner as to avoid anything which might in any shape involve us in the transactions of the parties after the conclusion of the negotiation immediately referred to. . . ."

Dated
15.12.1819,
para. 11.

TREATY OF 1820 BETWEEN BAHREIN AND HIS MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT.

16. On the 17th January 1820 the Sheikh agreed to surrender certain pirate craft which had taken refuge in his territories, and undertook to the British Government not to admit any more boats of the same character until authorised to do so by the British authorities. On the 5th February 1820 a preliminary Treaty of Peace was signed between the Sheikh and His Majesty's Government, and on the 23rd February 1820 the Sheikhs were admitted to the benefits of the General Treaty of Peace which had been made between His Majesty's Government and the Arab rulers of the Persian Gulf and under which His Majesty's Government undertook, in return for abstention by those rulers from piracy and the slave trade, that "if any shall attack them the British Government shall take notice of it" (Article 10). The Sheikh of Bahrein went so far as to claim subsequently that the treaty in question established relations of protection and dependence between the British Government and himself, but it was made clear to him by the Political Resident in the Persian Gulf while on a visit to Bahrein in 1823 that this was not the case.

Aitchison,
Vol. XI,
No. viii, 233.
Aitchison,
Vol. XI,
No. xix,
245-9.
Lt. McLeod to Govt. of
Bombay,
No. 8, dated
17.2.1823,
paras. 30,
64-5.
Précis, 297.

Proposal for British Mediation with Bahrein not taken up by Persia.

17. On 10th May 1820 His Majesty's Minister at Tehran reported to the Government of Bombay that he had been received in audience by the Shah on 5th May and had put

Teh. Desp.,
10.5.1820.

to him the proposal referred to in paragraph 15 for British mediation with a view to securing tribute to Persia from Bahrein. The Shah had replied that "he wished that advices should be received from Shiraz before the mediation of the British Government to render Bahrein a tributary to Persia can be accepted." Sir H. Willock remarked that "the great repugnance of the Shah to the formation of any British settlement in the neighbourhood of Persia was strongly manifested by His Majesty's not immediately accepting the British mediation to obtain a tribute from the island of Bahrein, an object which he so urgently desired and which His Majesty was aware must at a future period be difficult of attainment from the already advanced stage of negotiations between the Sheikhs of Bahrein and the Imam of Muscat."

and withdrawn (1820).

No. 1485 to Tehran.

18. On the 3rd October 1820 the Government of Bombay instructed Sir H. Willock to take the earliest opportunity of informing the Persian Government "that as our views are exclusively limited to the extirpation of piracy, it would be contrary to our policy, in the present state of the Gulf, to afford the mediation we formerly offered between His Majesty [the Shah] and the Uttabis of Bahrein."

Summary, 1783-1820.

19. In 1799 the Sheikdom, independent since 1783, professed allegiance to Persia and paid a year's tribute, but it was immediately afterwards conquered by the Imam of Muscat, and thereafter fell under the influence and ultimately the control of the Wahabi Amir. Liberated by Muscat in 1811, it appealed to the Wahabis in 1816 against the Imam and defeated him.

In 1816 or 1817 a Persian envoy was received at Bahrein and presents exchanged. While no details are available as to what precisely took place on this occasion, the incident had no effective sequel. Persian authority was not asserted in the island between the date of the visit and 1820, and in the latter year the island became temporarily subject and tributary to Muscat.

In 1820 Bahrein entered into its first formal treaty with the British Government, and that Government, on condition that the Sheikhs abstained from piracy, undertook to "take notice" "if any shall attack them."

IV.—1820-30.

UNAUTHORISED AGREEMENT BETWEEN CAPTAIN BRUCE AND THE PRINCE GOVERNOR OF SHIRAZ, 1822.

20. In 1822 Captain Bruce, then Political Resident in the Persian Gulf, acting on his own initiative and without any authority from or prior reference to Government, having proceeded of his own accord to Shiraz there signed an agreement with the Minister of the Prince Governor of Shiraz, on the part of Persia. This agreement alleged, inter alia, in regard to Bahrein, that the islands had always been subordinate to the Governor of Fars, against whose authority the Uttabi Sheikhs had lately become rebellious; that the flag assigned to the Uttabis of Bahrein under the General Treaty of Peace with Britain in 1820 should accordingly, if already granted, be withdrawn, that no assistance should in future be rendered by Britain to the Uttabis of Bahrein, and that on the contrary the British Government should, if requested, assist the Persians against Bahrein with "one or two" vessels of war. In other words, the title of Persia to the possession of Bahrein was explicitly admitted. The arguments which carried weight with Captain Bruce in concluding this unauthorised agreement appear to have been

Capt. Bruce
to Govt. of Bombay,
3.9.1822.

that the reversion of Bahrein to Persian authority would tend "more to the tranquillity of the Arabian side of the Gulf than almost any other act."

21. The Resident's action was immediately disavowed and disapproved by the Government of Bombay, in letters from the Governor to the Prince Regent of Fars (which stated that "it is not the intention of this Government to take any part in the claims of the several Powers and States of the Persian Gulf further than may be necessary to prevent a renewal of piracy. . . . There can be nothing in the flag [granted to the Uttabis] to give offence to Persia, as there is not the smallest connection between it and the British flag, nor the smallest pretension to superiority on the part of the British Government"), the Imam of Muscat, and the Sheikh of Bahrein, and as a mark of disapprobation he was removed from his appointment. With regard to the clause of the agreement affecting Bahrein the Government of Bombay remarked: "It acknowledges the King of Persia's title to Bahrein, of which there is not the least proof, and which the British Government cannot assert without injuring the pretensions of the Imam [of Muscat] and the Uttabis. . . ." On the Persian side, the Shah not only refused to approve the arrangements which had been made, but expressed his displeasure that the Prince of Shiraz should have entered into any engagement with the British Government without his knowledge and injunctions. The agreement was thus repudiated by both sides.

Govt. of Bombay to
Capt. Bruce,
No. 1491 of 1.11.1822,
para. 6.

Teh. Desp.
No. 1,
25.1.1823.

1822-29. BAHREIN—MUSCAT DISPUTES.

22. By 1822, if not earlier, the Sheikhs of Bahrein had ceased to observe the engagement undertaken by them in 1820 to pay an annual tribute to Muscat. In August 1822, an attack by Muscat on Bahrein seeming in consequence imminent, the Governor of Bombay, in letters to the Sheikh and to the Imam of Muscat, suggested that if this tribute was of ancient origin it should be regularly paid, but that otherwise it should be dropped. In January 1823 the Political Resident (Lieut. McLeod) visited Bahrein to reassure the Sheikhs in regard to the unratified treaty concluded by Captain Bruce with the Prince Governor of Shiraz, and to inform them that that treaty was of no effect and that no change of policy was contemplated by Government. In the spring of 1823, on rumours of a contemplated joint attack on Bahrein by Persia, Muscat and the Arabs of the mainland, the Minister at Tehran was asked at a suitable juncture to dissuade the Persians from disturbing the tranquillity of the Gulf.

Lor. I, 851.
Govr. to
Imam,
19.8.1822.
Govr. to Sheikh,
19.8.1822.
Precis, 307.
Lor. I, 850.
Resdt. to
Govt. of Bombay,
No. 8,
27.2.1823.
Lor. I, 852.
Govt. of Bombay to Teh.,
No. 394,
26.3.1823.

23. In February 1824 the Resident composed for a period of two years the acute internal disputes between members of the ruling house which were for many years a feature of the history of Bahrein. In 1825 the Governor of Bombay personally remonstrated with the Imam of Muscat on an endeavour by the latter to interfere in the question of the Bahrein succession consequent on the death in that year of Sheikh Salman, who had ruled the Sheikdom since 1796 (in association in his later years with his brother Abdulla).

Lor. I, 851.
Lor. I, iii, X,
Table 9.

Reassertion of Persian Claim, 1825.

24. In 1825 an intimation was made by the Political Resident to the Prince Governor of Fars, who had been meditating an expedition to subdue Bahrein, and whose Minister had requested the Resident to give directions to the Sheikh to strike the flag which the British Government had authorised the Uttabis of Bahrein to fly. "He was informed that no control was assumed over the people of

Bombay Political letter dated
2.7.1825.
Abstract.

Bahrein and that the letter disapproving of Captain Bruce's treaty had manifested the line of conduct Government would pursue in regard to Bahrein." The expedition was abandoned on a pretext, "but the Sheikh averted the danger which threatened him by presents of considerable amount."

Lor. I, 854.

Lor. I, 855-6.

25. In October 1828 a last attack by the Imam of Muscat was severely defeated and driven off, "after several undignified attempts to conclude a peace with the" Sheikhs of Bahrein, and on 2nd December 1829 peace was finally made between the Sheikhs and the Imam. The main provisions of this agreement were that tribute should not in future be paid by Bahrein to Muscat, and that neither ruler should henceforth interfere in the affairs of the other. By a supplementary verbal agreement the parties bound themselves to aid one another in the event of an attack by a third party.

Summary, 1820-30.

26. During the first two years of this period the islands acknowledged the supremacy of and, for a time, paid tribute to Muscat. From 1822 to 1829 they were intermittently at feud with Muscat. In 1829 a treaty was concluded by which Muscat withdrew its claims to supremacy and to tribute. The Persian claim was alluded to in 1822 and 1825 but not pressed.

V.—1830-40.

Bahrein and the Wahabis, 1830-35.

27. In the course of 1830-31 the Sheikhs, His Majesty's Government having refused to intervene in their favour, and fearing a combination between the Amir and Muscat, formally submitted to the Wahabi Amir of the Arab mainland. They agreed to acknowledge the Amir's supremacy and to pay a tribute to him. He on his part undertook to protect Bahrein against external aggression. In 1833, however, the Sheikh felt strong enough to repudiate Wahabi supremacy, and he conducted a not unsuccessful offensive against the Wahabis between 1833 and 1835.

Lor. I, 856-7.
Lor. I, iii,
Table 9.

Bahrein and the British Government.

28. Sheikh Khalifah-bin-Salman, who had been joint ruler with his uncle Sheikh Abdulla since the death of Sheikh Salman in 1825, died in 1834, and was succeeded as joint ruler by his son Sheikh Mohammed bin Khalifah. Effective control continued to rest with Sheikh Abdullah. Internal dissension in the ruling family became more marked between 1834 and 1839, and the misgovernment of the island continued to grow with unfortunate effects on its prosperity. His Majesty's Government, although in 1834 they had to take forcible measures against the Sheikh to secure reparation for an insult to their Residency Agent in Bahrein, were, however, content to abstain from any interference in the internal affairs of Bahrein so long as the Sheikhs discharged the obligations undertaken by their Treaty of 1820.

RESTRICTIVE LINE APPLIED TO BAHREIN, 1836.

Lor. I, 860
Précis, 350.

29. In 1835 the British Government renewed the maritime truce which they had imposed in 1820 on the Arab rulers of the Gulf in the interest of the suppression of piracy. The Sheikh of Bahrein was not, however, included in the renewed truce, partly apparently because he had behaved so well that this was thought unnecessary, partly because he could be easily punished in the event of this proving desirable, and partly lest in the event of his inclusion he might claim British intervention if attacked by Muscat. In March 1836 the Sheikh agreed, however, to the application to Bahrein of the "Restrictive Line," this being a line laid down in that year by His Majesty's Government between which and the Persian coast no naval hostilities were in future to be permitted.

Reassertion of Persian claim. Bahrein tributary to the Wahabis, 1836.

30. In the middle of 1836 the Sheikh, alarmed by a communication from the Governor of Shiraz calling on him as a Persian subject to tender his submission to the Shah and by the possibility of the co-operation of the Imam of Muscat in a Persian attack on Bahrein, took steps for a reconciliation with the Wahabi Amir. As a result, he agreed to pay a nominal tribute of $2,000 to the Amir, the Amir on his side agreeing to supply troops for the defence of Bahrein against external attacks and to refrain from calling on the Sheikh for marine transport in the event of a Wahabi attack on Muscat by sea.

Bombay
Selections,
XXIV, 385.
Lor. I, 858.

31. In 1837 the Sheikh, with the prior approval of Her Majesty's Government, was allowed to punish certain pirates. In 1839 the Resident was invoked to settle internal disputes in the ruling family, but the parties would not agree to any settlement without a guarantee by Her Majesty's Government, which Her Majesty's Government were not prepared to give.

Lor. I, 860.

EGYPTIAN INVASION OF HASA: SHEIKH PROFESSES TO BE A PERSIAN SUBJECT, 1839.

32. In 1838-39 the Egyptians conquered Hasa and captured the Wahabi Amir. They thereupon demanded the payment of tribute and certain territorial concessions from the Sheikh of Bahrein. The Egyptian Commander about the same time intimated to the British authorities his intention to attack and reduce the island. The Sheikh appealed for assistance to the Government of India, but in the absence of instructions from Her Majesty's Government the Government of India were at first not prepared to give him any pledge and the Sheikh was instructed to decide for himself as to waiting on the Egyptian representative. Much alarmed by the proceedings of the Egyptians, "and perhaps even more so by a rumour, apparently well founded, that the Saiyed of Oman was intriguing with the Egyptians to obtain and hold Bahrein as a fief under the Viceroy of Egypt," the Sheikh thereon professed, in reply to demands made on him in the name of the Egyptians, to be a subject of the Persian Government. Apparently as the result of overtures by the Sheikh designed to substantiate this, the Prince Governor of Shiraz thereupon sent an envoy—one Haji Qasim, formerly supercargo of a trading vessel—to reside in Bahrein as Persian agent, "and to be the medium of receiving and transmitting the annual tribute which the Persian authorities vainly flattered themselves the Bahrein Chief was disposed to pay for their countenance and protection," and to bear a Robe of Honour and a letter to the Sheikh. The envoy was accompanied by a guard of 10 Persian infantry. No details appear to be available about his mission, which was apparently a failure.

Bombay
Selections,
XXIV,
387-8.

Lor. I, 862.

Bombay
Selections,
XXIV, 388.

33. On 1st April 1839 Admiral Sir F. Maitland, then commanding the Gulf Squadron, was instructed by the Government of Bombay to give the Sheikh all support against the Egyptians, short of actually entering on hostilities. If the Sheikh asked for a new engagement with Her Majesty's Government he should offer to transmit his proposals to India. The Resident was simultaneously to send a formal protest to the Egyptians. On the 18th April

Précis, 375,
Govt. of
Bombay to Res., No. 661, dated 4.1839

Lor. I, 864.

the Government of India empowered the Admiral, if the Sheikh claimed British intervention and offered to place his territories under British protection, "to assure him of the temporary protection of Her Majesty's squadron in the Gulf," to inform the Egyptians that this pledge had been given and to urge them to abstain from further military proceedings until the views of both Governments were known, failing which Bahrein would be defended against intervention by them until the pleasure of Her Majesty's Government had been communicated to the local authorities. In the same month the Sheikh promised the Assistant Political Resident to take no steps to place himself under the authority or protection of a foreign Power without first consulting the Political Resident.

SHEIKH SUBMITS TO EGYPTIANS (JULY 1839).

Lor. I, 865.
Bombay
Selections,
XXIV, 389.Pol. Res. to Govt. of
Bombay,
4.7.1839.

34. In July 1839 the Sheikh "suddenly and unexpectedly" acknowledged the supremacy of the Egyptians and agreed to pay them a tribute of 2,000 dollars a year, on the understanding that his local authority would be observed and that no representative of the Egyptians would be sent to reside in Bahrein. The Resident protested in writing to both the Sheikh and the Egyptians, and expostulated with the Sheikh on the way in which he was sacrificing his independence. The Sheikh explained that his action was the result of the refusal of Her Majesty's Government to give him advice or a specific assurance of support. For a trifling financial payment he had now secured immunity from interference. He offered, however, in return for a written and distinct pledge of protection, to repudiate his agreement with the Pasha and to avow himself a dependent of Her Majesty's Government; but on being pressed he refused to confirm this in writing and said that in any event it would be necessary for him to justify his change of attitude to the Egyptians on the ground that it was the result of compulsion by Her Majesty's Government.

1839-40. VIEWS OF HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT ON FUTURE POLICY TOWARDS BAHREIN.

Précis, 393.

Hertslet,
1874, p. 5.

35. As a consequence of the activities of the Egyptians discussion appears about this time to have taken place as to the desirability of declaring a regular protectorate over Bahrein. On 1st July 1839 the Secret Committee of the East India Company informed the Government of India that if necessary they would "not disapprove of your entering into an engagement with the Chief of Bahrein to protect him against encroachments from Mehemet Ali, but we concur in the doubt expressed by Captain Hennell [then Political Resident] as to whether it would be expedient for that island to be taken under the protection of the British Government." On 24th February 1840 the Foreign Office wrote to the India Board (with reference to an enquiry from the Bombay Government) that it was important that the Egyptian troops should not be allowed to take possession of Bahrein and that if the Company's troops could occupy it, even provisionally, such a measure could not fail to be attended with advantage. On the retirement of the Egyptians from Hasa in 1840 their relations with the Sheikh came to an end.

Summary, 1830-40.

36. From 1831-33 Bahrein was subject and tributary to the Wahabi Amirs. She revolted from them in the latter year, but in 1836 again entered into an understanding, which appears to have lasted until 1838, under which Bahrein paid a tribute and received guarantees of assistance against external attack. In 1838 the Wahabi Amir was himself conquered by the Egyptians.

The Persians reasserted their claim in 1836, the Bahreini answer being a renewal of their understanding with the Wahabi Amirs.

In 1839, when faced by a demand for tribute from Egypt, Bahrein appealed to Persia, claimed to be a Persian subject, and received a Persian envoy. But immediately after she formally acknowledged Egyptian supremacy and paid tribute to Egypt. The visit of the Persian envoy had thus no effective sequel.

VI.—1840-50.

37. In 1840 the Government of India, provoked by the attitude which the Sheikh had adopted, decided not to restrain the Imam of Muscat in the event of his wishing to conquer Bahrein. On 27th March 1840 the Secret Committee remarked to the Government of India "We consider ourselves . . . relieved from all regard to the interests of the Sheikh of Bahrein, and we should be glad to hear that his island was in possession of a friendly chieftain."

No. 591,
27.3.40.
Précis, 394.

38. Towards the end of 1840 the Imam of Muscat informed the Resident that while his views in regard to Bahrein remained unaltered, he had been restrained from giving effect to them by his impression that Her Majesty's Government were averse to the prosecution of his claim and that without their assistance or that of the Egyptians, he would have no chance of success.

India Board letter,
22.10.1840.

EXPULSION OF SHEIKH ABDULLAH. SUCCESSION OF SHEIKH MOHAMED BIN KHALIFA (1843-68).

39. Internal dissensions in the Sheikhdom between the ruler, Sheikh Abdullah, and his grand-nephew and co-ruler, Sheikh Mohamed, became increasingly bitter, and Sheikh Mohamed was finally expelled from the island. In November 1842 he was given permission by Her Majesty's Government to attack Sheikh Abdullah. After a civil war which lasted from January to April 1843, Abdullah was expelled by Mohamed, who thereafter held the Sheikhdom, no reply being sent to an appeal to restrain the attackers which was made by Abdullah to the British authorities in February 1843.

Lor. I, 866.

INTRIGUES OF EX-SHEIKH, 1843-49.

40. Between 1843 and 1849 the ex-Sheikh appealed at various times for the assistance of the Wahabis, the Trucial Sheikhs, the Sheikh of Koweit, and the British and Persian authorities to enable him to recover his position. In 1843 Her Majesty's Government dissuaded Muscat from trying to conquer Bahrein—considerations which weighed with them being inter alia the risk of provoking the Wahabis and the danger of giving Persia an excuse to espouse the cause of the ex-Sheikh. In the same year the ex-Sheikh twice visited Bushire, where he failed to find any consolation from the Resident, who, on his stating that if disappointed by Her Majesty's Government he was ready to throw himself into the arms of Persia, informed him (October 1843) that the adherence of Persia to his cause would not be recognised by Britain unless it was open and declared.

Lor. I, 873.

41. In the course of his visits the ex-Sheikh entered into discussions with the nephew of the Persian Sheikh of Bushire, who, while holding no official position himself,

Teh. Desp.
86, Oct.
1843.

Lor. I, 875.

promised him military assistance from Persia. On representations being thereupon made to the Persian Prime Minister by Her Majesty's Minister at Tehran, the Prime Minister "informed me that Sheikh Suleiman had acted with great presumption in having interfered in political affairs without having any authority from the Government, and he said that he would reprimand him for his conduct. His Excellency added that Bahrein belonged to Persia and that she would take possession of it when more pressing affairs were disposed of. As I looked on this as mere idle boasting which was never likely to be fulfilled, I thought it unnecessary to pursue the conversation."

42. It may be recorded that on a second visit of the ex-Sheikh to Bushire from December 1843 to March 1844, he is stated to have been received with distinction by the Persians, and to have offered, if reinstated, to pay the cost, to remit in future a large annual tribute to the Shah, and to leave one son as a hostage in Persia. His proposals were not, however, accepted by the Persian Government.

43. In 1844 the Political Resident in the Persian Gulf was instructed by the Government of India to resist by force any attempt by Persia to establish troops on the island of Bahrein. During the same year the ex-Sheikh, having, while residing at Naband in South Persia, captured two Bahreini vessels, the ruling Sheikh appealed to the Resident, with the result that an injunction was issued by the Central Persian Government at the instance of the British envoy directing the Governor-General of Fars to compel Sheikh Abdulla to give up the boats he had taken and abstain from disturbing the peace of the Gulf.

VIEWS OF HIS MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT ON PERSIAN CLAIM AND ON FUTURE POLICY, 1844-45.

44. Consequent on indications that Persia intended to intervene in the succession at Bahrein on behalf of the ex-Sheikh Abdullah the general question of policy was considered by Her Majesty's Government in the early part of 1844, in the light of an intimation by the Government of India that they would see the strongest objections to any such interference by Persia, which could not but react adversely on British interests. As a result, Her Majesty's Minister was informed (Foreign Office Despatch to Tehran, No. 23, dated 1st May 1844) that "the question of the right of Persia to interfere and of the Indian Government to prevent interference necessarily depends upon the validity of the pretension put forward by Persia to the sovereignty of Bahrein. Her Majesty's Government are ignorant of the grounds of such pretension, and, assuming those grounds to be insufficient, they would claim for the British Government the right to prevent, if it accorded with its policy to do so, any direct interposition of Persia in the quarrels of rival claimants to the possession of Bahrein. The British Government in India at present consider that any such disturbance as may be occasioned by military operations on the part of Persia directed against the island of Bahrein would be injurious to British interests, and, therefore, unless Persia can show that she has a clear and indisputable right to the sovereignty of Bahrein; that she has exercised it without interruption under the dynasty of the Kajar family; that consequently her present policy is directed to the maintenance of her lawful claims and not to the assertion of a pretension not founded on law, she must be prepared to encounter in any scheme of this kind the active opposition of the British Government in India." In these circumstances the Minister was instructed to inform the Persian Government that "Her Majesty's Government had heard with regret that that Government contemplated taking part in the disputes respecting the Government of Bahrein; that such a proceeding would be viewed with much jealousy by the British Government in India; and that unless the right of Persia to interfere in the matter is beyond dispute, any interference on her part might lead to unpleasant discussions with England. For, although Her Majesty's Government do not dispute the right of Persia as an independent power to adopt any line of policy not inconsistent with its engagements to foreign states which she might think advantageous to herself, they claim for themselves a corresponding right to judge and act in such matters as they may think fit."

Discussions with Persia, 1844-45.

45. On a communication in these terms being made to the Persian Prime Minister, the Prime Minister "said he would undertake to prove the right of Persia to possession of that island, and that in the meantime he would not make any movement against it without giving previous notification of such an intention to the British Government."

46. In February 1845 the Minister at Tehran sent home a letter received from the Prime Minister, from which it appeared that the Persian claim was essentially based on the Convention of 1822 between Captain Bruce and the Minister of the Prince Governor of Fars. (See paragraphs 20-21 above.)

47. In a subsequent despatch the Minister said that he had informed the Prime Minister that the Bruce Agreement was unauthorised and had been repudiated at the time, and that the Prime Minister had thereupon sent him a fuller statement of the grounds of the Persian claim. The result of enquiries which His Majesty's Minister had made consequent on the receipt of this statement "confirmed me in the opinion that this island has not formed part of the dominions of Persia since the accession of the Kajar dynasty [1795]. It is true that the Chiefs of Bahrein have in all probability from time to time given peeshkesh, offerings, or tribute to this country [Persia] as a mark of superiority, as Kandahar and Herat continue to do, without an acknowledgment of subjection,* and it is also not unlikely that the rulers of that island may have declared themselves to be subjects of the Shah when threatened with subjugation from Bagdad, but I cannot ascertain that Persia has exercised any real control over it within the last 50 or 60 years." The Minister added that in further support of their claim the Persian Government had sent him a gold coin struck at Bahrein in 1817 in the name of Fateh Ali Shah Kajar, which he believed to be genuine.

48. The fuller statement of claim put forward by the Persian Government was investigated by the Secret Committee of the East India Company, who, after detailed examination of it, reached the conclusion "that Persia has no legitimate claim to the sovereignty of Bahrein." It may be remarked that the Persian claim was largely based on a general claim that the Persian Gulf from the Shatt-el-Arab to Muscat and all the islands in it belonged to

* On this point the Secret Committee of the East India Company remarked: "Presents and complimentary messages do not imply an acknowledgment of sovereignty, and they have not been confined to Persia." (Secret Committee to India Board, 31st July 1845.)

Persia; that the employment in English of the term "Persian Gulf" was itself evidence of this; that from about 1300 A.D. the island of Bahrein had always been in the possession of the Governors of Fars and had paid revenue to them until its conquest in 1783 by the Uttabi Arabs, from which tribe "itself, likewise, presents have generally been sent to the Governors of Fars"; that Her Majesty's Government had recognised the position when they warned Mehemet Ali of Egypt in 1840 not to attack Bahrein, which did not form part of Arabia, but rather of the Persian Gulf; "and that accordingly the British Government would not allow him to extend the hand of possession over that island"; that the British authorities had formally and repeatedly asked Persia to rent the island to them and that British representatives at Tehran had frequently declared that Her Majesty's Government had no right whatever to the Gulf or its islands [there is no foundation for either statement]; and that the fact that Captain Bruce's treaty was on record supported the Persian claim. The following extract, which (except as regards the initial date) appears correctly to represent the true facts, may, however, be placed on record from the Prime Minister's memorandum: "In the commencement of the reign of His Majesty the late Shah, the Arabs of Beni Attabi came from the desert and conquered the island by sea. The object and desire of the Persian Government has since always been and is the recovery of that island from its spoilers."

49. Her Majesty's Government, in view of the unlikelihood that Persia had, or could give effect to, any serious designs in Bahrein and the undesirability of engaging in those circumstances in a correspondence which might merely cause irritation without serving any useful purpose, instructed the Minister at Tehran not to revert to the subject unless it was forced upon him by the Persian Prime Minister. In that case he was to employ certain arguments supplied to him (apparently the critical comments of the Secret Committee of the East India Company on the Prime Minister's memorandum) to show generally the grounds on which Her Majesty's Government were "unable to recognise as valid the claims advanced by Persia to the sovereignty of Bahrein, and you may add that they would . . . very much disapprove of any attempts on the part of Persia to interfere in the affairs of that island and thus disturb the peace of the Gulf and to afford an opening to piracy." The question appears to have dropped for the time being.

Treaty of Peace with Wahabis, to whom Bahrein pays Tribute (1847).

50. Meanwhile, the ex-Sheikh (who in 1845 had unsuccessfully attempted to capture Bahrein with the aid of the Wahabis) had been invited in June 1846 by the Governor-General of Fars to return to Bushire, where he should be liberally entertained "until . . . the season for action had arrived," but he declined the invitation. In October 1846 the Wahabi Amir asked the permission of the Resident to call in the Trucial Sheikhs of the Arab littoral against Bahrein. This was refused. A request by the ruling Sheikh of Bahrein to be allowed to call in the assistance of the Sheikh of Debai against the Wahabis was equally refused in November 1846. In August 1847 a Treaty of Peace was concluded between the Wahabi Amir and the ruling Sheikh, under which the ruling Sheikh agreed to pay a tribute of 4,000 dollars a year, while the Wahabi Amir agreed not to encourage the ex-Sheikh.

Slavery Treaty with Great Britain, 1847.

51. On the 8th March 1847 Her Majesty's Government entered into a Slavery Treaty with the ruling Sheikh.

Turkish Designs on Bahrein, 1847.

52. In the same year the first Turkish claim to suzerainty over Bahrein was put forward, the Turkish Mutasallim of Basra writing to the Sheikh inviting him to declare his allegiance to the Sultan and to submit lists of his shipping for registration. These overtures were evaded by the Sheikh, while the Porte assured Her Majesty's Government that they did not intend to use compulsion against him; but that "if the Governor of Bussorah had attempted by negotiation to induce any of the Maritime Chiefs of the Persian Gulf to return to their allegiance to the Porte, they could not disapprove his doing so."

Persian Intrigues, 1848.

53. In the following year correspondence took place between the Persian Consul-General at Bagdad, the ex-Sheikh (whom he advised to press ahead, since Persia would surely assist him) and the ruling Sheikh, whom he addressed in friendly terms. The correspondence was put a stop to consequent on representations by the British Resident at Bagdad. In 1849 the ex-Sheikh died.

VIEWS OF HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT ON FUTURE POLICY, 1847-49.

54. The overtures made by the Turks in 1847 gave rise between 1847 and 1849 to consideration by the Government of Bombay, the Government of India, and Her Majesty's Government of the policy to be adopted in regard to Bahrein. The Sheikh hinted in 1847 that unless certain grievances were met he might become a Turkish subject. His grievances were accordingly remedied by the Government of Bombay. That Government represented, however, that it was desirable to exclude interference in Gulf affairs by foreign Powers, since unless Her Majesty's Government retained the supreme control they could not secure the permanence of the objects (the suppression of piracy, &c.) on which so much money had been spent. The Court of Directors concurred in the Government of Bombay's recommendation "that any attempts upon Bahrein ought to be resisted by the British Naval Force" and that the Resident should be so informed.

55. On 11th October 1847 the Foreign Office, in a letter to the India Board, in which they referred to recent Turkish assurances that the Turkish Government had no intention of using compulsion with regard to Bahrein, added that "if the Indian Government has any further apprehensions on the subject, and if the Bahrein Chief is really an independent ruler, the best course would be to make with him a treaty of alliance which would secure his independence and his friendly connection with England." The Resident, who deemed it inexpedient that Her Majesty's Government should involve itself in the embarrassments likely to arise from a closer alliance with Bahrein (letter of 25th January 1848), was, however, opposed to making the existing connection closer, as were the Secret Committee of the East India Company, who expressed the view that the Resident "had exercised a wise discretion in not taking any step for the negotiation of a new treaty with Bahrein." The Resident was, at the same time, authorised, while avoiding discussion with the Turks, to ascertain whether the Sheikh was inclined to enter into a closer connection with Her Majesty's Government.

SHEIKH'S REQUEST TO BE TAKEN UNDER BRITISH PROTECTION REFUSED (1849).

56. In January 1849, however, the Sheikh spontaneously asked to be taken under British protection. The Resident, who, as stated above, had originally opposed, ultimately supported this request, but after a lengthy discussion the Government of India and Her Majesty's Government agreed

Lor. I, 881.

F.O. to India Bd. 28.9.1847.

Bushire to Tehran. No. 177 of 5.6.1848.

Lor. I, 881. Bo. to Res. 334 of 31.7.1847.

Lor. I, 882. Bombay Selections, XXIV, 429. India Bd. to F.O. 3.2.1851.

India Bd.
to F.O.,
26.7.1849.

that a change of policy was inexpedient, and the Resident was instructed in September 1849 to decline the Sheikh's overtures, but to assure him of the continuance of the good-will and friendship of Her Majesty's Government.

Persian Protest, 1848.

Hertslet, 9.
Teh. Desp.
No. 15,
17.2.1848.
Teh. Desp.
No. 11,
2.5.1848.

57. During the course of these discussions, the Persian Government protested against British interference in the affairs of Bahrein, whereupon they were informed by the Minister at Tehran in February 1848 that the British Government were unable to recognise as valid the claims advanced by Persia to the sovereignty of Bahrein.

Designs of Muscat, 1849.

F.O. to L.O.,
11.6.1849.

58. In June 1849 the Imam of Muscat, having intimated his desire to send an expedition to take possession of Bahrein, and having asked the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, was strongly dissuaded from doing so by Her Majesty's Government.

Summary, 1840-50.

59. The ruling Sheikh was expelled in 1843 and continued to intrigue to regain the throne till his death in 1849, appealing for assistance during this period to the Wahabis, Persia, Muscat and Great Britain, in all cases unsuccessfully.

In 1847 Turkey asserted a claim to Bahrein. In the same year the islands submitted themselves to the Wahabi Amir and agreed to pay tribute to him.

Claims by Persia were advanced, but rejected, in 1844-45 and 1848.

Muscat was dissuaded from attacking Bahrein in 1849.

Her Majesty's Government, on consideration of the policy to be adopted in regard to Bahrein, decided against establishing a protectorate and refused a request put forward in 1849 by the Sheikh to be taken under British protection. They assured him at the same time of their general goodwill, and their deliberations made it clear that they regarded the island as independent, but were reluctant to assume further responsibility in relation to it so long as its independence and the performance of the engagements undertaken by the Sheikh could be secured without their doing so.

VII.—1850-61.

DISPUTES WITH WAHABIS, 1850-51.

Lor. I, 884.

60. In 1850 the Resident found it necessary to take disciplinary action against the ruling Sheikh—an individual of "irresponsible character." Consequent on strained relations between the Sheikh and the Wahabi Amir, the Amir, with whom the sons of the ex-Sheikh Abdulla were associated, in 1850-51 threatened Bahrein, whereupon the Sheikh "against his own better judgment . . . tendered a small annual tribute to the Amir," a circumstance from which it may perhaps be inferred that he had failed to observe the agreement of 1847 referred to in paragraph 50 above. The Amir rejected the offer and made exorbitant demands instead. The Sheikh was about to succumb to a combination of the sons of the ex-Sheikh and the Wahabi Amir "when a British squadron arriving off Bahrein took the islands under their protection." Peace was subsequently made with the Wahabis in July 1851.

HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT AND THE CLAIMS OF TURKEY (1851).

F.O. to India Bd.,
24.1.1851.
India Bd.
to F.O.,
3.2.1851.
F.O. to India Bd.,
6.2.1851.

61. In the same year Her Majesty's Government decided that the Turkish Government should be informed at Constantinople that Her Majesty's Government, having heard that the Sheikh was desirous of placing himself under Turkish protection, could not acknowledge or acquiesce in any such arrangement, seeing that the Government of British India had had relations with Bahrein as an independent

State and had concluded with it certain treaties, namely, one in 1820 for the suppression of piracy and one in 1847 for the prohibition of the exportation of slaves, and that Her Majesty's Government must object to any arrangement which would transfer Bahrein to the dominion or protectorship of any other Power.

62. In the correspondence leading up to this decision Lord Palmerston remarked: "I come to the conclusion that it is the opinion of the East India Company that the object first to be aimed at is to prevent Bahrein from falling under the control of any foreign Power, and to keep that island in its present condition of political independence. But I infer from what has been stated in the despatches which you have communicated to me, that if that independence could no longer be maintained, and if the ruler and the people of Bahrein were determined to place themselves under some foreign protection, the East India Company would think that less evil would arise from affording to Bahrein British protection than from allowing French, Persian or Turkish authority to be established in that island."

Attitude of the Wahabis and of Muscat, 1852-53.

63. In 1852 the Sheikh proposed to withhold his tribute from the Wahabi Amir, but on the advice of the Resident decided to pay it. In the same year the Consul at Zanzibar was instructed to inform the Imam of Muscat that Her Majesty's Government saw no reason to alter the views regarding the possession of Bahrein communicated to His Highness in 1849 (paragraph 58 above). In May 1853 the Government of India authorised the Government of Bombay to offer every obstacle to an attack on Bahrein by the Wahabi Amir (who was now nominally subject to the Turkish Government) on the ground that Her Majesty's Government would not permit the occupation of Bahrein by the Turkish Government or by anyone acting for them or in their interest.

PRINCIPLE OF NON-INTERFERENCE IN INTERNAL AFFAIRS LAID DOWN BY BOMBAY GOVERNMENT (1854).

64. On 20th November 1854 the Government of Bombay in a letter to the Resident laid down the principle of non-interference in the internal affairs of Bahrein, and authorised the Resident simultaneously to inform the Sheikh of Qatif on the Arab mainland that the British Government would not tolerate his further interference with the affairs of Bahrein.

SLAVERY AGREEMENT WITH HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT (1856).

65. On the 10th May 1856 an agreement supplementary to the Treaty of 1847 (paragraph 51 above) regarding the slave trade was made with the Sheikh. Its contents were identical with that of corresponding engagements entered into at the same time by the Arab rulers of the Trucial Coast.

66. The Sheikh's internal government continued to go from bad to worse. In September 1858 reparation was secured from him for the ill-treatment of British subjects in Bahrein. In 1859 a Wahabi attack was averted by British intervention. The local Wahabi Governor sued for pardon to the Senior Naval Officer; the Wahabi ruler, however, made a formal protest, asserted his authority over Bahrein, and declared that he was himself a vassal of the Sultan of Turkey. The Resident, in reply, informed him of the determination of Her Majesty's Government to preserve the independence of Bahrein, and pointed out the inconsistency of his piratical attacks on Turkish shipping with his professions of dependence on the Ottoman Government.

SHEIKH'S APPEAL TO PERSIA AND TURKEY, 1859-61.

67. At the end of 1859 or early in 1860, as the result, apparently, partly of apprehensions of the Wahabis and partly of irritation at the restraint exercised by the Resident

India Bd.
to F.O.,
7.2.1851.
Lor. I, 885.
F.O. to Sir
S. Canning,
Constantinople, No. 40,
12.2.1851.

Lor. I, 885.

Lor. I, 887.

Aitchison,
Vol. XI,
No. ix, 234.

Lor. I, 887.

Lor. I, 888.

Resdt. to
Bombay,
No. 118,
14.4.1860;
No. 2A,
7.5.1860;
No. 219,
26.7.1860.
Resdt. to Tehran,
No. 210,
16.7.1860.
Resdt. to Constant.
3.6.1860.

over his piratical activities directed against the Wahabis, the Sheikh made a simultaneous appeal for assistance to the Persian Governor of Fars and the Turkish Wali of Baghdad. The Turkish answer was delayed. A Persian agent (Mirza Mehdi Khan), bearing a Persian Firman to the Sheikh, arrived in April 1860. The Persian flag was hoisted, Persian sovereignty proclaimed, and the Sheikh's agreement to pay tribute secured. These ceremonies were, however, scarcely over when a Turkish emissary arrived. The Persian flag continued to fly during the Sheikh's negotiations with the Turks, but on the latter withdrawing, and subsequently communicating assurances of a character satisfactory to the Sheikh from the Turkish Government, the Turkish flag was hoisted on the forts in place of the Persian flag in May 1860 and the Sheikh agreed to pay tribute to Turkey. The Persian emissary, however, refused to leave Bahrein "or surrender his imaginary authority in the Sheikhdom." The Resident reported in July 1860 that "the Ottoman flag has now become the national one." The Sheikh appears to have endeavoured to play off each party against the other.

Views of the Minister at Tehran and the Government of Bombay.

68. The Minister at Tehran regarded the matter as one of relatively small importance. He pointed out to the Persian Government "that under no circumstances can the British Government be expected to concur in the proposed transfer of the sovereignty of Bahrein to the Persian Crown, since we have contracted engagements with the Arab Sheikhs of the island as independent Chiefs, and since the maintenance of their independence is indispensable to the successful working of those plans of maritime police in the Persian Gulf which we have been at so much pains and expense to establish"; and obtained an assurance from Persia that no military occupation of Bahrein should be attempted until the title to the island had been settled through the diplomatic channel. He advised the Resident that, while hostilities against Bahrein were to be repelled by force, a voluntary tender of allegiance by the Sheikh to any other Power might, so long as it was unaccompanied by any military occupation, be ignored as of no particular importance. In the light of the Minister's views the Government of Bombay instructed the Resident that he should not interfere with the occupation of Bahrein, whether by Persia or Turkey, save by protest and by an intimation that the matter had been referred to Her Majesty's Government; but at the same time that the agents of both Powers (Turkey and Persia) should be warned that aggression by or in the name of Bahrein on neighbouring tribes would not be allowed and would, if necessary, be prevented by force. In representing the matter to the Secretary of State for India they urged that in the interests of the peace of the Gulf it would be better that Bahrein should be regarded as independent and as subject neither to Turkey nor to Persia, that its independence should be recognised, and the engagements into which in the interests of humanity we had entered with its rulers for the preservation of the peace and good order of the Gulf should be maintained.

HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT DECIDE THAT BAHREIN SHALL BE REGARDED AS INDEPENDENT (1861).

69. In February 1861 Her Majesty's Government, after discussion between the India Office and the Foreign Office, approved the recommendation of the Government of Bombay. The Resident and the Minister at Tehran were so informed. During part of the time at any rate that the question was under consideration in London the Turkish and Persian agents or their representatives appear (though it is not clear how consistently) to have remained in Bahrein, and the flags of both Powers to have been flown

Teh. to Bu.
No. 16 of
4.5.1860.

Dec. 1860.

I.O. to F.O.,
11.2.61.
F.O. to I.O.,
12.2.61.
S. of S. to G.
of I., No. 2, 18.2.61.

simultaneously. On the 27th February 1861 the Political Resident reported that "the Persian and Turkish flags still fly on the forts of the island and in an interview that Commander Cruttenden had with Sheikh Md. bin Khalifah at his own request he (the Chief) remarked in respect to them that they were displayed 'merely to suit his own fancy. What did he care for Turk or Persian? He valued the friendship of the British Government highly.'"

British Convention of 31st May 1861 with the Sheikh.

70. In May 1861 the Sheikh, refusing to discontinue a blockade which he had imposed on the Wahabi coast, was informed by the Resident of the decision of Her Majesty's Government that he was regarded as an independent Chief and that in these circumstances he must be held responsible by them for any piratical activities in which he might indulge. The Sheikh proved obdurate; he was threatened with forcible measures by the Resident and two of his ships were seized. He accordingly submitted, and on 31st May 1861 he signed a Friendly Convention with the Resident, acting on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, by which he entered into a "perpetual treaty of peace and friendship" with Great Britain, and in which, as "independent ruler of Bahrein," he acknowledged as valid and in force the earlier conventions entered into between Bahrein and Her Majesty's Government, and undertook in return for a guarantee of protection against aggressions "by the Chiefs and Tribes of the Gulf" to abstain from maritime aggression, piracy, the slave trade, &c., and to agree to certain conditions in regard to residence and trade in Bahrein by British subjects and to jurisdiction over them. One of the ships seized from him was thereupon returned; the second, the Hamrah, was retained.

Pol. Res. to Sheikh,
25.5.1861.

Aitchison,
Vol. XI,
No. x, 234.

71. The Turkish and Persian agents would seem to have disappeared from Bahrein before the Resident's arrival. The Persian authorities at Bushire in June 1861 asked the Resident for an explanation of his proceedings. The Resident, however, contented himself with forwarding their enquiry to Her Majesty's Minister at Tehran. The Convention was approved by the Government of India in 1861, and the Turkish and Persian Governments were informed of what had happened.

Pol. Res. to
Teh., No. 20,
8.6.1861.

Summary, 1850-61.

72. The Turkish Government were informed in 1851 that Her Majesty's Government could not recognise any claim on their part to Bahrein.

The Sheikhs appear to have continued to pay tribute to the Wahabi Amir in the early part of and possibly throughout this period.

In 1859 the Sheikh appealed simultaneously to Turkey and to Persia, as the result of apprehensions of a Wahabi attack, and received a Persian envoy, who hoisted the Persian flag. On the arrival immediately afterwards of the Turkish envoy the Persian flag was hauled down. Subsequently the Sheikh for a time flew both flags side by side. The envoys seem to have left Bahrein in the early part of 1861. No action was taken by the British authorities pending a decision by Her Majesty's Government as to whether they regarded Bahrein as independent. The Persian Government undertook not to endeavour to occupy the islands until the title to them was settled.

Her Majesty's Government decided in February 1861 to regard the Sheikh as an independent ruler and so hold him responsible for piracies, &c. Punitive action against him by Her Majesty's Government having proved necessary in May 1861, he entered in that month into a convention with them in which he was described as "independent ruler of Bahrein," and secured certain guarantees of protection.

VIII.—1861-67. From the Convention of 1861 to the Punitive Expedition of August 1868.

PERSIAN PROTEST (1862).

Lord Cowley to F.O., No. 15, 7.7.1862. F.O. to Lord Cowley, No. 209, 22.2.1862.

73. In January 1862 the Persian Minister in Paris protested to Her Majesty's Ambassador in Paris against the seizure of the Hamrah. He was informed in reply that Her Majesty's Government could not recognise any claim on the part of Persia to question their proceedings in regard to Bahrein, and must therefore decline to offer him any explanation on the subject of his complaint.

PERSIAN PROTEST (1866).

Lor. I, 891.

74. Between 1863 and 1865 the Sheikh continued to misbehave, and in the latter year his ship, the Dinar, was seized under the instructions of the Resident. The Persian Government in 1866 made a complaint in regard to the Dinar proceedings on the ground that Bahrein under the unratified agreement of 1822 was a dependency of Persia. The Government of India, after ascertaining from the Government of Bombay the nature of the agreement of 1822, communicated the result of their enquiries to the Minister at Tehran, and added their own opinion that "whatever might have been the pretensions of Persia or the grounds of the same to the sovereignty of Bahrein in former days, the Shah could not now be regarded as possessing in point of fact any rights in the principality." This communication was approved by Her Majesty's Government in the same year, and the matter appears to have dropped.

Lor. I, 691.

I.O. to G. of I., No. 37 of 28.2.1867.

NATURE OF RELATIONS BETWEEN BAHREIN AND WAHABI AMIR (1867).

75. In 1866-67 the Resident, on the instructions of the Government of India, investigated the relations of the Sheikh of Bahrein and the Wahabi Amir. He reported as a result that the Sheikh claimed to be independent so far as his islands were concerned, and that the annual tribute of 4,000 dollars "which he indubitably paid" (cp. paragraph 50 above) to the Amir was on account of the possessions held by him in Qatar on the Arabian mainland, the object of the payment being to secure those possessions against attacks by Arab tribes under Wahabi influence. The Government of India, in the light of the Resident's investigation, expressed the view in March 1867 that the Sheikh was independent of all other Powers in respect of his insular possessions and owed fealty to the Wahabis only in regard to Qatar.

Lor. I, 892.

Summary, 1861-67.

76. This period is marked by assertions of the Persian claim in 1862 and 1866. Her Majesty's Government on both occasions made it clear that they could not regard that claim as well founded.

Investigation showed that the tribute still paid (1867) by the Sheikh to the Wahabi Amir was in respect of Bahreini possessions on the mainland of Arabia, and not in respect of Bahrein, which the Sheikh held independently of all other Powers.

IX.—Discussions and Incidents, 1868-70.

77. Questions of considerable importance as bearing on the status of Bahrein arose in 1868-70 consequent on—

- (a) the disciplinary action taken by the Government of India against the ruling Sheikh Md. bin Khalifa, in view of his breaches of the Maritime Truce of 1820, which resulted in his flight from Bahrein in September 1868 and the succession as sole Sheikh of his brother, Sheikh Ali bin Khalifa;
- (b) the punitive action taken at Bahrein by the Government of India in November-December 1869, consequent on the invasion of Bahrein by the ex-Sheikh Md. bin Khalifa, the murder of Sheikh Ali, and the attempt of Sheikh Md. bin Khalifa and Sheikh Md. bin Abdullah to establish themselves in control of the islands.

78. In view of the weight attached by the Persians to the declarations made in the course of those discussions as indicating the view held by Her Majesty's Government on the status of Bahrein, of the Persian allegations that overtures to Persia had been made by the ruling Sheikh, Ali bin Khalifa, and by the ex-Sheikh, Md. bin Khalifa, and of the misleading but categorical accusations made against the Resident by the Persian Government, it seems desirable to examine in some detail the correspondence which passed and the sequence of events.

Punitive Expedition of August-September 1868.

79. In 1868, consequent on an attack on Qatar by the Sheikh of Bahrein, the Government of India resolved to take disciplinary action against Sheikh Mohamed bin Khalifa. The Sheikh sent an agent to Bushire to satisfy the Resident, but the agent having no powers from his master, his mission proved fruitless, and he returned to Bahrein in August 1868. An armed expedition was thereupon sent against the Sheikh in August-September of that year. Before it reached Bahrein the Sheikh fled to the Arab mainland, and he was thereafter regarded by the people of Bahrein and by Her Majesty's Government as having abdicated the Sheikhdom. The expedition found it unnecessary to use any force, a full submission being made on its arrival by Sheikh Ali bin Khalifa, brother of Sheikh Mohamed, who had previously been associated with Sheikh Mohamed to some extent in the Sheikhship. An agreement was reached by the Political Resident with Sheikh Ali, which disposed of the matters in dispute, on 6th September 1868. The agreement was signed by "Ali bin Khalifah and the inhabitants and subjects of Bahrein." It declared inter alia that "Md. bin Khalifah having repeatedly committed acts of piracy and other irregularities at sea, and having now, after his recent piratical acts, fled from Bahrein, has forfeited all claim to his title as principal Sheikh and Chief of Bahrein."

Bushire
Desp. 3 of 25.9.1868.

Aitch. XI,
No. xi,
236-7.

80. Subsequently to the conclusion of this agreement the Resident, by way of punishment, destroyed the fort of Muharraq by gunfire and burnt certain vessels of war belonging to Sheikh Mohamed bin Khalifah. His despatch, which contains a detailed report on the course of events, makes no reference to any flying of the Persian flag by Mohamed bin Khalifah, and the bombardment of Muharraq and the punitive destruction of the warships took place after the submission of Bahrein, and so after Mohamed bin Khalifah had fled from the islands.

Pol. Res. to Govt. of
Bombay,
No. 3,
25.9.1868.

Persian Protest, November 1868.

81. The facts appear to be as stated in the preceding paragraph. It was some time before a full account of these proceedings reached either India or London. Meanwhile, as will be seen from the correspondence, extracts of which are quoted below, the action of the Government of India drew a vigorous protest from the Persian Government. The protest, after appealing to the treaties concluded between England and Persia in 1809, in 1814, in 1822 (unratified) and in 1857, urged that the Resident, instead of respecting the rights of Persia in the Gulf to the extent provided for in those treaties, had, without any prior intimation to the Persian authorities, attacked Bahrein, which island had been and still was the property of Persia; had bombarded and destroyed the Governor's fort and house and caused considerable damage; had appointed the Sheikh's brother

Teh. Desp.
to G. of I.,
28.10.1868.

Teh. Desp.
149 of
17.11.1868.

as Governor over the island on the flight, through fear, of the Sheikh; had imposed a fine; and had required the new Sheikh to find his brother and deliver him up to the British authorities. These proceedings had taken place at a time when "Sheikh Md. bin Khalifah, the Governor of Bahrein, was openly avowing his submission to and dependence upon Persia and declaring that he considered Bahrein to be indisputably Persian, in proof of which the Persian flag was flying over his fort."

F.O. to I.O.
1.2.1869.

82. Her Majesty's Minister at Tehran was instructed to communicate a suitable explanatory statement to the Persian Government. The Foreign Office suggested, however, that it might be advisable, in the event of similar proceedings again becoming necessary, that communication should be had with that Government. While this question was still under consideration a formal protest against the Resident's action was received (11th February 1869) from the Persian Chargé d'Affaires in London, who complained, inter alia, that the Resident had sunk three ships belonging to the Governor of Bahrein and fired on his palace on which the Persian flag flew, and requested that the British Government would give orders for the repair of the damage caused. He was informed in reply that "the Sheikh of Bahrein was an independent chief with whom the British Government had treaty engagements and whom they must hold strictly to the performance of those engagements."

From Gen.
Mohsin
Khan,
11.2.1869.
To Gen.
Mohsin
Khan,
5.3.1869.

Gen. Mohsin
Khan to Duke of Argyll,
13.4.1869.

83. This contention the Persian representative disputed, and in support of his view he forwarded letters addressed "from 1858 to 1869 by the Sheikh of Bahrein to His Imperial Majesty the Shah and the Prince Governor of Shiraz." The translations of these letters are dated 9th April and 12th April 1869 respectively. From internal evidence it seems probable that they were, however, written in 1860 on the occasion of the visit to Bahrein of the Persian envoy, Mirza Mehdi Khan (paragraph 67 above). They acknowledge the receipt of a Firman from the Mirza (apparently recognising Sheikh Md. as Sheikh and accompanying a Firman and a Sword of Honour for Sheikh Ali). They state emphatically that Bahrein forms part of Persia, and has always done so. They refer to an agreement reached for the future payment of tribute; remark that "the slight neglect which was lately shown on our part towards Your Imperial Majesty's Government was because they had not for a while superintended and protected us, but as now the Government of Your Imperial Majesty has intended by sending over Mirza Mehdy to enquire into and manage the affairs here, I, with my brother and all the inhabitants, feel quite ready to declare at once that we are most willing to render any services required from us towards Your Majesty's Government, being already aware that Bahrein (Persian Gulf) is part of Persia," and add "... I will hasten to hoist the flag on my residence bearing the Lion and the Sun which are the signs of the Persian Standard."

British Note of 29th April 1869.

I.O. to F.O.,
21.4.1869.

84. The question of the reply to be given to this further protest was carefully considered between the India Office and the Foreign Office. The Duke of Argyll, then Secretary of State for India, remarked that although he was of opinion that the line of policy which had hitherto been pursued of regarding the Sheikh of Bahrein as an independent sovereign, and of refusing to recognise the right of sovereignty advanced by Persia, as had been done in 1845, 1848 and 1860, could not now be abandoned without very serious risk of endangering the peace of the Gulf, yet that "he was not blind to the expediency of avoiding all causes of unnecessary irritation at the Court of Tehran and that he was willing, therefore, should Lord Clarendon desire it, as a matter of courtesy to the Persian Government, to issue instructions to the Government of India to direct the Resident in the Persian Gulf (whenever he might on any future occasion, under orders from India, be about to call the Chief of Bahrein to account for any breach of his engagements with the British Government) to notify the fact to the British Minister at Tehran for the information of the Shah's Government." Circumstances might, however, arise in which the Resident might, in the general interests of peace and order, be called upon to act promptly on his own responsibility, and in such cases the Secretary of State was not willing to waive what he considered "as not only a right pertaining to, but a duty incumbent upon, the British Government." The Foreign Office concurred in these views and the Persian representative was informed accordingly.

To Gen.
Mohsin
Khan,
29.4.1869.

85. The Persian representative on receipt of the Foreign Office letter asked that in order to make it more palatable to the Shah, certain modifications should be made in it. After private discussion between Lord Clarendon and the Duke of Argyll, of which no record exists, and an interview between the Envoy and Lord Clarendon, it was finally agreed to accept the modification embodied in the opening paragraph of the letter which follows, but also to make the addition contained in the last paragraph of that letter; and a letter so amended was despatched to him. The text (omitting an introductory paragraph) of the amended letter, which is of importance as one of the principal pieces of evidence subsequently adduced by the Persian Government in support of their claim that Her Majesty's Government have recognised Persian sovereignty over Bahrein, is as follows. The sentences in italics are those which were added in deference to the further representations from General Mohsin Khan referred to above:—

F.O. to I.O.,
11.5.1869.
I.O. to F.O.,
19.5.1869,
5.6.1869.

"The British Government readily admit that the Government of the Shah has protested against the Persian right of sovereignty over Bahrein being ignored by the British Authorities, and they have given due consideration to that protest. But it is the fact, as yourself and the Government of the Shah are undoubtedly aware, that the Sheikhs of Bahrein have at different periods entered directly into engagements with the British Government; and I beg to assure you that the British Government hold the Sheikh to these engagements solely for the purposes of preventing Piracy and Slave Trade, and of maintaining the police of the Gulf. If the Persian Government are prepared to keep a sufficient force in the Gulf for these purposes, this country would be relieved of a troublesome and costly duty; but, if the Shah is not prepared to undertake these duties, Her Majesty's Government cannot suppose His Majesty would wish that in those waters disorder and crimes should be encouraged by impunity."

"I need scarcely assure you of the friendly feelings entertained by Her Majesty's Government towards Persia, and their desire on all occasions to meet as far as possible the wishes of the Shah; and, in regard to this question, I have the honour to state to you that, whenever it is practicable to do so, Her Majesty's Government will cause the Persian Government to be informed beforehand of any measures of coercion against himself which the conduct of the Sheikh of Bahrein may have rendered necessary."

"But the British Government cannot consent to debar its officers, to whom the superintendence of the police of the Persian Gulf is entrusted, from the exercise of the right of punishing by prompt measures any violation of Treaty engagements by the Sheikh of Bahrein, when a reference to the Court of Tehran would be attended with embarrassing delays which might endanger the general peace of the Gulf; but whenever such a necessity shall arise a full communication respecting it shall be made to the Persian Government."

Overthrow and Death of Sheikh Ali (August—September 1869).

Pol. Res. to Govt. of
Bombay,
165 of 11.9.1869,
181 of
25.9.1869,
184 of
5.10.1869.

Teh. Desp.
No. 81,
14.11.1869.

86. In August—September 1869 Bahrein was invaded by the ex-Sheikh Mohammed bin Khalifah, who was joined by one Mohammed bin Abdullah, son of the Sheikh who had been deposed in 1843 (paragraph 39 above). The ruling Sheikh Ali was defeated and killed, while Sheikh Mohammed bin Abdullah assumed the leadership of the usurping party.

87. Her Majesty's Minister reported on 14th November 1869 a conversation on this incident with the Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs in the course of which the latter admitted that Persia had not acquired sufficient power or authority in that part of the Gulf to enable her to repress acts of piracy and to maintain order, but added that he hoped that before long the Shah's authority would be fully established at Bahrein, when full redress would be given for losses suffered through the recent events, and that in the meanwhile it would not be considered necessary that the British authorities should undertake coercive measures. Her Majesty's Minister further reported that "Ali bin Khalifa having forwarded letters to this Court admitting his allegiance to the Shah and offering his services to the Persian Government," an agent (Mirza Mehdi Khan, who had been Persian Envoy to Bahrein in 1859 (paragraph 67 above)) had been despatched with a Royal Firman, recognising Sheikh Ali bin Khalifah as Chief of Bahrein, but that on receipt of the news of the murder of the Sheikh by the ex-Sheikh Mahomed bin Khalifah, the Firman had been recalled and the name of the ex-Sheikh substituted (from paragraphs 94-5 below it will be seen that these statements subsequently proved to be incorrect in material particulars).

British Punitive Expedition (November—December 1869).

Pol. Res. to
Teh. tel. of 14.11.1869.

15.11.1869.

Teh. Desp.
83 of
16.11.1869.

88. Punitive operations consequent on the murder of Sheikh Ali were undertaken by the British Government in November of the same year. Previous notification was given to the Persian Government of the grounds of this expedition, the object of which was stated to be "to call the chief now in possession of Bahrein to account for his breach of the maritime peace and for the attack on Sheikh Ali bin Khalifah, who had been placed in power by the British Government."

89. The Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs on receipt of the notification in question stated that the ex-Sheikh Mohammed bin Khalifah, who had, he said, been the cause of the recent disturbances, had been killed (this was in fact incorrect); that the Resident's action would therefore be useless, and that the Persian Government hoped that he would be telegraphically instructed not to proceed to Bahrein. He added that the Persian Government would themselves keep the affairs of Bahrein by land in order and that should anything happen to affect its affairs by sea they would request the British Government to send a naval force to put affairs in order, "but up till now the state of affairs in Bahrein had not fallen into disorder."

90. The Persian agent referred to in paragraph 87 above arriving in the Gulf at this stage addressed letters to Sheikh

Mohammed bin Abdullah (see paragraph 86 above) intimating his recognition as Sheikh, and despatched them by a special messenger, who proceeded to the island in a native boat belonging to a Persian. The messenger was, however, on his arrival prevented by the Resident from landing or communicating with the Sheikh, and his letters were detained and ultimately handed by the Resident to Sheikh Mohammed bin Abdullah after the submission of that Sheikh, who returned them to Colonel Pelly after perusal. The messenger stated that he had himself no authority from the Shah's Government and was deputed by the Chief of Dayer, who was acting in obedience to Mirza Mehdi Khan.

SUBMISSION OF USURPING SHEIKHS.

Sheikh Isa bin Ali becomes Sheikh.

91. The punitive operations against Bahrein resulted in the complete submission of Sheikh Md. bin Abdullah and the ex-Sheikh Md. bin Khalifah in September 1869. It may be remarked that prior to the opening of operations Sheikh Abdullah made overtures to the Resident, which were, however, rejected, with a view to securing recognition by His Majesty's Government. He also appealed to the Wahabi Amir for recognition and protection. Sheikh Isa bin Ali, son of the murdered Sheikh Ali, voluntarily assumed the vacant Chiefship and was recognised by the Resident on behalf of the Government of India ("in no way did Colonel Pelly influence the succession") and the ex-Sheikh and Mohammed bin Abdullah were deported to India. Shortly after his installation the new Sheikh received a letter from one Hydar Khan, Zabit of the Dashti district on the Persian coast, advising him to place himself under the Shah's protection, but the incident appears to have been unimportant.

Pol. Res. to Govt. of
Bombay,
165 of 11.9.1869,
181 of
25.9.1869,
184 of
5.10.1869.

Teh. Desp.
No. 94 of
11.12.1869.
Teh. Desp.
No. 7 of 12.1.1870.

PERSIAN PROTEST, 1869-70.

Views of Government of India.

92. The Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs appears at first to have received news of the removal of the ex-Sheikh with equanimity and is said to have remarked that Persia and Great Britain had an equal interest in the maintenance of peace by sea and that Persia had therefore no reason to object to the punishment of the delinquent. But he protested in strong terms against the Resident's action in preventing the Persian agent from landing and holding communication with the Sheikh, and a still stronger protest was made by the Persian Minister in London. The Government of India, in the exhaustive reports they submitted on the Resident's action, urged, after a review of the history of the islands, that the Shah had no legitimate control over the Sheikh of Bahrein; that his Government had nevertheless encouraged the piratical faction in the Persian Gulf by sending letters of recognition to the piratical leader; that in styling Sheikh Md. bin Abdullah Chief of Bahrein the Persian Government ignored the facts that he had never held sway in Bahrein, belonged to the younger branch of the ruling family, and so had neither by right nor possession claim to this title; and that, so far from the Shah having any just cause of complaint against the Resident, the Persian Government should be called upon to give some explanation of the conduct of its officers in encouraging a piratical expedition which was prejudicial to British interests in the Persian Gulf and for the successive appointment by them of Ali bin Khalifa and Md. bin Khalifa to the sovereignty of a district over which they had no legitimate control. The Government of India added that they had no confirmation of the alleged overtures of Sheikh Ali bin Khalifa to Persia (paragraph 87 above), as to which further enquiry was being made of Her Majesty's Minister

(see paragraphs 94-95 below), but in any event could not admit "that such overtures, made without its knowledge and consent, can in any way affect its treaty relations with Bahrein."

British Reply to Persia, March 1870.

To Teh.,
No. 22,
30.3.1870.

93. Her Majesty's Minister was therefore instructed by the Foreign Office that it appeared possible that Her Majesty's Government, instead of furnishing explanations to Persia, might have cause to complain "of the proceedings of the Persian authorities in endeavouring to communicate with a piratical chief who had been guilty of a breach of the Maritime Truce, and who had attacked the Chief placed in power at Bahrein by the British Government," and was informed that no notice would be taken of the complaints against the Resident until the Persian Government gave a full explanation of the intercepted letters.

Supplementary Reports by Her Majesty's Minister, Tehran, April 1870.

94. On 6th April 1870 the Minister at Tehran reported as follows to the Government of India:—

"In my Despatch No. 81 . . . I reported that the Firman of appointment was originally in the name of Ali bin Khalifa, but that, on hearing of his death, it was altered in favour of his brother, Md. bin Khalifa. This information had reached me from a relation of . . . one of the principal Persian officials in Shiraz, and not . . . from the Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs. When further intelligence reached Shiraz from the Gulf and it was supposed that Md. bin Abdullah would retain possession of Bahrein, the Firman was probably again altered in his favour, as it was to him that it was eventually forwarded. In conversation with the Persian Minister this afternoon His Excellency admitted that this was probably the case. He said that Mirza Mehdi Khan on leaving Tehran had received general instructions for his guidance respecting the Bahrein question, but that the details were settled at Shiraz and the Firman was issued in the name of the Persian Governor of Fars and not in that of the Shah. The name inserted in this document had certainly, he said, been altered once to his knowledge, and it was not unlikely that it had been changed a second time before being forwarded to its destination.

"With regard to the overtures said to have been made by Ali bin Khalifa to the Persian Government, as reported in my Despatch No. 81, I have the honour to state that that information also reached me from a private source and not from the Ministry for Foreign Affairs. His Excellency has, however, asserted very positively to me to-day that Ali bin Khalifa had repeatedly written to the Persian Government professing allegiance to the Shah and that a number of letters containing assurances of this kind are now in his (the Minister's) possession.

"It appears to me that on the receipt of a correspondence which passed last April between Her Majesty's Government and the Shah's representative in London, the Persian Ministers, believing that the Bahrein Chief was himself well disposed to further their designs, resolved to take measures with a view to establishing, if possible, the Shah's authority in that quarter and make good his claim to exercise sovereign rights over Bahrein. Mirza Mehdi Khan was accordingly dispatched to Shiraz and Bushire and a certain latitude was given to him as to the mode in which he should proceed to carry out the wishes of his Government. The Persian authorities in Shiraz finally determined that a Firman should be addressed to Md. bin Abdullah, conferring upon him the government of Bahrein and with this the Khan hoped to be able to come to terms with the Chief then in possession of the place. But in this matter the sole object of all concerned would seem to have been to carry out the policy of the Persian Government at Bahrein without reference to the interests or wishes of Her Majesty's Government in that quarter."

95. On 8th April 1870 the Minister at Tehran addressed the following despatch to the Government of India:—

"With reference to my despatch of the 6th instant, in which I stated that the Minister for Foreign Affairs had informed me that Ali bin Khalifa had repeatedly made overtures to Persia admitting his allegiance to the Shah, I have the honour to report to Your Excellency that Mirza Sayed Khan has just sent to inform me that he was mistaken in making this assertion, and that he finds on enquiry that the letters to which he referred were not from that Chief, but from Md. bin Khalifa."

Views of Government of India, May 1870.

96. The Government of India, commenting on these facts, remarked that Mehdi Khan appeared to have left Tehran with a general discretion as to which of the various Sheikhs should be recognised as ruler. "At the capital no more definite plan appears to have been resolved on than that measures should be adopted to establish the Sheikh's assumed right of sovereignty over the island."

97. The Government of India proceeded that they had already pointed out that any disposition to admit the claims of Persia would probably lead to the revival of similar claims on the part of Turkey, a result which had in fact now been brought about (cp. paragraph 99 below). "This (i.e. the Turkish) claim rests on no better foundation than that of Persia. It was summarily rejected by Lord Palmerston in 1851 and in our opinion should not again be reopened. With equal reason the Wahabi Amir and the Sultan of Muscat could claim the sovereignty of the island, if the nominal and temporary tender of allegiance, in times of difficulty, and as a security against foreign intervention, be considered sufficient ground on which to base such pretensions. On the same ground indeed we might claim Bahrein as a part of the British dominions. But, as we have repeatedly observed, the real status of the island, and the only one which we have recognised and admitted, or are prepared to recognise and admit, in all our dealings in the Persian Gulf and our negotiations with the Chiefs, is that of an independent State, subject neither to Persia nor to Turkey, neither to the Wahabis nor to Muscat, nor yet to the British Government."

G. of I.
Desp. No. 28
of 20.5.1870.

Review of Discussions of 1868-70.

98. The matter ultimately lapsed. But from the facts and the correspondence summarised above it will be seen, in the first place, that there appears to be no foundation for the alleged overtures to Persia by the ruling Sheikh, Ali bin Khalifa, or for the statement that the Persian flag was flying at the time of the punitive expedition of 1868; and that if any overtures were made to Persia in 1868-69 (and there is no confirmatory evidence of any such overtures) they would appear to have been made by the ex-Sheikh Md. bin Khalifa, presumably in his anxiety to secure Persian support for his restoration. Secondly, while the statements contained in the Note sent by the Foreign Office on behalf of Her Majesty's Government to the Persian Chargé d'Affaires on 29th April 1869 were widely phrased, and afford some justification for the interpretation placed on them by Persia, and while the Persians may have been confirmed in their view by the absence of any protest by Her Majesty's Minister against the mission of Mirza Mehdi Khan, the terms of that Note do not, in fact, constitute more than a recognition that Persia had in the past repeatedly pressed her claim to Bahrein, and that Her Majesty's Government did not claim sovereignty over that island and interested themselves in its affairs only to the extent necessary to discharge their treaty obligations to its rulers (which included a guarantee of defence against external aggression) and to ensure the peace of the Gulf. Finally, that while Her Majesty's Government agreed to notify Persia, when circumstances permitted, before taking punitive action against Bahrein, on the only occasion on which (immediately after) they appear to have given effect to this undertaking, the terms of their communication made it clear that they regarded themselves as at liberty to punish the usurping Sheikhs Md. bin Abdullah and Md. bin Khalifa (in accordance with the obligations assumed by them under the Treaties of 1820 and 1861 with Bahrein) for their piratical attack on Bahrein and murder of the Chief placed in power there by the British Government.

X.—1870-80. From the Turkish Occupation of Hasa to the First Exclusive Agreement.

Turkish Protest, 1870.

99. In January 1870 a protest was received from the Turkish Government against the recent actions of the Resident at Bahrein. In reply the Turkish Government were informed that Her Majesty's Government could not recognise the Turkish claim to sovereignty over Bahrein; and were courteously reminded of the intimation made to them in 1851 on Lord Palmerston's instructions (paragraph 61 above).

F.O. to I.O.,
11.1.1870,
5.3.1870.
Lor. I, 901.

Turkish Occupation of Hasa. British Assurances to Bahrein, 1871.

100. In 1871 the Turks occupied Hasa. Protests at Constantinople in April and May 1871 against rumoured Turkish designs on Bahrein resulted in a repudiation by Turkey of any such designs. The assurances received from the Turkish Government were communicated to the Sheikh of Bahrein, who had asked Her Majesty's Government for their advice and their protection against the Turks in May 1871, and he was informed that so long as he observed the provisions of the Convention of 1861 (paragraph 70 above) the reciprocal obligations towards him of Great Britain would be fulfilled.

Lor. I, 902.

101. Protests about the same time at Constantinople led to a Turkish repudiation of the designs which the Turkish Government were alleged to have entertained at Bahrein, and the Turkish authorities in Hasa were given instructions by their Government which debarred them from approaching Bahrein. In May 1871 the Shah enquired from Her Majesty's Representative at Tehran as to the probable effect on Bahrein of the Turkish occupation of Hasa and was informed in reply of the assurances which had been given to Her Majesty's Government by the Turks.

Lor. I, 919.

Reply to Persian Legation at Constantinople as to meaning of British Note of April 1869.

102. In November 1871 the Secretary of the Persian Legation at Constantinople made enquiries of Her Majesty's Ambassador in connection with a rumour that a Turkish expedition was to be sent for the reduction of Bahrein, "which island the Persian Secretary stated had been acknowledged by the British Government as a portion of the Persian dominions and . . . in proof of this assertion he had handed to Sir H. Elliott a copy of the note which Lord Clarendon addressed to General Haji Mohsin Khan on 28th April 1869. Sir H. Elliott, however, observed that he Hertslet, 28.

cp. G. of I.
No. 16,
15.3.1872.

saw in that note nothing more than an acknowledgment that the claim had previously been made, but that he was unwilling to discuss the point, as he believed there was no danger of any attempt being made to interfere with the position of Bahrein as it then stood."

Turkish Claims, 1871-79.

103. Consequent on the murder of a Turkish messenger in Bahrein in August or September 1871, the Turkish Government demanded reparation direct from the Sheikh and received a conciliatory reply. On their demand being pressed the Sheikh, on the advice of the Resident, suggested that the matter be arranged between the British and the Turkish Governments, by whose joint decision he would abide, but the Turkish Government preferred that it should be settled direct by the parties by agents. Her Majesty's Government saw no objection to such a procedure so long as no compulsion or show of force by Turkey was involved. The Turks, however, let the matter drop. The incident is of some interest as illustrating the view taken by Her Majesty's Government of the Sheikh as an independent ruler who might deal direct with foreign Powers.

104. In August 1872, a further complaint having been received from Turkey of British proceedings in regard to Bahrein and the commission of "acts of sovereignty" on the part of the English, the Ambassador was informed in reply that enquiries would be made into the point raised by him and that his Government might rest assured that it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to interfere in the affairs of the Persian Gulf beyond what was imposed upon them by treaty for the preservation of peace in the waters. The Ambassador was finally informed in April 1873, after investigation, that there were no grounds whatever for the statement that the British Government had attempted to exercise acts of sovereignty over Bahrein.

F.O. to Turkish Ambassador
8.8.1872.
Hertslet, 30.
I.O. to F.O.,
30.7.1872.

105. In 1874, consequent on a Turkish claim to conscript Bahreinis resident in Basra, the Turkish Ambassador in London was referred to the British Notes of 1851 and 1870 (paragraphs 61 and 99 above), which stated that Her Majesty's Government did not admit the claims of Turkey to consider Bahrein as part of the Ottoman dominions. In the same year, on a piratical attack being made on the island by certain Bahreini exiles who had signed a petition claiming Turkish protection, the Ambassador at Constantinople handed a memorandum to the Porte in which it was stated that Her Majesty's Government could not recognise any rights or pretensions of the Porte over Bahrein. In 1875 a rumour that Her Majesty's Government were fortifying Bahrein led to representations from Turkey. The rumour was unfounded and the Turks were so informed. On its becoming known about the same time that the Turks themselves contemplated building a lighthouse on the island, the British Government entered a protest at Constantinople (October 1875), with the result that the project was abandoned.

Lor. I, 914.

Lor. I, 915.

106. In 1876, consequent on steps taken by the Turkish authorities to enforce the claims of Qatar merchants against Bahreinis, a Note was addressed to the Porte reminding them of the determination of Her Majesty's Government to protect Bahrein against any attack on its independence.

107. In 1879-80 the Turkish Government took up the cause of the rebels of 1869. Her Majesty's Government, after again disclaiming the exercise of sovereignty over Bahrein, which they regarded, they said, as independent, promised to make enquiries as to certain acts of which complaint was made by petitioners to the Turkish Government.

Lor. I, 915.

First Exclusive Agreement between Her Majesty's Government and the Sheikh of Bahrein (1880).

108. In 1880 the Political Resident, finding that the Sheikh was disposed to conclude a special arrangement with the British Government, entered on the 22nd December into what is known as the First Exclusive Agreement with him. By this Agreement the Sheikh undertook on behalf of himself and his "successors in the Government of Bahrein to the British Government to abstain from entering into negotiations or making treaties of any sort with any State or Government other than the British without the consent of the said British Government, and to refuse permission to any other Government than the British to establish diplomatic or consular agencies or coaling depôts in our territory, unless with the consent of the British Government. This engagement does not apply to or affect the customary friendly correspondence with the local authorities of neighbouring States on business of minor importance." The agreement was approved by Her Majesty's Government and ratified in 1881.

Summary, 1870-80.

109. The claims of the Wahabi Amir disappear with the subjugation of Hasa by the Turks in 1871. The Turkish claim was repeatedly pressed during this period and was consistently rejected by Her Majesty's Government.

The Persian claim appears to have been dormant.

Her Majesty's Government repudiate suggestions that they have committed "acts of sovereignty" and continue to express their view that the Sheikh is an independent ruler. In 1880 the Sheikh entered into his first exclusive agreement with Her Majesty's Government.

XI.—1880-92. From the conclusion of the First to the conclusion of the Second Exclusive Agreement with Her Majesty's Government.

Persian Démarche, 1886.

110. In September 1886 the Shah sent a verbal message to Her Majesty's Government through the Minister at Tehran that he considered the communication made to him in April 1869 as tantamount to an admission of his rights in Bahrein and that he was anxious to establish his authority effectually over the islands either by sending a Governor to Bahrein or possibly by recognising the Sheikh as representative of Persian authority, but that he wished the maritime police to remain in the hands of the British authorities. An answer was prepared by Her Majesty's Government to the effect that they did not concur in His Majesty's interpretation of the communication of April 1869. They had treaty engagements with the Sheikh, whom they considered to be independent, and must hold the Sheikh to his engagements while fulfilling those they had contracted towards him. As, however, the Shah did not return to the subject, the message was not delivered.

111. In the same year presents sent from the Persian Governor of Lar to the Sheikh were returned to the sender.

112. In 1887-88 Persian intrigues took place with a view to the establishment of Persian influence on the Arab littoral of the Persian Gulf. These were of little importance in the case of Bahrein, but it may be recorded that it appears that in the case of that principality the Persian Government had sanctioned a scheme for the seizure of Bahrein by Sheikh Jasim of Dohah in Qatar, who had seemingly undertaken to put the Persians in possession of the Sheikhdom. Two British ships were in February 1888 stationed off Bahrein, with instructions to prevent by force any hostile attempt to land by the Turks, Arabs or Persians, and the Minister at

Aitchison,
Vol. XI,
No. xxii,
237.

Lor. I, 919.

Teh. tel. 188,
27.9.1886.

F.O. to I.O.,
30.7.1886.

F.O. to Teh.,
tel. No. 58,
8.10.1886.

Lor. I, 911.

Lor. I, 920.

Tehran was asked by the Government of India so to inform the Persian Government. As, however, the Amin-us-Sultan, "on being questioned disavowed all designs on Bahrein, Her Majesty's Minister thought it better to avoid the reference to forcible action."

Warning to Turkey, 1888.

113. In March 1888 the Turkish Government were informed that any attempt to effect a landing in Bahrein would be opposed by force, and that no claim by the Porte to jurisdiction over Bahrein could be admitted, since Her Majesty's Government regarded the Sheikh as an independent ruler with whom they were in treaty relations.

Second Exclusive Agreement between Her Majesty's Government and Bahrein (1892).

114. On the 13th March 1892 the Political Resident signed a second Exclusive Agreement with the Sheikh of Bahrein on behalf of Her Majesty's Government. The provisions of the Agreement (which was ratified on 12th May 1892, and which was expressed to be binding on the Sheikh, his heirs, and successors) were as follows:—

- (1) "That I will on no account enter into any agreement or correspondence with any Power other than the British Government."
- (2) "That without the assent of the British Government I will not consent to the residence within my territory of the agent of any other Government."
- (3) "That I will on no account cede, sell, mortgage or otherwise give for occupation any part of my territory, save to the British Government."

Aitchison
(1933),
Vol. XI,
No. xiii, 238.

Further Warning to Turkey, November 1892.

115. In November 1892 the Ottoman Government were warned (apropos of the position of Bahrein at Basra) that Bahrein was under British protection, and that no interference with its natives by the Ottoman authorities could be admitted. In the same year the Porte was informed, with reference to a rumoured intention to land Turkish troops, that such action would be opposed by Her Majesty's ships.

Const. Desp.
No. 348 of
15.11.1892.

Summary, 1880-92.

116. The Turkish claim was again pressed vigorously during this period and was consistently rejected by Her Majesty's Government.

The Shah raised the question of the Persian claim in 1886, but did not press the matter.

In 1892 the Sheikh entered into his Second Exclusive Agreement with Her Majesty's Government.

XII.—1892-1913. From the Second Exclusive Agreement to the Anglo-Turkish Convention of 1913.

British repudiations of Turkish Claims, 1892-98.

117. In 1895 steps were taken at Constantinople by Her Majesty's Government to check an attempted invasion of Bahrein from Qatar, which seemed not improbably to have been inspired by the Turks, and later in the same year Her Majesty's Government twice reiterated to the Porte that Bahrein was under British protection and that no interference with it would be tolerated. The views of Her Majesty's Government on the status of the island were again officially repeated at Constantinople on two occasions in 1896. In 1897 the Constantinople Board of Health proposed to establish a sanitary post in Bahrein. The proposal was abandoned on the objections of the British delegate, who represented that Bahrein was an independent principality under British protection.

Lor. I, 935.

118. In 1898 a Turkish request that a British Vice-Consul alleged to have been appointed at Bahrein should apply to the Turkish Government for his exequatur was refused on the ground that Her Majesty's Government could not admit the right of the Turkish Government to insist that a British Consular Officer in Bahrein should be provided with a Turkish exequatur. In 1899 the Minister at Tehran informed the French representative at that capital that since 1880 the Sheikh was precluded by treaty from holding direct relations with any Power other than Her Majesty's Government and that his subjects abroad were now under British protection.

Lor. I, 935.

119. A native British Agent had for a long period of years been maintained in Bahrein. In 1900 a British Political Agent was appointed at Bahrein. The post has been maintained since that date, and has been filled by an officer of the Indian Political Department since 1904.

THE INCIDENT OF 1901.

Lor. I, 935-6.

Teh. Desp. No. 140 of 18.9.1901.

120. On 31st August 1901 a Belgian customs official in the service of the Persian Government visited Bahrein, where he called on the Sheikh and informed him that he had been deputed by the Shah to obtain his consent to place Persian custom officials in Bahrein. An official protest was at once made by His Majesty's Minister to the Persian Government, in the course of which Sir A. Hardinge remarked that no intimation had been given to the Political Resident in the Persian Gulf "of this Persian mission to an Arab State under British protection and bound by special treaties, of which the Persian Government cannot be ignorant, to the Government of India . . . It is my duty to place on record in the clearest manner that His Majesty the Emperor of India cannot acquiesce in any foreign interference in the affairs of Bahrein . . . and that any attempt to disturb the relations established by treaties of long standing between those Chiefs and the Government of India will be regarded as an unfriendly act." The Attabeg-i-Azam, in a note received on the 17th September 1901, replied: "As I have told you verbally, M. Simais has had no instructions from the Persian Government on this matter, and if there have been any steps on his part it must have been by mistake and he will be reprimanded for it."

THE DISORDERS OF 1904-05.

Lor. I, 938-42.

121. In 1904-05, consequent on a series of attacks on Persians and on German subjects in Bahrein, the Persians appealed to the Shah. The Persian Government replied that His Majesty's Government would take action on their behalf. The text of their telegram was as follows: "To the Merchants and Traders of the High Government living in Bahrein. Your telegram on the subject of the assaults which have been made upon you by the Arab roughs of Bahrein has been received. Certainly let your minds be at rest. Consultations with the English Legation have taken place on this subject, and it will shortly be settled in such a way that the oppression will be removed and that the offenders will receive their proper punishment."

122. The Germans complained to the German Vice-Consul at Bushire, who made a direct request to the Sheikh for reparation, in reply to which he was referred by His Excellency to His Majesty's Government. The Sheikh was ultimately compelled by His Majesty's Government to give redress.

Turkish Protest, 1904-05.

123. On the Turks pressing in 1904-05 for an explanation of the action taken by His Majesty's Government in connection with the ill-treatment of the German subject, the Turkish Ambassador was informed by Lord Lansdowne that it was a matter of common knowledge and well known to the Turkish Government, that His Majesty's Government had direct relations with the Sheikh of Bahrein; that the island and its natives were under British protection; and that His Majesty's Government were within their rights in taking measures to obtain redress for the outrage committed there. On the Ambassador reverting to the subject later in 1905, he was informed (20th May 1905) that His Majesty's Government must decline to entertain any further representations from the Turkish Government on the subject.

F.O. to Constantinople, No. 59 of 22.2.1905.

Reassertions of Persian Claim, 1905-13.

124. In 1905 the Persians again reasserted their claim. On the 19th February 1906, in reply to a further reiteration which appears to have been based on the treaties of 1809, 1814 and 1857, the Minister at Tehran informed the Persian Government that "The Treaties of 1809, of 1814 and of 1857 on this subject have always been scrupulously observed by His Majesty's Government, but have no bearing on the present question. His Majesty's Government have never admitted the ownership or sovereignty of Persia over Bahrein. Such a claim is in their view entirely inadmissible. His Majesty's Government consider the island of Bahrein and its inhabitants to be under British protection, and must decline to entertain any further representations on the subject. I am further to mention that this reply has invariably been made to the Ottoman Government, who have on several occasions advanced a claim to Bahrein." The Note concluded by a reference to the Persian appeal for our assistance in 1904-05 and quoted in extenso the telegram of reassurance (paragraph 121 above) to the Persian inhabitants of Bahrein then sent on behalf of the Persian Government.

19.2.1906.

125. On 13th September 1906 the Persian Grand Vizier revived the Persian claim in a letter referring to Captain Bruce's unauthorised agreement of 1822. He was reminded in reply that that agreement had been expressly disavowed by His Majesty's Government and that Captain Bruce had been recalled. In a supplementary note the Grand Vizier's attention was drawn to the fact that the then Shah himself had "refused to recognise" the stipulations of the Treaty of 1822, which had never been ratified, and had "expressed his displeasure that the Prince of Shiraz should have entered into any engagements with the British Government without his knowledge or instructions."

Teh. Desp. No. 3 of 3.1.1907.

Teh. Desp. No. 61 of 27.3.1907.

126. On the Ala-es-Sultaneh reviving the Persian claim, on the ground of the Agreement of 1822, in August 1907, his attention was drawn in a Note dated 13th August 1907 to the Notes referred to in the preceding paragraph; and to the fact that the Agreement had been disavowed alike by His Majesty's Government and by the Shah. The Note added that "since 1822 the Turkish Government have raised claims on Bahrein, and, like the Persian Government, have been informed that Bahrein is under British protection."

Teh. Desp. No. 179 of 15.8.1907.

127. In 1908 the Persian Government, in a correspondence regarding the punishment of a Bahrein subject at Lingah, intimated that instructions had been sent to Lingah that reparation should be made, but added that His Majesty's Minister would admit that "the proprietary right of the Persian Government over the island is not a matter to be disputed." The Note was returned as inadmissible to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. A modified version was subsequently accepted by His Majesty's Government, which was acknowledged by a Note from His Majesty's Minister,

Teh. tel. 95 of 11.4.1908.

Teh. Desp. No. 40 of 22.1.1909.

reaffirming that His Majesty's Government maintained as regards the status of Bahrein in Persia the position that the island of Bahrein and its inhabitants were under British protection, and that they would be guided entirely by their own views of the position should any action of the Persian Government make representations necessary.

Teh. Desp.
No. 95 of
26.4.1910.
P. 3539/10.

P.G. 13: 67,
§ 24.

128. Early in 1910 the Persian Government assimilated the formalities to be fulfilled in the case of persons visiting Bahrein to those prescribed in the case of travellers to Persian ports, a measure which, as pointed out by the Foreign Office at the time, constituted a fresh attempt to assert Persian sovereignty over the island, but it was agreed that in view of the undesirability of raising the general question, no protest should be made to them. In July of the same year it was reported that internal Persian coastal passes issued to persons proceeding to Bahrein from Persian ports were visé by a Persian merchant residing in Bahrein. In 1912 the individual in question was forbidden to take any action in regard to the endorsement of passes held by Persian subjects for travelling in Bahrein. The endorsements in question were, however, henceforth granted by the Political Resident—a practice, as pointed out by the Political Resident nine years later, "of itself open to objection, as it might be construed into a tacit admission that the Persian passport authorities are justified in giving passes for another Persian port to persons going to Bahrein."

Withdrawal of Turkish Claim to Bahrein in Anglo-Turkish Convention of 29th July 1913.

129. On 29th July 1913 His Majesty's Government signed a convention (which still awaited ratification on the outbreak of the War of 1914-18) with the Ottoman Government, under which that Government renounced all their claims to the islands of Bahrein, the independence of which they recognised. His Majesty's Government on their part declared that they had no intention of annexing the islands and undertook not to allow the Sheikh of Bahrein to disturb the autonomy of the peninsula of El Katr or to annex it, and to ensure that the Sheikh should not discriminate against Ottoman subjects in the matter of dues levied upon pearl fisheries. The Turkish Government on their side accepted a reservation of the right of the population of Bahrein to visit Zakhnuniyah Island for fishing, and recognised the rights of subjects of the Sheikh to British consular protection in Turkey. This arrangement, followed, as it was, by the disappearance of Turkey from the Gulf after the War of 1914-18, disposed of the Turkish claim to Bahrein, which had been reasserted on numerous occasions and with great insistence since 1847.

Summary, 1892-1913.

130. The Turkish claim was repeatedly raised during the early part of this period, but consistently opposed by His Majesty's Government. It was finally abandoned in the (unratified) Anglo-Turkish Convention of July 1913. While that Convention was never ratified, the abandonment of the Turkish claim was confirmed by Article 16 of the Treaty of Lausanne of 1923.

The Persian claim was also frequently pressed and was consistently repudiated in strong terms by His Majesty's Government.

XIII.—1913-34.

Exercise of Jurisdiction over Foreigners by British Agent in Bahrein.

P.G. 13,
§ 8, p. 62,
§ 10, p. 63.

131. In virtue of the Convention of 1861 (paragraph 70 above) and of subsequent delegations by the Sheikhs, the British Representative in Bahrein has for over 70 years exercised important judicial powers in the islands. The Sheikh in 1909-12 formally requested His Majesty's Government to exercise jurisdiction over foreigners in Bahrein other than the subjects of Arab potentates. An Order in Council conferring such jurisdiction on the Political Agent was made in 1913. It was supplemented by a further Order in 1922. Since 1920 jurisdiction over all foreign subjects has rested with the British authorities within the limits of the Orders in Council.

132. The Sheikh, on 14th May 1914, undertook not to entertain any overtures for an oil concession save after consultation with the Political Agent and with the approval of His Majesty's Government. Aitch., XI, No. xvi, 239.

Undertakings secured from Ibn Saud, December 1915.

133. In 1915 His Majesty's Government, in entering into an Agreement with Ibn Saud, then ruler of Nejd, secured an undertaking from him "to refrain from all aggression on, or interference with the territories of ... Bahrein. . . ." Aitch., XI, No. ii, 206-8.

Persian Claim reasserted, 1922-23.

134. In 1922 His Majesty's Consul at Bunder Abbas reported that the Persian passport officials at Lingah had ruled that Bahreinis were Persian subjects and should be given Persian passports. They seized two British certificates of identity granted to Bahrein subjects, but on representations being made by the Minister at Tehran instructions were given by the Central Government that there was to be no repetition of this incident. In 1922, also, the Persian delegate at a Postal Conference held at Bushire stated that while not for the moment pressing for the transfer to Persia of the Bahrein post office, his action was without prejudice to the Persian claim to Bahrein. P.G. 13, 67, § 26.

135. In 1923, consequent on a Press campaign and a discussion in the Majliss on the desirability of giving Bahrein the right to return a member to the Persian Parliament, which was referred to a Commission for report, His Majesty's Government decided that it was desirable to address a formal Note to the Persian Government in terms similar to those employed in 1906 (paragraph 124 above). Owing to the difficult internal situation in Persia this proposal was dropped, but in September 1923 the Persian Government was informed that the island was now a British protectorate, and that His Majesty's Government did not contemplate any alteration of its status. The Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs replied that the Government of which he was a member had no intention of laying claim to Bahrein on behalf of Persia. But despite this statement the Minister for Foreign Affairs again reverted to the question in the following month. P.G. 13, 67-8, §§ 27-9.

His Majesty's Government remove Sheikh Isa for Misgovernment (1923).

136. Consequent on the gross misgovernment of Sheikh Isa, who had been ruler of Bahrein since 1869, the Sheikh was deprived by His Majesty's Government of his control of affairs in Bahrein on 26th May 1923, and was granted an allowance, his son, Sheikh Hamad (whose right of succession had been recognised by His Majesty's Government in 1901) being appointed to act for him "as his father's fully empowered agent." P.G. 13, 63-4, §§ 11-14.

Oil concession granted by Sheikh, 1925.

137. In 1925 an oil concession was granted by the Sheikh of Bahrein to the Eastern and General Syndicate, a British corporation, with the approval of His Majesty's Government.

Undertakings secured from Ibn Saud in Treaty of Jedda, 1927. Persian Protest.

138. The Treaty of Jedda, concluded on 20th May 1927, between His Majesty's Government and Ibn Saud, the ruler of Saudi Arabia, in substitution for the Treaty of 1915 (paragraph 133 above), provided inter alia that "His Majesty the King of the Hedjaz and of Nejd and its Dependencies" should "maintain friendly and peaceful relations with the territories of . . . Bahrein and with the Sheikhs of Qatar and the Oman Coast who are in special treaty relations with His Britannic Majesty's Government." Consequent thereon, a strong protest was received on 26th November 1927 from the Persian Government, copies of which were despatched to the League of Nations. The Persian protest was based essentially on the recognition stated to have been accorded to Persian sovereignty over Bahrein in Lord Clarendon's Note of 29th April 1869 (paragraph 85 above). A reasoned reply to the Persian Note was despatched by His Majesty's Government on 18th January 1928, and circulated to the League. While avoiding any definite statement as to their own position in Bahrein or its basis, His Majesty's Government in their Note repudiated the Persian claim in the strongest terms, and intimated that no argument such as was suggested could be based on the communication of 29th April 1869.

Aitch., XI,
No. vii,
227-9.
26.11.1927.
P. 5559/27.

P. 322/28

Attitude of Sheikhs to Persian claim (1928).

139. The Sheikhs of Bahrein, on being apprised of the revival of Persia's claim, gave a letter to the Political Resident, requesting His Majesty's Government in accordance with their treaties "to defend Bahrein from outside interference" and to act as their agents in rebutting the Persian claims, and intimating that the Sheikhs proposed to send Sheikh Mohamed, brother of Sheikh Hamad, the deputy ruler, and son of the deposed ruler, Isa, as their representative in answering the claim should the case be taken to Geneva.

P. 1409/28.

Further Persian Protest, 2nd August 1928.

140. On the 2nd August 1928 the Persian Government communicated a lengthy and reasoned reply to the British Note of 18th January 1928. The Note based its reiteration of the Persian claim on the principle that territory belonging to a sovereign State could definitely be detached from that State only with the consent of the State in question, which had not been given in the case of Bahrein; and alleged that the terms of the Foreign Office Note of 29th April 1869 were conclusive evidence of the view then held of the rights of Persia by His Majesty's Government; that Bahrein had consistently recognised Persian sovereignty, as could be proved by documentary evidence, up to the date when the Sheikhs were instigated to rebellion by a foreign government; that no valid argument could be founded on the direct relations into which the Sheikhs had entered with His Majesty's Government, since their action had been without the approval of their suzerain; that the relations of Bahrein with Persia were more highly developed than with any other independent civilised country; that the Persian claim had been consistently and uninterruptedly pressed; and finally that even if the Treaty of 1822 was disavowed by His Majesty's Government, it was material evidence of the view held by a British officer of great experience at the time of its conclusion, and that its disavowal by the then Shah of Persia was not because of any doubt on his part as to the true status of Bahrein.

P. 1640/29

141. A reasoned reply, which examined in detail the arguments put forward by the Persian Government and reached the conclusion that they were without substance, was despatched and circulated to the League at the request of His Majesty's Government on 18th February 1929.

Assignment of Bahrein Oil Concession to American Interests, 1930. Fresh Persian Protest.

142. On 23rd July 1930, the oil concession granted to the Eastern and General Syndicate in 1925 having been assigned by that Corporation, with the approval of the Sheikh and His Majesty's Government, to an American subsidiary of the Standard Oil Company of California, a formal protest against such assignment was received from the Persian Government, based on the ground that, Bahrein being Persian territory, neither the Sheikh nor His Majesty's Government had any right to grant a concession. The protest reserved the right of Persia to claim damages. Treaty negotiations were at the time proceeding with Persia, and it was thought unnecessary to send any reply to this Note, which was, however, circulated, at the request of the Persian Government, to the League of Nations.

DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN HIS MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT AND PERSIA, 1928-34.

143. Between 1928 and 1934 treaty negotiations, with a view to the conclusion of a general treaty which should dispose of outstanding points of difference, were in progress with Persia, the question of Bahrein figuring prominently in those negotiations. The general attitude taken by the Persians was that Bahrein was a point of great importance to them, but that in return for a sufficient quid pro quo they would be prepared to abandon their claims. His Majesty's Government on their side consistently maintained that the Persian claim was worthless, and that while they would gladly see it finally disposed of as part of a general settlement, they would not be prepared to make any specific concession in return for its abandonment. Various formulæ were worked out in discussion between His Majesty's Representatives in Tehran and the representatives of the Persian Government with a view to an agreed solution. The negotiations have, however, failed to reach any conclusion and are at the moment suspended without any prospect of early resumption.

144. In 1932 the Persian Government protested to His Majesty's Government against the issue of British Indian postage stamps surcharged "Bahrein," and repeated their protest to the League. Their protest was rejected by His Majesty's Government, and the stamps issued in August 1933.

On 22nd May 1934 a further protest against the operation of the Bahrein oil concession was addressed by the Persian Government to the United States Minister at Tehran, the United States Government and His Majesty's Government, and copies were circulated at the request of Persia to the League of Nations. His Majesty's Government propose to reply to this communication in a Note drawing attention to their Notes of January 1928 and February 1929 and to request the League of Nations to circulate this reply to the States Members of the League.

XIV.—Conclusion.

145. It may be convenient in concluding this memorandum on the recent history of Bahrein to summarise very briefly the claims to sovereignty over the island which have been advanced by various countries since 1783; the particular basis of those claims in the case of Persia (whose claim is alone at the present time of any importance); and the basis and development of the attitude of His Majesty's Government.

A.—Claims to or Assertions of Sovereignty over Bahrein, 1873 to 1934.

146.—(a) Muscat.—Bahrein subject to Muscat 1800-01, 1811? to 1816, 1820-22. Tribute paid to Muscat 1820.

2953

K

Bahreini independence recognised by Treaty 1829. Muscat thereafter deterred by His Majesty's Government from pursuing its claims.

(b) Egypt.—Representative of Mehemet Ali, Viceroy of Egypt, informed by Her Majesty's Government in 1839 that no claim upon Bahrein could be admitted. But in 1839-40 the Sheikh acknowledged Egyptian supremacy and he paid tribute during this period.

(c) Wahabi Amirs of the Arab Mainland.—Bahrein under protection of or subject to Wahabi Amirs 1803-11; 1816; 1830-33 (tributary); 1836-1838-39 (tributary); 1847 (tributary); 1852 (tribute). In 1867 (see paragraph 75) it was held by Government of India that tribute was paid to the Wahabis only in respect of mainland possessions and not of Bahrein. The claims of the Amirs disappeared with the conquest of Hasa by Turkey in 1871.

(d) Turkey.—The islands have never in the period subsequent to 1783 been occupied by Turkey or (if the incidents of 1860-61 (paragraphs 67-9 above) are ignored) subject to Turkish sovereignty. But Turkish claims to them were advanced, directly or indirectly, in 1847, 1851, 1870, 1874, 1875, 1876, 1879, 1888, 1892, 1893, 1895, 1896 and 1905, and on each occasion, save in 1847, when certain assurances were given by Turkey (paragraph 52), were rejected by the British Government. The Turkish claim was finally withdrawn in the Anglo-Turkish Convention of 1913. That Convention was never ratified, but the withdrawal of the claim was confirmed by Article 16 of the Treaty of Lausanne of 1923.

(e) Persia.—The Persian claim has been consistently urged on a variety of occasions through the period in question. The Sheikhs momentarily submitted themselves to Persia in 1799 and paid tribute. In 1816-17 they received a Persian envoy and apparently appealed for help to Tehran. They again momentarily submitted to Persia and received an envoy in 1839. Persian aid was invoked and a Persian emissary received at Bahrein in 1860-61, while in 1869 the deposed ex-Sheikh Mohammed bin Khalifa may have made overtures to Persia (though there is no confirmation of this) to enable him to re-establish his control over the island.

The Persian claim appears, apart from this, to have been asserted in 1822, 1825, 1844, 1848, 1861, 1862, 1866, 1868, 1869, 1886, 1901, 1905, 1906, 1907, 1910, 1927, 1928, 1930, 1932-33 and 1934, and to have been rejected by His Majesty's Government in 1822 (as part of their refusal to accept Captain Bruce's Treaty), 1825, 1844, 1848, 1861, 1862, 1866-67, 1869, 1901, 1906, 1907, 1908-09, 1923, 1928, 1929, 1933 and 1934.

B.—Basis of the Persian Claim.

147. Ignoring contentions such as that the use of the term "Persian Gulf" is a recognition of Persian sovereignty over the various islands of the Gulf, Persia has at one time or other based her claim on the nine grounds examined below:—

(1) History of the Islands prior to 1783.

The history of the islands prior to the expulsion of the Persians in 1783 is dealt with in paragraphs 3 to 5 above. It will be seen that at various periods since the beginning of the Christian era, Persia has exercised a degree of control over the islands, and in particular that during the 30 years prior to 1783 her control was of a more definite character. On the other hand, the facts recorded above do not support any claim by Persia to an uninterrupted occupation or control of the islands.

Persia has on various occasions in the past appealed to the early history of Bahrein in support of her claim that it is historically Persian territory. Since 1930, too, certain Persian newspapers, presumably inspired, have dealt at considerable length with the history of Bahrein in the more or less remote past, and have supported their statements by quotations from, or references to, Arab or Persian geographers or historians. Owing to the absence of records and the shortness of time available, it has been impossible to check these statements in detail, or to conduct elaborate researches into the writings of Arab geographers and others from which further information might be secured. But it is arguable that the position of the islands prior to 1783 is at most only of very indirect importance in the present connection. The essential weakness in the Persian claim is, it is suggested, that there has been no effective exercise of authority in the islands by Persia since her expulsion in 1783, and that the Sheikhs, who originally established themselves by conquest, have now acquired a prescriptive title, based on an uninterrupted occupation of 150 years by the present ruling family.

(2) The Absence of Persian Consent to the Detachment of Bahrein from Persia.

The Persian Government, in paragraph 2 of their Note of 2nd August 1928 (Appendix B), invited attention to "the following international juridical principle. . . . A territory belonging to a sovereign State cannot be lawfully detached so long as the right of ownership has not been transferred by this State to another State in virtue of an official act, in this case a treaty, or so long as its annexation by another State or its independence have not been officially recognised by the lawful owner of the territory." They added (correctly) that Persia has never renounced her sovereignty or ceded it to another State or ever recognised any of the Sheikhs of Bahrein as independent rulers.

The argument put forward by the Persian Government under this head is examined in detail in paragraphs 6 and 7 of the Note despatched by the Foreign Office on 18th February 1929 in reply to the Persian Note of 2nd August 1928 (Appendix B). His Majesty's Government expressed their inability to agree that any such principle, if alleged to be of universal application, formed part of international law. The deciding factor in the question of international title in cases in which territory has effectively established its independence of the former sovereign is the effective establishment by that territory of its independence, "and in the case of Bahrein His Majesty's Government regard as wholly untenable the proposition that effective possession and administration by the present ruling family for 145 years, during which these rulers have been independent of Persia and during which no Persian authority has been exercised in their dominions, can be affected by the mere consideration that the Persian Government have not set their signature to a document formally recognising the fact of their independence." In paragraph 7 of the same Note His Majesty's Government cite historical precedents to show that the theory of the necessity for the formal consent of the dispossessed State is not one which has ever obtained international acceptance.

(3) The Unratified Treaty of 1822.

The circumstances in which the Treaty of 1822 was concluded by Captain Bruce with the representative of the Prince Governor of Shiraz are set out in paragraphs 20-21 above. As will be seen, Captain Bruce concluded it without the authority of or reference to Government. The treaty into which he had entered was immediately officially disavowed, and the Persian Government so informed, and Captain Bruce, as a sign of disapproval of his action, was removed from his appointment. The Persian Government on their side equally disapproved the action of the Prince Governor of Fars in entering into any treaty discussions without the prior approval of the Shah. [The Persian Government were reminded of this in 1825, 1845, 1866, 1907, 1928 and 1929.] It appears impossible in these circumstances to base any legitimate claim to Persian sovereignty over Bahrein on the provisions of the Treaty of 1822.

(4) The Gold Coin alleged to have been struck at Bahrein in 1817.

Please see paragraph 47 above.

A Persian Mission appears to have visited Bahrein in 1816 or 1817 (paragraph 9 above) and it is conceivable that a coin might have been struck on that occasion. On the other hand, it would probably be extremely difficult to prove that the coin had not in fact been struck elsewhere, though with an indication that it had been minted at Bahrein. The incident is in itself of relatively small importance, and it would, it is suggested, be impossible for Persia to use such an incident, even if it could be proved, save in support of arguments of much more substantial character.

(5) Payment of Pecshkesh, Offerings or Tribute at various Stages by Bahrein to Persia.

From paragraph 6 above it will be seen that tribute appears to have been paid by Bahrein to Persia in 1799. The rulers of Bahrein may also have offered to pay tribute in 1839 (paragraph 32) and appear to have offered to do so in 1860 (paragraph 67). In assessing the importance of the payment of tribute in 1799, or, if it then took place, in 1839 or 1860, it is relevant that such payment or promise of payment was immediately followed by the submission of the rulers of Bahrein, in 1800 to Muscat, in 1839 to the Egyptians, and in 1860 to the Turks. In estimating the importance of such payments as evidence of a recognition of Persian suzerainty, the arguments advanced by Her Majesty's Minister at Tehran in his Despatch No. 28 of March 1845, in which Colonel Sheil remarks that the Chiefs of Bahrein "had in all probability from time to time given peeshkesh, offerings, or tribute to Persia as a mark of superiority, as Kandahar and Herat still continue to do, without an acknowledgment of subjection"; and the comment thereon of the Secret Committee of the East India Company that "presents and complimentary messages do not imply an acknowledgment of sovereignty, and they have not been confined to Persia" are also relevant.

(6) Flying of the Persian Flag by the Sheikh of Bahrein.

(a) The Persian flag was hoisted by the Sheikh of Bahrein in 1860. But as will be seen from paragraph 67 above, hardly had it been hoisted when, on the arrival of a Turkish emissary, it was lowered and the Turkish flag hoisted in its place. At a later stage in 1860-61 the Persian and Turkish flags were apparently flown side by side by the Sheikh. It appears difficult in these circumstances to base any substantial argument on the incident.

(b) The Notes addressed by the Persian envoy in London to the Foreign Office in February 1869 alleged that the Persian flag had been hoisted by Sheikh Md. bin Khalifah and that the Resident had in September 1868 bombarded the Sheikh's palace on which the flag was flying. There appears to be no foundation for the suggestion that the Persian flag was flying when the Resident reached Bahrein or that it was fired on (see paragraph 80). If previously hoisted it had, by the time of the Resident's arrival, been hauled down.

(c) In the undated letters from Sheikh Md. bin Khalifah communicated to the Foreign Office by the Persian envoy in April 1869, the Sheikh stated that he was hoisting the flag of the Lion and Sun over Bahrein. If, as seems probable from internal evidence, these letters date from the period of the abortive Persian Mission to Bahrein of 1860-61, it is relevant in assessing their importance that immediately after the reception of the Persian envoy, a Turkish envoy was received, the Persian flag hauled down and the Turkish flag substituted, and that in the early part of 1861 the flags of Persia and Turkey appear to have been flying side by side on the forts at Bahrein. There is nothing to show that either flag flew in Bahrein between the conclusion of the Convention of 1861 (paragraph 70) and 1868.

(d) In September 1869 the ex-Sheikh Md. bin Khalifah attacked the islands, and with the assistance of Sheikh Md. bin Abdulla killed the ruling Sheikh Ali. The Persian flag may have been hoisted on this occasion. But there is no reference to this in the detailed reports of the capture of the islands by Sheikh Md. bin Khalifah and Sheikh Md. bin Abdullah, or of the operations as the result of which those Sheikhs were reduced at the end of 1869. (Enclosure to Government of India's Despatch No. 7 of 25th January 1870; Resident's Despatches of 11th September, 25th September, and 5th October 1869.)

(7) Letters from past Rulers of Bahrein admitting Persian Suzerainty.

It is by no means improbable that in 1799, 1816-17, and 1839 the rulers of Bahrein addressed letters to the Persian Government acknowledging Persian suzerainty over the island, and they appear certainly to have done so in 1860. But the only letters the text of which has ever been communicated to Her Majesty's Government are the two letters communicated by the Persian envoy in London in 1869. Those letters indeed categorically acknowledge Persian suzerainty over Bahrein and state that it has been uninterruptedly exercised in the past. But they appear to date from 1860, and the submission of Bahrein to Turkey and the hauling down of the Persian flag in the same year are, it is suggested, material in assessing the weight to be attached to them.

(8) Declarations made by Her Majesty's Government to the Persian Minister in London, April 1869.

(a) These declarations are examined in paragraph 98 above. The text of the Note addressed by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the Persian envoy on 29th April 1869, on which the subsequent Persian claims have to a considerable extent been based, is given in paragraph 85 above. The wording of that Note, and the general attitude adopted by Her Majesty's Government, as evidenced by their acquiescence in the despatch of a mission to Bahrein by Persia, undoubtedly afforded Persia justification for the inferences she appears to have drawn. But, as pointed out in paragraph 10 of the Note addressed to the Persian Minister on 18th February 1929 and reproduced in Appendix B, the Note in question, while very loosely expressed, was never intended to bear the interpretation now placed upon it by the Persian Government (cp. in this connection, paragraphs 102 and 110 above), and in stating that due consideration had been given in the past by Her Majesty's Government to the Persian claim it did not in any way admit that that claim was valid. The Note, indeed, confirmed the intention of the British Government to continue to hold the Sheikhs to the treaty engagements which had been entered into with them as independent rulers.

(b) The undertaking given by Her Majesty's Government in the same correspondence to communicate in future with Persia before undertaking punitive action against the rulers of Bahrein is prima facie consistent with a recognition by Her Majesty's Government of Persian claims to that island. But it appears, however, in fact to have been no more than a courteous indication by His Majesty's Government of their desire to pay the fullest possible attention to any Persian claims. It will be observed that the first (and apparently the only) communication made to the Persian Government in discharge of this understanding, intimated to that Government the intention of Her Majesty's Government to proceed at once against the "Chief now in possession of Bahrein" consequent on his breach of the maritime peace and his attack on the Sheikh who had been placed in power at Bahrein by the British Government.

(9) Closeness of Relations at the present Day between Persia and Bahrein.

The Sheikhs of Bahrein are strongly opposed to any recognition of Persian suzerainty (cp. paragraph 139). The Persian suggestion that relations are at the present time closer between Persia and Bahrein than between Bahrein and any other independent civilised State is without foundation. Relations are at least equally close with Saudi Arabia, and the closest relations are maintained in addition with Great Britain and with British India.

The Terms of the Treaties of 1809, 1814 and 1857 between the British Government and Persia.

148. In addition to the nine arguments examined above, Persia has on more than one occasion appealed to the provisions of her treaties of 1809, 1814 and 1857 with the British Government in connection with her claim to Bahrein. Her appeal is based substantially on the fact that those treaties provide in certain circumstances for the evacuation of Persian territory occupied by British troops. The relevant passages of the treaties are as follows:—

Aitch. XIII,
No. v, 53.

(i) By the preliminary Treaty of 1809 between His Majesty's Government and Persia, the Persian Government undertook not to "permit any European force whatever to pass through Persia either towards India or towards the ports of that country"; while His Majesty's Government undertook "in case any European forces have invaded or shall invade the territories of His Majesty the King of Persia" to "afford to His Majesty the King of Persia a force, or in lieu of it a subsidy, with warlike ammunition . . . and officers. . . ."

Article 5 of the same treaty provided: "If a detachment of British troops has arrived from India in the Gulf of Persia and, by the consent of His Persian Majesty, landed on the island of Karak or any of the Persian ports, they shall not in any manner possess themselves of such places, and from the date of these preliminary articles the said detachment shall be at the disposal of His Majesty the King of Persia, the amount of which shall be settled in the definitive treaty."

Article 6 provided that "If the said troops remain by the desire of His Majesty the King of Persia either at Karak or at any other port in the Gulf of Persia" they shall be treated in a friendly manner by the Governor and arrangements made for the supply to them of provisions, &c. at fair prices.

(ii) Treaty of 1814.—Article (2) provides that "His Britannic Majesty further engages not to interfere in any dispute which may hereafter arise between the Princes, noblemen and great chiefs of Persia, and if one of the contending parties should even offer a Province of Persia with a view to obtaining assistance, the English Government shall not agree to such proposal, nor by adopting it possess themselves of such part of Persia." Aitch. XIII, No. vii, 60.

Article 11 provided that "Should His Persian Majesty require assistance from the English Government in the Persian Gulf, they shall, if convenient and practicable, assist him with ships of war and troops. The expenses of such expedition shall be accounted for and defrayed by the Persian Government, and the above ships shall anchor in such ports as shall be pointed out by the Persian Government and not at other harbours without permission, except from absolute necessity." Aitch. XIII, No. xviii, 81.

(iii) The Treaty of Peace of 4th March 1857, drawn up on the conclusion of the war between Persia and Great Britain, provided that "Peace being happily concluded between Their said Majesties, it is hereby agreed that the forces of H.M. the Queen shall evacuate Persian territory, subject to the conditions and stipulations hereafter specified" (Art. 2), and that "immediately on the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty the British troops will desist from all acts of hostility against Persia, and the British Government engages further that as soon as the stipulations in regard to evacuation by the Persian troops of the Herat and Afghan territories as well as in regard to the reception of the British Mission at Tehran shall have been carried into full effect, the British troops shall without delay be withdrawn from all ports, places and islands belonging to Persia. . . ."

If Bahrein were Persian territory and if it had been occupied by British forces at the times envisaged by the treaty provisions to which appeal is made by Persia, there might be some force in the Persian argument, though even then His Majesty's Government might claim that the fact that their actual relations with Bahrein had in no way been affected by the provisions of those treaties, and that Persia had made no protest at the time against any failure to implement those provisions clearly showed that Persia had accepted in the past the fact that Bahrein fell outside her territorial limits. In fact, neither in 1809, 1814 nor in 1857 was there any British occupation of Bahrein; while His Majesty's Government, never having admitted Persian sovereignty over Bahrein or regarded Bahrein as an integral part of Persia, have in the past adopted the attitude that the terms of the treaties referred to above are irrelevant for the present purpose. As stated by His Majesty's Government in 1906 in reply to a Persian Note which based the Persian claim upon the provisions of those treaties, "the treaties of 1809, 1814 and 1857 on this subject have always been scrupulously observed by His Majesty's Government, but have no bearing on the present question. His Majesty's Government have never admitted the ownership or sovereignty of Persia over Bahrein. Such a claim is in their view entirely inadmissible."

Review of the Persian Claim.

149. It is relevant in the first place that from 1847 to 1913 the Turkish claim to Bahrein was pressed with at least equal vigour to the Persian claim, and that through much of that period the Turkish claim had a stronger practical justification than can be claimed by Persia since a period long prior to 1783, in that Turkey was the suzerain of the adjoining continental littoral of Arabia and held or preferred claims to both sides of the Gulf by which Bahrein is enfolded. Moreover, Muscat, which in the early part of the 19th century on more than one occasion established a temporary control over Bahrein and drew tribute from it, was deterred from urging its claims by force from 1829 onwards only by the attitude of His Majesty's Government, while the Wahabi Amirs brought effective pressure to bear on Bahrein and drew tribute from it, though latterly probably in respect only of Bahreini possessions on the mainland, at frequent intervals through the early part of the 19th century, and desisted only with their subjugation by Turkey in 1870. Persia, in other words, was up to 1913 one only of the claimants to Bahrein, and through much of the period 1847 to 1913 if anything a less insistent and to some extent a less plausible claimant than Turkey.

150. These considerations, however, apart, the general effect of a review of the history of Bahrein over the last 150 years and of an examination of the specific arguments put forward by Persia and referred to in paragraphs 147-8 above is to suggest that there is no solid basis for a Persian claim to suzerainty or sovereignty over the islands. The geographical remoteness of the islands from Persia and the fact that their population is Arab are admittedly not decisive arguments. The real weakness in the Persian claim appears to be that there has been no effective exercise of Persian authority in the islands since the expulsion of Persia by the ancestors of the present ruling house in 1783. Such incidents as the momentary hoisting of the Persian flag in 1860, its flying side by side with the Turkish flag in 1860-61, or the temporary tender of allegiance to Persia in 1799, 1816-17 and 1839 must be considered in relation to the history of the islands as a whole, in the period now under consideration, and in particular to the consistent claim of Turkey between 1847 and 1913 and to the absence of any sequel to such momentary acknowledgment of or appeals to Persian power; and they cannot carry the weight of a long dealing extending over a course of years. The remarks of the Government of India in 1870, quoted in paragraph 97 above, are relevant in this connection, as are the observations in paragraph 8 of the British Note to Persia of 18th February 1929.

It may be added, too, that during the period from 1783 Bahrein has at various dates been in a position to enter into treaty engagements or discussions with neighbouring States such as Muscat (paragraph 26), Turkey (paragraph 103), the Egyptian Viceroy, Mehemet Ali (paragraph 34) and His Majesty's Government on a basis inconsistent with her being at the time subject to Persian jurisdiction. A further point of some importance is the absence, so far as available records show, of any reference to Persia by the Sheikhs of Bahrein, at any date since the conquest of Bahrein by the ancestors of the present rulers in 1783, on the occasion of their accession, or of any formal acknowledgment by Bahrein on such occasions of sovereignty or suzerainty such as might be expected from a Sheikh who regarded himself as a vassal of Persia. Nor does any protest at the absence of any such formal acknowledgment appear at any time to have been made by Persia.

151. The correspondence of 1869-70, to which particular attention has been paid by Persia in the past, and which may be thought the strongest contention that Persia is in a position to put forward, may indeed be quoted as evidence of the view taken by Her Majesty's Government at that period of the relation of Persia to Bahrein. But it cannot be valid as against the Sheikhs, and while it is sufficiently loosely expressed to afford some justification for the construction which has been placed on it by Persia, it is relevant that the construction placed on it by Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, and supported by the Government of India, passed without challenge in 1871 (paragraph 102); that a similar interpretation was placed on it, with a minimum of preliminary discussion, in 1886 (paragraph 110); that at frequent intervals between 1870 and 1880 His Majesty's Government maintained the independence of Bahrein against Turkey (paragraphs 99-107 above); that so early as January 1870 they drew the attention of the Turkish Government to the British Note of 1851 (paragraph 61 above); and that His Majesty's Government have uninterruptedly maintained the independence of Bahrein against Persia and Turkey alike since the date of the correspondence in question.

152. The Sheikhs themselves appear, particularly in the early part of the past century, before their relations with Her Majesty's Government were placed on a more definite footing by the Agreements of 1880 and 1892, to have been guided by a consideration of their own immediate interests in deciding on the line of policy to be adopted towards the stronger rulers by whom they were surrounded. But not only is it now almost three-quarters of a century since any appeal, however flimsy, appears to have been made to Persia by Bahrein, but the present Sheikh (like his predecessor) is keenly apprehensive of any recognition of the Persian claim, to which he is most strongly opposed.

C.—Attitude of British Government, 1820-1934.

153. From 1820 onwards His Majesty's Government consistently dealt with the Sheikhs as independent rulers. They concluded treaties with them on that basis in 1820, 1847, 1861, 1868, 1880 and 1892, and they have been prepared to maintain their independence by diplomatic, or on occasion by forcible methods against challenge from outside, whether from Persia, Turkey, Egypt or the Wahabis. They originally entered into relations with the Sheikhs and promised them a measure of protection (paragraph 16) in the interests of securing the peace of the Persian Gulf. In the early stages of those relations they appear to have been solely concerned to achieve this object (in 1820 they even offered their mediation, which was, however, not accepted by Persia, to secure the payment of tribute to Persia by the Sheikhs), and they restricted their interference with the internal affairs of the Sheikhdom to the minimum required to secure the interests of British subjects. They were consistently reluctant to establish a protectorate over Bahrein in view of the probable local embarrassments in regulating the succession, &c., in which this might involve them, and in 1849 they formally declined a request by the Sheikh that he and the islands should be taken under British protection. In 1861 (paragraph 70) they gave the Sheikhs more categorical guarantees of protection in return for more binding undertakings. Their correspondence with the Persian Minister in London in 1869-70 shows the Home Government, however, still ready at that date to adopt the attitude that if any other Power would discharge the objects which had led Great Britain to undertake certain responsibilities in relation to Bahrein, she would gladly see them do so. Closer relations with the Sheikh and closer control over his freedom of action were established for the first time by the Exclusive Agreement of 1880. Relations became closer still with the conclusion of the Exclusive Agreement of 1892. Since that date the position of Bahrein, though His Majesty's Government make no claim to sovereignty, though the Sheikhdom continues to be regarded as independent from the international standpoint, and though the Sheikhs enjoy a very large measure of internal autonomy, has tended increasingly to approximate to that of a State under British protection.

J. G. LAITHWAITE.

India Office,
14th July 1934.

1934

CONFIDENTIAL.

Paper B.

NOTES EXCHANGED WITH THE PERSIAN GOVERNMENT, 1927-29, RESPECTING THE PERSIAN CLAIM TO BAHREIN.

[E 5063/184/91]

(A)

M. Khan Mossaed to Sir Austen Chamberlain.—(Received November 28.)

Persian Legation, London,

November 26, 1927.

Your Excellency,

I HAVE the honour to state that the Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs has recently addressed a note to His Britannic Majesty's Minister at Tehran, of which the following is a translation:—

"1. According to information received by the Persian Government, a treaty was concluded between His Britannic Majesty and Ibn Saud and signed at Jeddah on the 20th May last, of which article 6 is as follows:—

"His Majesty the King of the Hejaz and of Nejd and its dependencies undertakes to maintain friendly and peaceful relations with the territories of Kuwait and Bahrain, and with the Sheikhs of Qatar and the Oman Coast, who are in special treaty relations with His Britannic Majesty's Government."

"2. The sovereignty of Persia over the Island of Bahrain being well founded, the Imperial Persian Government, at the time a special treaty was concluded between the British Government and the Sheikh of Bahrain, right-fully protested, and Lord Clarendon, in a letter dated the 29th April, 1869, addressed to the then Persian Minister in London, formally acknowledged the justice of that protest.

"3. You will realise that the insertion of article 6 in the above-mentioned treaty, in so far as it relates to Bahrain, is averse to the territorial integrity of Persia, and, consequently, incompatible with the friendly relations subsisting between two neighbouring countries.

"4. I therefore earnestly protest against the insertion of the above article in the treaty, and shall look forward to suitable measures being taken, as soon as practicable, by His Britannic Majesty's Government, with a view to its elimination.

"5. I have to add further that, Persia being a member of the League of Nations, the Imperial Persian Government, conformably to article 10 of the Covenant, which guarantees the territorial integrity of its members, have forwarded a copy of their note to the League of Nations, with the request that their protest may receive due consideration."

I beg leave to bring this matter to the notice of your Excellency for your kind consideration.

I have, &c.

HOVHANNES KHAN MOSSAED,
Persian Minister.

[E 220/51/91]

(B)

Sir Austen Chamberlain to Hovhannès Khan Mossaed.

Foreign Office, January 18, 1928.

Sir,

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 26th November, containing the formal protest which the Persian Government have seen fit to make against the terms of article 6 of the Treaty of Jeddah, concluded on the 20th May, 1927, between His Britannic Majesty and His Majesty the King of the Hejaz and Nejd and its dependencies, on the ground that the reference in that article to the Islands of Bahrein is contrary to the territorial integrity of Persia.

[11921]

2. In reply, I shall be grateful if you will inform your Government that His Majesty's Government are not aware of any valid grounds upon which the claim of the Persian Government to sovereignty over these islands is or can be based. Geographically, the islands are not a part of Persia, nor are the inhabitants of Persian race. His Majesty's Government are aware that during part of the 17th century and for some years during the latter part of the 18th century Bahrein was overrun and occupied by Persian troops, or by the followers of certain chiefs from the eastern shores of the Persian Gulf; but it appears to be established that in or about the year 1783 the Government of the Shah were dispossessed of the islands by an invasion of Arab tribes under the leadership of the direct lineal ancestor of the present sheikh, and that since that date the islands have never at any time been under the effective control of Persia.

3. The Persian Government have on various occasions alleged that their claim to sovereignty over Bahrein has been recognised by His Majesty's Government. While it is not evident that, even if this assertion were justified, it would confer on Persia the right of ownership which on other grounds appears so difficult to establish, His Majesty's Government feel that they must once and for all declare this statement to be entirely inadmissible.

4. The special treaty relations between His Majesty's Government and the successive Sheikhs of Bahrein, to which reference is made in the Treaty of Jeddah, have now been in existence for more than a century, the first in the series of undertakings by which those relations are regulated having been signed in the year 1820. The agreements have throughout been concluded on the basis that the Sheikh of Bahrein is an independent ruler. His Majesty's Government do not deny that the claim to independence of the sheikh is one which has from time to time been contested by the Government of the Shah, and in particular in the discussions which took place in 1869, to which reference is made in your note. I desire, however, to point out that your Government are under a complete misunderstanding in inferring from the terms of the communication made by the late Earl of Clarendon to the Persian Minister on the 29th April, 1869, that any recognition of the validity of the Persian claims to sovereignty in Bahrein was at that time intended. In that note it was stated that Her Majesty's Government had given due consideration to the protest of the Persian Government "against the Persian right of sovereignty over Bahrein being ignored by the British authorities," but it in no way admitted any such right. On the contrary, the whole tenor of the note should have made it clear that Her Majesty's Government maintained their right to enter into direct treaty relations with the Sheikhs of Bahrein as independent rulers; and while at the same time it indicated that Her Majesty's Government would gladly transfer to Persia, if she were able and willing to perform them, certain duties in the Persian Gulf towards the performance of which the treaty relations in question contributed, and offered, in view of the friendly feelings entertained by Her Majesty's Government towards Persia, to cause the Persian Government to be informed beforehand, when practicable, of any measure of coercion which the conduct of the sheikhs might have rendered necessary, it is evident that no recognition of the validity of the Persian protest, or of the Persian claim to suzerainty, was thereby intended or implied. The note, in fact, as the Persian Legation at Constantinople was reminded in December 1871 by Sir Henry Elliott, then Her Majesty's Ambassador in Turkey, contains nothing more than an acknowledgment that the Persian claim to suzerainty had previously been made. The numerous supplementary agreements entered into between the British Government and the rulers of Bahrein between 1869 and the present day have equally proceeded on the assumption that a claim to sovereignty in Bahrein on the part either of the Government of the Shah or of the Turkish Government could not possibly be admitted by His Majesty's Government.

5. The attitude of His Majesty's Government towards this question was still more clearly defined when in the year 1906 His Majesty's Minister at Tehran, on my predecessor's instructions, addressed to the Persian Government a note stating that "His Majesty's Government have never admitted the ownership or sovereignty of Persia over Bahrein, and such a claim is, in their view, entirely inadmissible. His Majesty's Government consider the Island of Bahrein and its inhabitants to be under British protection, and must decline to entertain any further representations on the subject." The note added that this reply had invariably been made to the Ottoman Government, which had on several occasions advanced a claim to Bahrein. In reply to this note, a formal protest was received from the Persian Government, in which their claim to sovereignty over Bahrein was based on an agreement, dated the 30th August, 1822, between Captain William Bruce, "the special commissioner of the British Government," and the Prince Governor of Shiraz. This agreement, however, as was pointed out in a reply from His Majesty's Minister on the 2nd January, 1907, and again on the 23rd February, 1907, was promptly disavowed at the time by the proper representatives of His Britannic Majesty, as having been entered into without authority, and His Majesty Fath Ali Shah also refused to recognise its stipulations, and expressed his displeasure that the Prince of Shiraz should have entered into any engagements with the British Government without his knowledge or instructions. In these circumstances, having regard to international law and custom, the agreement cannot be regarded as ever having possessed any binding force.

6. From the foregoing remarks you will observe that the Persian Government are not justified in supposing that His Majesty's Government, either in 1869 or at any other time, intended to recognise that Bahrein was a part of Persia, and that, while they have, indeed, admitted that a claim on the subject has from time to time been put forward by the Persian Government, they have never admitted the validity of the claims which either the Turkish or Persian Governments have frequently put forward in the past. Their consistent endeavour in the matter of Bahrein has been to secure that the peaceful development of the islands and the welfare of the Arab inhabitants shall not be disturbed by unjustified attempts on the part of their neighbours to subject them to a foreign domination. They are not prepared to contemplate any departure from this policy.

I have, &c.

AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN

[E 4249/51/91]

(C)

Mr. Parr to Sir Austen Chamberlain.—(Received August 27.)

(No. 363.)

HIS Majesty's representative presents his compliments to His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and has the honour to transmit herewith copy of a note from the Acting Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs, dated the 2nd August, on the subject of Bahrein.

Tehran, August 6, 1928.

Enclosure in (C).

M. Pakrevan to Mr. Parr.

M. le Chargé d'Affaires,

Téhéran, le 2 août 1928.

D'ORDRE de mon Gouvernement, j'ai l'honneur de vous faire connaître sa réponse à la lettre du 18 janvier 1928, relative aux îles de Bahrein, que son Excellence le Secrétaire d'Etat Sir Austen Chamberlain a adressée au Ministre de Perse à Londres.

Les motifs invoqués par l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat pour opposer une fin de non-recevoir à la juste protestation du Gouvernement impérial, formulée dans sa lettre du 22 novembre 1927, contre la clause relative aux îles de Bahrein contenue à l'article 6 du Traité de Djeddah du 20 mai 1927, entre Sa Majesté britannique et le Sultan Abdol Aziz-Ebn-Séoud, ne sauraient en rien convaincre le Gouvernement impérial et le détourner un instant de la voie dans laquelle il s'est engagé pour la légitime défense de son incontestable droit de souveraineté sur les îles de Bahrein.

[11921]

2. Mais, avant d'en venir à l'étude et au sujet des postulats sur lesquels s'appuie le Secrétaire d'Etat pour repousser la protestation persane et affirmer la légitimité de la politique britannique, je tiens à attirer l'attention de votre Gouvernement sur ce principe juridique d'ordre international :

Un territoire appartenant à un Etat souverain ne peut en être légitimement détaché tant que le droit de propriété n'a pas été transféré par cet Etat à un autre Etat, par un acte officiel, en l'espèce un traité, ou que son annexion à un autre Etat ou que son indépendance propre n'ont pas été reconnues officiellement par le légitime propriétaire de ce territoire.

Or, comme toute vérité historique, c'est l'évidence même que les îles de Bahrein appartiennent à la Perse. Jamais il n'a existé un Etat indépendant connu sous le nom de Bahrein. La Perse n'a jamais renoncé à sa souveraineté sur ces îles, comme elle ne l'a jamais cédée à un autre Etat, ni jamais reconnu aucun des cheikhs de ces îles comme des chefs indépendants.

Nous sommes loin de disconvenir qu'il est souvent arrivé dans l'histoire de la Perse que des khans, gouverneurs, cheikhs ou autres chefs locaux se sont soulevés contre l'autorité du pouvoir central, se soumettant sitôt après ou vivant un temps plus ou moins long en état de rébellion, fréquemment se battant entre eux, le plus fort s'emparant du pouvoir local, mais restant, comme ses adversaires, soumis et subordonné au Gouvernement central : il va de soi que ces rivalités, ces querelles intestines n'ont jamais pu porter atteinte au droit de souveraineté ni à l'intégrité du pays.

Cela posé, je déclare, au nom de mon Gouvernement et de la façon la plus catégorique, que les îles de Bahrein font partie intégrante de la Perse et qu'il ne peut, par conséquent, admettre que l'insoumission momentanée ou plus ou moins prolongée d'un cheikh quelconque puisse aucunement porter atteinte au droit souverain de la Perse sur Bahrein.

Dans l'état actuel des usages internationaux, il ne peut jamais être question de demander à un Etat, en temps de paix, de renoncer à ses droits de souveraineté sur une partie quelconque de son territoire, sous le prétexte que les habitants de ce territoire ne parlent pas la langue nationale de l'Etat souverain ou que ce territoire est, par sa position géographique, en fait détaché de la mère-patrie par la mer. Cette vérité, le Gouvernement britannique, moins que tout autre pays, ne peut la méconnaître. Les considérations d'ordre ethnique et géographique ne peuvent à la rigueur se poser que pour justifier les prétentions d'un Etat d'annexer un territoire nouveau.

En outre des droits de la Perse sur Bahrein, il est notoire que les rapports de ces îles avec elle, tant ethniques qu'économiques, sont beaucoup plus développés qu'avec n'importe quel autre pays indépendant et civilisé du monde.

Bahrein a constamment et sans interruption fait partie de la Perse dans les siècles passés, sauf cependant durant l'occupation portugaise de 1507 à 1622, date à laquelle le Gouvernement persan en a repris possession.

Jamais les Cheikhs-Gouverneurs de Bahrein n'ont, même dans les siècles passés, exercé leurs fonctions à titre de chefs indépendants, mais bien plutôt comme chefs de tribu, à l'exemple de khans locaux de certaines parties de la Perse, qui, il y a à peine quelques années encore, exerçaient leurs fonctions de gouverneurs à titre permanent et parfois même héréditaire, mais toujours sous la dépendance et le contrôle du pouvoir central.

Les Cheikhs de Bahrein ont toujours reconnu la souveraineté persane et cela non pas seulement jusqu'à la fin du 18^e siècle. Des documents postérieurs et authentiques existent, où ils déclarent leur entière soumission et leur fidélité au Gouvernement central ; sans omettre d'ajouter, ce qui est une preuve incontestable de dépendance, qu'ils payaient l'impôt qu'ils devaient à l'Etat.

Il est manifeste que cet état de choses n'a cessé qu'à partir du moment où les cheikhs ont été incités à l'insoumission, à l'instigation d'un Etat étranger, sous forme de contrainte, de menaces ou d'ingérence directe.

3. S'il est constant que la Perse n'a jamais douté de son droit de souveraineté et de propriété sur Bahrein, il est avéré qu'il fut un temps où le Gouvernement britannique n'en doutait pas non plus. Nous en trouvons la preuve dans la correspondance échangée avec le Secrétaire d'Etat, feu le Comte de Clarendon. Après avoir pris connaissance des documents communiqués par la Légation de Perse à Londres et après en avoir conféré avec son collègue, le

Secrétaire d'Etat des Indes, le Comte de Clarendon dans sa lettre du 29 avril 1869 déclare :

"The British Government readily admit that the Government of the Shah has protested against the Persian right of sovereignty over Bahrein being ignored by the British authorities, and they have given due consideration to that protest."

Ainsi après avoir pris connaissance des faits et documents, il déclare prendre en due considération la protestation par laquelle le Gouvernement impérial affirme son droit de souveraineté.

Nous prétendons qu'il est impossible de découvrir dans les termes dont se sert le Secrétaire d'Etat de l'époque un sens autre et de leur donner une interprétation autre que celle qui tombe sous le sens.

Cela est si vrai que le noble Lord se voit obligé de justifier la nature des relations entretenues par son Gouvernement avec les Cheikhs de Bahrein, ce qui ne peut s'expliquer que vis-à-vis du Souverain légitime, et de restreindre la politique britannique à leur égard à un simple contrôle sur la piraterie, la traite des esclaves et le maintien de l'ordre dans le Golfe. Il convient de citer, à cet effet, la partie de sa lettre qui s'y rapporte :

"I beg to assure you that the British Government hold the Sheikh to these engagements solely for the purpose of preventing piracy and slave trade and of maintaining the police of the Gulf."

Il n'est ici nullement question d'un droit pour l'Angleterre sur ces îles, ni de l'indépendance de Bahrein et de ces cheikhs.

Et la reconnaissance de la souveraineté persane sur Bahrein est ensuite affirmée de la façon la plus éclatante :

"If the Persian Government are prepared to keep a sufficient force in the Gulf for these purposes, this country would be relieved of a troublesome and costly duty, but if the Shah is not prepared to undertake these duties, Her Majesty's Government cannot suppose His Majesty would wish that in those waters disorder and crimes should be encouraged by impunity."

Ce qui revient à dire que, si le Gouvernement persan est en état de faire la police du Golfe, le Gouvernement britannique se considérera libéré "de la lourde et coûteuse tâche" qu'il s'est imposée à cet effet et que, par conséquent, il se retirera pour laisser le Souverain légitime exercer ces devoirs, qui donc lui reviennent réellement.

Lord Clarendon ajoute :

"and in regard to this question, I have the honour to state to you, whenever it is practicable to do so Her Majesty's Government will cause the Persian Government to be informed beforehand of any measures of coercion against himself which the conduct of the Sheikh of Bahrein may have rendered necessary."

Ce qui ne peut s'expliquer que par la nécessité de rendre compte au Souverain légitime.

Les déclarations très explicites de Lord Clarendon et l'engagement formel du Gouvernement britannique en 1869 sont une preuve éclatante tant de la fragilité des droits que s'est arrogés le Gouvernement britannique que de la souveraineté de la Perse sur les îles de Bahrein.

Cela étant le passage du paragraphe 3 de la lettre de l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat britannique, dans lequel il prétend que même au cas où la Perse aurait raison d'affirmer que le Gouvernement britannique a admis sa revendication sur Bahrein, cela ne conférerait pas à la Perse un droit de propriété sur ces îles, nous demeure inintelligible.

Nous n'avons jamais prétendu que la reconnaissance par le Gouvernement britannique de notre droit sur Bahrein créait ce droit, pas plus que nous ne pouvons accepter que sa méconnaissance de ce droit nous l'enlève. Il est demeuré, indépendamment de toute opinion étrangère, pour les raisons que nous avons établies. Il n'est tout de même pas sans intérêt de relever que le Gouvernement britannique, qui nous conteste aujourd'hui ce droit, l'a lui-même, au cours de l'histoire, plus d'une fois reconnu.

4. Le seul argument invoqué, à plusieurs reprises, par le Gouvernement britannique, pour refuser de reconnaître la souveraineté de la Perse sur Bahreïn, se base sur le fait qu'il est entré en relations directes contractuelles avec les Cheikhs-Gouverneurs de Bahreïn.

A cet aveu, le Gouvernement répond en posant les questions suivantes :

Le fait d'avoir enfreint les règles élémentaires du droit international crée-t-il un droit et autorise-t-il son auteur à s'en prévaloir pour en tirer les conclusions qui conviennent à sa politique ?

En effet, si un gouverneur ou un chef local d'une partie quelconque du territoire d'un Etat souverain entre en relations directes avec un Etat étranger, sans l'autorisation expresse du Gouvernement central, cela a-t-il une valeur juridique en droit des gens ?

Un Etat étranger a-t-il le droit de conclure des accords avec des gouverneurs ou des chefs locaux, à l'insu du Gouvernement dont ses chefs ou gouverneurs dépendent ?

Mais si, néanmoins, ce principe incontesté du droit international se trouve avoir été transgressé par un gouverneur ou chef local, volontairement ou par contrainte, ou si l'Etat étranger, passant outre aux règles communes du droit des gens, est entré en relations contractuelles avec ces gouverneurs ou ces chefs rebelles, le droit de l'Etat souverain sur ces parties de son territoire où ces accords illégaux ont eu lieu sera-t-il prescrit ?

Le gouverneur ou le chef rebelle pourra-t-il légitimement se prévaloir de ces accords avec l'étranger pour prétendre à une autonomie ou une indépendance quelconque ?

Le Gouvernement impérial, chaque fois qu'il a eu connaissance de semblables accords, n'a jamais manqué d'élever à leur rencontre une énergique protestation officielle.

5. Les déclarations du Ministre d'Angleterre à Téhéran en 1906, auxquelles il est fait allusion dans la lettre de l'honorable Secrétaire d'Etat—déclarations tendant à rejeter l'affirmation par la Perse de sa souveraineté sur Bahreïn et à prétendre au protectorat britannique sur ces îles—ne donnent aucune force nouvelle à la thèse anglaise.

A ces déclarations, le Gouvernement impérial a répondu par une protestation catégorique, appuyée, entre autres, sur cet argument que ses droits sur Bahreïn étaient corroborés dans l'accord, en date du 30 août 1822, conclu entre le Capitaine William Bruce et le Prince Gouverneur de Chiraz.

Cet accord aurait été "immédiatement désavoué, à l'époque, par les représentants compétents de Sa Majesté britannique comme ayant été conclu sans les autorisations nécessaires."

Mais, même désavoué, il reste un document historique d'une inappréciable valeur. Il permet, en effet, de fixer, telles qu'elles étaient, les situations respectives du Gouvernement persan et du Gouvernement britannique par rapport à Bahreïn et à ses cheikhs. La vérité historique qui ressort de cet accord, c'est l'affirmation et la confirmation de la main même du Capitaine Bruce que les îles de Bahreïn faisaient partie de notre Province de Fars.

Aucun désaveu n'infirmera jamais ce point d'histoire définitivement élucidé dès 1832 par une autorité britannique, bien placée pour en connaître.

On peut supposer à ce désaveu tous les motifs qu'on voudra, sauf évidemment le fait que le Capitaine Bruce avait reconnu que Bahreïn faisait partie de la Perse, puisque la susdite lettre de Lord Clarendon, postérieure de 47 ans, corrobore et même renforce, comme nous l'avons ci-dessus établi, la reconnaissance de l'état de fait émanant du Capitaine Bruce.

D'autre part, quand on dit que Fath Ali Chah lui-même a désavoué cet accord, ce n'est certes pas parce qu'on y reconnaissait que les îles de Bahreïn dépendaient de son Gouvernement.

Sans répit, ni trêve, la Perse ne s'est pas lassée de proclamer sa souveraineté et cela même aux temps les plus troubles de son histoire.

En effet, le Gouvernement persan, dans sa réponse du 10 août 1907 aux notes du 2 janvier 1907 du Ministre britannique à Téhéran, relatives au désaveu de l'accord du 30 août 1822, déclare :

"L'accord de 1822, même non exécuté, comme vous le prétendez, ne peut aller à l'encontre des conséquences qui s'en déduisent. Les autorités officielles britanniques, à ce moment-là, ont constaté, tels qu'ils étaient, l'état et la situation juridique des îles de Bahreïn. Elles les ont certifiées d'après ce qu'elles ont vu et reconnu. Si, par la suite, l'accord intervenu n'a pas été exécuté, cela ne peut nullement porter atteinte au principe de la reconnaissance du droit de la Perse sur les îles par les autorités britanniques, et c'est au sujet de ce principe que le Gouvernement persan ne peut s'attendre que le Gouvernement britannique méconnaisse le droit traditionnel de la Perse sur ces îles."

6. De l'accord de 1822 jusqu'à ce jour, aucun titre valable n'a été acquis par le Gouvernement britannique. Il n'avait donc pas le droit d'empiéter sur le droit de souveraineté de la Perse sur Bahreïn par le traité qu'il a conclu avec le Sultan Abdol Aziz-Ebn-Séoud en mai 1927.

C'est pour ces considérations que le Gouvernement impérial a protesté et qu'il maintient sa protestation contre l'article 6 du Traité de Djeddah du 20 mai 1927, relatif aux îles de Bahreïn.

Mon Gouvernement espère que le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté britannique se rendra aux considérations historiques et juridiques ci-dessus invoquées et qu'il reconnaîtra volontiers qu'une telle disposition ne peut avoir d'effet que si elle a été conclue avec l'Etat persan, Souverain légitime des îles de Bahreïn.

Veuillez, &c.

F. PAKREVAN.

[E 853/33/91]

(D)

Sir Austen Chamberlain to Hovhannès Khan Mossadé.

Sir,

Foreign Office, February 18, 1929.

IN a note dated the 18th January, 1928, I had the honour to inform you, in reply to your note of the 26th November, 1927, respecting the claim advanced by your Government to the islands of Bahrein, that His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom were not aware of any valid grounds upon which the claim of the Persian Government to sovereignty over those islands was or could be based. Some months later, on the 2nd August, 1928, the Persian Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs addressed to His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Tehran a further note explaining in detail the reasons which have led his Government to consider themselves justified in advancing such a claim. I now have the honour to request that you will convey to your Government the following reply :—

2. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom have examined with the greatest care the views set forth in the Persian Government's note of the 2nd August, and have endeavoured to extract from the many unsupported declarations that Bahrein forms an integral part of Persia (a statement which, as I have already indicated in my note under reference, bears no relation to geographical facts), the essential arguments on which this claim is based. They note that the Persian Government do not in any way base their claim on the alleged recognition of their rights in the past by His Majesty's Government. So far as can be deduced from their note under reply, their claim is, in fact, founded on three main arguments: Firstly, on uninterrupted possession except for the period of Portuguese occupation between 1507 and 1622; secondly, on an alleged principle of international law that a territory belonging to a sovereign State cannot be lawfully detached so long as its annexation by another State or its independence have not been officially recognised by the lawful owner of the territory; and thirdly, on documents of a date later than the end of the 18th century, in which the sheikhs of the islands are alleged to have declared their submission to the Persian Government, and on the alleged payment by them of tribute to the Persian Government. After full examination of these arguments His Majesty's Government have reached the conclusion, for the reasons given below, that they entirely fail to substantiate a Persian claim to sovereignty over the islands at the present day.

3. In the first place, the statement that "Bahrein has always and uninterruptedly formed part of Persia in past centuries, except during the Portuguese occupation from 1507 to 1622" is not one which can be allowed to pass unquestioned. I have already drawn attention to the evident fact that geographically this assertion is misleading. Historically it is almost equally misleading. The earlier history of the islands before 1507 is obscure, but it cannot seriously be maintained that they were subject to Persian sovereignty all through the Arab, Mongol and Tartar invasions and the anarchy of the Middle Ages. On the contrary, modern historians have expressed the opinion that from the 11th to the beginning of the 16th century the inhabitants of Bahrein were subject to chiefs of their own race; and, among contemporary writers, the Arabian geographer, Idrisi, writing in the latter half of the 12th century, stated categorically that the island was then governed by an independent chief. It is, therefore, impossible to accept the view that the island was continuously subject to Persia before 1507. Between the years 1507 and 1622 the islands were occupied by the Portuguese, as the Persian Government themselves admit. The period of Persian rule began in 1622 and ended in 1783, when the Persian troops were finally driven out of the islands by the ancestors of the present Sheikh of Bahrein, but it is not to be supposed that even during this period of Persian ascendancy, Persian rule was continuous and unchallenged, or that it brought peace and prosperity to the inhabitants. The Persian occupation after the expulsion of the Portuguese was of uncertain duration, but it seems to be established that about the year 1718 a descent was made upon the island by the Omani Arabs, who then occupied it for a short period. In the middle of the 18th century control appears to have passed into the hands of the once powerful Huwala Arabs, who even at the present day are strongly represented there, though in 1753 Persia was again able to assert her ascendancy by conquest. In 1783, however, the troops of His Majesty the Shah were finally driven out by the Utubi Arabs, and the authority of Persia ceased, never to be re-established.

4. It will be evident from the brief historical summary contained in the preceding paragraph that such historical evidence as can be adduced in favour of the Persian claim must rest mainly upon intermittent occupation between the years 1622 and 1783, a period which comprises at least two periods of Arab rule. On the other hand, a period of approximately equal length between 1783 and the present day has elapsed during which no dominion has been exercised in the islands by Persia, and Arab rule has been uninterrupted. In these circumstances His Majesty's Government cannot but regard the claim of Bahrein to independence from Persia as abundantly established.

5. It is in the light of the historical events summarised above that the second argument of the Persian Government must be examined, viz., that part of their note now under reply in which they affirm as an alleged principle of international law the statement that "a territory belonging to a sovereign State cannot be lawfully detached so long as the right of ownership has not been transferred by this State to another State in virtue of an official act, in this case a treaty, or so long as its annexation by another State or its independence have not been officially recognised by the lawful owner of the territory." Even if this statement could be accepted as valid, it would still be necessary for Persia to prove that she is, or ever has been, the lawful owner of Bahrein, and that such rights as she may have acquired in former ages by conquest and the exercise of force outweigh those not only of the Portuguese, but of the Arab inhabitants themselves.

6. His Majesty's Government, however, deny without hesitation that any such principle, if alleged to be of universal application, forms part of international law. The assertion that the consent of the dispossessed State is invariably required to validate a change of sovereignty is contradicted both by international practice and the facts of history. Moreover, it would, if it existed, seriously prejudice the maintenance of peace and international order. It would be open to any State to advance a claim to territory, of which it has not for centuries been in effective possession, on the ground that its loss of possession in distant ages had not been confirmed by a subsequent treaty. To assert such a legal principle would be to assert that on a disputed question of territory the one factor that is decisive is the expressed will of one of the disputants. On the contrary, in cases where a territory has effectively established its independence of the former sovereign, a treaty by which the disposed owner recognises its independence is in effect chiefly valuable as conclusive evidence that, in the view of the former sovereign, such independence has been effectively established. In such cases the effective establishment by the territory of its independence is the deciding factor in the question of international title, and in the case of Bahrein His Majesty's Government regard as wholly untenable the proposition that effective possession and administration by the present ruling family for 145 years, during which these rulers have been independent of Persia, and during which no Persian authority has been exercised in their dominions, can be affected by the mere consideration that the Persian Government have not set their signature to a document formally recognising the fact of their independence.

7. It is, moreover, abundantly clear from historical precedents that the theory of the necessity for the formal consent of the dispossessed State is not one which has ever obtained international acceptance. The revolted Spanish colonies in South America were diplomatically recognised as independent States by the United States Government in 1822 and by the British Government in 1824, many years before their independence was formally admitted by Spain. The independence of Texas in 1837 and that of Panamá in 1903 were recognised by the United States, and subsequently by Great Britain and other European Powers, long before Mexico and Colombia had ceased to look upon those territories as revolted provinces. In these instances, to which others could, if necessary, be added, the effective establishment of independence was clearly regarded by the Powers as the ruling factor in the situation, and the consent of the dispossessed State was not held to be a condition sine qua non of a valid transfer or acquisition of territory. In the case of Bahrein, whose sheikhs have now been in treaty relations with His Majesty's Government for more than a century as independent rulers, it was thus not necessary for His Majesty's Government to await the consent of Persia before such recognition could be accorded.

8. The only other argument advanced by the Persian Government in support of their claim is the statement that the sheikhs of Bahrein at some time later than the end of the 18th century declared in writing their entire submission and fidelity to the Persian Government, and that they paid tribute to the Persian Government. Although the Persian Government do not give any details in corroboration of this assertion, and although it would probably be difficult at the present day to prove the authenticity of any documents which may be in their possession, His Majesty's Government are perfectly prepared to admit the possibility that such documents may exist. They do not, however, consider that the existence of such documents, or even evidence, were this forthcoming, of payments by the Rulers of Bahrein to the Government of the Shah can be regarded as establishing the validity of Persia's claim. They have always been well aware that the unfortunate rulers of the islands, surrounded by warlike and more powerful States which menaced their independence, professed on various occasions during the first sixty or seventy years of the 19th century an unwilling allegiance to Muscat, to Persia, to Turkey, to the rulers of the mainland of Arabia, even to Egypt—to any Power, in short, who would agree to offer them protection and seemed at the time in a strong enough position to do so; and that at different times for short periods they paid tribute to Muscat, Egypt, or the Wahabi Arabs of the mainland. Any argument based on payment of tribute would, therefore, be available in support of a claim to sovereignty over Bahrein by any of the States to which tribute was, in fact, paid, and, in any case, it is evident that this timid and vacillating policy pursued on occasion by his predecessors cannot be held to affect the position of the present sheikh, who is firm in his determination to resist the Persian Government's claims, and has empowered His Majesty's Government to refute them on his behalf, in virtue of the treaties which give them the right of defending Bahrein from external aggression.

9. In view of the fact that the Persian Government do not base any part of their claim on the alleged recognition of that claim by His Majesty's Government in the past, it seems unnecessary here to reply in detail to the various arguments by which the Persian Government endeavour to show that their claims have received British recognition in the past. I have already, in my note of the 18th January, 1928, explained that it has never on any occasion been the intention of His Majesty's Government to admit the validity of Persia's claims, and I must now ask the Persian Government to believe that a further full and careful examination of the contemporary records confirms that statement in its entirety. Ever since the year 1820, when His Majesty's Government first entered into special treaty relations with the Sheikh of Bahrein without any reference to the Government of the Shah, they have acted on the assumption that the sheikh is an independent ruler. In 1822, when Captain William Bruce was recalled for having negotiated the terms of an agreement with the Prince Governor of Shiraz without their authority, the main reason recorded for his recall and for the prompt disavowal of this tentative agreement is that "it acknowledges the King of Persia's title to Bahrein, of which there is not the least proof." No clearer statement could possibly have been made of the views held by His Majesty's Government at that date, more than a century ago; they have never since seen any reason to alter their opinion.

1934

10. The Earl of Clarendon's note of the 29th April, 1869, to which the Persian Government devote so large a part of their note now under reply, was certainly never intended to bear the interpretation now placed upon it by the Persian Government. As was pointed out in my note of the 18th January, 1928, it admitted that the Persian Government had advanced a claim to Bahrein, it stated that due consideration had been given to their claim, but it did not admit that their claim was valid. It even affirms the intention of the British Government to continue to hold the sheikhs to the treaty engagements which had been entered into with them as independent rulers. His Majesty's Government are entirely unable to admit that an implicit acknowledgment of the validity of the Persian claims is constituted by the reference in that note to the considerations which led to the establishment and the maintenance of those treaty relations; nor can they agree that the dependence or otherwise of Bahrein on Persia can in any way be affected by the fact that in entering upon and maintaining their treaties with the sheikhs they were principally moved by a desire to suppress piracy and the slave trade and to maintain the police of the Gulf, duties which the Persian Government themselves were not in a position effectively to perform. It is true that at that time Her Majesty's Government were mainly influenced by the consideration that they, like Persia, were interested in the safety of the Persian Gulf for commerce, and that they would gladly have accepted Persia's co-operation in maintaining order had her naval position admitted of it; but, although they did not consider Persia's claims to ownership to be valid, they were not at that time directly concerned in refuting them. The special treaties by which they eventually agreed to accept the control of the sheikh's foreign relations were concluded at a later date.

11. I must in this connexion invite the Persian Government to take note of the fact that there is no conceivable ground for the suggestion in the last paragraph of the second section of your Government's note under reply that the independent status enjoyed by the rulers of Bahrein can in any sense be represented as the result of "rebellion at a foreign State's instigation." This suggestion is one which His Majesty's Government repudiate as entirely unjustifiable. When in 1820, consequent on their suppression of the piratical activities of the independent rulers of the crucial coast of Oman, they found it necessary to consider the position in regard to Bahrein, nearly forty years had elapsed since the conquest of this island by the ancestor of the present sheikh, and during those years Persia had exercised no dominion in the islands and appeared to have taken no measures to re-establish her position. They had accordingly no hesitation in entering into negotiations and concluding a treaty with the independent ruler without prior reference to the Government of the Shah. Their object, as stated by Lord Clarendon in 1869, was the suppression of piracy and the maintenance of peace in the Gulf; they strictly confined themselves to the measures necessary to attain that object, and while it might have been open to them to establish their dominion over the sheikh, they did not choose to do so, but contented themselves with an arrangement to secure the safety of international shipping without imposing on themselves the burden of administration. They maintained this position not only in 1820 but on other occasions in subsequent years, and notably in 1848, when they declined to accede to the sheikh's request that his dominions should be incorporated in those of Her Majesty the Queen. The treaty of 1820, by which the Sheikh of Bahrein bound himself to abstain from plunder and piracy by land and sea, from the slave traffic and from inter-tribal war was followed in 1847, in 1856, and 1861 by further treaties designed to secure the same objects—the suppression of slavery, and the general pacification of the Gulf in the interests of international shipping. The British Government concluded all these treaties with the sheikh as an independent ruler, and consistently refused throughout to admit the Turkish, Persian and other claims to sovereignty over his dominions. It was not until the treaty of 1861 that Her Majesty's Government, in return for the sheikh's undertaking to abstain from maritime aggression, war and piracy, assured him in return of their support against similar aggression, nor till a still later period in 1880 and 1892, that they took upon themselves the unqualified liability for the foreign relations of that ruler, under which he has now invoked their assistance in repelling what he not unnaturally regards as a wholly unprovoked attempt on his independence by a foreign Government.

12. In conclusion, His Majesty's Government cannot refrain from expressing their surprise that the Persian Government should have referred in this correspondence to article 10 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, under which the members of the League undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression, the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the League; and that they should seemingly imagine that the terms of this article lay an obligation on members of the League to support Persian pretensions to an island which is separated from Persia by the whole width of the Persian Gulf, and over which Persia has exercised no authority for 145 years.

13. It will be evident to the Persian Government that His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom have carefully weighed the arguments advanced in the note now under reply, and that although they have found no reason to modify their previous opinions, their attitude is dictated by their genuine conviction that those arguments are untenable, and is in no way inspired by a policy hostile to Persia's legitimate aspirations. They cannot believe that the true interests of Persia can be served by a continued refusal to recognise the long-standing independence of the State of Bahrein. They are, indeed, hopeful that the Government of the Shah, whose enlightened domestic policy they have long followed with friendly interest, will acknowledge the desirability of establishing good relations with Persia's neighbours, and, realising that their present antiquated claim cannot properly be sustained and is an insurmountable obstacle to the establishment of such good relations with the Government and people of Bahrein, will on further consideration desist from its pursuit.

14. A copy of this note has been sent to the Secretary-General of the League of Nations.

I have, &c.

AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN.

Paper C.

[E 975/33/91]

SOCIÉTÉ DES NATIONS.

Communiqué au Conseil et aux Etats membres de la Société.

[C. 39.M.23.1929.VII.]

Genève, le 13 février 1929.

Les Iles Bahrein.

Note du Secrétaire général.

LE Secrétaire général a l'honneur de communiquer au Conseil et aux Etats membres de la Société des Nations la lettre en date du 13 janvier 1929, de M. F. Pakrevan, Gérant du Ministère des Affaires étrangères de Perse, ainsi que le document y annexé.

M. le Secrétaire général,

Téhéran, le 13 janvier 1929.

En rapport avec ma lettre datée du 2 août 1928⁽¹⁾, relative aux îles de Bahrein, j'ai l'honneur de vous envoyer à titre d'information pour les membres de la Société des Nations copie de la lettre adressée à son Excellence Sir Robert Henry Clive, Ministre de Sa Majesté britannique à Téhéran, le 5 janvier 1929.

F. PAKREVAN,

Gérant du Ministère des Affaires étrangères de Perse.

⁽¹⁾ Voir document C. 413.M.131.1928.VII.

1934

98

PERSIA

Copie de la Lettre adressée par le Gérant du Ministère des Affaires étrangères de Perse à son Excellence Sir Robert Clive, Ministre de Sa Majesté britannique à Téhéran.

M. le Ministre,

Téhéran, le 5 janvier 1929.

J'ai l'honneur d'attirer l'attention de votre Excellence sur ce qui suit :

Jusqu'à présent, les Persans qui se rendaient à Bahreïn n'étaient munis que du permis nécessaire pour se rendre d'un port persan à un autre, et aucune difficulté ne leur était apportée à l'accomplissement de leur voyage.

Mon Gouvernement vient d'apprendre que des ordres auraient été donnés d'exiger des Persans se rendant à Bahreïn un passeport, comme si Bahreïn était hors de la Perse.

Le changement ainsi apporté à une pratique ancienne, qui constituait la reconnaissance par les autorités britanniques mêmes des droits incontestables de la Perse sur Bahreïn, ne saurait affaiblir la portée de cette reconnaissance, surtout qu'il coïncide avec le moment où la question entière pourrait être résolue par la Société des Nations. Il semble qu'en tout état de cause il eût été préférable d'attendre, avant de rien modifier au statu quo, jusqu'à ce que cette question ait été réglée par la décision de la Société des Nations ou par un accord amiable entre les deux Gouvernements.

En conséquence, le Gouvernement impérial se voit obligé de protester énergiquement contre la tentative faite pour porter atteinte aux droits du pays et entraver le libre passage des Persans d'un point à un autre du territoire national.

J'ai l'honneur d'informer votre Excellence qu'aucun passeport ne sera accordé à un Persan pour se rendre à Bahreïn et que la responsabilité des dommages causés aux ressortissants persans, au cas où les autorités britanniques maintiendraient une exigence injustifiée, sera à la charge de ces autorités mêmes, sans préjudice de toutes autres sanctions utiles que le Gouvernement impérial se réserve de prendre, comme par exemple la défense d'entrer dans les ports persans aux bateaux ayant à leur bord des passagers qui ne seraient pas en règle avec les prescriptions et le point de vue du Gouvernement impérial.

J'ai l'honneur de vous informer en outre que le Gouvernement impérial se voit obligé d'adresser copie de la présente note au Secrétariat de la Société des Nations.

F. PAKREVAN,
Gérant du Ministère des Affaires étrangères.

Paper D.

[E 690/193/91]

Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs to Secretary-General, League of Nations.

Ministère des Affaires étrangères,
Téhéran, le 17 janvier 1930.

M. le Secrétaire général,

A PLUSIEURS reprises, notamment par des communications qui vous ont été adressées le 23 novembre 1927 et le 2 août 1928, le Gouvernement impérial a informé le Secrétariat de la Société des Nations et l'a prié de porter à la connaissance des Etats membres que les îles de Bahreïn étaient partie intégrante de l'Empire de Perse et que les prétentions du Gouvernement britannique à leur propos restaient infondées.

Mon Gouvernement a le regret de devoir une fois de plus faire entendre une protestation formelle, du fait que, dans le texte de la deuxième partie de l'Annexe 1 à la Convention internationale concernant les Statistiques économiques, les îles Bahreïn sont indiquées comme territoire statistique distinct, rangé sous la rubrique : "Dominions, Colonies, &c. . . . britanniques" (G. 505.M.167.1929.11., page 25, No. 59). Il doit être entendu que l'indication fournie dans le document officiel émanant de la Société des Nations, et intitulé

PERSIA

99

"Conférence internationale économique concernant les Statistiques économiques" (Genève, 1^{er} octobre 1929), n'a aucune valeur réelle et ne préjuge en rien de l'attribution des îles en question, lesquelles sont et demeurent persanes.

Veuillez agréer, &c.

Le Ministre des Affaires étrangères :
M. FARZINE.

Paper E.

[E 4460/193/91/1930]

Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs to Secretary-General, League of Nations.

Ministère des Affaires étrangères,
Téhéran, le 24 juillet 1930.

M. le Secrétaire général,

J'AI l'honneur de communiquer au Secrétariat, afin qu'il en soit donné connaissance par ses soins à tous les Etats membres de la Société des Nations, copie de la traduction d'une lettre que je viens d'adresser à la Légation britannique pour protester contre une nouvelle infraction aux droits souverains de la Perse sur Bahreïn.

Je vous prie, &c.

Le Ministre des Affaires étrangères :
M. O. FOROUGHÍ.

Enclosure in Paper E.

Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs to Sir R. Clive (Tehran).

Ministère des Affaires étrangères,

Téhéran, le 23 juillet 1930.

M. le Ministre,

D'APRES une nouvelle parue dans divers journaux, notamment dans le Near East and India et le Bagdad Times des 5 et 18 juin dernier, un syndicat anglais aurait obtenu du Cheik de Bahreïn une concession pour l'exploitation des pétroles de l'île et, le Major Holmes, représentant dudit syndicat, y aurait commencé les travaux.

Or, les îles de Bahreïn étant partie intégrante de la Perse et le droit de souveraineté de la Perse sur ces îles étant hors de conteste—ainsi qu'il a été prouvé au Gouvernement de votre Excellence et à la Société des Nations dans nos lettres du 26 novembre 1927 et du 2 août 1928 rappelant la reconnaissance expresse de votre Gouvernement en 1869 des droits de souveraineté de la Perse sur ces îles—mon Gouvernement proteste énergiquement contre la concession en question et toute autre concession qui ne serait pas accordée directement par le Gouvernement persan dans les îles de Bahreïn et déclare les considérer comme nulles et non avenues.

J'éprouve du regret à me trouver contraint, en dépit de l'esprit d'équité que je me plais à reconnaître à votre Gouvernement, de renouveler à ce sujet de temps en temps nos protestations.

Il va sans dire que pareils actes et la méconnaissance des droits incontestables de la Perse sur ces îles de Bahreïn ne sauraient en rien affaiblir ces droits et que mon Gouvernement se réserve de réclamer et demander la restitution de tout profit résultant éventuellement de la concession en cause, sans préjudice de tous dommages-intérêts y relatifs.

Veuillez agréer, &c.

FOROUGHÍ,
Ministre des Affaires étrangères de Perse.

1934

100

PERSIA

Paper F.

[E 5768/782/91]

M. Sepahbody to Secretary-General, League of Nations.Délégation persane auprès de la Société des Nations, le 14 octobre 1932.

M. le Secrétaire général,

J'AI l'honneur de vous faire connaître que l'Administration postale des Indes va incessamment mettre en circulation un certain nombre de timbres portant la surcharge des îles de Bahreïn pour les besoins du service postal desdites îles. Cette mesure étant une nouvelle atteinte à la souveraineté de la Perse sur les îles de Bahreïn, le Gouvernement impérial s'est empressé de protester officiellement contre cette mesure auprès de la Légation de Sa Majesté britannique à Téhéran.

En portant ce qui précède à la connaissance de votre Excellence, je la prie de vouloir bien communiquer cette lettre aux membres de la Société des Nations.

Veuillez agréer, &c.

A. SEPAHBODY.

Paper G.

[E 3945/2369/91]

M. Avenol to Sir John Simon.—(Received June 15.)League of Nations, Geneva, June 12, 1934.

Sir,

I HAVE the honour to forward to you herewith copy of a communication dated the 22nd May, 1934, from the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Persia relative to the Bahrein Islands. This communication, in conformity with the request of the Minister for Foreign Affairs, will be transmitted to the members of the League of Nations.

I have, &c.

J. AVENOL, Secretary-General.

Enclosure 1.

M. Kazémi to M. Avenol.

M. le Secrétaire général,

Téhéran, le 22 mai 1934.

FAISANT suite à la lettre que son Altesse Mirza Mohammad Ali Khan Foroughi, mon prédécesseur, avait adressée en date du 24 juillet 1930 à l'honorable Sir Eric Drummond, ex-Secrétaire général de la Société des Nations, j'ai l'honneur de communiquer au secrétariat, afin qu'il en soit donné connaissance à tous les Etats membres de la Société des Nations, la traduction d'une lettre que je viens d'adresser à la Légation des Etats-Unis d'Amérique à Téhéran au sujet des îles Bahreïn.

Je vous prie, &c.

Le Ministre des Affaires étrangères,
B. KAZEMI.

Enclosure 2.

M. Kazémi to Mr. Hornibrook.

(Traduction.)

M. le Ministre,

Téhéran, le 22 mai 1934.

IL y a bientôt quatre ans, mon Gouvernement a appris pour la première fois, par la voie de la presse étrangère, qu'un syndicat anglais a obtenu la concession de l'exploitation des gisements pétrolifères de Bahreïn et a commencé certains travaux dans ladite région. Etant donné que Bahreïn fait partie intégrante du territoire persan et que les droits de souveraineté du Gouvernement impérial sur les îles susmentionnées sont indéniables, une protestation énergique a été faite en cette occasion auprès de la Légation de Sa Majesté britannique à Téhéran contre la façon d'agir dudit syndicat, qui avait illégalement obtenu cette concession et avait procédé à l'exploitation des richesses de ce territoire et par là avait violé les droits de souveraineté de la Perse.

PERSIA

101

Copie de cette lettre de protestation a été communiquée au Secrétaire général de la Société des Nations, qui, selon la demande du Gouvernement persan, l'a portée à la connaissance de tous les Etats membres.

Conformément aux informations reçues tout récemment par le Gouvernement impérial, la concession des pétroles de Bahreïn vient d'être obtenue par la Standard Oil Company of California, laquelle s'est livrée à des opérations d'exploitation et a déjà extrait de grandes quantités de pétrole.

J'ai l'honneur d'attirer la sérieuse attention de votre Excellence sur ce qui précède et de lui faire savoir qu'une telle concession ou toute autre acquise par la Standard Oil Company ou une autre compagnie quelconque n'ayant pas été obtenue du Gouvernement persan, dont les droits de souveraineté sur les îles Bahreïn sont incontestables, mais des autorités légalement incompétentes et n'ayant aucun droit d'accorder de pareilles concessions, est considérée comme nulle et non avenue et est l'objet de vives protestations de mon Gouvernement, qui se réserve tous ses droits quant à la réclamation et à la restitution de tout profit réalisé du chef desdites concessions ainsi que pour les réparations de tout dommage qui en résulterait.

En conséquence, je prie votre Excellence de bien vouloir porter le contenu de la présente lettre à la connaissance du Gouvernement de la République des Etats-Unis d'Amérique et de lui demander d'en communiquer la teneur à la Standard Oil Company of California.

Veuillez, &c.

B. KAZEMI.

Paper H.

[E 2304/728/91]

No. 653/25.

Objet: Convention.

Perse: Correspondance du Bureau indo-britannique de Bahreïn.Bureau international de l'Union postale universelle, Berne, le 26 janvier 1933.

Monsieur,

J'AI l'honneur, à la demande de l'Office de Perse, de vous communiquer la lettre reproduite ci-après que je viens de recevoir de cet office:

"Me référant à votre circulaire No. 5787/229 du 24 août 1932, relative à l'émission prochaine de timbres-poste indo-britanniques portant en surcharge le mot 'Bahreïn', j'ai l'honneur de vous faire savoir que, les îles de Bahreïn appartenant à la Perse, les correspondances reçues desdites localités munies de timbres-poste non persans seront traitées comme des correspondances non affranchies et ne seront remises aux destinataires que contre perception de la double taxe d'affranchissement selon le tarif intérieur. Je vous prie de vouloir bien porter ce qui précède, par la voie de circulaire, à la connaissance des offices de l'union."

La circulaire mentionnée par l'Office persan annonçait, de la part de l'Office indo-britannique, l'émission prochaine d'une série de timbres-poste indo-britanniques portant en surcharge le mot "Bahreïn," valables seulement pour l'affranchissement des envois mis à la poste au bureau indo-britannique de Bahreïn.

Ce bureau est indiqué à la page 72, 2^e colonne, du dictionnaire des bureaux de poste (édition de novembre 1926) publié par le Bureau international.

Veuillez agréer, &c.

Le Directeur,

GARBANI-NERINI.

1934

102

PERSIA

No. 3341/124.

Objet : Convention.

Inde britannique : Usage de timbres-poste surchargés "Bahrein" au bureau de poste de Bahrein.

Bureau international de l'Union postale universelle, Berne, le 20 avril 1933.

Monsieur,

J'AI l'honneur, à la demande de l'Office de l'Inde britannique, de vous communiquer, en traduction, la lettre ci-après que je viens de recevoir de cet office :

" Me référant à votre circulaire du 26 janvier 1933, No. 653/25, relative à l'émission envisagée de timbres-poste indo-britanniques surchargés
'Bahrein', j'ai l'honneur de vous informer que les îles de Bahrein ne sont pas territoire persan et que, par conséquent, le Gouvernement persan n'a aucun droit d'ordonner quels timbres le Cheik de Bahrein doit émettre. Le Cheik, à la demande duquel un bureau de poste indo-britannique a été entretenu pendant plusieurs années à Bahrein, est dans ses droits souverains lorsqu'il demande au Gouvernement de l'Inde britannique de pourvoir à l'émission de timbres-poste surchargés ainsi qu'il est prévu présentement.
Je vous prie de vouloir bien porter ces faits à la connaissance de tous les membres de l'union."

Veuillez agréer, &c.
Le Directeur,
GARBANI-NERINI.

1935

THIS DOCUMENT IS THE PROPERTY OF HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office

CONFIDENTIAL.

(14928)

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1935

(ii)

LIST OF REPORTS

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked 1^A, &c.

AFRICA.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
1	Law Officers...	July 19, 1935	Possibility of denouncing the Congo Basin Treaties, or, alternatively, of introducing quota systems in British Territories to which they apply	1
2	Law Officers...	July 19, 1935	Possibility of limiting by means of quotas the importation of Japanese goods into certain British mandated territories in Africa in view of the terms of the relevant mandates	28
2A	Law Officers...	Dec. 6, 1935	Closer Union between Kenya, Uganda and Tanganyika: compatibility of proposals with Article 22 of Covenant of the League of Nations and Article 10 of the Tanganyika Mandate	32

GENERAL.

3	Law Officers...	Sept. 5, 1935	Possible application to Italy of sanctions provided in article 16 of Covenant of League of Nations: Prohibition of import into United Kingdom of Italian goods, &c., and position as regards British colonies, protectorates and mandated territories	52
---	-----------------	---------------	---	----

GUATEMALA.

4	Law Officers...	Oct. 28, 1935	Guatemala—British Honduras boundary: extent to which boundary set up by Anglo-Guatemalan Convention of 1859 depends on fulfilment of article VII; obligations of His Majesty's Government under that article	61
---	-----------------	---------------	--	----

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

5	Law Officers...	Feb. 20, 1935	Diplomatic privilege and immunity for officials of International Labour Office	78
---	-----------------	---------------	--	----

(iii)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS)

1935

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.
Cases cited are indicated by italics.

ACT—DUT.

A.

Act—

See British Settlements Act.
See Treaty of Peace Act, 1919.
Operation of Statutes beyond territorial limits of the United Kingdom, 53.
Africa, East—Proposals for closer union between Kenya, Uganda and Tanganyika, 32–51.

B.

Belize—Settlement of, 62.
Belligerent Rights—Non-application in exercise of financial and economic sanctions under article 16 of League Covenant, 52.
Boundary—Guatemala and British Honduras; His Majesty's Government's obligations under article VII of Anglo-Guatemalan Convention, 1859, 61–77.
British Settlements Act—Position of Kenya Colony under, in connexion with proposed closer union in East Africa, 33–34.

C.

Certificates of Origin—see Origin, Certificates of.
Chinn, Oscar—Case of, before Permanent Court of International Justice, 16–22.
Colonies—Extension to British colonies of economic and financial sanctions contemplated in article 16 of League Covenant, 52–55.
Commerce—see Trade.
Congo Basin—
See also Treaties; Congo Basin.
Possibility of introducing quota systems in British territories, 1–28.
Ditto; Special position of Tanganyika in view of terms of mandate, 28–32.
Courts—see Permanent Court of International Justice.

D.

Diplomatic Privilege—
For officials of International Labour Office, 78–86.
For officials of League of Nations, 78–86.
For officials of Permanent Court of International Justice, 83–84.
Duties—Provisions of Congo Basin treaties regarding import duties, 2–3, 12–13.

8699 [13464]

IMP—MAN.

I.

Imperial Preference—Application to British territories in Congo Conventional Basin precluded by treaties, 5–6.
Importation—
Quota system for territories in Africa—see Trade.
Restrictions under article 16 of League Covenant—see Sanctions.
International Labour Office—
Diplomatic privilege for officials, 78–86.
Status in relation to League of Nations, 79–82, 85–86.
Membership of non-members of League of Nations, 80.
Italy—Application to, of sanctions contemplated in article 16 of League Covenant, 52–60.

K.

Kenya—Proposals for closer union with Uganda and Tanganyika, 32–51.

L.

League of Nations—
Article 7 of Covenant (diplomatic privileges for officials), 78–86.
Article 16 of Covenant—see Sanctions.
Article 22 of Covenant in relation to article 10 of mandate for Tanganyika, 34, 36.
Article 22 of Covenant in relation to proposals for closer union between Tanganyika, Kenya and Uganda, 34–36.
Article 23 (a) of Covenant, 79, 85.

M.

Mandates—
Introduction of quotas for imports into British mandated territories in Africa, 28–32.
Proposals for closer union between Tanganyika, Kenya and Uganda; effect of article 10 of mandate for Tanganyika, 33.
Question whether article 10 of mandate for Tanganyika is in conformity with article 22 of Covenant of the League, 34–36.
Extension to British mandated territories of economic and financial sanctions, 53, 55.

a

(iv)

ORI—TRA.

O.

Origin, Certificates of—Power to require, during exercise of sanctions under Treaty of Peace Act, 1919, 53–55.

P.

Permanent Court of International Justice—Decisions in Oscar Chinn case, 16–22.
Diplomatic privilege for members, 83–84.
Status in relation to League of Nations, 83–84.
Privilege—see Diplomatic Privilege.
Protectorates—Extension to British protectorates of sanctions contemplated in article 16 of League Covenant, 53–55.

Q.

Quotas—see Trade.

R.

Reprisals—Justification for, in International Law, 71.
Retaliation—see Reprisals.

S.

Sanctions—
Application to Italy of sanctions provided in article 16 of Covenant of the League, 52–60.
Interpretation of article 16 of Covenant, 56–60.
League Assembly resolutions, 1921, 52–53, 56–60.
Power of His Majesty's Government to impose economic and financial sanctions by Order in Council under Treaty of Peace Act, 1919, 52–55.

T.

Tanganyika—
Inclusion in Congo Conventional Basin, 1.
Mandate provision against trade discrimination; position of Japan, 6, 28–32.
Proposals for closer union with Kenya and Uganda, 32–51.

Trade—
Restrictions contemplated in article 16 of League Covenant—see Sanctions.
In Congo Basin; treaty position, 1–28.
Ditto; possibility of introducing quota system, 18–16, 21–22.
Ditto; effect of terms of Tanganyika mandate, 28–32.

TRE—UGA.

Treaties—

Claiming of benefits by countries not parties, 5.
Unilateral denunciation; doctrine of rebus sic stantibus, 7, 24–28.
Unilateral denunciation necessitates denunciation of whole instrument, 11.
Interpretation in light of surrounding circumstances and preparatory documents, 73.
Interpretation as a whole, 83.
Congo Basin; possibility of denouncing unilaterally, 1–28.
Ditto; parties to various treaties, 4.
Ditto; continuance in force of Berlin and Brussels Acts, as affected by non-accession to Saint-Germain Convention or by its termination, 4, 5, 15.
Ditto; possibility of Japan claiming benefits of earlier treaties, 5, 20–21, 23.
Ditto; permanency of régime set up by, 8–10, 11, 22–23.
Ditto; meaning of "free access" in article 2 of Saint-Germain Convention, 14.
Ditto; question whether Saint-Germain Convention is legally invalid ab initio, 16–19, 22.
Ditto; application to eastern zone of principle of complete commercial equality, 20.
Anglo-Guatemalan Convention, 1859; boundary between Guatemala and British Honduras, 61–77.
Ditto; interpretation of article VII, 61–75.
Ditto; His Majesty's Government's obligations under article VII, 61–75.
Anglo-Japanese Commercial Treaty, 1911; entitles Japan to most-favoured-nation treatment in British territories in Congo Conventional Basin, 6.
Anglo-Venezuelan treaty of 1825; denunciation, 7.
General Act of Berlin, 1885—see Treaties, Congo Basin.
General Act and Declaration of Brussels, 1890—see Treaties, Congo Basin.
Convention of Saint-Germain-en-Laye, 1919—see Treaties, Congo Basin.
Treaty of Versailles; articles 387–427 (International Labour Office) 78–86.
Treaty of Peace Act, 1919—
Power to impose by Order in Council economic and financial sanctions under article 16 of League Covenant, 52–55.
Ditto; extension by Order in Council to colonies, protectorates and mandated territories, 52–55.
Power to require certificates of origin during sanctions period, 54–55.

U.

Uganda—Proposals for closer union with Kenya and Tanganyika, 32–51.

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office.

CONFIDENTIAL.

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.: 1935

AFRICA

[J 3014/98/60/1935]

No. 1.

[July 19, 1935]

(1)

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, January 8, 1935.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir John Simon, to transmit to you herewith two references concerning points upon which he would be grateful to have your opinion.

2. The first of these references relates to the question whether it is possible to denounce the treaties commonly known as the Congo Basin Treaties regulating trade and commerce in Central Africa, and also to the question whether (if denunciation is not practicable) it would be possible, under the terms of these treaties, to introduce quota systems in the British territories to which they apply.

3. The other⁽¹⁾ reference relates to one aspect of the question whether it is possible to introduce a quota system in certain British mandated territories in Africa in view of the terms of the relevant mandates.

4. There is one territory, Tanganyika, which is affected by the questions put in both references, since it is both a mandated territory and also a territory forming part of the conventional basin of the Congo. It is for this reason that these references are submitted to you together (though the points of principle involved in each are quite distinct); and it would be much appreciated if you could furnish your reports on them concurrently.

5. Since the references were drafted, and at the moment of sending them to you, the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague has given a decision in the claim brought on behalf of Mr. Oscar Chinn by His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom against the Belgian Government. The decision of the court, together with certain passages in some of the dissenting judgments, may have a bearing on portions of the reference regarding the Congo Basin Treaties. It is proposed, therefore, to send you a separate memorandum on this subject as soon as the judgments have been digested in this Department.

I have, &c.

RONALD CAMPBELL.

Possibility of denouncing the Congo Basin Treaties, or, alternatively, of introducing quota systems in British territories to which they apply.

⁽¹⁾ See Report No. 2.

1935

2

AFRICA

(2)

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, January 8, 1935.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir John Simon, to transmit to you the papers noted in the accompanying list and to request your opinion on certain questions connected with the series of international instruments commonly known as the Congo Basin Treaties. The treaties in question, of which copies are attached, are the General Act of Berlin, of the 26th February, 1885 (C.-4739 of 1886, Paper A), the General Act and Declaration of Brussels, of the 2nd July, 1890 (C.-6049-1 of 1890, Paper B), and the Convention of Saint-Germain-en-Laye, of the 10th September, 1919, revising the former treaties (Cmd. 477 of 1919, Paper C). None of these instruments was concluded for any specified period, and none of them contains any specific provision whereby it may be denounced or terminated, and the principal question on which your views are desired is whether His Majesty's Government can, notwithstanding this fact, free themselves from the obligations in regard to trade imposed by the treaties. Your opinion is also desired on certain other questions, inter alia, whether the introduction of a quota system in the British territories affected would be consistent with the terms of the treaties.

2. The historical background of the treaties is to be found in the fact that tropical Africa was, at the time of the original Berlin Conference in 1885, largely unexplored and entirely undeveloped. In view of the fact that the Great Powers were evincing interest in this region, it was desirable that some agreement providing equal opportunities for all, and at the same time safeguarding the rights of the native populations, should be reached. With these objects, the Berlin Conference was held, and its outcome was the General Act of Berlin of 1885, of which the principal provisions relevant to the present issues were as follows: Article 1 defined the area (maintained in all subsequent instruments) covered by the Act. This area (see map attached, Paper D) includes Kenya, Uganda, Tanganyika, Nyasaland, part of Northern Rhodesia and part of the Sudan; it does not include any British territories in West Africa except in so far as these may indirectly be affected by the provisions in the various Congo Basin Treaties concerning the free navigation of the River Niger, and consequently the provisions regarding freedom and equality of trade do not apply to any West African British territories, as such. Article 1 provided that in this area—

"The trade of all nations shall enjoy complete freedom."

Article 3 provided that—

"Wares, of whatever origin, imported into these regions, under whatsoever flag, shall be subject to no other taxes than such as may be levied as fair compensation for expenditure in the interests of trade."

Article 4 laid down that—

"Merchandise imported into those regions shall remain free from import and transit dues. The Powers reserve to themselves to determine, after the lapse of twenty years, whether this freedom of import shall be retained or not."

Article 5 provided (inter alia) that—

"No Power . . . shall be allowed to grant (in the regions affected) a monopoly or favour of any kind in matters of trade."

The remaining articles, other than article 2, which provided for freedom of navigation, dealt with other topics, such as the protection of natives, the slave trade, riverine rights, &c.

3. It will be observed that article 4 specifically contemplated that at some later date it might be found necessary to allow the introduction of import duties, and, in fact, provision for duties not exceeding 10 per cent. ad valorem was made five years later in the declaration attached to the Brussels Act of 1890 (the Act itself dealt exclusively with the slave trade, and is not relevant to the present issues). This declaration modified the position regarding import duties as follows:—

AFRICA

3

"The signatories or acceding Powers who have possessions or protectorates in the said Conventional Basin . . . shall be able, so far as authority is required to this end, to establish duties upon imported goods, the scale of which shall not exceed a rate equivalent to 10 per cent. ad valorem at the port of entry, always excepting spirituous liquors.

"Nevertheless, it is understood . . . that no differential treatment or transit duty shall be established."

These concluding words make it clear that the faculty to impose import duties was not to affect the principle of non-discrimination. As will be seen, however, it is the existence of this obligation of non-discrimination in this and the other instruments which has caused His Majesty's Government to consider the possibility of withdrawal from the treaties concerned.

4. The declaration attached to the Brussels Act also provided that the duties introduced as a result of it should remain in force for fifteen years, thus completing, with the five years which had elapsed since the Berlin Act, the period of twenty years mentioned in article 4 of the latter instrument. The Brussels Declaration went on to provide that at the expiration of this period, and failing agreement on new duties—

"the contracting Powers will return to the conditions provided for by article 4 of the General Act of Berlin, retaining the power of imposing duties up to a maximum of 10 per cent."

The effect of this latter provision was that, failing agreement on new duties in 1905, the existing duties (being duties up to a maximum of 10 per cent.) should continue. Whether this state of affairs was to continue only for a further period of twenty years (see article 4 of the Berlin Act) is uncertain. In fact, no new agreement was reached in 1905, and the existing duties did continue unchanged. During the last ten years, however, duties above 10 per cent. have, under article 2 of the Convention of Saint-Germain (see paragraph 6 below), been imposed, and it may in consequence be possible, for the reasons given in paragraph 22 below, to argue that by tacit agreement article 4 of the Berlin Act has lapsed. But this lapse, if it has taken place, probably only confers a right to impose duties up to any amount by unilateral action, and does not prejudice the principle that such duties as are imposed must be the same vis-à-vis all countries. This principle of non-discrimination, while perhaps not stated in so many words in the other provisions of the Berlin Act, is almost certainly implicit therein.

5. Besides the provisions of the Berlin Act already mentioned, it is necessary to notice article 36, which provided that the parties—

"reserve to themselves to introduce into (the Act) subsequently, and by common accord, such modifications and improvements as experience may show to be expedient."

There was no provision for the unilateral denunciation of the Act by individual parties.

6. The last instrument of the Congo Basin Series, the Convention of Saint-Germain of 1919, was drawn up at the Peace Conference to revise the Berlin and Brussels Acts, and was intended to replace these instruments as between the parties to the Saint-Germain Convention. The substantive provisions of this convention are as follows: Article 1 provides that—

"The signatory Powers undertake to maintain between their respective nationals and those of States members of the League of Nations, which may adhere to the present convention, a complete commercial equality in the territories under their authority within the area defined by article 1 of the General Act of Berlin."

This latter article is then annexed textually to the first article of Saint-Germain. Article 2 provides that—

"Merchandise belonging to the nationals of the signatory Powers, &c. . . . shall have free access (to the conventional zone). No differential treatment shall be imposed upon the said merchandise on importation or exportation, the transit remaining free from all duties, taxes or dues other than those collected for services rendered.

[13464]

B 2

AFRICA

"Vessels shall also have access to all the coast and to all maritime ports (in the defined area); . . . they shall be subject to no differential treatment.

"Subject to these provisions, the States concerned reserve to themselves complete liberty of action as to the customs and navigation regulations and tariffs to be applied in their territories."

7. The Saint-Germain Convention also provided (article 15) that—

"The signatory Powers will reassemble at the expiration of ten years from the coming into force of the present convention, in order to introduce into it such modifications as experience may have shown to be necessary."

Again, there was no provision for denunciation; and the projected reassembly of the parties in 1930 was not held, nor has any fresh conference taken place (see paragraph 21 below). At present, therefore, the convention is treated as being still in force as originally drafted, and there can be little doubt that this is the legal position.

8. Not all the parties to Berlin and Brussels were original signatories of or became parties to Saint-Germain. The intention, indeed, was that they should all become parties in due course, and article 14 of Saint-Germain provided that—

"States . . . parties either to the Act of Berlin or to the Act of Brussels or the declaration annexed thereto may adhere to the present convention. The signatory Powers will use their best endeavours to obtain the adhesion of these States."

This intention has never been realised. The parties to Berlin (and Brussels) were Germany, Austria-Hungary, Belgium, Denmark, Spain, the Congo Free State, France, Great Britain, Italy, Holland, Persia, Portugal, Russia, Sweden, Norway, Turkey and Zanzibar. The United States signed, but did not ratify. The parties to Saint-Germain are the United Kingdom (whose signature also covers Zanzibar), Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Belgium, France, Italy, Portugal, Japan and the United States (on the 29th October last). In addition, Germany, Austria, Hungary and Bulgaria are parties by the operation of the peace treaties (by article 126 of Versailles, 373 of the Peace Treaty of Saint-Germain, 356 of Trianon and 290 of Neuilly, these Powers agreed to accept any conventions modifying the former Congo treaties). The position of certain countries such as Czechoslovakia (formerly part of Austria-Hungary), Soviet Russia and Turkey is anomalous and need not be gone into for present purposes. The position seems to be, therefore, that the older Congo instruments continued to be in force (and they have so been treated) as between those parties to them who did not become parties to Saint-Germain, and also as between these and the parties to Saint-Germain who were parties to Berlin and Brussels. But as between the Saint-Germain Powers themselves, that instrument replaced the earlier ones (see article 13 thereof, cited in the following paragraph).

9. Article 13 of Saint-Germain reads as follows:—

"Except in so far as the stipulations contained in article 1 of the present convention are concerned, the General Act of Berlin . . . and the General Act of Brussels . . . with the accompanying declaration . . . shall be considered as abrogated, in so far as they are binding between the Powers which are parties to the present convention."

The stipulations "contained in article 1" were those of article 1 of Berlin (see paragraph 2 above), and it is a question whether this latter article, which, as already stated, was textually annexed to article 1 of Saint-Germain, was so annexed merely or mainly in order to provide an identical definition of the geographical area involved, or whether it was also intended to maintain it as an independent substantive provision, to remain operative as between the Saint-Germain Powers in addition to Saint-Germain itself, and even in the event of Saint-Germain being terminated. If the latter was the intention then, on the termination of Saint-Germain as regards one or more of the parties thereto, article 1 of Berlin would none the less continue to operate (or revive) as between those parties, or as between them and any parties to Saint-Germain which had not denounced that convention, though the rest of Berlin would, as between the same Powers, remain abrogated. In view of the wording of article 13 of Saint-Germain, this interpretation cannot entirely be ruled out. It is, however, militated against by the fact that the substantive retention of article 1 of Berlin (by far the most important provision of that instrument) would go far to render nugatory the abrogation of Berlin, which, as between the Saint-Germain Powers, was apparently intended; such retention would also introduce confusion inasmuch as the substantive parts of article 1 of Berlin and the substantive parts of article 1 of Saint-Germain, while analogous, are not identical in effect (cf., inter alia, the difference between "freedom" and "equality" of trade); finally, it is evident from article 14 of Saint-Germain (see paragraph 8 above) that the intention (not, however, realised—see ibidem) was that the parties to the older instruments should all become parties to the new one, and in that event the retention, as a substantive provision, of article 1 of Berlin would have been both unnecessary and confusing. Nor was it necessary specifically to retain it for operation as between the Saint-Germain Powers and the Berlin Powers not parties to Saint-Germain, since the whole of Berlin was in any event retained for this purpose, and was not, as it could not be, affected for this purpose by article 13 of Saint-Germain. Another possible explanation of this matter may, of course, be that the intention was neither merely to obtain an identical geographical definition, nor to maintain article 1 of Berlin in toto qua article continuing or reviving if Saint-Germain should terminate, but that it was intended (in addition to geography) to restate and incorporate in Saint-Germain the principle of "freedom" of trade for "all" nations, qua principle, but not in the sense that this principle (i.e., article 1 itself, as a substantive provision) would survive or revive as between the Saint-Germain Powers if Saint-Germain were terminated. It may be thought, therefore, that if Saint-Germain were to be terminated as regards any party to it, Berlin and Brussels could not (or any part of them) revive as between that party and the remaining Saint-Germain Powers.

AFRICA

10. It will have been observed (paragraph 8 above) that Japan, who became a party to Saint-Germain, was not a party to Berlin or Brussels, and this fact gives rise to the following observations. It would seem, in the first place, that Japan (not being a party to Berlin or Brussels) can only claim rights under Saint-Germain, except, of course, in so far as she may be able indirectly to claim Berlin and Brussels treatment by means of any most-favoured-nation clauses in her bilateral commercial treaties. On the other hand, it must be noticed that Berlin (see articles 1 and 3) provides for freedom and equality for the trade of "all nations" and not merely of the actual parties. Under international law, it is arguable that, in certain cases, countries can claim the benefit of treaties to which they are not actual parties (alternatively, such treatment might be claimed on behalf of Japan by a party to Berlin). Any such claims vis-à-vis a Saint-Germain Power are, however, probably ruled out by article 13 of Saint-Germain (to which Japan, of course, subscribed) abrogating Berlin and Brussels as between the Saint-Germain Powers (except in so far as expressly maintained by article 1 of Saint-Germain—see previous paragraph). It would seem, therefore, that, having regard to her consent to article 13 of Saint-Germain, neither Japan, nor any other Power on her behalf, could claim the benefit of Berlin, or any part of it, in the event of Saint-Germain terminating.

11. If, however, article 13 does not, per se, have the effect of precluding any claim by or on behalf of Japan (or of any other Saint-Germain Power) under Berlin (or part of it), then it would be necessary to consider whether any such claim could, under any such general rule of international law as is alluded to in the preceding paragraph, be made good. It does not seem necessary to discuss this problem, which is a very difficult and extensive one, in detail. If information on it is desired, however, the main authorities are Roxburgh, International Conventions and Third States, McNair on "So-Called State Servitudes" in the British Year Book of International Law for 1925 (in which most of the authorities are reviewed) and the decisions of the Permanent Court of International Justice in the cases of The Wimbledon (Publications of the Court, Series A, No. 1, at pp. 21-28 and 43-45), German Interests in Polish Upper Silesia (Series A, No. 7, at pp. 28, 84) and The Free Zones of Savoy and Gex (Series A, Nos. 22 and 24, and Series A/B, No. 46, at pp. 115-185).

12. It will be observed that the terms of the Congo Basin treaties are so wide as to preclude the introduction, not merely of discrimination as between foreign countries, but even of a policy of Imperial Preference in the British territories affected. In consequence, the question has recently been discussed whether any modification or denunciation⁽²⁾ of the relevant instruments is possible, in order to enable local British administrations to grant a preferential tariff to British Empire goods. (It will be noted, however, that such a grant would not in any event be possible in Tanganyika, since that territory is administered by His Majesty's Government under a League mandate, which provides that all members of the League must be treated equally; and, in consequence, non-members of the League also, who, under any relevant treaties, enjoy most-favoured-nation rights, are also entitled to such treatment.) The question of a modification or denunciation of the Congo treaties was last considered in 1932, but while it was thought that, on the whole the Convention of Saint-Germain could, failing agreement on modification, be denounced, no action was taken because the legal difficulties and complications seemed too great. A new economic factor has, however, now rendered it desirable that the possibilities of modification or denunciation should again be considered. Japan has been Britain's chief competitor in the Congo Basin markets for some years, but, since 1932, Japanese competition throughout the world has developed to such an extent that, as you will be aware, the question of dealing with it has come to be a major problem of policy.

1935

13. Although Japan (see paragraphs 8 and 10 above) is not a party either to the Berlin Act or to the Brussels Declaration, but only to Saint-Germain, it would not, in order to recover complete liberty of action against her, be sufficient merely to denounce Saint-Germain. One reason is that, under the Anglo-Japanese Commercial Treaty of 1911, Japan is still entitled to most-favoured-nation treatment in the British territories included in the Conventional Basin of the Congo, and she would therefore be able to claim the benefit of any treatment granted in those territories to parties to the Berlin Act who had not become parties to Saint-Germain. The Anglo-Japanese Commercial Treaty has been terminated as regards British West African territories, but not as regards the East African and other British territories in the Congo Basin area. In order to recover freedom of action against Japan, therefore, it would be necessary to denounce Saint-Germain, and to supplement this denunciation either (1) by terminating the application of the Anglo-Japanese Commercial Treaty to all the British territories concerned, or (2) by denouncing Berlin and withdrawing only Tanganyika (where the position is complicated by the mandate) from the scope of the Anglo-Japanese Commercial Treaty. A denunciation of Berlin would enable the other British territories to discriminate in favour of British countries not only against Japan, but against all foreign countries alike. (As regards Tanganyika, Japan will, on the 27th March next, cease to be a member of the League of Nations, and from that date, therefore, the mandate, apart from certain questions dealt with in the separate reference on quotas in mandated territories accompanying this one, and not relevant in the present context, will no longer constitute in itself a bar to Tanganyika discriminating against Japan.) So far as Japan is concerned freedom of action could be regained by adopting either of courses (1) and (2) above; unless, indeed, it were considered (see supra paragraph 10) that Japan, though not a party to Berlin, was entitled to claim, or have claimed on her behalf, the benefit of certain of the provisions of that instrument, in which case, even if Japan alone were in question, a denunciation of both Saint-Germain and Berlin would be needed. But Japan is not the only foreign competitor in these markets, and, if possible, it would be desirable in any case to recover complete freedom (apart from the obligations imposed in Tanganyika by the mandate) by denouncing both Saint-Germain and Berlin.

14. Since it is almost hopeless to expect that in existing circumstances any modification of the Congo treaties in the sense desired by His Majesty's Government, or even any termination by general agreement, could be obtained, the first question to be decided is how far it is legally possible to obtain freedom unilaterally by giving reasonable notice of termination, seeing that the treaties contain no provision for unilateral denunciation. Do treaties of this kind continue for ever unless modified or terminated by common accord or until they lapse from desuetude, or is it, on the contrary, possible for the parties to free themselves unilaterally by giving reasonable notice to that effect? A copy of a memorandum prepared in the library of the Foreign Office on this subject is enclosed (paper E). As regards the doctrine of rebus sic stantibus therein discussed, i.e., the doctrine whereby a party may withdraw from a treaty which does not provide for denunciation, on the ground that there has been a vital or material change of circumstances since the treaty was entered into, it seems unnecessary to try and determine whether this doctrine is legally sound or not, as there seem in any event to be strong objections to attempting to make use of it in the present case. In the first place, the doctrine is one which, if applied in the present case, could be used by other countries as a means of escaping from treaty obligations which it is in the interest of His Majesty's Government to maintain. Secondly, it is by no means clear that the necessary "change of circumstances" has really occurred in the present case. It is true that Japanese competition has vastly increased, and it might possibly be argued that the parties to the Congo Basin Treaties, when they provided for a régime of equality and freedom of trade, never contemplated a state of affairs in which one country would be able so drastically to undersell all others, and that they based themselves on the assumption that the price levels of all countries would, within limits, bear a reasonable ratio to one another. On the other hand, at least part of the reason why His Majesty's Government desire to free themselves from the Congo treaties lies not in any outside factor, such as Japanese competition, but in a change of commercial policy on the part of His Majesty's Government themselves, in pursuance of which they have substituted protection for free trade, and now desire to be able to accord Imperial Preference in the East African territories to other parts of the Empire. It seems very necessary that a country wishing to terminate a treaty obligation on the ground that circumstances have changed should not itself be the author or part-author of the change rendering the termination desirable to that country.

⁽²⁾ In this reference the term "denunciation" is used in relation to possible action in connexion with the Congo Basin Treaties, as meaning unilateral action by His Majesty's Government by which they would cease to be a party to the treaty in question; such action would not, of course, by itself have the effect of terminating the treaty altogether, and it would continue to operate as between the other parties except to the extent to which they denounced it too.

15. The doctrine of rebus sic stantibus being the only ground based on general principles of international law on which it might be possible to seek to terminate the Congo Basin Treaties, it follows that the right so to terminate them, if it exists at all, must be found in or under the treaties themselves. If it is clear that a given treaty, when negotiated, was intended to set up a permanent state of affairs, then evidently no termination, except by agreement or obsolescence, is possible. If, on the other hand, it is possible to infer from the treaty, or the surrounding circumstances, that such was not the intention, then it would seem that, notwithstanding the absence of any provision for unilateral denunciation, individual parties may nevertheless denounce the treaty by giving "reasonable" notice. This is the view taken by Oppenheim (International Law, vol. 1, § 538) in the following passage:—

"Section 538. Treaties, provided they are not such as are concluded for ever, may also be dissolved by withdrawal, after notice by one of the parties. Many treaties stipulate expressly the possibility of such withdrawal, and as a rule contain details in regard to form, and period, in which notice is to be given for the purpose of withdrawal. But there are other treaties which, although they do not expressly stipulate the possibility of withdrawal, can nevertheless be dissolved after notice by one of the contracting parties. To that class belong all such treaties as are either not expressly concluded for ever, or apparently not intended to set up an everlasting condition of things. Thus, for instance, a commercial treaty, or a treaty of alliance not concluded for a fixed period only, can always be dissolved after notice, although such notice be not expressly stipulated. Treaties, however, which are apparently intended, or expressly concluded, for the purpose of setting up an everlasting condition of things, and, further, treaties concluded for a certain period of time only, are as a rule not notifiable, although they can be dissolved by mutual consent of the contracting parties."

Similarly, the Law Officers (the 28th May, 1909) advised in connexion with the Anglo-Venezuelan Treaty of 1825, which contains no provision for termination, that—

"on the whole, we think that the main object of the treaty is commercial, and that it would be held to be temporary in character and terminable by the withdrawal of either party on reasonable notice."

AFRICA

It seems evident that the Congo treaties were largely commercial in character (see below).

16. It becomes necessary, therefore, to examine the relevant treaties in order to determine whether or not they purported to set up a permanent state of affairs, and the arguments for and against may be summarised as follows (these arguments are directed mainly to Saint-Germain, but apply also generally to the other instruments unless the contrary is indicated):—

(i) The treaties are mainly commercial in character, and judging from the passages above cited, it may be thought that there is a species of presumption that commercial treaties are not normally intended necessarily to be permanent. Of the fifteen articles of the Saint-Germain Convention, articles 1 to 10 are such as might figure in an ordinary commercial treaty, and articles 12 to 15 are purely formal; only article 11, dealing with native rights, is of an entirely non-commercial character. In the Berlin Act, on the other hand, the number of non-commercial provisions is greater, though, even so, the Act remains predominantly commercial in character.

(ii) In concluding the Saint-Germain Convention, the parties were revising for the second time an instrument (the Berlin Act) not yet 35 years old. Even if the original instrument had been intended to be permanent, it may be thought unlikely that, two revisions having been found necessary, the framers of the second one would have intended to set up, or supposed that they were setting up, a final régime. Put differently, this argument is that, if the treaties be regarded as a whole, it may be that, by the time Saint-Germain was reached, they had lost any permanent character they may once have had. As against this, it may be said that, if it appears (as for special reasons to be given later—see paragraph 19—it probably does) that Berlin was intended to set up a régime of indefinite duration, there may be a presumption that the same is the case with any revising instrument.

(iii) The view that no permanent régime was intended by Saint-Germain may be regarded as being reinforced by article 15 of the convention (see paragraph 7 above), which not only specifically contemplated the possibility that revision might be necessary, but even made provision for a reassembly of the parties at the end of ten years, in order that any necessary modifications might be introduced. The recognition of this possibility and the fixing of a predetermined date for revision may be thought scarcely consistent with an intention to create a permanent régime. On the other hand, it can also be argued that the fact that an agreed revision was envisaged in no way precludes the possibility of an intention that failing such revision the convention was to continue indefinitely as it was. But again, it may be doubtful whether there is any definite evidence of such an intention, while there is at least some evidence (see this and succeeding paragraphs, passim) against it. It is worth observing that the analogous article 36 of Berlin (see paragraph 5 above), while also recognising the possibility of revision, did not oblige the parties to reassemble at all, still less did it specify any fixed date for reassembly. As has already been observed (paragraph 7), the reassembly contemplated by article 15 of Saint-Germain has never taken place. This fact is discussed further below (paragraph 21).

(iv) For what it is worth, it may be noted that, whereas article 36 of Berlin specifically provided that any modification must be "by common accord," article 15 of Saint-Germain does not contain this phrase. It is evident, however, that in neither case could any modifications, qua modifications, have been introduced except by the consent of all concerned. On the other hand, it may be argued that both articles 36 of Berlin and 15 of Saint-Germain were only intended to regularise actual modification, as such, and not to exclude the possibility of denunciation, which is a different thing, and terminates the convention altogether as regards the party or parties making it.

(v) It seems necessary to develop the last sub-paragraph a little, because (apart from such material as is to be drawn from the minutes of the discussions of the various conferences—as to which see below paragraphs 17–19) this question is the central one on this point. The question, put briefly, is whether the fact that the parties included a provision about modification, while failing to include one on denunciation, is evidence that they contemplated the possibility of an agreed revision, but intended to exclude any right of unilateral denunciation. It is clear that this question is perfectly capable of being answered in the affirmative. The argument would be that it is self-evident that parties have a right, by mutual consent, to modify an agreement if they choose, and that any such modification must be by mutual consent; hence if the sole intention of articles 36 of Berlin and 15 of Saint-Germain was to confer this right, these articles were, as regards this matter, superfluous; consequently, these articles must have had some further purpose, and this purpose (apart from the obligation to reassemble on a fixed date contained in Saint-Germain and the implied indication that no modifications would be necessary or need be agreed to sooner) can only have been to make it clear by implication that unilateral denunciation was excluded. The contrary argument would be that this is the wrong way to look at the point. According to the general principles quoted in paragraph 15 above, the question would be, did the parties or did they not intend to set up a permanent régime? If not, then notwithstanding the absence of a specific provision for denunciation, the treaty can be unilaterally denounced. On this view, the inclusion of specific provisions about modification by agreement would be evidence that the parties did not contemplate the indefinite duration of the convention in its original form, and hence some evidence that they did not intend to set up a permanent régime. Consequently, on this view, the main effect of the modification articles, apart from laying down dates and procedure, would be to make it clear by implication that any party dissatisfied with the treaty must, in the first place, and before taking any unilateral action, seek to obtain agreed modifications or an agreed termination. But these articles would not prejudice the right to denounce if the attempt to obtain agreement had been made and had failed.

AFRICA

(vi) Another argument tending to support the latter view would be as follows. If the effect of the modification articles is indeed to exclude the possibility of the total termination of the treaty, then logically, since those articles only contemplate revision, they should exclude any possibility of total termination even by the consent of all concerned. But (so the argument would run) such a conclusion would be manifestly absurd. If, however, the modification articles do not exclude termination by mutual consent, then, since they deal in terms only with revision, is there any sufficient ground for supposing that they exclude termination in any form, agreed or unilateral? Modification, as everyone knows, can only be by common accord and any words to that effect in the relevant articles may be presumed to be there ex abundanti cautela; termination, as everyone knows, may, in the absence of any contrary indication, be agreed or unilateral, and if the modification articles do not exclude the former is there sufficient ground for assuming that they exclude the latter?

(vii) One possible (though far from certain) explanation of the presence of the phrase "by common accord" in article 36 of Berlin, whereas this phrase is absent in Saint-Germain, may be found in the terms of article 4 of Berlin (see paragraph 2 above). This article, while providing for the possibility of imposing duties after twenty years, does not speak in terms of doing so by agreement, and is capable of being interpreted in the sense that at the expiry of that period the Powers would have a right of unilateral decision in the matter. It is very far from certain that this interpretation would be correct; and the minutes of the conference, while not definitely against it, do not support it. The main argument in favour of it is that article 36 (see paragraph 5 above) specifies common accord, and article 4 does not. Hence it may be argued that common accord was not intended under article 4, or it would have been mentioned there too. On this view the phrase "by common accord" in article 36 would serve only to make it clear that, with the exception of revision of article 4 after twenty years, any revision must be by agreement; and these words would not in consequence have any bearing on the possibility or otherwise of denunciation by unilateral action. Subsequent events (though not strictly relevant to the intention of the parties at the time) have served both to throw doubt on and to support the above interpretation of article 4. Import duties were, in fact, subsequently allowed up to 10 per cent. in 1890 (see paragraph 3 above), but this was done by mutual agreement (i.e., by the Brussels Declaration) and as twenty years had not elapsed since the conclusion of Berlin it could not have been done otherwise. After 1905, however, when the period imposed by the Brussels Declaration expired, and article 4 of Berlin revived, there was no agreement on new duties, and the fact that, in these circumstances, the existing duties continued might be held to support the view that any revision must be an agreed one. On the other hand, it is possible (see paragraph 4 above) that these duties were intended to continue until 1925, but, before this date was reached, duties of over 10 per cent. were, nevertheless, being imposed under article 2 of Saint-Germain. These duties were imposed not only as against the Saint-Germain Powers, but also vis-à-vis the Berlin Powers not parties to Saint-Germain, and without any protest from the latter, so far at all events as the British territories covered by the treaties are concerned.

1935

(viii) The question discussed in paragraph 9 above as to whether it was intended in Saint-Germain to retain article 1 of Berlin as an independent substantive provision (and not merely to recite it for purposes of geographical definition) so that it would remain in force as between the Saint-Germain Powers (with the exception perhaps of Japan), even if Saint-Germain were terminated, may have some relevance on the question of the intention of the parties as regards the permanence or otherwise of Saint-Germain, inasmuch as if the intention indeed was to maintain article 1 of Berlin for this purpose this might be some evidence that the parties contemplated the possibility of Saint-Germain being terminated.

17. On account of the obscurity of the question of terminating these instruments, it is almost certain that an international court would have recourse to the minutes of the conferences at which the treaties were drawn up, in order to ascertain, if possible, what were the intentions of the parties. A reference to p. 117 of the procès-verbaux of Saint-Germain (copy attached, Paper G) shows that the question was raised, as to what would be the position at the end of the period of ten years contemplated by article 15 if the Powers were unable to agree upon modifications. The President stated, in the course of the meeting, that the position would be the same as under the régime of the Berlin and Brussels Acts:—

“chaque Puissance restera libre de déclarer qu'elle ne se considère plus comme liée par la Convention.”

He evidently considered that the Berlin and Brussels Acts were terminable unilaterally, but, of course, this is no evidence that they in fact were. The United States delegate urged that the convention should remain in force if an agreement for its revision could not be arrived at. The Belgian delegate was against the idea of imposing on the African Powers a kind of perpetual contract. The discussion on this point was concluded by the Belgian delegation stating that they would accept—

“une formule marquant qu'une réunion en vue de la revision sera obligatoire.”

As a result, article 15 was adopted stating that the contracting parties were to meet on the expiry of a period of ten years to introduce into the convention such modifications as experience had showed to be necessary. The opinion was also expressed during the discussions of the drafting commission that if the Powers were unable to agree on a revision at the expiry of ten years, each Power would be free to declare that it was no longer bound by the convention. However, there was evidently no definite agreement on the subject and the discussions seem consistent with either view, and do not appear to be conclusive.

18. The delegates to Saint-Germain also discussed the question of the duration of the Berlin and Brussels instruments; and although their views are not evidence as to the intention of the parties to the former instruments, it may be of interest to give the gist of the discussions. The matter came up in regard to the text of the second paragraph of the preamble to the Saint-Germain Convention, which reads as follows:—

“Considérant que le régime de la franchise d'entrée instauré pour vingt ans par l'article 4 dudit Acte [i.e., the Berlin Act] a dû être modifié pour une période provisoire de quinze ans par la Déclaration de Bruxelles du 2 juillet 1890 et que, depuis lors, aucun accord n'est intervenu, contrairement aux dispositions desdits Actes.”

This text appears to be consistent with the view that the obligations with regard to freedom of commerce of the Berlin and Brussels Acts were still in force and equally consistent with the view that they had lapsed. A study of the relevant passage on pp. 91 and 92 of the procès-verbaux of the conference (Paper G) will show that this very point was argued between the delegates. Since a text was adopted which was consistent with either view, it would seem that neither side convinced the other as to what the legal position was.

19. As has already been observed, it is not possible to rely on the Saint-Germain discussions as showing what the intention of the parties was in framing the Berlin Act more than thirty years before; and, in any case, the discussions in question could be in no way binding on those parties to the Berlin Act who did not take part in the Saint-Germain discussions or become parties to that convention. If reference is made to the minutes of the Berlin Conference itself, however, it becomes quite plain that, apart from article 4, the intention was that the treaty should continue indefinitely. Protocol No. 8 of the procès-verbal of the Berlin Conference (Paper F, pp. 210 and 211) records the words of the British delegate, Sir Edward Malet, as follows:—

“the régime of freedom of commerce in the Congo Conventional Basin, as laid down by the Act, was without limit as to duration, and that article 4 solely aims at deciding afresh after twenty years whether or no import duties ought to be still prohibited.”

He went on to ask for the assent of the conference to this proposition, and this was unanimously given after a discussion in which several delegates expressed their agreement with this view, the French delegate laying stress on the fact that—

“the prohibition of differential duties . . . and of all inequality of treatment . . . is affected by no limit of time.”

20. These pronouncements obviously present considerable difficulties in the way of deciding that there is any unilateral right to denounce Berlin. As regards Saint-Germain, the position is evidently more in favour of the possibility of denunciation, whether the matter be considered on the basis of the procès-verbaux or on that of the actual terms of the instrument itself.

21. Two further factors must be noticed. Such arguments as exist in favour of supposing that there is a right of unilateral denunciation, i.e., in effect, of supposing that there was no intention to set up a permanent régime, obviously apply much more forcibly to the commercial provisions of the treaties; there really is very little, if any, reason to suppose that the non-commercial provisions, e.g., those respecting the slave trade and native rights, were not intended to be absolutely permanent unless changed by common accord. Yet if a treaty is denounced, it must be denounced as a whole; it is not normally possible to denounce part while continuing to be bound by another part. The other factor applies particularly in the case of Saint-Germain. It has already been observed (paragraph 8) that the parties to that instrument intended, or hoped (see article 14), that all the other parties to Berlin would accede to Saint-Germain. They did not, in fact, do so. If, therefore, Saint-Germain were terminated by one of the parties thereto, then, on the assumption (see paragraph 9 above) that Berlin would not revive as between that party and the other parties to Saint-Germain, the withdrawing party, while no longer bound to accord the conventional treatment to the other parties to Saint-Germain, would continue (under Berlin) to have to accord much the same treatment to the Berlin Powers not parties to Saint-Germain; in other words, that party would be at liberty to treat the other Saint-Germain Powers less favourably than these Berlin Powers. It is somewhat difficult to suppose that the framers of Saint-Germain really intended to create a situation in which they might, as against such a withdrawing party, be placed in a worse position than if they had remained parties to Berlin pure and simple. This, for what it is worth, may be evidence that they did not intend Saint-Germain to be subject to unilateral denunciation. On the other hand, it is to be noted that, on such withdrawal by one of the parties to Saint-Germain, not only the rights of the other Saint-Germain Powers, but also their obligations vis-à-vis that party would terminate. This fact might, to a large extent, outweigh the disadvantage mentioned above.

22. Before leaving the question of the denunciation of Berlin and Saint-Germain, and on the assumption that these instruments or either of them can be denounced, the question of procedure must be discussed. The first question is what amount of notice would be “reasonable.” It is suggested not less than six months and not more than one year. The second question is as to the necessity for holding conferences in order to attempt to obtain general consent either to the changes desired by His Majesty's Government or to termination by agreement. It is clear that such general consent or agreement would never be obtained, but it is possible that the attempt ought to be made. In view of the terms of articles 36 of Berlin and 15 of Saint-Germain, there is much to be said for this conclusion (and please see the penultimate sentence of paragraph 16 (v) above). Berlin, of course, laid no specific obligation on the Powers to meet again; but Saint-Germain did (see paragraph 16 (iii) above). As already observed, however (paragraph 7), no further conference has ever been held. His Majesty's Government did, indeed, in July 1930, write to the other Powers stating that in their view the convention came up for revision on the 31st July, 1930, but that the amendments which this country might want to introduce were not of such importance as to oblige His Majesty's Government to press for their adoption, and that they proposed in consequence that the convention should remain in force unaltered until 1935. Only the Portuguese and Japanese Governments definitely agreed to this proposal. The Belgian Government agreed in principle, but suggested that the proposal should be embodied in a protocol to be signed by the Saint-Germain Powers. Replies were not received from the other Governments and the proposed protocol was never signed. The terms of the proposed protocol as settled between His Majesty's Government and the Belgian Government, although it came to nothing, may be of interest, and copies of two versions of it are attached (Papers H and J). Paper H contains the version originally proposed by the Belgians, and it will be seen that it includes a clause specifically providing that, in the event of the parties not being able to agree at the proposed conference as to the conditions in which the convention should continue in force, any party might afterwards denounce the convention on giving notice of its intention to do so. For reasons which are not very clear, the Belgian Government subsequently withdrew the suggestion for this clause, and Paper J contains the version of the protocol which was finally agreed upon between the two Governments. Either in consequence or in spite of the failure on the part of certain of the parties to agree to the proposals of His Majesty's Government, and the failure to sign the protocol, the convention has continued to be treated as being in force, and it would scarcely seem possible to argue now that it has in any way lapsed. It is unnecessary to consider whether in these circumstances a conference could be called by His Majesty's Government prior to 1935, since no such conference could in any event now be held before that date. The question still remains, however, whether the holding of a conference (or the attempt to hold it) is, or is not, an indispensable preliminary to any unilateral denunciation of the treaties by His Majesty's Government, and in this connexion it seems clear that the attempt to hold a conference, coupled with a refusal on the part of the other interested Powers to attend, would be equivalent to holding it and failing to agree on modification or termination.

23. There remains the question of the necessity and possibility of denouncing the declaration attached to the Brussels Act (see paragraphs 3 and 4 above). It may be considered that no denunciation is here called for, since it is possible to maintain that the declaration has already lapsed. It will be recollected that its object was to amend article 4 of the Berlin Act (for the position in regard to this article, see paragraphs 16 (vii) and 19 above). It seems clear (see paragraph 4) that, as no new duties were agreed upon in 1905, the Brussels Declaration lost its force except in so far as it operated to restore the régime of article 4 of Berlin, subject to the continuance of any existing duties (being duties up to 10 per cent.). The restoration of the régime of article 4 may have meant (the position is very obscure—see paragraph 4 above) that these existing duties were to continue unchanged for a further period of twenty years, i.e., until 1925, when they might be altered (though whether by agreement or unilaterally is not clear—see paragraphs 16 (vii) and 19 above). However, even before 1925 duties above 10 per cent. were being imposed without protest and have since continued to be. It may be argued, therefore, that article 4 of Berlin has tacitly lapsed, and, if so, it would seem that the Brussels Declaration is now entirely spent and has lost its force, even if it did not do so in 1905, when article 4 of Berlin revived. In this connexion, it may be noted that, in 1922, in a note to the Belgian Ambassador in London, Lord Curzon expressed a reserve against any thesis that the territorially interested Powers were bound to continue the régime of a maximum import duty of 10 per cent. until all the signatories of the Berlin and Brussels Acts should have agreed to a new régime:—

"It is evident, in the view of His Majesty's Government, that the effect of section 3 of the 1890 declaration, taken in conjunction with article 4 of the General Act of Berlin, was that, on and after the 2nd July, 1905, the Powers were free to redetermine what customs régime should be applied in the conventional basin of the Congo. It is true that no redetermination of the régime was suggested at that time, but it is for that reason that His Majesty's Government consider that the general position as regards the customs régime was subsequently an undetermined one."

24. If the Brussels Declaration has not already lapsed, the question of its denunciation arises, since it only operates to permit the imposition of certain duties and does not affect (indeed, specifically maintains—see paragraph 3 above) the principle of non-discrimination. As regards the possibility of denunciation, it would seem that, of all the relevant instruments, the Brussels Declaration is the one in regard to which it is most easy to maintain that it was not intended to be permanent. Here also the question of holding a preliminary conference arises.

25. The final question on which your opinion is desired is how far it would be consistent with the terms of the Congo Basin Treaties to introduce in the British territories affected a system of quotas, i.e., a system whereby the goods to be imported annually from any given country would be limited to a fixed quantity. If it were possible to institute such a system, this might afford an adequate means of protection against Japanese competition without going to the length of denouncing the relevant treaties. It must be premised, of course, that any such system would be (or purport to be) (as under the terms of the treaties it would have to be) entirely non-discriminatory in character; i.e., the quotas allocated to the different countries, including Japan, would all be allocated on the same basis (e.g., the average of each country's imports during a given number of years previous to the imposition of the quota). The result of this would be that certain countries would, in fact, receive, owing to their having during previous years had a greater share of the trade, a larger quota than other countries, though the basis of allocation would be the same for all. It is further evident that this basis itself could so be chosen, as in fact, though not in form, to favour or penalise certain countries, and this has been a frequent ground of complaint by countries against given quotas allocated to them in other countries. There are several other ways in which quotas apparently fair on paper may operate inequitably in practice. Hitherto the view taken by Sir John Simon's advisers has been that even a non-discriminatory system of quotas (if such a thing is really possible) would not be consistent with the terms of the treaty. The French Government have, however, expressed a different view, at any rate so far as Saint-Germain is concerned. In a recent note addressed to His Majesty's Ambassador at Paris they observed that—

"Touchant les territoires du bassin conventionnel du Congo, le Gouvernement français considère que ni l'égalité commerciale, ni le libre accès des marchandises dans les territoires placés sous l'autorité des Puissances contractantes, que sanctionne la convention de Saint-Germain, ne s'opposent à l'institution de contingents applicables sans exception à toutes les Puissances signataires, y compris la Grande-Bretagne, et établis sur la base de la plus stricte équité, notamment pour le choix des années de référence. Il se plaint à penser qu'il est d'accord à cet égard avec le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté britannique."

It will be observed that the French note refers to "commercial equality" (article 1 of Saint-Germain) and to "free access" (article 2), but that it does not mention any principle of "freedom" of trade (see article 1 of Berlin). In this connexion (see paragraph 9 above) it will be remembered that article 1 of Saint-Germain reproduces textually article 1 of Berlin (which article is also maintained by article 13 of Saint-Germain) and that the latter does mention "freedom" of trade. It is, of course, as already observed (paragraph 9), open to doubt whether the Saint-Germain Convention, by reproducing article 1 of Berlin, really intended to restate the principle of freedom of trade. It may rather be that the intention was merely to reproduce the article for the purpose of defining the geographical limits of the conventional area. However this may be, and notwithstanding the French view, it seems open to question whether quota restrictions, however equitably fixed, can be said to be consistent with any of the three principles enunciated in the relevant treaties. These treaties abound with provisions forbidding discrimination against trade, and it seems therefore that it might be difficult to maintain that a quota imposed with a view to limiting the influx of foreign goods, particularly if aimed in substance (though not in form) against the goods of one particular country, would be consistent with, e.g., "complete commercial equality" (article 1 of Saint-Germain) or that it would not be "differential treatment" (article 2), or that it would be compatible with the prohibition against "a monopoly or favour of any kind in matters of trade" (article 5 of Berlin). The matter has also been considered by the Departments of His Majesty's Government with reference to the meaning of the words "free access" in article 2 of Saint-Germain, and in a semi-official letter from the Board of Trade to the Foreign Office of the 14th November last the following views were expressed:—

"So far as we can see the possible justification for the view that quotas are permissible would be that the words 'shall have free access' (in article 2 of Saint-Germain) have a purely general meaning which is qualified and explained in the following sentence of the same paragraph. As against such an interpretation there seem to us to be the following indications that on the contrary the two sentences of article 2 contain two separate and distinct ideas:—

"(1) The sentence does not appear so far as we know in any other modern instrument in this form and in particular it is not included in the mandates drawn up at the same time.

"(2) It cannot be argued that the treaty dates back to a time when the modern system of regulation by quota could not have been contemplated. Although quotas in their present form might not have been in the minds of the parties in 1919 they were of course quite conversant with the idea of prohibitions.

"(3) The two sentences are quite distinct and there is no indication in the text that they are intended to qualify or be qualified by each other. Indeed, in the version of the article which, according to the procès-verbal, was finally adopted at the Peace Conference at its session of the 30th July, 1919 (p. 97 of the printed procès-verbaux of the conference), the first and second sentences of the article formed separate paragraphs. Unless this is merely a typing error it is hardly consistent with the view that the first sentence was intended only to be a statement of the second in more general terms.

"According to the procès-verbaux the word 'access' does appear in the first (Anglo-French) draft of the convention, linked with ships as well as merchandise and as the expression 'shall have free access' is used with regard to shipping in article 2 of the Berlin Act of 1885, it might perhaps be argued that there is direct parentage here (especially as the word 'free' was added in the second draft), the parties only wishing to keep as much of the spirit of the previous instrument as possible. Unless, however, it is to be maintained that the old Berlin Act, article 1 of which begins with the words 'The trade of all nations shall enjoy complete freedom . . . allowed the restriction of imports by prohibition while disallowing import duties and providing for free access and transit for shipping, &c., in the widest sense, we do not see that this assists the view that free access does not mean absence of restriction.

"As against these arguments it is at least surprising that the negotiators of the Saint-Germain Convention should have wished to provide for a freer régime in Africa than they provided for the mandated territories, and further that if prohibitions and restrictions were in their minds they did not refer to them specifically instead of reverting to the special words 'free access'; the word 'prohibition' was far from being unknown at that time. On the latter point, however, the argument in the preceding paragraph as to the desire of the parties to retain as much as possible of the old Acts is probably a sufficient reply."

26. It will be appreciated that, as regards Tanganyika, since that territory (alone amongst the British territories concerned) is subject to mandate as well as covered by the Congo Basin Treaties, the question of introducing quotas there has to be considered in the light not only of those treaties, but also of the terms of the mandate. One question concerning the effect of the mandates on the possibility of introducing quotas in certain mandated territories is, however, being separately referred to you.

27. Sir John Simon would accordingly be glad if you would take the matters discussed in paragraphs 1-25 above into your consideration, and if you would be so good as to furnish him with your opinion on the following questions:—

(1)—(a) Can His Majesty's Government denounce by unilateral action the Convention of Saint-Germain of 1919 relative to the Congo Basin?

(b) If so, (i) what period of notice ought to be given?

(ii) Would it be necessary first to hold or seek to hold a conference in order to try and obtain agreement as to modifying or terminating the convention, and can it be assumed that, so far as this point is concerned, freedom of action would be regained if the other interested Powers refused or failed to attend any conference which it was sought to hold? Can it also be assumed that the failure to hold the conference envisaged by article 15 of Saint-Germain in 1929 did not, in the circumstances described in paragraph 21 above, affect the continued force and operation of the convention?

(2) In the event of the Convention of Saint-Germain being denounced or terminated, would the General Act of Berlin of 1885, as modified by the declaration attached to the Brussels Act of 1890, or any part of the Berlin Act (and in particular article 1—see paragraph 9 above), revive or continue to operate as between the denouncing or terminating parties? It will be appreciated that if the answer to this is in the affirmative, the same will also be the case as between such a party or parties and any party or parties who had not denounced the convention; and also as between all the parties, if they had all terminated it without agreeing on any specific provision as to their future relationship in the matter of the Congo Basin.

(3) If the answer to the last question is in the affirmative, could Japan, though not a party to the Berlin Act or to the Brussels Declaration, claim (or have claimed on her behalf by a party thereto) the benefit of any of the provisions of these instruments (see paragraphs 10 and 11 above)?

(4) Can it be assumed that, notwithstanding the conclusion of the Saint-Germain Convention, the relations between the parties to that instrument and those parties to the Berlin Act and Brussels Declaration who did not become parties to Saint-Germain continued, and still continue, to be governed by the Act and by the declaration so far as the latter has not lapsed?

(5)—(a) Can His Majesty's Government denounce by unilateral action the General Act of Berlin of 1885?

(b) If so, (i) what period of notice ought to be given?

(ii) Would it be necessary first to hold or seek to hold a conference in order to try and obtain agreement as to modifying or terminating the convention, and can it be assumed that, so far as this point is concerned, freedom of action would be regained if the other interested Powers refused or failed to attend any conference which it was sought to hold?

(6) Can (a) article 4 of the Berlin Act, (b) the declaration attached to the Brussels Act of 1890, be regarded as having lapsed by tacit agreement or as having lost its force?

(7)—(a) If the answer to (6) (b) is in the negative, can His Majesty's Government denounce by unilateral action the Brussels Declaration?

(b) If so, (i) what period of notice ought to be given?

(ii) Would it be necessary first to hold or seek to hold a conference in order to try and obtain agreement as to modifying or terminating the convention, and can it be assumed that, so far as this point is concerned, freedom of action would be regained if the other interested Powers refused or failed to attend any conference which it was sought to hold?

(8) Would the introduction of a quota system in the British territories in the Congo Basin area be consistent with the terms of (a) the Convention of Saint-Germain, (b) the Berlin Act and Brussels Declaration? If the answer to (b) is in the negative, could Japan (see questions (2) and (3)) avail herself of any provisions of the Berlin Act and Brussels Declaration which might operate to prevent a quota system? In this connexion would you indicate, in so far as the point is not already covered by your answer to questions (2) and (3), whether, in your view, the textual quotation of article 1 of the Berlin Act in article 1 of the Saint-Germain Convention, coupled with the terms of article 13 of the latter, had the effect either (i) of maintaining article 1 of Berlin as a substantive provision, or (ii) of restating and incorporating in Saint-Germain the principle of "freedom" of trade for "all" nations, or whether the effect was merely to provide a definition of the geographical area affected by Saint-Germain identical with that contained in Berlin.

1935

28. Sir John Simon would also be glad of any further observations which you may feel disposed to make, and if you would, in particular, raise and answer any other questions which may occur to you as having an important bearing in connexion with the matters discussed above.

I have, &c.

RONALD CAMPBELL.

List of Papers.

- Paper A.—Berlin Act. ["Africa, No. 3" (1886): C. 4739.]
 Paper B.—Brussels Declaration. ["Africa, No. 8 A" (1890): C. 6049-1.]
 Paper C.—Saint-Germain Convention. ["Treaty Series, 1919, No. 18": Cmd. 477.]
 Paper D.—Map of Congo Basin Area. [J 2741/470/60/1934.]
 Paper E.—Foreign Office Library Memorandum on Termination of Treaties. [J 1157/147/60/1932] (Annex A.)
 Paper F.—Procès-verbal, Berlin. ["Africa, No. 4" (1885).]
 Paper G.—Procès-verbal, Saint-Germain. [Confidential 11939*.]
 Papers H and J.—Two Versions of Proposed Protocol Continuing Saint-Germain until 1935. [J 4035/106/60/1930 and J 3139/21/60/1931.]

(3)

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 4, 1935.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir John Simon, to refer to the letter from this Department of the 8th January, 1935, transmitting two references concerning questions on which your opinion was desired in regard to the interpretation of the Congo Basin Treaties, and the possibility of introducing a quota system in certain territories under British mandate in Africa. In paragraph 5 of that letter it was stated that a decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice had just been received, parts of which had a bearing on some of the questions raised in one of the above-mentioned references, namely, that regarding the Congo Basin Treaties, and that a separate memorandum on the subject would be addressed to you as soon as possible.

2 The decision in question, of which I now have the honour to enclose a copy,^(*) is that given in the case of Mr. Oscar Chinn, a British subject, which was submitted to the Court by special agreement between the Governments of the United Kingdom and Belgium. The point at issue was whether certain measures introduced in the Belgian Congo in regard to fluvial transport, and which were alleged to have caused damage to Mr. Chinn's business, were contrary to the Convention of Saint-Germain or not. The Court, by a majority of six to five, decided in favour of the Belgian contention that no infraction of Saint-Germain was involved. The facts of the case and some of the grounds on which the decision was based are not material in the present connexion, but there appear to be three points in the decision which have a bearing on parts of the main reference.

(i) The first of these is the question whether the Convention of Saint-Germain can be regarded as having any validity at all. The argument against its validity is that Saint-Germain is in effect a variation of the Berlin Act; but the Berlin Act could only be revised by the consent of all concerned; hence it was not open to certain of the parties to the Act to agree (even for application purely as between themselves) on a different régime.

() Confidential 14348.

(ii) The second relevant point in the Court's decision is the question whether the principle of "freedom" of trade provided for by the Berlin Act (especially in article 1) was also incorporated in the Saint-Germain Convention. It will be remembered that article 1 of Saint-Germain only provides for "equality" of commerce as between the parties, but that the annex to the article reproduces article 1 of Berlin with the passages about "freedom" of trade for "all" nations (see paragraph 6 below).

(iii) The third point is, on the assumption that the principle of freedom of trade is incorporated in the Saint-Germain Convention (as the Court in fact decided that it was), what is the exact meaning and effect of that principle as embodied in Saint-Germain. It will be convenient to deal with these points in the above order.

3. The first point was not considered by the majority of the Court (whose views are, of course, embodied in the decision itself) because they took the view that both parties, i.e., the United Kingdom and Belgium, having founded their respective cases on Saint-Germain, the Court must, for the purposes of the dispute, regard the validity of that convention as not being in question. On this point the decision of the Court (see p. 19) was as follows:—

"No matter what interest may in other respects attach to these Acts—the Berlin Act and the Act and Declaration of Brussels—in the present case the Convention of Saint-Germain of 1919, which both parties have relied on as the immediate source of their respective contractual rights and obligations, must be regarded by the Court as the Act which it is asked to apply; the validity of this Act has not so far, to the knowledge of the Court, been challenged by any Government."

The question of the validity of Saint-Germain in the light of Berlin was, however, discussed in certain of the dissenting judgments. The matter was raised by Sir Cecil Hurst, the United Kingdom Member of the Court, in the following passage (p. 61):—

"I do not propose to express any opinion as to a question which, it is true, was not raised by the parties in this case, but which must strike anyone who studies the published procès-verbaux of the Berlin Conference of 1885. That question is whether both Belgium and the United Kingdom had not already pledged themselves by the terms of the Berlin Act not to terminate or to modify, even as between themselves, the provisions of that instrument except in agreement with all the other States which were parties to it. Nor do I propose to express any opinion as to what would be the effect of such a pledge, if it had been given, that is to say whether a new treaty made in violation of such a pledge would be devoid of juridical effect, or whether it would merely be a wrongful act entitling a State which was not a party to the Convention of Saint-Germain, but was a party to the Berlin Act, to demand reparation."

The Dutch member, Judge van Eysinga (p. 70 et seq.) stated that under the Berlin Act thirteen Powers instituted a highly internationalised régime for Central Africa, in a convention which contained no clause for denunciation, or for the conclusion of further conventions inter se between some only of the parties. Article 36 of the Act provided for revision, but only with the consent of all the original thirteen contracting parties. He therefore considered that a limited number of parties could not legally revise the Berlin Act by an agreement inter se, and that any instrument between them attempting to do so was invalid, even as between themselves. His view was (pp. 72-73) that—

"The General Act of Berlin does not create a number of contractual relations between a number of States, relations which may be replaced as regards some of these States by other contractual relations; it does not constitute a jus dispositivum, but it provides the Congo Basin with a régime, a statute, a Constitution."

He added (p. 73) that the parties to the Convention of Saint-Germain in proceeding as they did

"acted contrary not only to an essential principle of international law, but also to article 36 of the General Act of Berlin. . . . This is a legal situation of such importance that a tribunal should reckon with it ex officio. The only convention which the Court could apply is the Act of Berlin," [13464]

D

1935

and that it was immaterial whether any Government had or had not actually disputed the validity of Saint-Germain. The German member of the Court, Judge Schücking (p. 87), also agreed with this view, stating that—“Once it is recognised that the intention was to create a statute of the Congo which should not be liable to be altered by some only of its authors, the will of the Powers must be interpreted as being that no convention can acquire valid existence that is contracted in disregard of the rule forbidding a limited group of signatories of the Act to modify its terms. The antecedents of the Berlin Conference show that the intention was to set aside all treaties concluded between certain Powers only in regard to their interests in the Congo Basin; indeed, two States (the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Portugal) had to discard a commercial treaty concluded prior to the Berlin Act (the 26th February, 1885), and that particular treaty was the real cause of the Berlin Act. It is beyond doubt that the signatory States of the Congo Act desired to make it absolutely impossible, in the future, for some of their number only to amend the Congo Act, seeing that any modifications thus introduced would have been a danger to their vested rights in that vast region. Accordingly, in my view, the nullity contemplated by the Congo Act is an absolute nullity, that is to say, a nullity ex tunc, which the signatory States may invoke at any moment, and the convention concluded in violation of the prohibition is automatically null and void. The fact that, up to the present time, those signatories of the Berlin Act who did not participate in the Convention of Saint-Germain have not impugned the latter instrument, cannot, therefore, in any way remedy the absolute illegality of its conclusion. It remains null and void, because it transgresses the bounds which the authors of the Berlin Act established for themselves when they subscribed to that Act.”

4. Since the majority, i.e., the Court itself, considered that, as between the parties to the dispute, it was correct to apply the convention on which they were both content to take their stand and found their respective cases, it is not possible to say whether, had this not been the case, the Court would or would not have agreed with the opinions just noticed, to which, of course, no operative effect attaches. They are of interest, however, as showing a tendency on the part of international judges of the highest class to take a strict view of the situation created by the Berlin Act, and to regard that Act as having been intended to create a more or less permanent “statute” for the Congo Basin; and they appear to indicate that, if the question of the possibility of denouncing Berlin by unilateral action were to come before an international court, the view that such denunciation is possible is one which would not prevail at all easily. Judge van Eysinga, for instance, specifically referred (p. 72) to the fact that “the General Act of Berlin contains no clause providing for its denunciation,” and seemed clearly to imply that it could not be denounced except by common agreement.

5. These views do not, however, appear to have any relevance in the present connexion as regards the particular question of law they deal with, i.e., whether Saint-Germain is, in fact, invalid ab initio on the ground suggested. It may, of course, be argued that if Saint-Germain were, indeed, as a matter of law, invalid ab initio, there would be no necessity to denounce it, and any party to it would be justified in simply disregarding it. Whether or not this argument would be sound in law, it is in any event clear that it would be politically impossible for a party to Saint-Germain to deny its validity as between the Saint-Germain Powers on the grounds reviewed above. Whatever the legal position, a party to Saint-Germain would be politically “estopped” from using such an argument vis-à-vis another such party. It would seem, therefore, that if a party to Saint-Germain desires to free itself from the obligations of that convention, otherwise than by agreement with the other parties, a resort to unilateral denunciation would be necessary. The question whether such unilateral denunciation is practicable remains in consequence one which it is necessary to determine, and in considering it the possibility that Saint-Germain may perhaps be totally invalid ab initio can, it would seem, be left out of account. It is, of course, conceivable that, in the event of a dispute as to whether unilateral denunciation of Saint-Germain was possible, the Court might spontaneously pronounce the convention to be totally invalid; but, even so, the Court might, at the instance of the party or parties objecting to unilateral denunciation, be prepared to determine whether such denunciation would be possible if Saint-Germain were valid. It is therefore necessary to assume that the question of the legality of a unilateral denunciation may in any event be material.

6. The next point dealt with by the Court, and relevant in the present connexion, is whether the principle of “freedom” as well as of “equality” of trade is incorporated in Saint-Germain. This question, it will be recollected, was discussed in paragraph 9 of the main reference (and also arose in connexion with paragraphs 10, 11, 13, 16 (viii) and 21, together with questions 2, 3 and 8 in paragraph 27). It was pointed out in paragraph 9 that article 13 of Saint-Germain abrogated, as between the Saint-Germain Powers, the Berlin Act and the Brussels Act, “except in so far as the stipulations contained in article 1 of the present convention are concerned.” These stipulations were as follows:—

Article 1.

The signatory Powers undertake to maintain between their respective nationals and those of States members of the League of Nations, which may adhere to the present convention, a complete commercial equality in the territories under their authority within the area defined by article 1 of the General Act of Berlin of the 26th February, 1885, set out in the annex hereto, but subject to the reservation specified in the final paragraph of that article.

Annex.

Article 1 of the General Act of Berlin of the 26th February, 1885.
The trade of all nations shall enjoy complete freedom:—

- (1) In all the regions forming the basin of the Congo [here follows geographical definition of the regions involved].
- (2) In the maritime zone extending along the Atlantic Ocean [here follows geographical description of regions involved].
- (3) In the zone stretching eastwards from the Congo Basin [here follows geographical description of the regions involved].

It is expressly recognised that, in extending the principle of free trade to this eastern zone, the conference Powers only undertake engagements for themselves, and that in the territories belonging to an independent sovereign State this principle shall only be applicable in so far as it is approved by such State. But the Powers agree to use their good offices with the Governments established on the African shore of the Indian Ocean for the purpose of obtaining such approval, and in any case of securing the most favourable conditions to the transit (traffic) of all nations.

It will be seen that in the above annex to article 1 of Saint-Germain (consisting of a textual repetition of article 1 of Berlin) the principle of freedom of trade is mentioned twice, first, at the very beginning in the passage “the trade of all nations shall enjoy complete freedom,” and, secondly, in the concluding paragraph.

7. It was suggested in paragraph 9 of the main reference that the effect of this reproduction of article 1 of Berlin in article 1 of Saint-Germain, combined with the provisions of article 13 of Saint-Germain, might be of three different kinds:—

- (i) It was suggested in the first place that the effect might be merely geographical, the sole intention being to provide an identical definition of the area involved.
- (ii) Secondly, it was suggested that (especially in view of the terms of article 13 of Saint-Germain) the intention may have been to except article 1 of Berlin from the general abrogation of Berlin as between the Saint-Germain Powers provided by article 13, in such a way that, if Saint-Germain were terminated, then, although Berlin as a whole would not revive, article 1 thereof would revive or continue to operate as between the Saint-Germain Powers.

[13464]

(iii) In the third place, it appeared possible that the intention was to produce an effect covering, but going beyond, the first alternative, yet falling short of the second, namely, while securing an identical geographical definition, also to incorporate the principle of "freedom" of trade in Saint-Germain, in addition to that of "equality" mentioned in the opening and substantive part of article 1 of Saint-Germain. On this view, article 1 of Berlin would not revive on the termination of Saint-Germain. On the other hand, Saint-Germain, so long as it continued to operate, would involve "freedom" as well as "equality" of trade.

8. On this question the Court decided (see pp. 19, 20 and 22-23) that the phrase "The trade of all nations shall enjoy complete freedom," which appears at the beginning of the annex to article 1 of Saint-Germain (being repeated from article 1 of Berlin), does not embody a provision intended to be reproduced with operative force in Saint-Germain, but that, nevertheless, Saint-Germain has maintained the general principle of freedom of trade with obligatory force, because this principle appears in the last paragraph of the annex to article 1. Whereas (so the Court seems to have thought) the opening paragraphs of this annex only maintained in force the territorial definitions contained in article 1 of Berlin, the last paragraph was maintained with substantive effect because of the words in article 1 proper of Saint-Germain (i.e., that part of the article other than the annex) which run "but subject to the reservation specified in the final paragraph of that article." (The above appears to be a correct description of the effect of the Court's decision as given at the bottom of p. 19.) The court also considered that the same principle of "freedom" of trade was to be found in articles 2, 5 and 10 of Saint-Germain (pp. 20 and 22-23).

9. Only one dissenting opinion, that of Judge Altamir, was given in regard to the question of "freedom" of trade. His view (p. 35) was that "equality" only was imported by Saint-Germain. Sir Cecil Hurst, who agreed with the view of the majority on this point, stated his opinion as follows (pp. 62-63):—

"In the Convention of Saint-Germain there is no specific provision in favour of freedom of trade. In this respect it differs from the Berlin Act, article 1 of which provides that in the Congo the trade of all nations shall enjoy complete freedom. All that the Convention of Saint-Germain provides for in article 1 is 'complete commercial equality,' and yet there is a provision in this same article which looks as if it must have been intended by the new convention to keep alive the principle of freedom of trade laid down in the first article of the Berlin Act. This provision consists of the words at the end of the article, 'but subject to the reservation specified in the final paragraph of that article.' The final paragraph of article 1 of the Berlin Act is that, 'in extending the principle of free trade to the eastern zone, the conference Powers only undertake engagement for themselves,' &c. If the authors of the Convention of Saint-Germain deliberately kept alive that reservation in the Berlin Act as to freedom of trade instead of making a corresponding reservation as to the application of the principle of complete commercial equality to the eastern zone, it seems difficult to escape the conclusion that they intended to maintain, after the Convention of Saint-Germain came into force, this principle of liberty of trade. It is equally difficult to believe that they intended the principle to apply only in the eastern zone and not throughout the Conventional Basin. I conclude, therefore, that this principle operates in the Belgian part of the Congo, and that the Belgian Government is still under obligation to the Government of the United Kingdom to see that the trade of all nations enjoys complete freedom."

10. The opinion of the Court as to "freedom" of trade in Saint-Germain has a bearing on two questions discussed in the main reference (a) the position of Japan, and (b) the possibility of introducing a quota system in territories subject to the Congo régime. The position of Japan was discussed in paragraphs 10 and 11 of the main reference. It was there pointed out that although Japan was not a party to Berlin, she might be able to claim the benefit of it by reason of the provision in article 1 thereof "The trade of all nations shall enjoy complete freedom" (which might mean all nations whether parties or not). If this were so, then, if the position were that article 1 of Berlin had been kept alive by article 1 of Saint-Germain in the sense that it would revive or continue to operate as between the Saint-Germain Powers if Saint-Germain were terminated (view (ii) in paragraph 7 above), Japan might, even on termination of Saint-Germain, still be entitled to freedom of trade.

11. The decision of the Permanent Court, it would appear, weakens this possibility without actually excluding it. On the one hand the Court decided that the phrase "The trade of all nations shall enjoy complete freedom" at the beginning of the annex to article 1 of Saint-Germain was not reproduced with operative force. On the other hand the Court decided that the last paragraph of the annex was reproduced with operative force, and this paragraph, besides referring to "free trade" also obliges the parties to use, in certain regions of Africa, "their good offices for the purpose of . . . securing the most favourable conditions to the transit (traffic) of all nations." Sir Cecil Hurst it will be remembered (see above paragraph 9) considered that the effect of this was to oblige the parties to allow freedom of trade for all nations throughout the conventional area.

12. The Court did not consider the further point (which was not in question in the case) whether article 1 of Berlin (or rather the principle of freedom for the trade of all nations) was, by reason of article 13 of Saint-Germain, excepted from the general abrogation of Berlin in such a way as to survive even the termination of Saint-Germain itself. There is therefore nothing in the Court's decision to affect the conclusion suggested in the last sentence of paragraph 9 of the main reference. The probability seems to be that the exception in article 13 of Saint-Germain to the general abrogation of Berlin was introduced in order to avoid any apparent contradiction between that abrogation and the repetition of part of the provisions of Berlin in the first article of Saint-Germain. On this view the effect of the exception would be (as between the Saint-Germain Powers) to maintain article 1 of Berlin (or rather the principle of freedom of trade for all nations embodied in it) only so long as Saint-Germain remained in force, and not in the sense of having any existence independently of Saint-Germain.

13. It has been mentioned (paragraph 10 above) that the decision of the Court that the principle of "freedom" of trade is incorporated in Saint-Germain also has a bearing on the question discussed in paragraph 25 of the main reference concerning the possibility of introducing a system of quotas in the British Congo Basin territories, as an alternative to denouncing the Congo Basin treaties. In that paragraph the view was expressed that it was very doubtful whether a quota system would be compatible either with Berlin or Saint-Germain. It seems evident that a quota system, however equally its incidence may fall on the various countries involved, must involve a restriction on the complete "freedom" of trade. Again, even on the view that Saint-Germain only involves "equality" of trade, there was some doubt as to whether a quota system could be consistent with real equality, or with the "free access" mentioned in article 2 of Saint-Germain. From the Court's decision, however, which (p. 22) specifically mentions article 2 (inter alia), it now appears that the principle of "freedom" of trade should be regarded as being incorporated in Saint-Germain as well as in Berlin, and therefore it becomes more than ever doubtful whether a quota system would be possible.

14. The third point decided by the Court and relevant in the present connexion (see paragraph 2 (iii) above) also affects the quota question. After deciding that the principle of "freedom" of trade is incorporated in Saint-Germain, the Court went on to elucidate the meaning of that principle in connexion with Saint-Germain. The Court's view was that "freedom" of trade has not quite the same meaning in Saint-Germain as in Berlin. The relevant passage from the decision of the Court is as follows (p. 23):—

"Whilst therefore it is certain that the Convention of Saint-Germain is also based on the idea of commercial freedom, it is however to be observed that this idea has not the same import in the convention as in the Act of Berlin. This Act really meant by free trade the régime of the open door. By abolishing—as has already been stated—the prohibition to levy customs duties found in article 4 of the Act, the convention has abandoned this régime; in this connexion it should also be observed that article 5 of the 1935

Act, the second paragraph of which corresponds to article 3 of the convention, contained a first paragraph which does not reappear in the convention and which prohibited the granting of a monopoly or privilege in matters of trade.

"It cannot be supposed that the contracting parties adopted new provisions with the idea that they might lend themselves to a broad interpretation going beyond what was expressly laid down.

"Freedom of trade, as established by the convention, consists in the right—in principle unrestricted—to engage in any commercial activity, whether it be concerned with trading properly so-called, that is the purchase and sale of goods, or whether it be concerned with industry, and, in particular, the transport business; or, finally, whether it is carried on inside the country or, by the exchange of imports and exports, with other countries."

The concluding phrases of this passage give ground for thinking that the Court considered that the expression "freedom of trade" in Saint-Germain includes the right, in principle unrestricted, to engage in the exchange of imports and exports with other countries; and this would seem to indicate that the legality of quota restrictions in the conventional area must be doubtful.

15. Sir John Simon would be glad if you would take the above matters into consideration in giving your opinion on the questions raised by the main reference; and if you would treat both the references enclosed in the letter of the 8th January from this Department as being urgent.

I have, &c.

RONALD CAMPBELL.

Report.

1.—(a) The Convention of Saint-Germain appears from its general heading or title to have been regarded by the signatories as a revision of the Berlin Act and the Brussels Act and Declaration. These Acts were treated as laying down general principles for the action of the signatory Powers in the Congo Basin. A possible view of the convention is that by article 15 the revision was intended to be of a temporary character, affecting only the signatories to the convention, and that the convention is now at an end by effluxion of time. This view presents many difficulties, and we reject it. There are also, in our view, serious grounds for doubting the validity of the convention. In the first place, it is difficult to see on what principle the Berlin Act could be revised except with the consent of all its signatories, and section 36 seems relevant on this point. It might be argued that the signatories of the Berlin Act who were not signatories to the convention had now lost their rights by not objecting promptly, but there are always difficulties in the way of an argument of this kind. Secondly, the Berlin Act by its terms conferred certain rights on all nations. Whether nations who were not signatories could claim rights under these provisions is a difficult question which arises to some extent under Question 3. We are on both these grounds of opinion that the convention is of doubtful validity. If, however, we are to assume that the convention was valid as between the signatories, we are of opinion that His Majesty's Government cannot by unilateral action denounce it. The convention purported to be in substitution for the Berlin Act and Brussels Act and Declaration, and it provided for modification of its terms, however futile the means provided may now appear. As appears from our answer to Question 5 (a), the Berlin Act appears to us to have been intended to be a permanent settlement, and the same reasoning, in our opinion, applies to the Saint-Germain Convention. We have given full consideration to the arguments to be drawn from the commercial character of many of the articles in these treaties. We are, however, of opinion that, reading the treaties as a whole, they were intended to be permanent. We rely not only on the non-commercial clauses, but also on the fact that the commercial clauses themselves do not merely, as in the ordinary commercial treaty, provide for an exchange of privileges or rights inter se, but create or purport to create rights for the benefit of all nations.

1.—(b) These questions do not arise.

2. The obvious difficulty of this question is an additional reason for the answer we have given to the first question. Assuming, however, the denunciation or termination of the Saint-Germain Convention, we are of opinion that the preferable view is that the Berlin Act as modified by the Brussels Declaration would revive or continue to operate as between the denouncing or terminating parties.

3. The intention of the Berlin Act and of the Brussels Declaration seems to us clearly to have been the establishment of certain principles of government and administration for the benefit of all nations. In these circumstances, we have come to the conclusion that Japan could establish a right to the benefit of any of the provisions of the treaties coming within the above description. The admission of Japan to the convention as a State interested in the subject-matter of the convention might, we think, strengthen Japan's case on this point.

There is the further point that Japan could presumably adhere to the Berlin Act under article 37.

4. In our opinion, this assumption can be properly made.

5.—(a) His Majesty's Government, in our opinion, cannot denounce by unilateral action the Berlin Act, which we think was intended to be, and is, a permanent settlement not terminable by denunciation on reasonable notice.

(b) These questions do not arise.

6. Article 4 of the Berlin Act seems to us to have been a provision binding the signatories primarily for twenty years only. In the event of there being no determination one way or the other after twenty years, we incline to the view that its provisions would continue in force, though there is ample scope for argument on the other side. Further, the Brussels Declaration expressly says that in the absence of fresh agreement the contracting parties will, after the twenty years, return to the "conditions" of article 4 subject to the power to impose 10 per cent. duties. As, however, duties higher than 10 per cent. have, in fact, been imposed without protest, we think that both article 4 and the Brussels Declaration can be regarded as having lapsed by the tacit consent of all concerned.

7. These questions do not arise.

8.—(a) and (b) We are of opinion that a quota system would not be consistent either with the Saint-Germain Convention or with the Berlin Act and Brussels Declaration. The essence of a quota system is prohibition, and it is fallacious, in our opinion, to point to the method of fixing the quota as in any way affecting its real nature. We find it impossible to reconcile a system which prohibits entry on any terms with the various provisions in the treaties in question prescribing freedom of trade. So far as Japan is concerned, our answer to Question 3 covers this case.

The form of article 1 of the Saint-Germain Convention, especially when read in the light of the explicit provisions of article 2 and of article 13, is puzzling. We are clearly of opinion that something more than a mere definition of a geographical area for the purpose of the convention was intended; otherwise there was no sense in the last few words of article 1 referring to the reservation contained in the final paragraph of article 1 of the Berlin Act. Our doubt is whether article 1 of the convention was concerned with anything more than "commercial equality," which is plainly not the same thing as freedom of trade. On the whole, our opinion is that article 1 read alone has this limited effect. When it is coupled with the terms of article 13 and also of article 2, we think the effect is to restate and incorporate in the convention the principle of freedom of trade without differentiation for the benefit of all nations.

T. W. H. INSKIP.

D. B. SOMERVELL.

Law Officers' Department,
July 19, 1935.

1935

Possibility of Denouncing Saint-Germain Convention of 1919 and Berlin Act of 1885.

THERE is a general rule that treaty instruments which are intended to set up a permanent state of things are not subject to unilateral denunciation without the consent of the other parties. Thus, at the London Conference of 1871, which followed Russia's declaration of her withdrawal from the stipulations of the Treaty of Paris of 1856 relative to the neutralisation of the Black Sea, the Powers, in an annex to one of the protocols, "reconnaissent que c'est un principe essentiel du droit des gens qu'aucune Puissance ne peut se délier des engagements d'un Traité, ni en modifier les stipulations, qu'à la suite de l'assentiment des Parties Contractantes, au moyen d'une entente amicale."

2. There are, however, cases where a Power has claimed and exercised the right to withdraw from a treaty, which does not provide for denunciation, on the ground that there has been a vital or material change of circumstances since the obligations were entered into. This doctrine of rebus sic stantibus is not considered by some writers to be a recognised rule of international law, but the majority of authorities admit that as a principle at least of international morals and public policy it is well established (Garner, American Journal of International Law, vol. 21, p. 511). The principle has been invoked in quite recent times, by China and Persia, for example, and was even used by France, in regard to certain treaties with Great Britain, in the course of oral statements during the proceedings before the Permanent Court of International Justice concerning the dispute with Great Britain over the Tunis-Morocco nationality decrees.

3. The interpretation of the rule rebus sic stantibus is not free from doubt, but the following expressions of opinion may be quoted.

4. Garner writes (American Journal, vol. 21, pp. 513-516) :—

"It is not to be understood that the rule may be invoked in every case where the change of circumstances has resulted merely in the disturbance of the equilibrium of burdens and benefits so that the obligation has become more onerous for one than for the other; the change must be such as to make the continued performance of the obligations flagrantly inequitable, unjust, oppressive, difficult of performance, or derogatory to the dignity or sovereignty of one of the parties."

* * * * *

"... each party must be its own judge, but unless the dissatisfied party repudiates by its own unilateral act the treaty, the right of the other party to judge for itself whether the changed situation is such as to justify the claim for a release from the obligations of the treaty must be admitted. Both parties being judges, therefore, a mutual agreement between them becomes necessary."

Garner quotes cases, such as the Russian denunciation of the Black Sea clauses of the treaty of 1856 and the Austro-Hungarian annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina in violation of the Treaty of Berlin, where the withdrawing Powers have themselves acted as sole judges of the existence of conditions justifying the application of the rule. But, he says :—

"The most authoritative recent and contemporary writers on international law maintain, more correctly it is submitted, that the rule merely gives the dissatisfied party a right to demand a revision or termination of the treaty, or its replacement by another. It should first approach the other party or parties, lay before them a statement of the reasons why in its opinion the treaty ought to be revised or terminated, and ask for a full consideration by them of the merits of the case."

* * * * *

"It is submitted that a dissatisfied party is justified in repudiating or denouncing a treaty which it has freely entered into only in case the other party or parties refuse to consider a request for its revision, termination or replacement by another treaty, or if after considering the request, it is refused, and it is established that in consequence of changed conditions not foreseen or contemplated by the parties at the time of the conclusion of the treaty, it has become so grossly unequal in its operation that the obligations are largely on one side while the benefits are on the other, or that the continued performance of the obligations has become difficult for one party, or interferes with the normal growth of the State or involves a substantial impairment of its dignity and sovereignty."

5. Sir John Fischer Williams also reaches somewhat the same conclusion : "It is not a doctrine that one State may by unilateral declaration rescind or modify its obligations. If it is to be put into force, the proposition that the essential conditions have changed needs either the assent of all the parties interested in the obligation or the decision of a tribunal."

6. If treaties which purport to set up a permanent state of things may, in certain circumstances, be denounced by the application of the principle rebus sic stantibus, so a fortiori may treaties which do not intend to set up a permanent state of things, although containing no provision for denunciation. Commercial treaties are of this nature. In connexion with the Anglo-Venezuelan Treaty of 1825, which contains no provision for termination, the Law Officers of the Crown advised (the 28th May, 1909) that, "on the whole, we think that the main object of the treaty is commercial, and that it would be held to be temporary in character and terminable by the withdrawal of either party on reasonable notice."

7. The question of the duration of the Act of Berlin and Act of Brussels, with declaration, and of the Saint-Germain Convention, revising those instruments, was raised during the discussions of the commission that drafted the Saint-Germain Convention. One of the paragraphs of the draft preamble of the convention runs as follows :—

Considérant que le régime commercial instauré pour vingt ans par l'article 4 dudit Acte [i.e., Berlin Act] a dû être modifié par la Déclaration de Bruxelles du 2 Juillet 1890; que ce régime est aujourd'hui périmé et que, depuis lors, aucun accord n'est intervenu, contrairement aux dispositions dudit article.

The following discussion (Procès-verbal No. 10) took place :—

M. Beer (Etats-Unis d'Amérique) estime que le deuxième considérant ne concorde, ni avec les faits historiques, ni avec les principes de droit international. C'est ainsi que le régime commercial instauré par l'Acte de Berlin ne s'appliquait qu'à la franchise d'entrée; il est inexact d'autre part de dire que ce régime soit aujourd'hui périmé.

M. Duchêne (France) reconnaît la justesse de la première observation, mais il combat la seconde.

Les rédacteurs du projet ont voulu montrer que les échéances résultant de l'Acte de Berlin (20 ans) et de l'Acte de Bruxelles (15 ans) étaient depuis longtemps dépassées. Il importe de montrer que les Actes de 1885 et de 1890 ne lient plus que provisoirement les Puissances possessionnées en Afrique. Le mot "périmé" employé dans le projet n'est peut-être pas le mot propre, mais on ne peut pas le supprimer purement et simplement.

Le Président ajoute que le régime de l'Acte de Berlin ne se prolonge que par tacite reconduction.

M. Dell'Abbadessa (Italie) réplique que, par tacite reconduction, on est retombé en 1905 sous le régime institué en 1885; sauf en ce qui concerne les droits d'entrée, on est donc toujours sous le régime de l'Acte de Berlin. L'Acte de Berlin n'était pas institué pour une période déterminée: il ne pouvait avoir de terme que par la volonté des Parties Contractantes.

M. Duchêne (France) fait remarquer que l'Acte de Berlin avait prévu une revision au bout de 20 ans; 5 ans plus tard, l'Acte de Bruxelles prévoit une revision au bout de 15 ans. Cette coïncidence n'est pas un effet du hasard: les Puissances instituaient une expérience pour une période déterminée.

Le Président ajoute qu'une Puissance signataire aurait eu le droit, à l'expiration du délai, de se considérer comme déliée si les Actes n'avaient pas été révisés.

M. Anzilotti (Italie) répond que les autres Puissances auraient pu ne pas se refuser à une revision mais déclarer en même temps qu'elles entendaient que les conventions demeuraient en vigueur.

1935

M. Louwers (Belgique) relève que l'Acte général de Berlin n'est pas un acte contractuel : c'est un ensemble de déclarations auxquelles des Puissances ont adhéré, chacune pour son compte. Sans doute, les Puissances avaient convenu que ces déclarations ne pouvaient être modifiées que de l'accord des parties; mais cela n'impliquait pas pour chacune d'elles l'obligation de continuer indéfiniment son adhésion à l'ensemble des déclarations.

8. The impression conveyed by the discussion is that, after 1905, a contracting Power had the right to withdraw from the Berlin Act, no revision having taken place.

9. At a later meeting of the same commission, a delegate raised the question what would be the position at the end of the period of ten years contemplated by the revising convention of Saint-Germain if the Powers were unable to agree upon modifications. The president of the commission stated that the position would be the same as under the régime of the Berlin and Brussels Acts: "Chaque Puissance restera libre de déclarer qu'elle ne se considère plus comme liée par la convention." In the discussion that followed, the United States delegate urged that the convention should remain in force if an agreement for its revision could not be arrived at. The Belgian delegate was against the idea of imposing on the African Powers a kind of perpetual contract. The discussion on this point was concluded by the Belgian delegation stating that they would accept "une formule marquant qu'une réunion en vue de la revision sera obligatoire." As a result, the provision was adopted which stated that the contracting parties should meet on the expiry of a period of ten years to introduce into the convention such modifications as experience showed to be necessary.

10. It is clear that the Saint-Germain Convention of 1919 revising the Berlin and Brussels Acts, providing, as it did, for a conference at the end of ten years, was not intended to set up a permanent state of things. It seems also that the conference provided for on the expiry of the ten-year period was intended to be of an obligatory nature. Moreover, the opinion was expressed during the discussions of the drafting commission (see preceding paragraph) that, if the Powers were unable to agree on revision at the expiry of the ten years, each Power would be free to declare that it was no longer bound by the convention.

11. If, then, a conference had been held at the expiry of the ten years' period as contemplated by the Saint-Germain Convention, it may well have been found that circumstances had so changed that the position of one or more of the territories affected by the convention was no longer met by the provisions of the convention. It would then have been the right of the country or countries affected to request that the convention of 1919 should be revised so as to meet the changed circumstances and to withdraw from the convention in the event of the request not being met.

12. The conference for the revision of the Saint-Germain Convention, which should have been held in 1930, has not, however, taken place. It was in the power of any one of the contracting parties to propose the convening of such a conference, and from the fact that no such step has been taken, the assumption may be drawn that the convention, by tacit agreement, continues in force unmodified.

13. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom have, indeed, made a proposal to the other Powers for the signature of a protocol by which the Saint-Germain Convention should remain in force until 1935. The French and Italian Governments have never replied to the proposal, but the mere fact that it has been made may be considered to constitute an added difficulty in the way of His Majesty's Government announcing withdrawal from the convention as a whole, without a preliminary conference with the other parties.

14. To sum up, it is suggested that there would be strong objections to a unilateral denunciation by His Majesty's Government of the Saint-Germain Convention without a preliminary conference between the contracting Powers. The period contemplated by the convention for such a conference has, however, elapsed, and it seems possible to contend, having regard to the intentions of the parties as evidenced in the procès-verbaux of their discussions at the time of the drafting of the convention, that each party is now free to request that a conference should be convoked. At such a conference, His Majesty's Government would be able to draw attention to such modifications as they considered desirable, and even to point out that circumstances have so changed that the interests of their territories affected are not now met by the existing convention. If an agreement by which the interests of His Majesty's Government would be met is not possible, it would then seem possible to give notice of withdrawal. It appears desirable that some period of notice should be given—say, six months—in order that other Powers may accommodate themselves to the changed conditions created by such withdrawal.

15. It does not appear necessary, from a theoretical point of view, to wait until 1935 before taking action. The year 1935 was mentioned in the proposal to the Powers as the period for which the convention should continue to remain in force. The proposal, however, has not been accepted by all the Powers, and it would seem possible to contend that the general position has not been affected thereby, and that a conference could be called now at any time.

16. As regards the Berlin Act, the position appears to be somewhat as follows: The Saint-Germain Convention abrogates the Berlin Act and the Brussels Act and declaration, so far as they are binding between the parties to the Saint-Germain Convention. In theory, therefore, parties to the Saint-Germain Convention remain bound by those Acts so far as regards the parties who have not become parties to the Saint-Germain Convention. In this connexion, it should perhaps be noted that, in 1922, in a note to the Belgian Ambassador in London, Lord Curzon expressed a reserve against any thesis that the territorially interested Powers are bound to continue the régime of a maximum import duty of 10 per cent. until all the signatories of the Berlin and Brussels Acts have agreed to a new régime. "It is evident, in the view of His Majesty's Government, that the effect of section 3 of the 1890 declaration, taken in conjunction with article 4 of the General Act of Berlin, was that, on and after the 2nd July, 1905, the Powers were free to redetermine what customs régime should be applied in the conventional basin of the Congo. It is true that no redetermination of the régime was suggested at that time, but it is for that reason that His Majesty's Government consider that the general position as regards the customs régime was subsequently an undetermined one."

17. If the Saint-Germain Convention is denounced, His Majesty's Government would apparently be bound, as now, by the Berlin Act as regards those parties to the Act who are not parties to the revising convention of Saint-Germain. Those parties are Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Netherlands, Spain and Russia. His Majesty's Government could not, of course, claim the benefits of the Berlin Act vis-à-vis the Powers who remain parties to the Saint-Germain Convention.

18. Parties to the Berlin Act, but not to the Saint-Germain Convention, possess somewhat different rights, although the conventional area is the same in both cases. As regards customs tariffs, after the expiry in 1905 of the fifteen years' period of the Declaration of Brussels, the parties to the Berlin Act retained the power of imposing duties up to 10 per cent. In 1922, however, as already mentioned, His Majesty's Government held that after 1905 the customs régime was an indeterminate one and claimed vis-à-vis parties to the Berlin Act the right to redetermine what customs régime should be applied. The Berlin Act also prohibits monopolies in matters of trade, but it is open to doubt whether the Saint-Germain Convention contains the same prohibition, according to the intentions of the parties. The Berlin Act applied the principles of the Vienna Congress to both the Congo and the Niger. The Saint-Germain Convention provides that as regards rivers not necessarily utilised by more than one riverain State, the Government concerned shall be free to establish such systems as may be required for the maintenance of public order and safety and for other necessities of the work of civilisation and colonisation. As regards freedom of worship, and protection of missionaries, the Berlin Act makes no reservations, whereas the Saint-Germain makes the application of the provisions subject to the enforcement of constitutional law. The declarations in the Berlin Act relating to neutrality and to the procedure to be followed in cases of future occupations on the coast of Africa are not contained in the Saint-German Convention.

19. If this country withdrew from the Saint-German Convention and the provisions of the Berlin Act revived, the most-favoured-nation clauses in treaties with countries who are not parties to the Berlin Act—providing such treaties apply to British territories in the Congo conventional area—could also be invoked.

20. The countries—other than parties to the Berlin Act—with whom treaties which contain a most-favoured-nation clause as regards customs duties have been concluded and whose provisions apply to some or all British territories in the Congo conventional area are: Albania, Argentine Republic, Austria, Bolivia, Bulgaria, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, Estonia, Finland, Germany, Greece, Guatemala, Hungary, Latvia, Liberia, Lithuania, Panamá, Persia, Poland (and Danzig), Roumania, Siam, Spain, Switzerland, Turkey, Venezuela and Yugoslavia. There are also treaties with a few countries—Ethiopia, Morocco, Muscat—where the most-favoured-nation clause is of a unilateral character and contains no definite stipulation as to the treatment to be accorded to imports from those countries into British territories, but it might be difficult to adhere, with fairness, to the unilateral character of this arrangement.

1935

21. As regards the countries remaining parties to the Saint-Germain Convention, France, Italy and Japan have commercial treaties with this country which contain most-favoured-nation provisions as regards customs duties, and which apply to certain British territories in the Congo conventional area.

22. If the United Kingdom were to withdraw from the Berlin Act, a circular notification would presumably have to be addressed to the other parties and it would seem desirable in this case, as in the case of the Saint-Germain Convention, to give a reasonable notice—say, three or six months—of the proposed action.

23. So far as Tanganyika Territory is concerned, His Majesty's Government are, of course, bound by the terms of the mandate.

24. No attempt has been made in this memorandum to comment on the possible reaction of foreign Powers to the denunciation of the Berlin Act and the Saint-Germain Convention, on the possibility, for example, of the French denunciation of the Anglo-French Convention of 1898 regarding the trade, &c., of possessions east and west of the Niger, and on the possible effect on Zanzibar's treaty position. But it would seem necessary to bear such matters in mind.

Foreign Office, May 10, 1932.

[J 3015/98/60/1935]

No. 2.

[July 19, 1935]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, January 8, 1935.

Possibility of limiting by means of quotas the importation of Japanese goods into certain British mandated territories in Africa in view of the terms of the relevant mandates.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir John Simon, to request your opinion as to the interpretation, in connexion with the question of introducing a system of quotas on the importation of goods into certain mandated territories, of the clauses in the mandates providing that the mandatory is to promote the moral and material well-being and social progress of the inhabitants.

2. The immediate occasion of this question consists in the possibility, which has been engaging the attention of His Majesty's Government, of introducing quotas in Tanganyika with a view to limiting the import of cheap Japanese goods. A similar possibility may, however, arise in the future as regards the other mandated territories in Africa administered by His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, viz., the Cameroons and Togoland.

3. It is not proposed in this reference to raise the question of the introduction of a general system of quotas in mandated territories; that question depends upon the discriminatory articles in the mandates and upon other factors. All that is being raised is the question whether, if Japan ceases to be a member of the League, and if the Anglo-Japanese Commercial Treaty is denounced in respect of these territories, it would be possible, so far as the mandates are concerned, to limit the import of Japanese goods only by means of quotas; and upon that question the only relevant articles in the mandates are those set out in paragraph 5 below.

4. As regards Tanganyika, the position is further complicated by the fact that this territory, in addition to being subject to the mandate for East Africa, also forms part of the Conventional Basin of the Congo. The question of the compatibility of quotas with the terms of the Congo Basin treaties has, together with certain other questions relative to those treaties, been referred to you separately. Even if, however, it should be decided, as regards Tanganyika, that the Congo Basin treaties can be denounced, or if not denounced place no obstacle in the way of quotas, and even if, as regards Tanganyika, the Cameroons and Togoland, one obstacle to quotas is removed by Japan leaving the League and by the denunciation of the Anglo-Japanese Commercial Treaty in respect of those territories, the question posed in the present reference would still remain, namely, how far a quota designed to keep out cheap Japanese goods would be consistent with the terms of the mandates providing for the welfare of the inhabitants.

5. The relevant clauses in the mandates concerned (viz., Tanganyika, the Cameroons and Togoland) are as follows:—

Tanganyika. Article 3.

"The mandatory shall be responsible for the peace, order and good government of the territory, and shall undertake to promote to the utmost the material and moral well-being and the social progress of its inhabitants. The mandatory shall have full powers of legislation and administration."

Cameroons and Togoland. Article 2.

"The mandatory shall be responsible for the peace, order and good government of the territory, and for the promotion to the utmost of the material and moral well-being and the social progress of its inhabitants."

It will be seen that in the case of the Cameroons and Togoland the clauses are identical. The Tanganyika clause is also substantially the same, though differing slightly in wording.

6. The facts of the case, as they exist at present, are that Japan is able to import into the territories concerned certain classes of goods at far lower prices than any other country. In those territories there exists a considerable native population at a level of subsistence very low by European standards. Owing to the low price of Japanese goods this native population is enabled, by purchasing these goods, to obtain articles which might otherwise be beyond their means. Some of these, e.g., shoes,⁽¹⁾ are articles which in more advanced countries would be regarded as necessities. It appears probable, therefore, that a quota which resulted in a serious limitation of the supplies of such goods available to the native population, and which did not confer any countervailing benefit on the territory, but was imposed merely to assist United Kingdom imports, would, in the African territories concerned, be inconsistent with the terms of the mandates above quoted. (It is, of course, not certain that a quota system would, in fact, seriously curtail the supply of cheap goods available. Enough might enter under the quota to meet reasonable needs.)

7. The principles which His Majesty's Government have regarded as being applicable to this matter are as follows:—

(i) Any measure in the shape of a quota introduced in a mandated territory must be justified primarily with reference to the interests and needs, present and future, of the territory itself.

(ii) The question whether any particular measure can be so justified is one to be decided on a consideration of all the factors involved. If, on balance, the measure can properly be regarded as being in the interests of the territory, then the fact that it may cause detriment, loss, inconvenience or hardship to certain sections of the community will not constitute any bar. Certain caveats appear relevant, however, in this connexion: (a) It would seem that a substantial balance on the right side would be necessary; (b) the interests and needs of the indigenous native population must be regarded as having especial weight; and (c) it may be that particular words in the relevant clause in the mandates (e.g., "promote social progress") will operate per se in certain cases to prevent given measures or encourage others. Further, it may be a question how far a disadvantage caused to one section of the community (e.g., the native section, or the consuming section), can be outweighed at all by any benefit, however great, conferred on a different section (e.g., the European section, or the producing or manufacturing section); but on the whole it seems reasonable to have regard to the territory as a whole. Another point is that the detriment caused by a measure limiting imports of necessities will presumably be greater than if mere luxuries are involved, and may need a correspondingly large advantage to outweigh it. Subject to these special considerations, it would appear that, for instance, a measure limiting the available supply of particularly cheap goods might, on balance, be in the interests of the territory if it also had the effect of encouraging and developing the production or manufacture of the same articles, or perhaps in some cases of other articles, in the territory itself; or to encourage exports from the territory. In this latter connexion it is to be noticed that a quota system, by a redistribution of imports into the territory amongst outside countries, might open up to the exports from that territory markets not previously available. In the case of the African mandated territories concerned, the United Kingdom already grants preference on those products which are not allowed into the United Kingdom free of duty from both Empire and foreign sources, and the retention of preference (with perhaps an extension of the field of preference if such is in fact practicable) might form a quid pro quo of sufficient value to outweigh any detriment caused to the native population by the quota. Again, a quota, while limiting the imports of certain classes of goods, may enable other classes, which it is in the interests of the territory to have, to be imported, whereas otherwise competition would have kept them out. A general argument is that any measure which would (e.g., by leading to an increase in exports) indirectly cause an increase in the purchasing power of the population, so that they would no longer be dependent on ultra-cheap goods, may be of more permanent benefit than merely continuing to ensure the supply of such goods to the inhabitants.

⁽¹⁾ Hookworm, a disease very common to native peoples, is caused by going barefoot.

1935

(iii) If, on balance, it appears that a given measure will be in the best interests of the territory, then the fact that it will also serve to assist United Kingdom manufactures will not involve any inconsistency with the clauses of the mandates quoted in paragraph 5 above.

(iv) If, on the other hand, the measure will, on balance, be prejudicial to the interests of the territory, then it cannot be justified on the ground that it will be of benefit to the United Kingdom.

It is, of course, obvious that the exact appreciation of the various factors involved, and the weight to be attached to them in any given case, can only be determined with reference to the facts of that case as they arise.

8. Sir John Simon will be glad if you will take the above matters into your consideration, and if you will be so good as to furnish him with your opinion on the following questions:—

I.—(i) Would it be consistent with the clauses in the relevant mandates, as quoted in paragraph 5 above, to impose quotas on the entry into Tanganyika, the Cameroons or Togoland of cheap Japanese goods where such quotas would have the effect of seriously curtailing the availability of those goods to the native population, and assuming (a) that if deprived of cheap Japanese goods the native population would be unable to afford to buy similar, but more expensive goods coming from other sources, and would thus, after the quota had been exhausted, be deprived of such goods altogether; and (b) that the quota would not confer, result in or be accompanied by any countervailing benefit sufficient to outweigh the above disadvantage?

(ii) Would the fact that the quotas might result in benefit to United Kingdom exports constitute in itself a sufficient justification for introducing them, notwithstanding any detriment they might cause to the territory concerned or its inhabitants?

(iii) How far, if at all, is the answer to either part of this question affected by the nature of the goods involved, i.e., necessities or luxuries?

II.—(i) Assuming the answer to the first two parts of the last question to be in the negative, would such a quota be consistent with the mandates if it conferred, resulted in or were accompanied by benefits or advantages sufficient, on balance, to outweigh any loss, detriment, inconvenience or hardship caused to the native population by the curtailment of the supply of cheap goods?

(ii) If so, (a) must those countervailing benefits and advantages redound also specifically to the profit of the native consuming population, or would it suffice if the benefit were to another section of the community (e.g., European immigrants; European or native manufacturers or producers in the territory) or to the territory as a whole; (b) would you indicate generally, so far as possible, what factors may properly be taken into consideration in estimating the balance of advantage or disadvantage, and the relative weight to be attached to the various factors and considerations involved?

III.—Assuming the answer to question II (i) to be in the affirmative, and that in point of fact the quotas could be justified on the balance of advantage and disadvantage, would the fact that they might also (either incidentally or even as a primary consideration of their introduction) enure to the benefit of United Kingdom exports involve any inconsistency with the clauses of the mandates quoted in paragraph 5 above?

IV.—In so far as not already covered by your answers to the preceding questions, would you state whether, in your view, the principles and considerations enunciated in paragraph 7 above are sound?

9. Sir John Simon would also be grateful for any observations of a general character which you may feel disposed to offer.

I have, &c.

RONALD CAMPBELL.

Report.

1.—(i) On the assumptions we are asked to make, we think a quota system for the territories mentioned would not be consistent with the relevant clauses in the mandates.

(ii) The possibility of benefit to United Kingdom trade would in our opinion be an irrelevant consideration.

(iii) Even assuming the possibility of dividing the goods in question into the two separate categories of necessities and of luxuries, the distinction is in our opinion irrelevant.

2.—(i) The proper and only consideration is the interest of the inhabitants. This must inevitably resolve itself into a question of the balance of advantage.

(ii)—(a) As far as possible we think the matter must be considered as one affecting the community as a whole. The fact that certain individuals or even sections of the community stand to gain is not enough to give rise to a balance of advantage. Their interest may be very material in considering the benefit or otherwise of the proposed measures to the territory and its inhabitants as a whole. Beyond this we are unable to go.

(b) The factors to be taken into consideration are those which would be taken into account by an enlightened Government of the territory if the territory had complete commercial autonomy. They are primarily economic as affecting the general well-being of the population and their standard of living and possibly also political and social. We feel a difficulty in further defining the factors as they cannot be tested by any legal principles.

3. Any question of benefit to United Kingdom exports is in our opinion irrelevant. Such a benefit may be incidental to some benefit which the population of the territory is going to reap, but, considered alone, it should be disregarded.

1935

32

AFRICA

4. Generally speaking, the principles appear to us to be sound apart from the reference to luxuries as contrasted with necessities. We would refer to our answers to Questions 2 (i) and 2 (ii) (b). Paragraph 7 is concerned for the most part with economic or trade policy and its results.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
D. B. SOMERVELL.

*Law Officers' Department,
July 19, 1935.*

[W 3973/1/98/1936]

No. 2^A.

[Colonial Office]

[December 6, 1935.]

Colonial Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Downing Street, April 18, 1935.

I AM directed by Secretary Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister to inform you that your advice is desired on certain questions arising from proposals which have been made for establishing a closer union between the following three territories in East Africa:—

The Colony and Protectorate of Kenya.
The Protectorate of Uganda.
The Tanganyika Territory.

Closer
Union between Kenya,
Uganda
and Tanganyika:
compatibility of proposals with Article 22
of Covenant of the League of Nations
and
Article 10
of the Tanganyika
Mandate.

A copy of the Tanganyika mandate is enclosed.

2. The history previous to June 1930 of the proposals for closer union is conveniently summarised in the Historical Note on pp. 9-12 of Cmd. 3574. A copy of this paper is annexed, together with copies of the various earlier reports, &c., to which it refers. It will be observed from the foreword on p. 2 of Cmd. 3574 that His Majesty's Government had decided to refer the proposals to a Joint Committee of the two Houses of Parliament.

3. Shortly after the publication of Cmd. 3574 a memorandum (copy annexed) was received from the German Government expressing doubts as to the propriety of His Majesty's Government's proposals.

4. The Joint Select Committee of Parliament was appointed at the end of November 1930. In December the committee sent to the Foreign Office a memorandum (copy attached) by Lord Lugard, a member of the committee, and asked that the legal adviser to the Foreign Office might give evidence on certain points raised in the memorandum. Thereupon Sir William Malkin prepared a note, with which the legal adviser to the Secretary of State for the Colonies concurred, and embodied it in a reference to the Law Officers. Copies are appended of the reference and of the note.

5. No formal opinion was tendered by the Law Officers. Informal advice, however, was received from Sir Stafford Cripps (the Solicitor-General), as a result of which Sir William Malkin prepared a new memorandum and laid it in evidence before the Joint Select Committee; a copy is annexed.

6. The conclusions of the Joint Select Committee will be found in paragraph 34 of their report. The acceptance by His Majesty's Government of the committee's recommendation was notified to the Governors of the three territories in paragraph 3 of the Secretary of State's despatch of the 13th July 1932 (see p. 47 of Cmd. 4141 annexed). There the matter rested until recently.

AFRICA

33

7. During the past few months the question has again come to the fore. Local petitions are coming forward and will have to be answered. A British Parliamentary Delegation has recommended closer union in a published report. And German pretensions have stimulated those who are anxious as to the future of Tanganyika to advocate that union or federation which they understand the mandate to envisage. All these circumstances make it necessary that the Colonial Office should know precisely what are the legal powers of His Majesty's Government.

8. The Secretary of State desires that the matter should now be considered on a basis somewhat different from that discussed in 1930, on Cmd. 3574 and before the Joint Committee; he considers that a High Commissioner and a Legislature superimposed upon the existing Governors and Legislatures would be uneconomical and unsatisfactory, and if this project is to be proceeded with at any time, he would desire to consider the creation of one Governor and one Legislature for the three territories.

9. This is not meant to imply the amalgamation of the three territories into one entity. The idea would be to leave each territory in its present constitutional position, namely, a colony, a protectorate and a mandated territory, but to provide for one Legislature composed of representatives from each territory, with power to legislate for the peace, order and good government of the three territories.

10. Ordinances enacted by this Legislature would apply throughout the territories unless in terms restricted in their application to one or more of the territories. It would be necessary, of course, to ensure that no laws should be passed which in their application to Tanganyika, or in their application to the other territories in relation to Tanganyika, were contrary to the mandate. This could be secured by instructions to the Governor not to assent to any such law or by other effective means.

11. These considerations lead inevitably to a contemplation of the composition of the Legislative Council. If it is composed so that there is an official majority, or if there is reserved to the Governor power to "certify" or to pass by his order any Bill which he considers necessary or desirable in the interest of any of the territories, the Governor's control of legislation would be complete, and His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom would consequently be able adequately to perform their function as Trustee for Tanganyika; but if there were to be an unofficial majority without a complete power of "certification" being reserved to the Governor, then, while the Governor would have the power to refuse his assent to Bills, and the Crown would have the power to disallow ordinances, there would not be any power to pass laws which might be necessary for the fulfilment of His Majesty's obligation as mandatory, except with the consent of the unofficial members.

12. It is not possible to envisage at the present moment the exact extent to which the creation of a single Legislature would lead to the unification of administration, but, as one of the chief objects of the scheme would be to ensure economy in the government of the territories, it may be assumed that there would be a substantial unification of administrative services.

13. The most convenient method of giving effect to the above scheme would be by means of one Order in Council made so far as Uganda, Tanganyika and the Kenya Protectorate are concerned, in virtue of the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, and so far as Kenya Colony is concerned, in virtue of the British Settlements Act.

14. But a difficulty arises in connexion with the wording of section 3 of the British Settlements Act. The section provides that His Majesty may delegate, by an instrument passed under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom, the powers conferred by the Act on His Majesty in Council, to three or more persons within the settlement.

15. The first question which arises is whether the suggested Order in Council would be an effective instrument so far as Kenya Colony is concerned, or whether there would have to be Letters Patent in relation to Kenya complementary to the Order in Council.

16. The second question is whether it is possible to delegate the power to legislate in Kenya to a Legislature sitting in Kenya but composed of representatives from Kenya, Uganda and Tanganyika, even assuming that the representatives of Kenya are not less than three; and, further, whether, so far as Kenya is concerned, any power could be conferred on the Governor to legislate personally.

[13464]

1935

34

AFRICA

In this connexion I am to refer to paragraph 16 of the reference to the Law Officers from the Dominions Office dated the 31st December, 1931, and to the opinion of the Law Officers dated the 29th July, 1932, with reference to the Administration of a part of the Antarctic Continent.⁽¹⁾

I am to enclose a copy of the existing constitutional instruments relating to Kenya, Uganda and Tanganyika.

17. In so far as the mandate and the Covenant of the League are concerned, the questions of law which are involved in a consideration of this matter are fully discussed in the note from the German Government and in Sir William Malkin's two memoranda, and it is not thought that it would serve any useful purpose to recapitulate them in the body of this reference.

18. I am to request, therefore, the favour of your opinion upon the following points:—

- (1) Whether the scheme outlined in paragraphs 8 to 12 is compatible with article 22 of the Covenant of the League and article 10 of the mandate for Tanganyika—
 - (a) If the Legislative Council is so composed that there is an official majority.
 - (b) If the Legislative Council is so composed that there is an unofficial majority.
 - (c) If the Legislative Council is so composed that there is an unofficial majority but there is reserved to the Governor the power to legislate independently of the Council.
- (2) If the answer to the first question is in the negative, whether the conclusions of His Majesty's Government as regards closer union in East Africa contained in Cmd. 3574 are compatible with article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations and article 10 of the mandate for Tanganyika.
- (3) Whether article 10 of the mandate for Tanganyika is in conformity with article 22 of the Covenant of the League.
- (4) If the answer to the third question is in the negative, whether and to what extent the validity of article 10 of the mandate and the use which can be made of it are affected.
- (5) Whether there are any, and if so what, constitutional or legal difficulties—
 - (a) In setting up the Joint Legislature referred to in paragraphs 8 to 12, and
 - (b) So far as Kenya Colony is concerned, in conferring on the Governor powers to legislate as suggested in paragraph 11, having regard especially to section 3 of the British Settlements Act.
- (6) Generally.

I am, &c.
W. C. BOTTOMLEY.

⁽¹⁾ Confidential 14251, No. 2c.

AFRICA

35

List of Papers.

- I.—Mandate for Tanganyika, Cmd. 1794.
- II.—Parliamentary Paper, Cmd. 3574.
- III.—Parliamentary Paper, Cmd. 1922.
- IV.—Parliamentary Paper, Cmd. 2904.
- V.—Parliamentary Paper, Cmd. 3234.
- VI.—Parliamentary Paper, Cmd. 3378.
- VII.—Parliamentary Paper, Cmd. 3573.
- VIII.—Memo. from German Embassy, September 4, 1930 (W. 9126/10/98/1930) [Annex A].
- IX.—Memo. by Lord Lugard, December 13, 1930 (W. 13562/10/98/1930) [Annex B].
- X.—Memo. by Sir W. Malkin, January 9, 1931 (W. 13562/10/98/1930) [Annex C].
- XI.—F.O. to Law Officers of the Crown, January 9, 1931 (W. 13562/10/98/1930) [Annex D].
- XII.—Précis of Sir W. Malkin's evidence before the joint Select Committee on East Africa (W. 1807/5/98/1931) [Annex E].
- XIII.—Report of Joint Select Committee (Parliamentary Paper, H.L. 184).
- XIV.—Correspondence (1931–32) arising from Report of Joint Select Committee (Parliamentary Paper, Cmd. 4141).
- XV.—Existing Constitutional Instruments relating to Kenya, Uganda and Tanganyika (see separate list in Annex F).

Report.

The statement of principles contained in the first two paragraphs of article 22 of the Covenant plainly envisages even in the case of "C" mandates a continuing trusteeship on the part of the mandatory for the people inhabiting the colonies and territories in question. Any scheme of government which either in point of form or in operation is inconsistent with that relationship must therefore be regarded as open to objection. The approbation in the case of "C" mandates of a system of administration which treats the mandated territory as an integral portion of the territory of the mandatory does not suggest to us that even in that case the mandated territory may be administered in such a way as to destroy the identity of the territory or the individuality of the people inhabiting it. Still more clearly is it proper to apply this guiding principle to a "B" mandate as in the case of Tanganyika. It follows that whatever form the machinery of government may take, the question may still arise as to whether it is so administered as to comply with the principles of article 22 of the Covenant. In the same way article 10 of the mandate is to be read not as authorising any and every "administrative union" whatever its effect, but an administrative union which satisfies both in its form and in its practical operation the conditions of article 22 of the Covenant. It might, for instance, be argued with some force that the words used in article 10, namely, "customs fiscal and administrative union or federation," contemplate a certain degree of governmental autonomy in the mandated territory as being essential to the validity of the scheme. The eighth paragraph of article 22, which it is right to regard as the authority for article 10 of the mandate, points to this conclusion.

The following answers to the first question must be understood in the light of the above observations:—

Under the scheme set out in paragraphs 8 to 12 of the case, there is to be a 1 (a) and single High Commissioner and a single Legislature for the three territories. The (c) three territories will have no subordinate Governments of their own, and according to paragraph 12 it is contemplated that there will be a substantial unification of administrative services. The question that arises, in our opinion, is whether this is such a complete union as to be contrary to article 22 of the Covenant and to the mandate. We have already indicated considerations which we think have to be kept in mind in answering this question. Clearly arguments of some force could be advanced for the view that the individuality of the mandated territory was not being sufficiently preserved. Political considerations

F 2

[13464]

1935

36

AFRICA

would also, we think, be bound to influence the decision. We do not, therefore, feel able to give an unqualified opinion on the information before us. In deciding what weight it should give to the arguments that might be raised under the Covenant and under article 10 of the mandate a tribunal would probably be influenced, and in our opinion rightly influenced, by the strength of the political and economic case for the proposed scheme, the advantage and progress of the mandated territory being clearly most important considerations in applying the general principles laid down in the Covenant and the mandate. Assuming a good case could be made on these points, this might well be accepted as overriding the objections referred to above which could be put forward to the scheme as we understand it.

- 1 (b). It would be wrong, in our view, to construe the Covenant so as to preclude for all time a degree of autonomy such as would be involved in the creation of an unofficial majority. On the other hand, we think there would be objection to any scheme of this kind unless and until the territory had developed to a stage which fitted it for self-government in the ordinary sense of the word. As we do not think it is suggested that this stage has been reached, we answer this question in the negative.
2. This does not arise.
3. We have already referred to this point in our general observations and for the reasons given we are of opinion that article 10 of the mandate is in conformity with article 22 of the Covenant.
4. This does not arise.
- 5 (a) and (b). The scheme may in our opinion be brought into effect by an Order in Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act so far as Uganda, Tanganyika and the Kenya Protectorate are concerned, and under section 2 of the British Settlement Act so far as Kenya Colony is concerned.
6. We have nothing to add.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
D. B. SOMERVELL.

Annex A (Paper No. VIII).

Aide-mémoire (communicated by the German Embassy in London).

(Translation.)

THE German Government have become acquainted with the British White Book (Cmd. 3574), which refers to the proposal to establish a closer connexion between the Mandated Territory of Tanganyika and the neighbouring British territories. From this they gather that His Majesty's Government attach particular importance to keeping the proposed innovations in harmony with the provisions of the mandate. In the opinion of the German Government, a realisation of the project in its present form would hardly be compatible with the principles of the mandate system.

As the representative of His Britannic Majesty's Government declared at the Council meeting of the League of Nations, it is the wish of that Government that, before their final decision, the Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations should take an opportunity to express their opinion on the question. The German Government assume that the commission will do this at their forthcoming autumn meeting. In view of the great interest which German public opinion takes in the matter, the German Government could not, however, omit to communicate their misgivings to the British Government at once.

The far-reaching executive and legislative powers of the High Commissioner and his council, which extend directly and indirectly to the most important branches of economic life and administration as well as to questions of policy regarding natives and other matters (No. 5 1 (a) and (b) of the statement), would abrogate or considerably limit the independent status which was accorded to the territory by article 22 of the League of Nations Covenant. It would not only establish an administrative union, but also a political and constitutional union of the three participating territories in which the mandated territory would scarcely possess the rank of a province. Article 10 of the Tanganyika mandate cannot, according to the German view, be applied, as a provision carrying into effect article 22 of the League of Nations Covenant, in such a manner that the principle of the independence of the mandated territory established in the latter article would be thereby impaired.

AFRICA

37

The German Government also doubt whether it is possible to realise the intention, announced in His Britannic Majesty's Government's statement, of advancing the interests of the population of the three territories concerned by a closer connexion. These territories exhibit striking differences with regard to their natural and economic needs, the development of their commerce and the character of the native population. Moreover, the fact that British sovereign interests exist in the neighbouring territories must, in the event of a closer connexion, contribute to render more difficult of fulfilment the intention that the mandated territory should be administered exclusively with regard to the needs of its population.

These dangers would not be avoided, in the opinion of Germany, by the provision in the proposal of the right of appeal of the High Commissioner or of three members of the Council.

London, September 4, 1930.

Annex B (Paper No. IX).

Memorandum on the Proposals for "Closer Union" in East Africa.

(With reference to the Treaty of Versailles and the Mandate for Tanganyika.)

BY articles 118 and 119 of the Treaty of Versailles Germany "renounced all rights, titles and privileges whatever" to her overseas possessions in favour of the Allies and Associated Powers, and undertook "to recognise and to conform to the measures which may be taken now or in the future by the Principal Allies and Associated Powers . . . to carry the above stipulations into effect,"⁽²⁾ and in particular to accept the articles which follow (re commercial relations, movable and immovable property, &c.).

2. By article 22 of the treaty it was decreed that the tutelage of the peoples of these colonies should be entrusted to "mandatories on behalf of the League of Nations," and the main provisions of the mandate were stated for three different categories of peoples. The treaty was signed on the 28th June, 1919. In reply to the German protest, the Allies declared, inter alia, that, for reasons given, "it is impossible for the Allied and Associated Powers to return (these colonies) to Germany" (Treaty, p. 244).

3. The Council of the League decided that "it was itself responsible in the last resort for approving and, if necessary, drawing up the mandates"; meanwhile, it called upon the Powers which had been selected as mandatories by the Allied and Associated Powers to submit draft mandates. A full report was presented (and adopted by the Council) by M. Hymans (161 of the 20th December, 1920). This document recognised the duty of the Council of the League "to notify the mandatory of the terms of the mandate after ascertaining whether they are in accord with article 22" (p. 14).

4. The approved mandate for German East Africa (Tanganyika) contains two articles, viz., 10 and 13 (copies attached—Enclosure 1), which merit consideration in reference to the proposals of His Majesty's Government for closer union between that territory and its neighbours, Kenya and Uganda.

⁽²⁾ Viz., "in order to carry the consequences of her renunciation into effect" (Hymans).

1935

Germany objects to these proposals. Her contention is—or may be—as I understand it—

- (a) That they are not in accord with the mandate and are in excess of the sanction given by article 10.
- (b) That article 10 is itself ultra vires as regards the Treaty of Versailles, by which alone she is bound.
- (c) That under article 13 of the mandate she can refer the matter for decision by the International Court of Justice.

5. Great Britain has declared her intention to submit the decisions she may arrive at to the C.P.M., and accordingly the White Paper containing the "conclusions," together with the reports of the commissions, has been transmitted to that body. I am the British member of it, but I was not present during their last session (a) because I desired to support the motion in the House of Lords on the 12th November to set up a joint committee, and (b) because the Secretary-General had raised the question of the propriety of my attending if I were a member of that committee (this objection has since been withdrawn). The report of the Permanent Mandates Commission is attached (Enclosure 2). In brief, it amounts to a decision not to deal with the matter until the mandatory has arrived at a final decision after the Joint Committee has reported.

6. It may be pertinent to note that an almost identical clause appears in the British mandates for Cameroons and Togo, and has been taken advantage of in the administration of those mandates, the former being for all practical purposes of administration a part of Nigeria, and the latter of the Gold Coast. Their separate identity is preserved as far as possible and they each send a separate report and an accredited representative to Geneva. In their case there can be no question that the arrangement is in the interest of the inhabitants of the territory because, owing to their small size and population, a separate administration would have been an intolerable burden upon the revenue, and they undoubtedly derive a greater advantage by their association with their neighbours. No protest has been raised by Germany.

7. Similar action was taken by Belgium as mandatory for Ruanda-Urundi, and a royal decree of the 21st August, 1925, stated that the territory "est uni administrativement à la Colonie du Congo belge dont il forme un vice-gouvernement général." A German protest was transmitted by the Secretary-General of the League to the German Government on the 29th September, 1925 (C. 593, VI), to the effect that Clause 10 of the mandate is contrary to the treaty and to the terms of article 22. The Belgian Government replied on the 20th October, 1925 (C.P.M. 301), that Germany could not intervene until she is a member of the League. Ruanda is a small country (about 20,500 square miles), smaller than the Cameroon Province, but it has an enormous population estimated at 3 to 5 million. The Belgian Congo does not, however, assume financial responsibility for Ruanda as Nigeria and the Gold Coast do for Cameroons and Togo, and unlike them a separate Administration has been set up. The union of Ruanda with the Congo is therefore on parallel lines with the proposed union of Tanganyika with its neighbours, and not with the West African mandates.

8. Germany is now a member of the League and has a representative on the Permanent Mandates Commission. It may, I presume, therefore be assumed that she accepts the mandate system as a legitimate corollary of the Versailles Treaty to which she is a party. Herr Stresemann and his successor Herr Curtius in the German Foreign Office have protested at Geneva against the proposed closer union of Tanganyika with Kenya and Uganda as being incompatible with the mandate. Under Clause 13 they can apparently demand that the question be referred to the International Court (see official report of Reichstag the 26th June, 1930, p. 5, 888, 5.889). Geheimrat Kastl, German member of the C.P.M., in a private letter to me maintains that Tanganyika would no longer be an entity in international law, since laws would be passed by a council on which it was in a minority. It may be noted that in the case of the "C" class of mandates (South-West Africa and the territories in the Western Pacific) article 22 of the Covenant specifically states that for the reasons cited they "can be best administered under the laws of the mandatory as integral portions of its territory" subject to the safeguards, &c., but that no such stipulation appears in the preceding paragraph upon which the "B" mandates (Central African) have been based.

9. There is the further contention that article 10 is itself contrary to the spirit and intention of article 22 of the treaty; that Germany is bound only by the treaty and not by the terms of the mandate to which she was no party, and that the certificate of the Council that it was in accord with article 22 has no binding force on her as she was not a member of the League, and that the mandate being based on article 22 of the treaty is not unilateral and the interpretation given to it by the mandatory is ex parte and without validity unless confirmed by the International Court to which she would demand reference under the treaty. M. van Rees of the C.P.M. expressed the view that Clause 10 is contrary to the spirit of the mandate system, but the C.P.M. has, of course, no competence to criticise the mandate. Its sole function is to record its view as to whether the mandate as it stands is being carried out or not.

10. The Joint Committee decided to ask the opinion of the Crown lawyers and I suggest that the points upon which we desire a legal opinion are:—

- (a) Is the form of closer union proposed by His Majesty's Government in accord with Clause 10 of the mandate? If not, in what respects is it repugnant?
- (b) Would the appointment of a High Commissioner with an Advisory instead of a Legislative Council be compatible, and what limitation must be placed on the legislative and executive powers of the High Commissioner?
- (c) Has Germany legal grounds for protest in view of the terms of articles 118 and 119?
- (d) Can she claim the right to refer it to the International Court under Clause 12 of the mandate?

N.B.—The public declarations by leading men in Kenya that a very potent reason for closer union is in order "to grapple Tanganyika more closely," and to "make it part of the Empire" are cited by Germany as evidence that the proposals for closer union are intended as a first step towards annexation. Her contention is, I believe, that the former German colonies were ceded by her to the Allies on the understanding that they remained international territory, to be administered as such on behalf of the League by mandatories who are merely agents of the League. Her avowed object in raising these protests is the hope of regaining possession. But neither the Treaty of Versailles nor the mandate contemplates or authorises the rendition or transfer of a mandate. Its expiry only takes place when its inhabitants are "able to stand alone." A transfer of the mandate would involve a breach of pledges made in a very formal and explicit way by His Majesty's Government to both Europeans and natives.

There is no need to emphasise the awkward position which would arise if Great Britain had decided on a scheme of closer union which was later adjudged to be incompatible either with the treaty or with the mandate.

LUGARD.

December 13, 1930.

NOTE.—If I may venture to submit a personal comment on the facts which I have endeavoured to state without bias, it is that the German contention appears to be based on a misapprehension of the status and powers of the High Commissioner and his council. Unless and until responsible Government is granted the mandatory Power alone remains responsible for the execution of the mandate. Responsible Government would involve a change of mandatory and would be inadmissible without the consent of the League, but so long as His Majesty's Government retains the final decision on every question affecting the mandated territory there is no violation of the mandate, if instead of a Governor local control is vested in a High Commissioner who exercises extended functions. The mandate is a measure "taken to carry into effect the consequences of her renunciation," and Germany is therefore pledged under article 118 to recognise it. On the other hand, if the P.M.C. considered that the step would prejudice native interests, or if Germany persists in her dissent, it is difficult to see how reference to the court could be refused under article 13, however weak her case might seem to us to be.

1935

Enclosure 1 to Annex B.

Articles 10 and 13 of Tanganyika Mandate.Article 10.

THE mandatory shall be authorised to constitute the territory into a customs, fiscal and administrative union or federation with the adjacent territories under his own sovereignty or control; provided always that the measures adopted to that end do not infringe the provisions of this mandate.

Article 13.

The mandatory agrees that if any dispute whatever should arise between the mandatory and another member of the League of Nations relating to the interpretation or the application of the provisions of the mandate, such dispute, if it cannot be settled by negotiation, shall be submitted to the Permanent Court of International Justice provided for by article 14 of the Covenant of the League of Nations.

States members of the League of Nations may likewise bring any claims on behalf of their nationals for infraction of their rights under this mandate before the said court for decision.

Enclosure 2 to Annex B.

Extract from Report of Permanent Mandates Commission to the Council on the Work of the 19th Session, November 1930.

(Confidential.)

(B) TANGANYIKA TERRITORY.

Scheme for Closer Administrative Union between the Mandated Territory of Tanganyika and Uganda and Kenya.

IN his comments on the commission's report on its 18th session, the accredited representative of the British Government for Tanganyika Territory remarked that the commission's observations on the British Government's proposals contained in the White Paper on the scheme for closer administrative union between Tanganyika, Uganda and Kenya, would be of great value to the Joint Committee of the two Houses of Parliament, before which the question would be laid. He expressed the hope that the Mandates Commission would find it possible to formulate its observations on the question in the course of its 19th session. Furthermore, in the report which he submitted to the Council on the 9th September, 1930, on the commission's 18th session, the rapporteur, the representative of Finland, alluded to the undertaking given by the British Government on the 6th September, 1929, to communicate its decision to the Mandates Commission before that decision was enforced, so that the latter should be in a position to submit its observations to the Council. He thought that the Council could leave it to the commission to decide to what extent it was expedient and possible to accede to the desire expressed by the mandatory Power, bearing in mind the significance of the declaration of which the Council had already taken note.

The commission carefully considered the suggestion of the accredited representative of the mandatory Power, but felt that to express an opinion at the present stage of the question would not release it from the obligation to examine, as contemplated by the Council, the final conclusions reached by the British Government on the advice of the Joint Parliamentary Committee, before which the question was to be laid.

Consequently, the commission thought it advisable again to defer consideration of the question until the British Government had communicated the terms of its decision in accordance with the undertaking noted by the Council on the 6th September, 1929.

Annex C (Paper No. X).

The Mandate for Tanganyika and the Proposals of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom as regards Closer Union in East Africa.

LORD LUGARD'S "Memorandum on the Proposals for 'Closer Union' in East Africa," dated the 13th December, 1930, sets out the following questions on which a legal opinion is desired:—

- (1) Is the form of closer union proposed by His Majesty's Government in accord with clause 10 of the mandate? If not, in what respects is it repugnant?
- (2) Would the appointment of a High Commissioner with an advisory instead of a legislative council be compatible, and what limitation must be placed on the legislative and executive powers of the High Commissioner?
- (3) Has Germany legal grounds for protest in view of the terms of articles 118 and 119?
- (4) Can she claim the right to refer it to the International Court under clause 12 of the mandate?

2. In addition, it is understood that the Joint Committee on East Africa desire to be advised whether the terms of article 10 of the mandate for East Africa are in conformity with article 22 of the Covenant, and it will obviously be convenient to consider this question first, as, if it were answered in the negative, the other questions put would fall to the ground.

3. Article 10 of the Tanganyika mandate runs as follows:—

"The mandatory shall be authorised to constitute the territory into a customs, fiscal and administrative union or federation with the adjacent territories under his own sovereignty or control, provided always that the measures adopted to that end do not infringe the provisions of this mandate."

The suggestion that this provision is inconsistent with article 22 of the Covenant, which established the mandatory system, does not appear to have been definitely formulated in any available document. The German protest of the 29th September, 1925 (referred to in paragraph 7 of Lord Lugard's memorandum), against the action taken by Belgium, as mandatory for Ruanda-Urundi, under the corresponding article of that mandate, does not, at any rate in terms, raise this contention, while it contains the following sentence in reference to the similar action taken by Great Britain in regard to the mandated areas of Cameroon and Togo (against which Germany has not protested—see paragraph 6 of Lord Lugard's memorandum), which would appear to be inconsistent with any suggestion that the terms of article 10 were in themselves incompatible with article 22 of the Covenant: "Belgium cannot appeal to the example of Great Britain in regard to Cameroon and Togo, for these mandatory districts were not actually amalgamated with the neighbouring British colonies; according to the wording of the decree in question, they are to be administered as if they were integral parts thereof." Nor is any such contention raised in the aide-mémoire addressed by the German Government to His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom on the 4th September, 1930, a copy of which is attached to the present memorandum. The following sentence from the aide-mémoire seems to make it clear that the present German objection is not to article 10 itself, but to the manner in which it is proposed to apply it: "Article 10 of the Tanganyika mandate cannot, according to the German view, be applied as a provision carrying into effect article 22 of the League of Nations Covenant, in such a manner that the principle of the independence of the mandated territory established in the latter article would be thereby impaired." This view of the attitude of the German Government is supported by the following passage from the speech made by Dr. Stresemann, then German Foreign Minister, at the meeting of the Council of the League of Nations on the 6th September, 1929 (League of Nations Official Journal, Minutes of the Council, 56th Session, p. 1470) :—

[13464]

G

"The whole mandates system was, indeed, based upon the fact that the mandated territories constituted international and independent units, for the administration of which the mandatory Powers were responsible to the League, which had conferred the mandates upon them. This guiding and all-important principle had been embodied in the Covenant itself, and it governed all the provisions of the mandates, none of which could be interpreted in a manner which could be invalidated.

"While admitting, therefore, that, under the Tanganyika mandate, a certain form of union between that territory and the neighbouring territories might be contemplated from the administrative point of view, there could be no question of any confusion arising which would call in question the existence of the territory under mandate as a politically independent unit, and which would consequently render doubtful the permanency of the League's control over the execution of the mandate. For the moment he would say no more."

4. It seems doubtful, therefore, whether the German Government really intended to challenge the present proposals of His Majesty's Government, on the ground that they are based on a provision in the mandate which is inconsistent with the instrument upon which the mandate itself is founded. In any case, apart from the inherent difficulty of establishing such a criticism of a provision which has been in force for ten years, and has been made use of in at least two cases without being challenged by the German Government, it does not appear that such a contention could be established. It appears to be suggested (paragraph 9 of Lord Lugard's memorandum) that Germany is bound only by article 22 and not by the terms of the mandate which was approved by the Council. This hardly seems to be an accurate statement of the position. Germany is bound by paragraph 8 of article 22, by which "the degree of authority, control or administration to be exercised by the mandatory shall . . . be explicitly defined in each case by the Council." The Council fulfilled its function under this provision by approving the terms of the Tanganyika Mandate, and therefore the terms of that mandate are binding on Germany, unless, indeed, she can establish that any provision of the mandate is definitely inconsistent with some specific and relevant provision in article 22. Inasmuch as the provisions of paragraph 5 of article 22 are reproduced in greater detail in the mandate itself, and are, therefore, expressly saved by article 10, the only provisions of article 22 with which article 10 could be in conflict are the general principles laid down in paragraphs 1 and 2. It seems impossible to find any inconsistency between those principles and article 10, unless it be suggested that the very idea of a customs, fiscal and administrative union or federation is inconsistent with the mandatory principle itself; and to this it seems a sufficient answer to point out that the general principles contained in paragraphs 1 and 2 are as applicable to the case of "C" mandates, which are dealt with in paragraph 6, as to that of "B" mandates, which are dealt with in paragraph 5, and that, in the former case, article 22 expressly provides for the administration of the territory "under the laws of the mandatory as integral portions of its territory, subject to the safeguards above mentioned in the interests of the indigenous population." It is impossible to suppose that this provision is inconsistent with the first two paragraphs of the article in which it appears, and if it is not, a fortiori article 10, which only allows of union or federation and not practical incorporation (as in paragraph 6), and makes any such union or federation subject to the maintenance of all the provisions of the mandate, cannot be inconsistent with the principles in question. In this connexion it may be material to point out that it would be inaccurate to suggest that the effect of making use of article 10 is in practice to turn the mandate from the "B" into the "C" type; in the latter case the mandatory has a completely free hand, subject to the safeguards in the interests of the indigenous population, but in the former the arrangements for federation or union must leave intact all the provisions of the mandate, including those which do not appear in "C" mandates, of which the most important is that prescribing "equal opportunities for the trade and commerce of other members of the League."

5. It is also material to point out that it is stated in the preamble to the mandate that "His Britannic Majesty has agreed to accept the mandate in respect of the said territory, and has undertaken to exercise it on behalf of the League of Nations in accordance with the following provisions." If article 10 were held to be void as being inconsistent with article 22 of the Covenant, the result would be a mandate whose terms did not correspond with those which His Britannic Majesty accepted and agreed to carry out.

6. For the above reasons it does not appear that it could be successfully contended that article 10 is inconsistent with the Covenant, and the specific questions put in Lord Lugard's memorandum can, therefore, be considered on that basis.

7.—(1) Is the form of closer union, proposed by His Majesty's Government, in accord with clause 10 of the mandate? If not, in what respects is it repugnant?

The scheme proposed by His Majesty's Government, as stated in paragraph 5 of Cmd. 3574, may be summarised as the establishment of a High Commissioner with duties of a twofold character: (a) As "chief adviser on native and other policy to the Secretary of State," he will perform functions which will be exclusively advisory and supervisory, except that he will have the power to suspend measures and to initiate legislation; (b) with the assistance of a council he is to administer and legislate in respect of certain important services which are of common interest to the three territories, and also in respect of any other matter which may be placed under his authority by Order in Council.

8. Under article 10 the measures adopted for the purpose of constituting the territory into a customs, fiscal and administrative union or federation must not "infringe the provisions of this mandate." The specific provisions of the mandate which must be taken into account in this connexion may be summarised as preventing the militarisation of the territory (article 4), laying down certain rules in the interest of the native population (articles 3, 5, 6 and 9), ensuring equality of commercial treatment for all members of the League of Nations (articles 7 and 9) and providing for religious freedom (article 8). There is nothing in the present proposals which is in itself inconsistent with these provisions. The essential requirement as regards the observance of provisions of this nature is that adequate powers of control should be retained by His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, who are responsible to the League for the administration of the mandate, and from this point of view the present proposals are likely to increase rather than diminish the powers retained by His Majesty's Government. It is obvious that any transfer of powers to bodies which are not under the ultimate control of the Colonial Office would require careful consideration from this point of view, but no such question appears to arise under the present proposals.

9. There are certain matters (such, for instance, as the military organisation of the natives and the commercial equality to be ensured for all members of the League) which will require special consideration in connexion with the proposed measures of union, but these are specifically mentioned in the passage (paragraph (d), pp. 16-17) of the "Statement of the Conclusions of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom as regards Closer Union in East Africa" (Cmd. 3574), which deals with the Tanganyika mandate, and there seems no reason to suppose that there should be difficulty in ensuring compliance with the relevant provisions of the mandate under the proposals in question.

10. Since the present proposals clearly do not go beyond what is contemplated by article 10 and do not infringe the other provisions of the mandate, it may be thought that from the legal point of view there is nothing more to be said as to their compatibility with the terms of the mandate, and this view was expressed by certain members of the Permanent Mandates Commission during their discussion of the Hilton Young report (minutes of the Fifteenth Session of the Permanent Mandates Commission, pp. 103-106, 167-170 and 200-204); but the recent criticism of these proposals appears to have been based on somewhat wider grounds which it is necessary to examine.

11. The observations of the German Government in their aide-mémoire of the 4th September, 1930 (see the annex to this memorandum), may be summarised under two heads: (1) the proposals would "abrogate or considerably limit the independent status which was accorded to the territory by article 22 of the Covenant"; they would "not only establish an administrative union, but also a political and constitutional union of the three participating territories," and "the principle of the independence of the mandated territory" would be impaired; (2) the proposals are not in the interests of Tanganyika itself. The first of the above criticisms was developed by several members of the Permanent Mandates Commission during the discussion referred to in the preceding paragraph, which related, of course, to the Hilton Young report and not to the present proposals. The general attitude of these critics may perhaps be summarised as being that, even if the Hilton Young proposals were legally within the powers of the mandatory under article 10, they were inconsistent with the spirit of the mandatory system, in that they were incompatible with the idea of the eventual "independence" of the mandated territory, which ought to be the ultimate object of the mandatory administration, and tended to obliterate the distinction between the mandated territory, for the administration of which the mandatory is responsible to the League of Nations, and the adjoining territories under his own sovereignty or control.

12. It is difficult to appreciate the weight attaching to criticism of this nature, in view of the somewhat vague and general terms in which the mandatory system is described in article 22 of the Covenant. The ultimate future of the territories under "B" mandate is not specifically dealt with in that article. The expression "the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a mandatory until such time as they are able to stand alone," which is used in paragraph 4 of the "A" mandates, is not employed in relation to the territories dealt with in paragraphs 5 and 6, but the same idea seems to be implicit in the phrase in paragraph 1: "colonies and territories . . . which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world," and some members at any rate of the Permanent Mandates Commission take the view that, in the words employed by M. van Rees in the course of the discussion referred to in paragraph 10, the mandatory is under an obligation "to prepare the population under its guardianship for the enjoyment of political autonomy, and, finally, for political independence." Whether such "autonomy" and "independence" would in the case of Tanganyika be compatible with some form of permanent union with the neighbouring territories, and possibly with some measure of association with the British Empire, are questions which are not likely to become actual for a considerable time, but might well form the subject of discussion by the Council of the League if any such proposals were made when the time comes to terminate the mandatory régime. For the moment it does not seem possible to say more than that (1) any attempt, during the continuance of the mandate, to make use of article 10 in such a manner as to effect the practical, even if not theoretical, incorporation of Tanganyika in the British Empire, and thereby to impair the powers of supervision possessed by the League, would doubtless be regarded as inconsistent with the mandatory system, and (2) that in any application of article 10, the essential distinction between the status of the mandatory territory, for the administration of which the mandatory is responsible to the League, and the adjoining territories, as to which the mandatory is master in his own house, must be carefully preserved.

13. In any case, it does not appear that the present proposals of His Majesty's Government are fairly open to criticism of this character. The contention of the German Government that they would establish "a political and constitutional union of the three participating territories" does not appear to be justified by the proposals themselves. While it may be admitted that the separate identity and special status of the mandated territory must be preserved in any application of article 10, any such application must of necessity involve some "limitation of the independent status" (to use the term employed by the German Government) of the territory. While it may well be difficult to decide what degree of such "limitation" is compatible with the mandatory principle, the present proposals do not seem to go beyond what is likely to be regarded as permissible, while to describe them, as the German Government do, as "abrogating" the "independent status" of the territory is surely an exaggeration. The necessity for preserving the essential distinction between the status of Tanganyika and that of Kenya and Uganda is fully realised in the passages dealing with Tanganyika on pp. 15-17 of Cmd. 3574. An essential element in the status of Tanganyika is that it is not British territory and its inhabitants are, as such, not British subjects, and, as is pointed out in the passage referred to, the present proposals do not involve any change in this essential element in the situation.

14. The second criticism of the German Government, in their aide-mémoire of the 4th September last, is that the present proposals are not in the interests of Tanganyika itself, and similar preoccupations were expressed by several members of the Permanent Mandates Commission during their discussion of the Hilton Young proposals. It will not be disputed that the governing consideration in the administration of a mandated territory must be the interests of the territory and its inhabitants, and that any proposals for closer union between Tanganyika and her neighbours must be capable of justification on this ground. Whether this is so is a question of fact which is outside the scope of the present memorandum; attention is called to one particular point in paragraph 17 below.

15. The general conclusion appears to be (subject to what is said in paragraph 14) that the present proposals of His Majesty's Government are in accordance with article 10 of the mandate, and that they cannot fairly be regarded as inconsistent with the general principles of the mandatory system. At the same time, it should be realised that any further steps in the direction of closer union between the three territories will, no doubt, be carefully scrutinised by the Permanent Mandates Commission and the German Government, and that it may be possible to establish against such steps, from the point of view of their compatibility with the mandatory system, criticisms to which the present proposals are not fairly open. This point will require to be borne in mind in connexion with any proposals to increase the functions of the High Commissioner and Council in accordance with paragraph (i) on p. 6 of Cmd. 3574.

16. In this connexion, it may be material to observe that the wording of article 10 of the Tanganyika Mandate differs from that of the corresponding article in all the other "B" mandates. The wording of the latter provisions is as follows:—

"The mandatory shall have full powers of administration and legislation in the area subject to the mandate.^(*) This area shall be administered in accordance with the laws of the mandatory as an integral part of his territory and subject to the above provisions.

"The mandatory shall, therefore, be at liberty to apply his laws to the territory subject to the mandate with such modifications as may be required by local conditions, and to constitute the territory into a customs, fiscal or administrative union or federation with the adjacent territories under his sovereignty or control, provided always that the measures adopted to that end do not infringe the provisions of this mandate."

It will be seen that, while the wording of the provision relating to the establishment of a customs, fiscal or administrative union or federation is identical in the two cases, the article in the other mandates gives the mandatory somewhat wider powers than are conferred in the case of Tanganyika, in particular the right to administer the area "in accordance with the laws of the mandatory as an integral part of his territory." The difference is presumably due to the greater size and importance of Tanganyika in relation to the neighbouring territories as compared with the other areas subject to "B" mandate, but it would not be safe to assume that any measure involving a closer connexion with the neighbouring territories which may be legitimate in the case of the other countries under "B" mandate would necessarily be so in the case of Tanganyika.

17.—(2) Would the appointment of a High Commissioner, with an Advisory instead of a Legislative Council, be compatible, and what limitation must be placed on the legislative and executive powers of the High Commissioner?

From the point of view of the compatibility of the proposed measures with the mandate, the question whether the High Commissioner's Council is advisory or legislative makes no difference. In either case there will be an outside authority with administrative and legislative powers over Tanganyika and the adjacent territories, and whether these powers are vested in the Governor alone or shared by him with a Legislative Council is immaterial, assuming that His Majesty's Government retain the power to ensure that the provisions of the mandate are complied with. The point has, however, already been taken that the representatives of Tanganyika will be in a minority on the proposed council, and the German Government have suggested (in the last paragraph of their aide-mémoire of the 4th September) that the power of the High Commissioner or three members of the council to refer any measure for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure is not sufficient to ensure that the interests of Tanganyika are not sacrificed to those of her neighbours. This is hardly a question of law, and the objection, if sound, would seem to be inherent in any scheme of union or federation, but the matter is one which seems to merit consideration by the Joint Committee.

(*) This sentence corresponds to one in article 3 of the Tanganyika Mandate.

18. As regards the limitation to be placed on the legislative and executive powers of the High Commissioner, there seems, as indicated above, and subject to what is said in paragraph 14, no objection to the proposals in paragraph 5 (pp. 4-6) of Cmd. 3574. As regards any suggested extension of those powers, it is only possible to refer to the general observations made in paragraphs 11-15 above.

19.—(3) Has Germany legal grounds for protest in view of the terms of articles 118 and 119?

(4) Can she claim the right to refer it to the International Court under Clause 12 of the Mandate?

It will be convenient to deal with these two questions together. Articles 118 and 119 give Germany no rights in the matter. The effect of those articles is to transfer the sovereignty over the German colonies to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, and to bind Germany to accept whatever dispositions might be made in the matter by those Powers. But as this renunciation by Germany was effected by a treaty which also contained article 22 of the Covenant, Germany was entitled to require that the territories in question should be dealt with in accordance with the relevant provisions of that article. Moreover, as a permanent member of the Council, Germany has the right and power to discuss any mandatory question before that body, and she is entitled, as a member of the League, to bring before the Permanent Court of International Justice under article 13 of the mandate any dispute with His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom "relating to the interpretation or the application of the provisions of the mandate." A dispute as to whether the present proposals of His Majesty's Government were consistent with the terms of the mandate would certainly be such a dispute. Strictly speaking, it would not seem that Germany is entitled under the provision in question to bring before the court the question whether article 10 of the mandate is consistent with article 22 of the Covenant, but if a dispute as to the compatibility of the present proposals with the mandate were brought before the court, it would not be safe to assume that the German Government could be prevented from raising this point in the course of the proceedings.

Foreign Office, January 9, 1931.

Annex D (Paper No. XI).

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, January 9, 1931.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to request the favour of your assistance in the following matter:—

2. The Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament on East Africa have requested the Foreign Office to supply them with a considered opinion on the compatibility of the "Conclusions of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom as regards Closer Union in East Africa," contained in Command Paper 3574 (Paper A), with article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations (Paper B) and article 10 of the Mandate for Tanganyika (Paper C). The matters at issue are discussed and the specific questions on which an opinion is desired are formulated in a memorandum by Lord Lugard, a member of the Permanent Mandates Commission and of the Joint Committee, copies of which are enclosed (Paper D).

3. In view of the importance of the questions raised and the possibility of their being brought before the Permanent Court of International Justice under article 13 of the mandate, Mr. Henderson thinks it necessary that any statement made to the Joint Committee should be settled by yourselves. For this purpose the draft of a memorandum (Paper E) has been prepared by the legal adviser to this Department and is sent herewith for your consideration. Copies of a memorandum by the German Government, dated the 16th September, 1925, and communicated to the League of Nations on the 29th September, 1925, which is referred to in paragraph 7 of Lord Lugard's memorandum, are also enclosed (Paper F), together with the minutes of the 15th session of the Permanent Mandates Commission (Paper G). The German aide-mémoire of the 4th September, 1930, to which reference is made in paragraph 3 of the draft memorandum, is attached as an annex to that document.

4. I am accordingly to request that you will take the enclosed papers into your consideration and will be good enough to settle the terms of the memorandum to be forwarded to the Joint Committee.

5. Mr. Henderson is not aware whether the Joint Committee would normally wish the memorandum communicated to them to be published with their report, but he would be glad to receive your views as to whether such publication would be permissible. In this connexion it seems necessary to take into account not only the general principle that the reports of the Law Officers to this Department are regarded as specially confidential documents, but also the possibility of its becoming necessary to defend the proposals of His Majesty's Government before the Permanent Court of International Justice.

I am, &c.

A. W. A. LEEPER.

List of Papers submitted.

- Paper A.—"Conclusions of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom as regards Closer Union in East Africa" (Cmd. 3574).
 Paper B.—The Covenant of the League of Nations (Treaty Series No. 37 (1924), Cmd. 2300).
 Paper C.—The Mandate for Tanganyika (Cmd. 1794).
 Paper D.—Memorandum by Lord Lugard, dated December 13, 1930 [Annex B].
 Paper E.—Memorandum prepared by the Legal Adviser of the Foreign Office [Annex C].
 Paper F.—Memorandum by the German Government, dated September 16, 1925 [W. 9690/1246/4/1925—attached].
 Paper G.—Minutes of the 15th Session of the Permanent Mandates Commission, July 1929 [W. 8131/49/98/1929].

Enclosure to Annex D.

Memorandum by the German Government.

(Translation submitted by the German Government.)

ON the 12th February, 1925, and the 9th July, 1925, the Belgian Government introduced into the Chamber of Representatives a Bill concerning the government of Ruanda-Urundi, the Bill being passed by the Chamber on the 28th July and officially promulgated on the 9th September, 1925. Under this Act the said mandated territory, which till then had been administered by a Royal Commissioner, is to be amalgamated with the Belgian Congo in such a way that it will form a Vice-Government-General of that colony and that, with a few reservations, it will be subject to its laws. Consequently, this hitherto independent territory has ceased, as a State, to be a persona in the sense of international law, and has become a province of the Belgian colony with restricted fiscal powers. The inhabitants, being on the same footing as those of the Congo Colony in regard to rights and obligations, have become Belgian subjects, a mode of proceedings with which the Permanent Mandates Commission has repeatedly dealt. Besides this, the two native princes who heretofore represented their people in dealings with the Government are threatened with the loss of their rights; since under the Congo Decree concerning "chefferies indigènes," they can be degraded to police auxiliaries of the Belgian administration having no political significance.

According to article 22 of the Treaty of Versailles, the "B" mandatories undertake the administration of the territory. In this article the right to subject the mandated territory to the laws of the mandatory and to make it an integral part of the mandatory's territory is reserved to "C" mandatories. But even for the mandate of Ruanda-Urundi, although it is a "B" mandate, to incorporate the privileges of "C" mandates in contravention of the terms cited from the treaty and to permit an administrative federation with the Congo Colony does not justify the Act; since the idea of administrative federation presupposes parity of the parties; when one party is absorbed by the other it is not a case of federation, but of annexation.

The reservation made by article 6 in favour of the mandate terms has no great significance, for it is repugnant to the main tenor of the Act.

Belgium cannot appeal to the example of Great Britain in regard to Cameroon and Togo, for these mandatory districts were not actually amalgamated with the neighbouring British colonies; according to the wording of the decree in question, they are to be administered "as if" they "were" integral parts thereof (cf. the Proceedings of the Permanent Mandates Commission, the 25th October, 1924, League Documents C.617.M.216.1924, VI, p. 17 et seq.).

As a signatory of the Treaty of Versailles, the German Government may claim the proper application of article 22. They have lodged their protest with the Belgian Government; but the Belgian Government has declined to consider the protest, stating that it is a matter which mutually concerns all the mandatories, and leaving it to the German Government to apply to the League of Nations. The German Government, therefore, has the honour to direct the attention of the Council of the League of Nations to this matter. Doubtless they may anticipate that the principle of independence of the mandated territories—in particular of the "B" mandate territories—deducible from article 22 of the Treaty of Versailles will not be jeopardised by executive statutes which suggest covert annexation.

Berlin, September 16, 1925.

Annex E (Paper No. XII).

Précis of Sir W. Malkin's Evidence before the Joint Select Committee.

Lord Lugard's "Memorandum on the Proposals for 'Closer Union' in East Africa," dated the 13th December, 1930, sets out the following questions on which a legal opinion is desired:—

- (a) Is the form of closer union proposed by His Majesty's Government in accord with clause 10 of the mandate? If not, in what respects is it repugnant?
- (b) Would the appointment of a High Commissioner, with an Advisory instead of a Legislative Council, be compatible, and what limitation must be placed on the legislative and executive powers of the High Commissioner?
- (c) Has Germany legal grounds for protest in view of the terms of articles 118 and 119?
- (d) Can she claim the right to refer it to the International Court under clause 12 of the mandate?

It may be convenient to deal with questions (c) and (d) first. Articles 118 and 119 of the Treaty of Versailles give Germany no particular rights in the matter, but as article 22 of the Covenant occurs in the same treaty, she was entitled to require that her surrendered colonies should be dealt with in accordance with that article, and as a member of the League of Nations she is entitled under article 13 of the mandate to bring before the Permanent Court of International Justice any dispute with the mandatory relating to the interpretation or the application of the provisions of the mandate, if such dispute cannot be settled by negotiation. Any scheme for closer union between Tanganyika and the neighbouring territories must, therefore, be considered on the basis that, not only will it be subject to scrutiny and criticism by the Permanent Mandates Commission and the Council of the League, but also that any points in it to which Germany may take objection may have to be decided by the Permanent Court.

Article 10 of the Tanganyika mandate provides as follows:—

"The mandatory shall be authorised to constitute the territory into a customs, fiscal and administrative union or federation with the adjacent territories under his own sovereignty or control, provided always that the measures adopted to that end do not infringe the provisions of this mandate."

The suggestion has apparently been made that article 10 is itself inconsistent with article 22 of the Covenant, which established the mandatory system. Inasmuch as paragraph 8 of article 22 provides that "the degree of authority, control, or administration to be exercised by the mandatory shall, if not previously agreed upon by the members of the League, be explicitly defined in each case by the Council," the above suggestions could only be established if it were shown that article 10 were definitely inconsistent with some specific provision in article 22. I do not consider that this can be established. The position is rather that article 22 laid down certain general principles which constitute or characterise the mandatory system, and that any action which is taken under article 10 must not be inconsistent with those principles. For present purposes the general principles resulting from article 22 may perhaps be summarised as follows: A special status is conferred on the mandated territory; the mandatory, who acts "on behalf of the League" and is responsible thereto, is in the position of a trustee; the objects of the trust are the well-being and development of the people of the mandated territory.

It follows, therefore, that any action taken under article 10 must comply with the following conditions:—

- (1) It must be in the best interests of the mandated territory and its inhabitants;
- (2) The special status of the mandatory area must not be impaired either in law or in fact;
- (3) It must be within the terms of article 10 itself; and
- (4) The "measures adopted to that end" must not "infringe the provisions of this mandate."

[13464]

1935

The question whether the present proposals are in the interests of Tanganyika is one of fact and not of law, but has to be taken into consideration throughout.

As regards the other three conditions indicated above, the advisory duties to be conferred on the High Commissioner under Head A of His Majesty's Government's proposals seem to present no difficulty, provided it is made clear that, in tendering advice affecting Tanganyika, the High Commissioner should bear in mind always the special responsibilities attaching to it by reason of its being a mandated territory.

Subject to one point, the powers proposed to be conferred on the High Commissioner under Head B do not appear to be inconsistent with any of the principles (2), (3) and (4) set out above. The criticisms which have been made on the scheme seem to be mainly based on the idea that it goes beyond an administrative union and constitutes a political and constitutional union of the three territories, and is, therefore, to be regarded as going outside article 10 and also as infringing principle No. 2, in that the special status of the mandated area is impaired. While the question which arises is largely one of degree, the scheme does not seem fairly open to this objection, the force of which would be further diminished if the transferred services were limited to those which can be described as "economic." Among the proposed duties of the High Commissioner under Head B, there is, however, one which may be held not to be within the terms of article 10. The High Commissioner is to have power not only to administer but also to legislate in respect of the transferred services. Article 10, while authorising a customs, fiscal and administrative union or federation with the adjacent territories, does not mention a legislative union or federation, nor does it (thereby differing from the corresponding provision in the other "B" mandates) authorise the mandatory to administer the area "in accordance with the laws of the mandatory as an integral part of his territory," and "to apply his laws to the territory under mandate subject to the modifications required by local conditions." It may therefore be held that, in the case of Tanganyika, article 10 does not contemplate a central legislature, though it would not necessarily be inconsistent with a delegated power to make rules and regulations necessary for the working of the transferred services. There are arguments which can be adduced against this view, and I am not saying that it would necessarily be adopted by the Permanent Court; but in view of the considerations which can be adduced in support of it, I think that it might not be prudent to adopt a scheme involving a central legislature for the transferred services.

As regards the fourth condition, the provisions of the mandate, which under article 10 must not be infringed, are those providing for (1) freedom of conscience and religion; (2) the prohibition of abuses such as the slave trade, the arms traffic and the liquor traffic, and protecting the interests of the natives in regard to certain special matters; (3) the prohibition of the militarisation of the territory, and the organisation of "any native military force in the territory except for local police purposes and for the defence of the territory"; and (4) equality of commercial and economic treatment to all members of the League. There is nothing in the proposed scheme which is inconsistent with any of these provisions, but (3) and (4) may require special consideration in the actual working of the scheme.

The question of an advisory or legislative Council is covered by what has been said above as to the possibility of a central legislature being held not to be within article 10.

Annex F.

List of Existing Constitutional Instruments relating to Kenya, Uganda and Tanganyika.Kenya.

- Statutory Rules and Orders, 1920, No. 2342. Kenya. The Kenya (Annexation) Order in Council, 1920. June 11, 1920.
- Statutory Rules and Orders, 1921, No. 1135. Kenya Colony. The Kenya Colony Order in Council, 1921. June 27, 1921.
- Instructions passed under the Royal Sign Manual and Signet to the Governor and Commander-in-chief of the Colony of Kenya. March 29, 1934.

Letters Patent passed under the Great Seal of the Realm amending Clause XVIII of the Letters Patent of September 11, 1920, constituting the Office of Governor and Commander-in-chief of the Colony of Kenya. Letters Patent passed under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom constituting the Office of Governor and Commander-in-chief of the Colony of Kenya and providing for the Government thereof. September 11, 1920.

Uganda.

- Statutory Rules and Orders, 1920, No. 884. The Uganda Order in Council, 1920. Foreign Jurisdiction. May 17, 1920.
- Statutory Rules and Orders, 1902, No. 662. The Uganda Order in Council, 1902. Foreign Jurisdiction. August 11, 1902.
- Additional Instructions passed under the Royal Sign Manual and Signet to the Governor and Commander-in-chief of the Uganda Protectorate. November 3, 1930.
- Additional Instructions passed under the Royal Sign Manual and Signet to the Governor and Commander-in-chief of the Uganda Protectorate. November 24, 1925.
- Instructions passed under the Royal Sign Manual and Signet to the Governor and Commander-in-chief of the Uganda Protectorate. June 5, 1920.

Tanganyika Territory.

- Tanganyika (Legislative Council) Amendment Order in Council, 1935. March 29, 1935.
- Tanganyika (Legislative Council) Order in Council, 1926. March 19, 1926.
- The Tanganyika Order in Council, 1920. July 22, 1920.

1935

52

GENERAL

[J 4577/G/1935]

No. 3.

[September 3, 1935]

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, August 29, 1935.

Possible application to Italy of sanctions provided in article 16 of Covenant of League of Nations: Prohibition of import into United Kingdom of Italian goods, &c., and position as regards British colonies, protectorates and mandated territories.

I HAVE the honour by direction of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to request your opinion on the following question: His Majesty's Government have at present under consideration the question of the application to Italy of the sanctions provided in article 16 of the Covenant of the League of Nations in view of the possible event of Italy being held to have brought herself within the terms of that article and of His Majesty's Government considering it necessary, in view of their obligations under the Covenant, to take, in co-operation with other members of the League of Nations, some action of this nature against Italy. In this connexion it has been found necessary to envisage a situation in which it would not be possible or even desirable to endeavour to take, or to persuade the other members of the League to take, all the measures contemplated by article 16, but in which it might be held proper to adopt some measure in the nature of a sanction, which would operate as a form of economic pressure against Italy, such measure being one which would neither render it necessary to make use of belligerent rights at sea nor be one of a character which would either render a declaration of war against Italy necessary or render it likely to provoke Italy into a declaration of war against His Majesty's Government or the other members of the League who adopted it. The measure which at the moment appears most likely to fulfil these conditions and at the same time (subject to further study into its practical aspects) to be likely, if sufficiently widely adopted, to produce a by no means negligible economic effect would be a prohibition against the import into the territory of any goods, consigned from or the produce or manufacture of Italy or her colonies.

2. It is, therefore, necessary to consider whether an Act of Parliament would be necessary to enable His Majesty's Government to impose and enforce such a prohibition against the entry of Italian exports into the United Kingdom or whether His Majesty's Government possess such powers under any existing Act of Parliament. The only existing Act of Parliament which it would appear to be possible to invoke as giving the requisite powers is the Treaty of Peace Act, 1919 (Paper No. 1), and in this connexion I am to invite your attention to an opinion given by your predecessors on the 29th October, 1920 (Paper No. 2), to the effect that this Act gives power to impose by Order in Council any prohibition on trade or financial relations and intercourse which might be necessary to give effect to article 16 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, this article being also article 16 of the Treaty of Peace with Germany (Paper No. 3). The prohibition against Italian exports would purport to be imposed in order to fulfil (or partially to fulfil) His Majesty's Government's obligations under article 16, paragraph 1. The measure would be a partial "severance of trade relations" with Italy, a Covenant-breaking State. It would therefore appear to come within the powers of His Majesty's Government under the Act of 1919 as interpreted by your predecessors, unless the fact that His Majesty's Government in taking this measure would be only fulfilling partially the obligations indicated in article 16 makes any difference from this point of view. It should be noted in this connexion, however, that resolutions of the Assembly passed in 1921 (Paper No. 4), in particular Nos. 8, 10 and 14, contemplate a procedure under which all the measures indicated by article 16 are not necessarily to be taken immediately and simultaneously, but that economic pressure should precede recourse to armed force, and the application of economic pressure might be by partial measures of (if necessary) gradually increasing severity. The legal effect of these resolutions is discussed in the opinion of Sir W. Malkin, which is enclosed as Paper No. 5. It is suggested that they might be regarded as an interpretation or procedure for giving effect to article 16 adopted by the most authoritative constitutional organ of the League, and that a member who complies with them and takes partial measures can be regarded as acting under article 16.

GENERAL

53

3. The Secretary of State desires to know, in the first place, whether, in your opinion, it would be possible by an Order in Council under the Treaty of Peace Act, 1919, to prohibit the import into the United Kingdom of any goods, consigned from or the produce or manufacture of Italy or Italian colonies.

4. Secondly, if the answer to the first question is in the affirmative, Sir S. Hoare desires your opinion on the question whether the Treaty of Peace Act is sufficient authority for extending by Order in Council the prohibition (a) to the colonies (i.e., not including the Dominions),⁽¹⁾ and (b) to protectorates and mandated territories which are at present administered under Orders in Council made under the Foreign Jurisdiction Acts. It may be that in the case of some or all of the colonies it will be found preferable, as a matter of policy or convenience, to apply the prohibition by local legislation rather than by a (United Kingdom) Order in Council. It is, however, desired to know whether you consider it to be legally possible to proceed by United Kingdom Order in Council. The Treaty of Peace Act, 1919, contains no express terms stating that its provisions apply outside the United Kingdom. The general principle of interpretation of Statutes in this respect, is stated by Maxwell on Statutes (6th edition, p. 297) as follows:—

"In the absence of an intention clearly expressed or to be inferred either from its language or from the object or subject matter or history of the enactment, the presumption is that Parliament does not design its statutes to operate beyond the territorial limits of the United Kingdom."

It is suggested that such an intention can be inferred in the case of the Treaty of Peace Act from its object or subject matter. The Treaty of Peace applied to the colonies and other territories as well as to the United Kingdom and under article 16 of the Covenant, His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom are responsible for fulfilling the requirements of that article in the colonies and other territories just as much as in the United Kingdom. As regards the protectorates and mandated territories, it will be recalled that they are administered under Acts of Parliament (namely, the Foreign Jurisdiction Act), and therefore, undoubtedly, Parliament can pass legislation operating there. Further, although in practice Acts of the United Kingdom are not passed directly applying to these territories, they frequently contain provisions under which the substance of the Act is to be applied to these territories by Order in Council. Moreover, Orders in Council under the Act of 1919 have, in fact, been made applying to the colonies and to the protectorates.

5. In order to make the measure effective, it would be necessary to prohibit not merely Italian exports coming direct from Italian territory, but also such exports when coming immediately from a third country, and it may also be necessary to have machinery under which goods, consigned from or the produce or manufacture of Italy, could be distinguished from similar goods produced or manufactured elsewhere. Whilst it may not be necessary to set up any elaborate system of certificates of origin for this purpose, it would probably be desirable at least to have the power to do so in reserve, and to be able to provide that goods imported from one or more countries, other than Italy, should only be permitted to be imported if accompanied by certificates of origin showing that their origin was not Italian. Sir S. Hoare consequently desires your opinion in the third place on whether it would be within the powers of His Majesty's Government, under the Treaty of Peace Act, to enact by Order in Council provisions prohibiting the imports from certain countries of all goods of certain classes unless accompanied by certificates of origin showing that their origin was not Italian. The countries to whose exports this procedure might have to be applied would be those which were unlikely to co-operate in the measures against Italy and which might become channels for Italian trade.

⁽¹⁾ It is thought that India, as a separate member of the League, would in any case take her own measures, and it is not desired to trouble you with the legal possibility of extending a United Kingdom Order in Council under the Act of 1919 to India.

[13464]

1

1935

6. I have the honour to enclose:—

- (1) A copy of the Treaty of Peace Act, 1919.
- (2) A copy of the Opinion of your predecessors given on the 29th October, 1920, and of the papers then laid before them.
- (3) A copy of the Treaty of Versailles including the Covenant of the League of Nations.
- (4) A copy of article 16 of the Covenant, together with certain resolutions of the Assembly which have been passed in relation thereto.
- (5) An opinion given by the Legal Adviser of the Foreign Office on the operation of article 16 of the Covenant in connexion with the possible application of this article to Italy, an opinion which was before the Cabinet and which raised the question which is the subject of the present reference.

7. I am therefore to request you to be good enough to take these papers into consideration and to furnish Sir S. Hoare with your opinion as to:—

- (1) Whether you concur in the opinion of your predecessors given on the 29th October, 1920, and consider that it could be followed by His Majesty's Government at the present date;
- (2) Whether the Treaty of Peace Act, 1919, gives power to impose by Order in Council a prohibition on the import into the United Kingdom of all goods, consigned from or the produce or manufacture of Italian territory, the said measure being adopted in fulfilment or partial fulfilment of the obligations of His Majesty's Government under article 16 of the Peace Treaty;
- (3) Whether in the circumstances aforesaid the Treaty of Peace Act, 1919, gives power by Order in Council to prohibit the import into (a) British colonies, (b) protectorates and mandates administered under Foreign Jurisdiction Acts of all goods, consigned from or the produce or manufacture of Italian territory;
- (4) Whether in the circumstances and for the purposes aforesaid, the Treaty of Peace Act, 1919, gives power by Order in Council to prohibit the import into the United Kingdom (and/or the colonies and other territories, as the case may be) of all goods of certain classes coming from certain countries unless accompanied by certificates of origin or other evidence, showing they are not consigned from or the produce or manufacture of Italian territory.

8. Sir S. Hoare would be grateful for any observations of a more general character which you may feel able to offer on the matter under consideration.

I have, &c.

RONALD I. CAMPBELL.

List of Papers.

- Paper No. 1.—Treaty of Peace Act, 1919.
 Paper No. 2.—Law Officers' Opinion, October 29, 1920. (Confidential 11810, pp. 51–52.)
 Paper No. 3.—Treaty of Versailles. (Treaty Series No. 4, 1919.)
 Paper No. 4.—Article 16 of the Covenant, together with certain resolutions of the Assembly passed in relation thereto. (W 7366/1209/98/1935.)
 Paper No. 5.—Opinion by Legal Adviser of the Foreign Office regarding the interpretation of article 16 of the Covenant. (Annex A.)

Report.

1. We answer this question in the affirmative, although we are of opinion that a formidable argument might be advanced against this view. The intention of section 1 (1) of the Treaty of Peace Act, 1919, it would be said, was only to enable all such things to be done as were necessary to bring the Treaty of Peace itself into effective operation within His Majesty's dominions in the circumstances as they were at the passing of the Act. The financial clauses, for instance, required statutory sanction in order to make them operative. So far, there can be no doubt as to the effect of the Act. It is by no means so plain that the powers conferred by the Act extended to action rendered necessary or politic as the result of provisions in the treaty becoming operative at some future date in events which might or might not happen such as a breach of the Covenant or the conclusion of a convention on labour matters under article 405. In support of this narrow construction of the Treaty of Peace Act the opening words of section 1 (1) dealing with the making of appointments and the establishing of offices might be noticed. On the other hand, the later words are very wide, and, on the whole, we have come to the conclusion that as a matter of legal construction the wider view ought to prevail and that the necessary steps for putting into force article 16 are within the powers conferred by the Act.

2. We assume that the proposed action would be taken in pursuance of a resolution by the Council or other appropriate body of the League as action in fulfilment of article 16. In that case, we are of opinion that the Treaty of Peace Act gives power to impose by Order in Council the proposed prohibition. We should have formed this opinion without the guidance afforded by the resolutions of the 4th October, 1921, and the resolutions confirm our view. It seems to us just as unreasonable to suppose that article 16 can only be made effective by taking all the measures therein prescribed against a covenant-breaking member of the League, as it would be to hold that measures which were not taken "immediately" in the literal sense could not be in fulfilment of article 16. If it was proposed to take action limited in the way suggested without the authority of any such resolution as we assume, we should feel great doubt as to whether it was covered by the words of section 1 (1) of the Act.

3.—(a) With regard to British colonies we answer this question in the affirmative. The Treaty of Peace Act from its very nature requires, in our opinion, to be read as extending to the colonies as fully as to the United Kingdom.

(b) With regard to protectorates and mandated territories it is unnecessary in our opinion to resort to the Treaty of Peace Act in order to find powers to make Orders in Council to the proposed effect, nor would the Treaty of Peace Act afford justification for such Orders in Council, if the proposed prohibition was without the powers contained in any relevant treaty or convention or mandate. If, however, the terms of any such instruments confer on His Majesty the power to regulate trade or to conduct foreign relations on behalf of the territories, His Majesty may, in our opinion, under the Foreign Jurisdiction Acts, make the appropriate Orders in Council.

4. This power may in our opinion be regarded as a necessary incident of the exercise of the power to prohibit the import of the goods which it is desired to exclude, and we answer this question in the affirmative.

5. The question whether it is proper to rely on the strict legal construction of section 1 (1) of the Treaty of Peace Act at the present time as a justification for not asking Parliament to pass special legislation authorising the proposed prohibition does not arise for our consideration. We have suggested in our answer to the first question arguments which might be used against the view we take of the Act, but even on the assumption that our view is right, it must be doubtful whether the intention of Parliament in passing the 1919 Act was as far-reaching as the language of the Act must be taken to go. The defence, therefore, of an Order in Council made without fresh Parliamentary authority, if it is attacked on that ground, may not be entirely free from difficulty.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
 D. B. SOMERVELL.

Law Officers' Department,
 September 5, 1935.

1935

ANNEX A.

(Paper No. 5.)

Interpretation of Article 16 of the Covenant of the League.

The terms of article 16 are as follows:—

"1. Should any member of the League resort to war in disregard of its Covenants under articles 12, 13 or 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the League, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the Covenant-breaking State, and the prevention of all financial, commercial or personal intercourse between the nationals of the Covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a member of the League or not.

"2. It shall be the duty of the Council in such case to recommend to the several Governments concerned what effective military, naval or air force the members of the League shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the Covenants of the League.

"3. The members of the League agree, further, that they will mutually support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken under this article, in order to minimise the loss and inconvenience resulting from the above measures, and that they will mutually support one another in resisting any special measures aimed at one of their number by the Covenant-breaking State, and that they will take the necessary steps to afford passage through their territory to the forces of any of the members of the League which are co-operating to protect the Covenants of the League.

"4. Any member of the League, which has violated any Covenant of the League, may be declared to be no longer a member of the League by a vote of the Council concurred in by the representatives of all the other members of the League represented thereon."

Article 16 has never yet been applied, and consequently there are no precedents to guide us as to what is likely to happen in practice. The subject has, however, been studied to some extent in the past by various League bodies, and the results of these studies throw a certain amount of light on the problems before the committee, though any conclusions reached must be to some extent provisional. It will be appreciated, of course, that this note is not intended to be anything in the nature of a complete commentary on article 16.

In 1921 the Assembly adopted certain resolutions relating to article 16, which were intended to become amendments to the article; as such they have never come into force owing to the lack of the requisite number of ratifications. Of these resolutions, the most material for present purposes are as follows:—

"The second paragraph of article 16 shall read as follows:—

"It is for the Council to give an opinion whether or not a breach of the Covenant has taken place. In deliberations on this question in the Council, the votes of members of the League alleged to have resorted to war and of members against whom such action was directed shall not be counted."

"The third paragraph of article 16 shall read as follows:—

"The Council will notify to all members of the League the date which it recommends for the application of the economic pressure under this article."

"The fourth paragraph of article 16 shall read as follows:—

"Nevertheless, the Council may, in the case of particular members, postpone the coming into force of any of these measures for a specified period where it is satisfied that such a postponement will facilitate the attainment of the object of the measures referred to in the preceding paragraph, or that it is necessary in order to minimise the loss and inconvenience which will be caused to such members."

The Assembly at the same time adopted a set of resolutions dealing with the application of article 16. The most important of these for present purposes are as follows: it will be seen that the first deals with the position both of the resolutions themselves and of the proposed amendments to article 16 so long as the latter had not come into force:—

"The Assembly adopts the following resolutions:—

"1. The resolutions and the proposals for amendments to article 16 which have been adopted by the Assembly shall, so long as the amendments have not been put in force in the form required by the Covenant, constitute rules for guidance which the Assembly recommends, as a provisional measure, to the Council and to the members of the League in connexion with the application of article 16.

"2.

"3. The unilateral action of the defaulting State cannot create a state of war: it merely entitles the other members of the League to resort to acts of war or to declare themselves in a state of war with the Covenant-breaking State; but it is in accordance with the spirit of the Covenant that the League of Nations should attempt, at least at the outset, to avoid war, and to restore peace by economic pressure.

"4. It is the duty of each member of the League to decide for itself whether a breach of the Covenant has been committed. The fulfilment of their duties under article 16 is required from members of the League by the express terms of the Covenant, and they cannot neglect them without breach of their treaty obligations.

"5. All cases of breach of Covenant under article 16 shall be referred to the Council as a matter of urgency at the request of any member of the League. Further, if a breach of Covenant be committed, or if there arise a danger of such breach being committed, the Secretary-General shall at once give notice thereof to all the members of the Council. Upon receipt of such a request by a member of the League, or of such a notice by the Secretary-General, the Council will meet as soon as possible. The Council shall summon representatives of the parties to the conflict and of all States which are neighbours of the defaulting States, or which normally maintain close economic relations with it, or whose co-operation would be especially valuable for the application of article 16.

"6. If the Council is of opinion that a State has been guilty of a breach of the Covenant, the minutes of the meeting at which that opinion is arrived at shall be immediately sent to all members of the League, accompanied by a statement of reasons and by an invitation to take action accordingly. The fullest publicity shall be given to this decision.

"7.

"8. The Council shall recommend the date on which the enforcement of economic pressure, under article 16, is to be begun, and shall give notice of that date to all the members of the League.

"9. All States must be treated alike as regards the application of the measures of economic pressure, with the following reservations:—

"(a) It may be necessary to recommend the execution of special measures by certain States.

"(b) If it is thought desirable to postpone, wholly or partially, in the case of certain States, the effective application of the economic sanctions laid down in article 16, such postponement shall not be permitted, except in so far as it is desirable for the success of the common plan of action, or reduces to a minimum the losses and embarrassments which may be entailed in the case of certain members of the League by the application of the sanctions.

"10.

"11.

"12.

"13.

"14. In cases of prolonged application of economic pressure, measures of increasing stringency may be taken. The cutting-off of the food supplies of the civil population of the defaulting State shall be regarded as an extremely drastic measure, which shall only be applied if the other measures available are clearly inadequate.

"15.

"16.

"17.

"18. In special circumstances and in support of economic measures to be taken, it may become advisable: (a) To establish an effective blockade of the seaboard of the Covenant-breaking State; (b) to entrust to some members of the League the execution of the blockade operations."

The precise legal position of these resolutions is perhaps somewhat uncertain. But in so far as they are not inconsistent with the terms of article 16 as it stands (and they are so only to a limited extent), there seems no reason to suppose that they would not be treated in accordance with Resolution No. 1, as rules for guidance recommended to the Council and to the members of the League. The Council intimated in 1922 that it would "s'inspirer des recommandations de l'Assemblée."

It is accordingly contemplated that the Council should give an opinion as to whether a breach of the Covenant has taken place which brings article 16 into application. In view of the fact that the unratified amendment of 1921 provides expressly for excluding the votes of the parties to the dispute, it would seem (though the contrary is arguable) that the adverse vote of the State alleged to have violated the Covenant would prevent the Council from adopting a resolution stating that in its opinion such a breach of the Covenant had taken place. But a resolution adopted by all the members of the Council except the guilty State would have, from the point of view of its effect upon the members of the League, practically the same result as a resolution which had been formally adopted by unanimity.

In any case, what the Council gives is only an opinion, and it is for each member of the League to decide for itself whether article 16 has become applicable. Consequently, a resolution by the Council is not essential in order that article 16 should be applied. If a member of the League is satisfied that the article has become applicable, it is entitled to act accordingly, even though the Council has given no opinion on the point.⁽¹⁾ But the result of the discussions before the Council would naturally have a considerable effect upon the opinions of members of the League, and in the case now before the committee, it seems unlikely that any action would be taken under article 16, except in consequence of a recommendation by the Council. For this purpose unanimity on the Council, apart from the vote of the State concerned, would, as indicated above, probably suffice in practice; while the difficulty might, of course, have been solved by the previous withdrawal from the Council of the State concerned, or (if it were not a member of the Council) by its refusing to accept an invitation to sit under article 4 (5).

Should article 16 have become applicable, the obligation on the members of the League is to take the economic and financial measures mentioned in paragraph 1. There is no obligation to resort to warlike measures. According to resolution No. 3, the act of the defaulting State does not automatically create a state of war between itself and the other members of the League, but it entitles those members to "resort to acts of war or to declare themselves in a state of war" with it. It is, moreover, contemplated that, in the first instance at any rate, an attempt should be made to restore peace by economic pressure. It was also contemplated that the application of such pressure might be gradual, and might, in the case of certain members of the League, be postponed wholly or partially. Moreover, the application of such pressure may be hampered by the necessity of respecting the rights of States who are not members of the League.

The action in this respect of the members of the League may be described as being in the nature of a prohibition of "trading with the enemy"; the members of the League would take the necessary steps to prevent persons subject to their jurisdiction from financial or commercial intercourse with the defaulting

⁽¹⁾ This point would be particularly important if the Council had been prevented from giving an opinion by the vote of the delinquent State.

State. These steps would be taken by means of their own domestic legislation.⁽²⁾ The question of what effect could be given in existing circumstances to the undertaking to prevent intercourse "between the nationals of the Covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a member of the League or not," is obscure; but it is not likely to be interpreted as involving any obligation to take measures, such as the imposition of a blockade, which could not be taken within the jurisdiction of the members of the League. The original idea of the article was, no doubt, that the League would, in time, become universal, and consequently measures taken by the members within their own jurisdiction would be effective to produce the desired result, though the possibility of more forcible measures becoming necessary was not excluded.

But in existing circumstances the situation of States which are not members of the League and have no obligations under article 16 has to be taken into serious account. In so far as such States were prepared to co-operate in the measures taken by the League, their position would be, in practice, the same as that of the members. But in the case of States who refused to co-operate, the mere application of the economic and financial measures contemplated would not enable the members of the League to prevent trade, &c., between those States and the Covenant-breaking State, except in so far as action could effectively be taken within the jurisdiction of members of the League.

The measures so far contemplated could be taken without the members of the League making use of their right to declare themselves in a state of war with the delinquent State, though, as was once pointed out in a report by the Secretary-General, that the State might make those measures the occasion of a recourse to war against the States which applied them.

Article 16, however, also contemplates the possibility of war-like action being taken against the delinquent State. Under paragraph 2, the Council can recommend to the Governments concerned what forces they should "contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the League." Moreover, any member of the League may, even if no such recommendation has been made by the Council, make use of its right to go to war with a Covenant-breaking State.

In this connexion it should be pointed out that the 1921 resolutions contemplated the advisability of blockading the sea-board of the Covenant-breaking State and entrusting the execution of the blockade to certain members of the League. It is possible that what was contemplated was the imposition of a blockade in consequence of a decision of the Council and without the States who conducted it necessarily declaring themselves to be in a state of war with the delinquent State. This situation might be possible as regards the application of the blockade measures to the ships of the members of the League (or at any rate those who agreed that article 16 was applicable), since in the circumstances the members of the League could not object to the blockade being enforced against their own shipping, even though the blockading State did not formally possess belligerent rights. But as regards ships of non-members of the League (failing acquiescence on their part in the measures executed by the League), it does not appear that a blockade could be enforced unless the blockading Powers were at war with the delinquent State, and therefore possessed belligerent rights.⁽³⁾ The same observation would apply to other measures at sea, such as the interception of vessels carrying goods regarded as contraband. If the measures contemplated went beyond the mere turning back of vessels proceeding to or from the blockaded area or carrying contraband, &c., and it were proposed that such vessels should be captured and treated as prize, it would seem that it would be necessary for the country conducting these operations to declare itself to be in a state of war, since otherwise it would not seem possible to set up prize courts and to institute the necessary proceedings therein against the ships concerned. Moreover, the actual operations of blockade might well lead to hostilities with the navy of the blockaded country, and thus produce a state of war.

⁽²⁾ In this connexion the question arises whether an Act of Parliament would be required to confer the necessary powers upon His Majesty's Government. The Law Officers advised in 1920 that any prohibition of trade and financial relations and intercourse which may be necessary to give effect to article 16 could be imposed by Order in Council under the Treaty of Peace Act, 1919; but the question whether at the present date this course of action, even though legally possible, would be a satisfactory method of dealing with the situation may well require consideration.

⁽³⁾ The question whether a so-called "pacific blockade" can be enforced against ships other than those of the blockaded State is extremely doubtful.

1935

60

GENERAL

As regards action against the shipping of the delinquent State itself, if it were possible to enforce a blockade of its coasts against the shipping of other nations without the blockading Power possessing belligerent rights, it would seem equally possible to enforce the blockade against the shipping of the delinquent State itself without those rights being necessary. For the reasons given in the preceding paragraph, however, this situation appears to be unlikely. Apart from this, operations at sea against enemy shipping are essentially a form of military action, and, although the delinquent State would hardly be in a position to claim that such action was illegitimate because the States concerned did not possess belligerent rights, it is difficult to see how in practice such operations could be carried on without the States concerned declaring themselves to be in a state of war against the Covenant-breaking country. Moreover, in the case of a country which possesses a navy, operations of this nature seem almost bound in practice to lead to actual hostilities.

The conclusions which seem to result from the above considerations are as follows:—

- (1) The economic and financial measures contemplated in the first paragraph of article 16 do not involve the use of belligerent rights; they could (subject to any question as to the rights of non-members of the League) be applied by steps taken within our own jurisdiction, and would not necessarily involve our declaring ourselves to be in a state of war.
- (2) If it became necessary to take action at sea to prevent commercial intercourse between the delinquent State and non-members of the League who declined to co-operate or acquiesce in the economic and financial measures taken, this could not be done without the possession of belligerent rights, which would involve our declaring ourselves to be in a state of war with the delinquent State.
- (3) Action against shipping of the delinquent State, though perhaps theoretically possible without our declaring ourselves to be at war, would, if the State concerned possessed a navy, almost inevitably lead to hostilities at sea, and thus involve us in a state of war.

H. W. MALKIN.

July 1935.

61

GUATEMALA

[A 9105/430/8/1935]

No. 4.

[October 28, 1935]

Foreign Office to Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, September 20, 1935.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Samuel Hoare, to transmit the accompanying papers and to request your opinion on certain matters arising out of the Anglo-Guatemalan Convention of 1859, relative to the boundary between Guatemala and British Honduras. A copy of the Convention will be found in the attached volume of correspondence (Paper A. No. 2). The matters in question have already formed the subject of reference to your predecessors in office in 1884 (see below, paragraph 9), but your opinion is being sought in view of further developments in the situation since that date, and of the possibility that the question of a reference to arbitration may arise.

2. The provisions of the Convention immediately relevant in the present connexion are the preamble and articles I, II and VII, which read as follows:—

“Whereas the boundary between Her Britannic Majesty's Settlement and Possessions in the Bay of Honduras, and the territories of the Republic of Guatemala, has not yet been ascertained and marked out; Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the Republic of Guatemala, being desirous, with a view to improve and perpetuate the friendly relations which happily subsist between the two countries, to define the boundary aforesaid have resolved to conclude a convention for that purpose, Guatemala-British Honduras boundary: extent to which boundary set up by Anglo-Guatemalan Convention of 1859 depends on fulfilment of article VII; obligations of His Majesty's Government under that article.

“ARTICLE I.

“It is agreed between Her Britannic Majesty and the Republic of Guatemala that the boundary between the Republic and the British Settlement and Possessions in the Bay of Honduras, as they existed previous to and on the 1st day of January, 1850, and have continued to exist up to the present time, was and is as follows:—

“Beginning at the mouth of the River Sarstoon in the Bay of Honduras, and proceeding up the mid-channel thereof to Gracias á Dios Falls; then turning to the right and continuing by a line drawn direct from Gracias á Dios Falls to Garbutt's Falls on the River Belize, and from Garbutt's Falls due north until it strikes the Mexican frontier.

“It is agreed and declared between the high contracting parties that all the territory to the north and east of the line of boundary above described belongs to Her Britannic Majesty, and that all the territory to the south and west of the same belongs to the Republic of Guatemala.

“ARTICLE II.

“Her Britannic Majesty and the Republic of Guatemala shall, within twelve months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present Convention, appoint each a commissioner for the purpose of designating and marking out the boundary described in the preceding article. Such commissioners shall ascertain the latitude and longitude of Gracias á Dios Falls and of Garbutt's Falls, and shall cause the line of boundary between Garbutt's Falls and the Mexican territory to be opened and marked where necessary as a protection against future trespass.

[13464]

K

1935

"ARTICLE VII.

"With the object of practically carrying out the views set forth in the preamble of the present Convention, for improving and perpetuating the friendly relations which at present so happily exist between the two high contracting parties, they mutually agree conjointly to use their best efforts, by taking adequate means for establishing the easiest communication (either by means of a cart-road, or employing the rivers, or both united, according to the opinion of the surveying engineers) between the fittest place on the Atlantic Coast, near the settlement of Belize,⁽¹⁾ and the capital of Guatemala, whereby the commerce of England on the one hand, and the material prosperity of the republic on the other, cannot fail to be sensibly increased, at the same time that the limits of the two countries being now clearly defined, all further encroachments by either party on the territory of the other will be effectually checked and prevented for the future."

A map is attached (Paper B) to facilitate understanding of the above provisions.

3. The principal questions on which your opinion is desired are (1) how far, if at all, the establishment of the boundary set up by the Convention was and is dependent on the due fulfilment of the provisions of article VII, which, it will be observed, is the only substantive article of the Convention not concerned with establishing the boundary; and (2) what, if any, are the present obligations of His Majesty's Government under article VII.

4. As regards the latter question, it may be noted at once that no road or waterway of the kind contemplated by article VII has, in fact, ever been constructed (or "established," in the words of the Convention), at any rate, not in pursuance of the provisions of the article. In 1908 a railway was opened between Guatemala City and Puerto Barrios on the Atlantic coast of Guatemala which, while it appears, in fact, to have achieved, so far as Guatemala is concerned, the purposes of article VII, was constructed on the sole initiative and responsibility of the Guatemalan Government, without previous consultation with His Majesty's Government and not (in the view of the latter) in pursuance of or in accordance with the terms of the article. The Guatemalan Government contend that, owing to the default of His Majesty's Government, article VII has never been implemented and that something is due in fulfilment thereof. The proposals which have been made on both sides for the purpose of carrying out the article will be mentioned in due course. It should be added, though this is a matter which is more conveniently discussed later, that the Guatemalan Government contend that the boundary as defined in the Convention of 1859 resulted in a cession of certain territory to the British Crown (though no express mention of this was made in the Convention), and that the real object of article VII (again not actually expressed) was to afford to Guatemala a compensation for this cession.

5. As regards the boundary, it will be observed that the Convention, while establishing the terminal and key points, left the major portion of the actual line to be demarcated by joint commissioners. The present position is that the Guatemalan Government have refused to agree to any final settlement of a large part of the boundary, and argue that they are under no obligation to do so until His Majesty's Government have fulfilled their alleged obligations in respect of article VII. They have refused to accept the contention of His Majesty's Government that the final establishment of the boundary ought not to be held up pending the settlement of the question of article VII.

6. Before considering the merits of the arguments on either side it will be necessary to trace briefly the history of the boundary question, and also of the action taken in regard to article VII. It will be convenient to begin with the boundary. It will be observed in the Convention of 1859 that the southern boundary of British Honduras with Guatemala is defined by article I as being, and as having at all material times been, the mid-channel of the Sarstoon River from its mouth up to a point known as Gracias á Dios Falls, that is, a definitely ascertained line; but that the western boundary, on the other hand, is simply indicated as the line lying between Gracias á Dios Falls on the Sarstoon River and Garbutt's Falls on the River Belize, and thence due northwards to the Mexican border (see map, Paper B). The actual demarcation of this western boundary on the ground was, however, left to commissioners to be appointed in pursuance of other articles of the Convention. It is in connexion with the demarcation of this western boundary that the present questions have arisen. Commissioners on both sides were duly appointed shortly after the entry into force of the Convention, and the terminal points at Gracias á Dios and Garbutt's Falls⁽²⁾ were fixed and roughly marked with piles of stones. A start was also made with the survey of the line between these points. This survey was, however, presently discontinued, mainly, it appears, at the instance of the authorities of British Honduras, for reasons which are not clear. Subsequent attempts to resume the joint survey proved abortive. Many years later, in 1929, commissioners appointed by both parties again met, and concrete monuments were set up definitely marking the points at Gracias á Dios and Garbutt's Falls, and these points were accepted in an exchange of notes with the Guatemalan Government of August 1931 (Paper C). The actual line still remained undemarcated, however, and efforts to induce the Guatemalan Government to proceed to joint demarcation proved unavailing. In view of the inconvenience of an undemarcated frontier and of the possibility of Guatemala acquiring prescriptive rights by encroachment, it was decided in 1932 to inform the Guatemalan Government that the authorities of British Honduras must reluctantly proceed to unilateral demarcation. On being so informed, the Guatemalan Government replied that their engineers were engaged on work elsewhere, but that, if British engineers demarcated the line, the Guatemalan engineers would examine it as soon as possible, and if it was found to be satisfactory, Guatemala would accept the boundary thus established. The work of demarcation was accordingly proceeded with by the authorities of British Honduras and has now been completed. In the meantime, the Guatemalan Government in 1933 raised the question of article VII for the first time since the period 1859-1900 (the history of this latter question is given below), and, pending a settlement in regard to it, have refused either to agree to the plans of the now demarcated line or to enter into an exchange of notes proposed to them for the purpose of recording the final acceptance of the line by both parties.⁽³⁾ In addition, the Guatemalan Government have adopted an obstructionist attitude over a number of other, quite unconnected, questions, and apparently intend to subordinate their entire relations with this country to a satisfactory settlement in regard to article VII. A memorandum is attached (Paper D) setting out the history of the boundary question in greater detail.

⁽¹⁾ British Honduras was, at the time, known as the settlement of Belize, and the use of this term in article VII of the Convention did not denote simply the town of Belize, the capital of British Honduras. It would appear therefore that the contemplated road or waterway was to be wholly within Guatemalan territory, between the capital, Guatemala City and some point situated on the Atlantic coast of Guatemala, but close to the border of British Honduras (see map, Paper B).

7. It has been observed that until raised in 1933, in terms to be described, the question of article VII had not been mentioned by the Guatemalan Government since the end of the last century. It appears that immediately on the conclusion of the Convention of 1859, a British engineer was sent out to enquire into the question of constructing a road or waterway in pursuance of article VII. As a result of his investigations, a draft convention was drawn up and submitted to the Guatemalan Government, in which it was proposed on the British side to apply to Parliament for a grant of £50,000, and that this sum, if granted, should be paid to Guatemala in full discharge of British obligations under article VII of the Convention of 1859. In 1863 a supplementary convention on these lines was signed with the Guatemalan Government, but not ratified. A copy of this convention will be found in the attached volume of correspondence (Paper A, No. 6). The preamble contains a full statement of the circumstances leading to the signature. Briefly, the position was that the cost of the road, if constructed jointly by both parties, was estimated at nearly £150,000. This was felt to be more than had been contemplated under the Convention of 1859. On the other hand, it was considered that if the work was carried out by Guatemala alone, it could be done more cheaply,^(*) and in that event that the obligations on the British side could be discharged by a payment of £50,000.

⁽²⁾ For reasons which need not be entered into here, the terminal point on the Mexican border was not marked, and the subsequent history of the boundary northwards from Garbutt's Falls to the Mexican border is not material in the present connexion.

⁽³⁾ The plans were communicated to the Guatemalan Government with a statement that their signature by the Guatemalan boundary commissioners would not involve a formal acceptance of the boundary as demarcated in the plans, which would be reserved for the proposed exchange of notes.

8. The supplementary convention was signed, but subject to ratification within six months, and it was not, in fact, ratified. It appears that on the British side ratification would have been effected, but that the Guatemalan Government were not then prepared to ratify. Subsequent to the expiry of the period of six months the latter asked for an extension of time. This was refused. The Guatemalan Government, who had decided too late that they wished to ratify, then (1866-69) suggested the signature of a fresh agreement in the same terms. This suggestion was rejected. The correspondence is attached (Paper A). It will be seen that at first (note of Lord Stanley to Sr. de Francisco Martin of the 29th August, 1866—No. 11 in Paper A), Her late Majesty's then Government took the view that article VII of the 1859 Convention was still in force, notwithstanding the failure of the Guatemalan Government to ratify the agreement signed in 1863, but that it was for the latter to suggest means "for the work being undertaken in an economical manner, for an equal share of the expense being borne by Guatemala, and for the commercial result being such as to justify the large outlay which . . . must be necessary." Later, however, the view was taken on the British side that the Guatemalan failure to ratify the agreement signed in 1863 altogether released Her Majesty's Government from their obligations under article VII. The British contention (see correspondence in Paper A) was that by sending out an engineer to make a survey and estimate costs, and by signing the agreement of 1863 and being ready to ratify the same and to ask Parliament for a grant of £50,000, Her Majesty's Government had, in the words of article VII of the 1859 Convention, "used their best efforts, by taking adequate means, &c.," in order to accomplish the objects in view. The Guatemalan Government, on the other hand, considered that as the agreement signed in 1863, which was intended to define the manner in which article VII of the 1859 Convention was to be carried out, had never come into force, article VII still stood, and that it remained undischarged. In this connexion they stated their view that the real intention of article VII had been solely to afford Guatemala compensation for an alleged cession of territory resulting from article I, and that anything in the wording of article VII which might appear inconsistent with this view was to be explained on grounds of "decorum." This view was uncompromisingly rejected by Her Majesty's Government for the reasons indicated in the notes from Lord Stanley and the Earl of Clarendon to the Guatemalan Minister in London, dated respectively the 3rd January, 1867 (No. 12 in Paper A), and the 15th November, 1869 (No. 13 in Paper A). But it would appear that there were other reasons, not disclosed; this question is discussed below (paragraph 20). Further desultory correspondence took place until, in 1884, the Guatemalan Minister in London sent in a note (No. 14 in Paper A), the effect of which appears to have been that the Guatemalan Government considered that the Convention of 1859 stood or fell as a whole, that the territorial articles were only part of a wider settlement which included article VII, and that, failing satisfaction of the latter, they could not recognise validity of the boundary definition.

9. As a result of the Guatemalan note of 1884 the matter was submitted in that year to the Law Officers of the Crown, who were asked to advise whether the territorial articles of the Convention of 1859 were invalidated by the non-fulfilment of article VII, and whether in the event of a parliamentary vote for the purpose of carrying out article VII being applied for and refused, this country would be released from all obligations under that article without prejudice to the other provisions of the Convention. The Law Officers gave two opinions (Nos. 15 and 16 in Paper A), the second arising out of an enquiry suggested in the first. In the first opinion the Law Officers advised that the territorial articles of the Convention were not invalidated by the non-fulfilment of article VII, the latter being an independent stipulation and the former articles explicit in their terms and unconditional; but that it would be open to the Guatemalan Government to refuse to observe the territorial articles by way of retaliation for a breach of article VII, if a breach had occurred and assuming the obligation created by the article to be still in force. On the second question put to them the Law Officers in their first opinion advised that article VII only imposed on Her Majesty's Government the obligation to "use their best efforts," and that if they proposed and used all due efforts to carry a vote of money in Parliament this obligation would be discharged. In their second opinion the Law Officers dealt with the Guatemalan contention that article VII was intended as compensation for a cession of territory by Guatemala. As to this, they advised that there was little doubt that previous to the Convention of 1859 Guatemala claimed territory in British occupation, that but for some inducement Guatemala would not have consented to article I of the Convention, and that article VII "was, in fact, the fine paid to secure the consent of Guatemala." As to the British obligations under article VII, the Law Officers in their second opinion advised that there was "a moral obligation, if not something more, to take some steps to give effect to article VII of the Convention of 1859," but that "in measuring the extent of this obligation, the changed circumstances and the increased difficulties, due to the delay which has taken place, and which are the fruits of the non-ratification of the treaty of 1863, may well be taken into consideration."

(*) Presumably because cheaper labour and materials were available on the Guatemalan side.

10. In consequence of these opinions the question of asking Parliament for a grant of £50,000 was again considered, and, in putting the matter up to the Cabinet in 1885 the views of the Lord Chancellor were requested. They were as follows:—

"I agree with the view expressed in the report of the Law Officers of the 25th November, 1884, that there is a moral obligation, if not something more, to take steps to give some effect to article VII of the treaty of 1859.

"I cannot think that it is a sound view that Her Majesty's Government, by incurring expense for a preliminary survey, and signing and being ready to ratify the Convention of 1863, have used their best efforts by taking adequate means for establishing the easiest communication between the fittest place on the Atlantic coast and the capital of Guatemala.

"The delay which has taken place and the changed circumstances may no doubt require a modification of the original scheme; but as there seems to be no doubt that the recognition of British rights to certain disputed territory in article I of the treaty of 1859 was obtained in consideration of the understanding contained in article VII, it would appear to be only right that some substantial effect should be given to that article."

11. No further steps appear to have been taken, however, though in 1895 Mr. Gosling, Her Majesty's Minister at Guatemala, on leave in Europe, was instructed to sound the Guatemalan Minister in Paris unofficially as to whether his Government would consider the payment of a sum of £50,000 by Her Majesty's Government towards the construction of a railway from Belize to the frontier of the Province of Peten, as a discharge of Her Majesty's Government's moral obligations under article VII of the Convention of 1859, i.e., not within Guatemalan territory (see footnote to paragraph 2 above), but from Belize across British Honduras to the Guatemala boundary (see map, Paper B). The Guatemalan Government, however, refused to accept this arrangement; but on returning to his post Mr. Gosling elicited a proposal from the President of the Republic to leave on one side the question of the £50,000, and to arrange to give a concession to a private company to construct a railway from Belize into Peten, on businesslike terms. The Colonial Office wished certain modifications to be made in these proposals, but the negotiations lapsed. The idea was taken up again in 1898 when the Colonial Office recommended, in the interests of British Honduras, that a subsidy should be granted towards the construction of the line. Careful consideration was given to the scheme, and complete surveys were made of the route, but it was clear that the Government of British Honduras were not in a position to construct it. It was, therefore, proposed to arrange with some private company for its construction and maintenance in consideration of certain subsidies and grants of land from the two countries. For this, however, it was necessary that Her Majesty's Government should give assistance, and it was proposed that the Treasury should be approached with a view to obtaining 50,000 as a loan to the Government of British Honduras, and to paying over that sum as a subsidy for the intended railway. But the Treasury declined to sanction the proposal on the grounds—

1935

- (1) That by lapse of time and change of circumstances article VII of the Convention had become obsolete;
- (2) That in 1892 a line of railway was begun connecting the capital of Guatemala with San José on the Pacific and Livingston^(*) on the Atlantic and its completion had done, or would do, for Guatemala all that was aimed at in article VII and much besides;
- (3) That the republic thus lost the motive that might impel her to fulfil her own share of the obligation of 1859, and could have no right to require this country to contribute to an entirely different undertaking which would neither be a joint enterprise of the two Governments such as was contemplated by the Convention, nor promote the trade of Guatemala with the Atlantic coast;
- (4) That British Honduras interests would not be benefited to the extent predicted.

After this, the question of an Imperial grant was not further pressed on the Treasury, and although the matter continued up to about 1901 to be the subject of further desultory conversations, both with private contractors and, unofficially, with the Guatemalan Government, nothing came of it.

12. Nothing further about article VII was said on either side until, as already mentioned (paragraph 6 above), the Guatemalan Government raised it early in 1933, with an enquiry as to whether His Majesty's Government were prepared to fulfil their obligations under article VII. In reply, the Guatemalan Government were informed that the matter would be carefully examined, but that His Majesty's Government presumed that it was not the intention of the Guatemalan Government to defer the final recognition of the boundary on this score; and that His Majesty's Government must insist on the prompt conclusion of the necessary arrangements for demarcation "without regard, although equally without prejudice to the question of article VII." In a further note it was stated that—

"His Majesty's Government, in their desire to comply with the wishes of the Guatemalan Government, are prepared to give most careful study to any practical proposals which the latter may put forward for the execution of the bilateral stipulations contained in article VII of the Convention of the 30th April, 1859, notwithstanding that in the view of His Majesty's Government subsequent developments, such as the construction of a railway from Guatemala City to the Atlantic Coast of the Republic, have fulfilled for many years past the needs which article VII was intended to satisfy, and thus have rendered its stipulations inapplicable to present conditions. The means of communication contemplated by article VII would have to benefit both the Colony of British Honduras and the Republic of Guatemala; would have to be economically sound, and would have to be constructed at the joint expense of both parties.

"In thus giving proof of their anxiety to meet the wishes of the Guatemalan Government, His Majesty's Government confidently anticipate that your Excellency's Government, animated by similar friendly feelings, will proceed forthwith, without awaiting the outcome of the investigation referred to in the preceding paragraph of this note, to an exchange of notes to enable the demarcation of the frontier between the Colony of British Honduras and the Republic of Guatemala to be carried out without further delay."

In reply, the Guatemalan Government made it clear that the final recognition of the boundary would be made dependent on satisfaction over article VII, and that, in their view, such satisfaction ought to take the form of an equitable and proportionate contribution by His Majesty's Government towards the cost of the railway from Guatemala City to Puerto Barrios; and they referred by implication to the Guatemalan contention that article VII had been intended to afford

(*) The line appears in fact to have been taken to Puerto Barrios, not Livingston (see paragraph 4 above).

Guatemala compensation for a cession of territory. The relevant parts of the Guatemalan note read as follows:—

"You explain that the construction of the railway from the City of Guatemala to the Atlantic coast has fulfilled the requirements which article VII of the Convention of 1859 was called upon to satisfy, and you consider, therefore, that at the present time its stipulations are inapplicable. You state in continuation that [under those stipulations] the method of communication should reciprocally benefit Guatemala and British Honduras, and the costs of construction should be divided between both countries.

"The railway, constructed exclusively by the Government of Guatemala, did, in point of fact, satisfy the pressing and immediate need for communication between the City of Guatemala and the northern coast; but that construction was carried out by the unilateral efforts and sacrifices of the Guatemalan people without the co-operation which was due from His Majesty's Government as provided for in article VII of the Convention of 1859.

"The activity of the Government of Guatemala and the abstention of His Majesty's Government with regard to the construction of the railway cannot be considered as a cancellation of the mutual obligations of the contracting parties, but, on the contrary, makes evident the right of Guatemala to request from the Government of His Majesty the reimbursement of the portion of the cost for which they are liable to respond.

"His Majesty's Government are well aware of the antecedents and reasons which determined the incorporation of article VII in the text of the Convention; and, therefore, the Government of Guatemala believe that the best practical proposal which they can suggest for the fulfilment of the bilateral stipulations contained in article VII of the Convention of 1859, would be the proportionate and equitable co-operation of His Majesty's Government in the costs of the railway which Guatemala constructed alone, as it was not able at that time to count upon the quota which His Majesty's Government was liable to defray.

"You urgently request a prompt reply for the acceptance of an exchange of notes as a proof of mutual consent for the demarcation of the frontier, and I must point out that my Government are anxious to give such favourable answer, provided that, on the part of His Majesty's Government, the express statement is made that they are ready to fulfil, for their part, the obligation which lies upon them under article VII of the Convention of the 30th April, 1859."

The reply of His Majesty's Government to this note was to the following effect:—

"His Majesty's Government have given most careful and sympathetic consideration to the contention advanced by the Guatemalan Government that His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom should, in fulfilment of their obligations under article VII of the Boundary Convention of 1859, contribute proportionately and equitably to the cost of construction of the existing railway from Guatemala City to the Atlantic coast.

"Whilst anxious to respect such obligations as may rest upon them, their examination of these obligations has led His Majesty's Government, to their regret, to the conclusion that they cannot accept this contention of the Guatemalan Government. Article VII of the Convention of 1859 provides that the high contracting parties shall mutually agree conjointly to use their 'best efforts, by taking adequate means for establishing the easiest communication,' and it is clear that only a means of communication established in pursuance of consultation and consequent mutual agreement between the two parties would fulfil the stipulations of the article. The existing railway, on the other hand, was constructed under the sole responsibility of the Guatemalan Government, and without any prior consultation or agreement with His Majesty's Government. Moreover, the means of communication contemplated by the article was 'either by means of a cart-road or employing the rivers, or both united,' and it does not appear to His Majesty's Government that a railway could be held to fall within the terms of the article, unless His Majesty's Government were willing to depart from the exact words of the treaty and accept a railway instead of a road. For these reasons His Majesty's Government do not feel that any obligation can be held to rest upon them to make any contribution towards the cost of construction of the existing railway, more particularly as it does not appear to them that it can be deemed to be specifically beneficial to the 'commerce of England' as contemplated by article VII of the Convention.

1935

"His Majesty's Government, although unable for the reasons stated to accept the proposal of a contribution to the cost of constructing the existing railway, still remain ready to give the most careful study to any practical scheme which the Guatemalan Government may be able to devise, which would fulfil the conditions stipulated in article VII of the Convention."

The relevant parts of the Guatemalan rejoinder were as follows:—

"The Government of Guatemala entertain the most constant desire to co-operate with His Majesty's Government in the maintenance and development of the most cordial relations between both Governments, and it has been their constant preoccupation to reach a reciprocally convenient solution which may definitely put an end to the discussions which have continued since 1863, owing to the non-ratification by the British Government of the Wyke-Martin Convention of the 5th August of that year, and owing to the fact that article VII of the 1859 Convention, which was essentially compensatory, has remained unfulfilled. There is no doubt what was the reason for the inclusion of article VII in the Convention and what was the object of the said article. Guatemala recognised, in perpetuity, as the definite frontier between their territory and that of the Colony of British Honduras, the Sarstoon River in place of the Sibún River, which previously had been the boundary according to the Convention of London of the 14th July, 1786, thereby renouncing a considerable part of territory which until then they considered as theirs. In exchange, the text of article VII was stipulated, which previously did not appear in the draft of the treaty, as it was considered that thus a compensation was obtained for their goodwill in accepting the frontier claimed by the British Government, who expressly approved the said complementary article, and manifested their pleasure through the British consul, Mr. William Hall.

"You invoke article VII to remind the Government of Guatemala of the text of the said article, in the following words: 'they mutually agree conjointly to use their best efforts by taking adequate means for establishing the easiest communication,' referring to a cart-road or to the employment of rivers or both united. With this quotation from article VII, His Majesty's Government consider that they have proved that they have no obligation to compensate the Government of Guatemala equitably for the part of the cost of the railway which they constructed at their own expense, since the stipulated obligation referred to a cart-road and not to a railway.

"I must remind you that it was not this Ministry, but yourself, in the name of your Government, who alluded to the railway in the following terms in your communication of the 7th April last.

"His Majesty's Government being desirous of satisfying the aspirations of the Government of Guatemala, are prepared to study carefully any practical proposal destined to carry out the bilateral stipulations contained in article VII of the Convention of the 30th April, 1859, although His Majesty's Government consider that, owing to subsequent events such as the construction of a railway from the city of Guatemala to the Atlantic coast of the republic, the necessity which article VII was called upon to satisfy, has been fulfilled for many years past, and, therefore, its stipulations are rendered inapplicable to existing conditions.

"You will perfectly understand that the construction of a commercial means of communication, such as that of the railway, was absolutely necessary for the Republic of Guatemala, and that, if on this occasion, they did not obtain British co-operation, it was because they had already exhausted their efforts that the Convention of 1859 should receive due fulfilment in so far as article VII was concerned, without having obtained any satisfactory result. It appears obvious that if Guatemala constructed a railway in place of the road which both Governments ought to have constructed seventy years ago, the proportional part of the cost of the road should be paid to them to be applied to the cost of the railway.

"It is regrettable that the existing railway does not appear satisfactory to His Majesty's Government as a commercial route, and that they should have preferred a road for carts and other similar vehicles; but, even in that case, Guatemala would be agreeable to the construction of such a road between a point near the colony of British Honduras and the capital of the republic, provided that His Majesty's Government were to agree to it; and even so, if there were objection on the part of the British Government, the republic would be ready to accept any other just compensation.

"If His Majesty's Government should not desire to construct the part of the road for which they are liable in the opinion of the Government of Guatemala, this Government would be prepared to effect the work alone provided that His Majesty's Government defray the sums corresponding to the section which they themselves would have had to construct.

"In any event, my Government would be ready to agree to any other arrangement which might be substituted for that agreed upon in article VII of the Convention of 1859 in order that the said Convention may be faithfully complied with by both contracting parties."

A further note was then sent by His Majesty's Government to the following effect:—

"In the first place, His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom cannot pass over in silence the implication that it was through their failure to ratify the Wyke-Martin Convention of the 5th August, 1863, that this instrument did not enter into force. The Guatemalan Government must surely be well aware that His Majesty's Government were ready and willing to ratify this Convention in due time, and that it was on the contrary through the failure of the Guatemalan Government to do so that the Convention lapsed.

"His Majesty's Government have already stated the reasons why they are unable to consider the existing railway from Puerto Barrios to Guatemala City as fulfilling the intentions of article VII of the Convention of 1859, and consequently to admit any obligation to contribute towards the cost of construction of this railway. One of these reasons was the fact that the railway was constructed under the sole responsibility of the Guatemalan Government, and without any prior consultation or agreement with His Majesty's Government, such as is obviously contemplated by article VII of the Convention. His Majesty's Government cannot accept the view now set forth by the Guatemalan Government that the failure in the past to reach any agreement in regard to the implementation of article VII of the Convention was sufficient justification for not attempting to secure the co-operation of His Majesty's Government in this new scheme, if the Guatemalan Government desired that His Majesty's Government should contribute towards its cost.

"Notwithstanding the fact that, for the reasons stated, His Majesty's Government cannot consider this railway as fulfilling the requirements of article VII of the Convention, its existence radically modifies the situation which obtained at the time of the conclusion of the Convention of 1859, and renders it extremely doubtful whether the construction of a means of communication of the nature specified in article VII of the Convention would at this date be economically sound or beneficial both to the colony of British Honduras and to the Republic of Guatemala, and so fulfil the purposes contemplated by that article. If, however, the Guatemalan Government are nevertheless able to show to the satisfaction of His Majesty's Government that the construction of such a means of communication would, in fact, redound to the mutual benefit of both parties, as evidently contemplated by the terms of article VII of the Convention, His Majesty's Government are still ready to give the most careful study to such a scheme.

"His Majesty's Government note that the Guatemalan Government would be ready to agree to any other arrangement which might be substituted for that contemplated by article VII of the Convention of 1859, in order that the Convention may be faithfully carried out by both the parties. Whilst, however, they remain, as already stated, prepared to entertain proposals by the Guatemalan Government for giving effect to the provisions of the article, they are not themselves in a position to offer any suggestion in this direction."

13. From this correspondence it will be observed that His Majesty's Government did not in terms maintain that article VII was obsolete or no longer binding upon them, but took up the attitude that any scheme for carrying it out must be to the benefit of both countries; and they left it to the Guatemalan Government to propose such a scheme. The latter maintained in effect that the scheme need only benefit Guatemala, since the real intention of article VII was to compensate Guatemala for a cession of territory. The Guatemalan Government, therefore, saw no reason why His Majesty's Government should not contribute towards the cost of the Puerto Barrios railway, the construction of which, in their view, they had been compelled to undertake because of the British default. His Majesty's Government, while considering that the railway in fact achieved, so far as Guatemala was concerned, the objects of article VII, were unable to admit that its construction was in accordance with the terms of the article, or that they had any obligation to contribute towards its cost.

14. Matters having thus reached a complete impasse, and the Guatemalan Government not putting forward any further proposals (beyond a suggestion, which His Majesty's Government were not able to entertain, that certain neighbouring British banks and islets should be ceded), it was decided to propose that the Government of British Honduras should construct a road from Belize to the frontier of the Guatemalan Province of Peten, the Guatemalan Government to continue the construction of the road on the Guatemalan side. This scheme it was thought would open up the Province of Peten and prove mutually advantageous to both parties. The proposal was accordingly made in November 1934, but was rejected by the Guatemalan Government on the ground of inadequacy.

15. Matters can only be carried further now either by His Majesty's Government deciding to defer to the Guatemalan view and to make some monetary payment, the exact amount of which would presumably be a subject for negotiation; or else by seeking arbitration on the issues involved. As regards this latter possibility, it is necessary to consider the nature of the tribunal before which the arbitration might take place. If the matter were referred to a court for decision on a purely legal basis, there is a probability that the court, if it decided that His Majesty's Government still had some liability in regard to article VII, would, in view of the terms of the article, consider that it was not in a position to decide the further question of the exact nature and extent of that liability, and that this must be left to the parties to decide by mutual agreement. In that event, matters would not be advanced in any way, since the difficulties created by the present situation arise precisely from the fact that the parties are not able to agree as to the means for carrying out the article. Even if the court were to decide, as it might well do, that the Guatemalan Government was not justified in holding up the boundary settlement pending a settlement of article VII; and even if the Guatemalan Government were accordingly to recognise the boundary, the unsettled question of article VII would still remain as an irritant in Anglo-Guatemalan relations. Unless, therefore, it seems reasonably certain that a court deciding on a purely legal basis would decide that His Majesty's Government had no further liability at all in regard to article VII, it would seem preferable to refer the matter to a court having power to decide ex aequo et bono. Such a court, if it held that His Majesty's Government still had some liability, would be in a position to suggest means for discharging that liability. It is not unlikely that such a court would consider that the liability, if it existed, would in the circumstances be best discharged by some form of money payment, and, in that case, it could indicate what sum would be appropriate. If (assuming that in your view His Majesty's Government are, in fact, still under some liability, in respect of article VII) you consider that such a court would indicate a small sum as being sufficient to discharge it, then a reference to arbitration would probably be advantageous. If, on the other hand, you consider that a larger sum of, say, in the neighbourhood of £50,000 might be awarded, then it would probably be better to come to terms with the Guatemalan Government by direct negotiation.

16. The first question to be submitted to any arbitral tribunal would be whether the territorial articles of the Convention of 1859 are conditional or dependent on article VII, and whether the Guatemalan Government are justified in deferring the final recognition of the boundary until a settlement has been reached in regard to article VII. These two questions are not quite the same. When the Law Officers, in their first opinion of 1884 (see paragraph 9 above), advised that the territorial articles were not dependent or conditional on the fulfilment of article VII, and would not be invalidated by the non-fulfilment of that article, they apparently meant that there was no necessary or inherent connexion between the two sets of provisions. Thus, if article VII failed to be fulfilled owing to impossibility or impracticability, or to a mutual agreement to let it lapse, there would be nothing to prevent the due carrying out of the boundary provisions, and it would not be open to either party to contend that the boundary settlement was thereby prejudiced. Similarly, the mere fact that article VII is not as yet fulfilled would afford no ground per se for refusing to carry out the boundary clauses or to recognise the line. On the other hand, the Law Officers evidently thought that, if the failure to fulfil article VII arose from the default of one of the parties amounting to a breach, it would be open to the other party by way of retaliation to refuse to observe the territorial articles. The doctrine of retaliation in international law is one which entitles one State to do something which would otherwise be illegal by way of retaliation for a definitely illegal act committed by another State. This doctrine has, however, always been held to be subject to certain limitations, the best recent statement of which occurred in an arbitration between Portugal and Germany concerning war damage committed by Germany in Portuguese territory in Africa, a note on which will be found in the British Year Book of International Law for 1932, volume XIII, p. 156. In the first place, reprisals are only justifiable if undertaken in reply to a definitely illegal act. In the present case, His Majesty's Government have not refused to carry out article VII, and the difficulties arise solely from the fact that the parties have not been able to agree as to the proper means of carrying it out. It would thus seem difficult in any event to establish an actual breach. Secondly, reprisals must be preceded by a request for redress which must have proved unavailing; and it would seem reasonable to say that, having regard to the developments which have occurred since the war regarding the pacific settlement of international disputes, it could be argued that definite reprisals would scarcely be justified at the present time without due attempt having first been made to obtain an arbitral decision in the matter. The Guatemalan Government have made no request for arbitration. Thirdly, the reprisals must be proportionate to the offence. In the present case, seeing that the main object of the Convention was the establishment of the boundary; that the boundary was, in fact, indicated as to its terminal and key points with definite certainty, its actual demarcation on the ground only being left for future determination; and having regard also to the vague and uncertain wording of article VII, it would seem at least questionable whether a refusal to agree the final demarcation of the boundary on the mere ground that article VII had not as yet been fulfilled, would be a reasonable and proportionate measure of retaliation (even if the failure to fulfil could be regarded as a definite breach). To a considerable extent, however, the question of the justifiability of the action of the Guatemalan Government is bound up with the merits of their contention that the boundary settlement involved a cession of territory on the part of Guatemala, for which article VII was intended as a compensation. This matter is discussed below.

17. Before leaving this part of the subject the fact may be recalled that, as mentioned in paragraph 6 above, the Guatemalan Government in 1931 entered into an exchange of notes with His Majesty's Government (Paper C) recognising the establishment of the terminal points on the boundary. By so doing it may be argued that they once and for all recognised the boundary itself and are precluded from refusing to do so now. In this connexion it will be appreciated that by the Convention of 1859 the boundary is defined as being a straight line between the terminals, and demarcation on the ground is really a technical formality. The line of the boundary was in esse from the start. It is true that in a subsequent note (see paragraph 6 above) the Guatemalan Government made their acceptance of the line as unilaterally demarcated on the ground by the British engineers conditional on its approval by their own engineers; and it is also true (see footnote (*) to paragraph 6) that, when the plans of the unilaterally demarcated line were communicated to the Guatemalan Government for signature by the Guatemalan boundary commissioners, they were informed that such signature would not involve a final acceptance of the line as demarcated, this being reserved for a subsequent exchange of notes. In spite of this, it may still be possible to take the view that, although the Guatemalan Government have not recognised the actual line indicated in the British plans as correctly marking the straight line between the terminals involved, yet they must be held, by virtue of the exchange of notes of 1931, to have recognised the boundary as in fact being the straight line between terminals, the correct positioning of which was definitely established by the notes. If this is so, it might be possible, if no settlement, arbitral or other, proves practicable, to treat the unilaterally demarcated line as being correct and to administer it as the boundary, it being left to the Guatemalan Government to allege an encroachment on Guatemalan territory, and in that event to discharge the burden of proving the British line to be incorrect.

1935

18. Turning now to the question of the liability of His Majesty's Government in respect of article VII, the first point which arises is whether any liability at all remains at this day. Having regard to the past history of the subject, the changed circumstances (including the existence—though not an existence for which His Majesty's Government can accept any responsibility—of the Puerto Barrios Railway, which, it is believed, does all for Guatemala that article VII was intended to do); and having regard to the efforts which His Majesty's Government have made to discharge their liability, culminating in the recent offer made to the Guatemalan Government, which was rejected (see paragraph 14 above), it might be argued that the article is now obsolete and that no liability now remains. But in estimating this possibility it is necessary to keep in mind the nature of the correspondence which has taken place between the two Governments during the last two years. In view of this correspondence, it would probably be somewhat difficult for His Majesty's Government to take the line now that they could recognise no liability at all, unless, indeed, the rejection of their last offer places them in a position to do this, or unless, alternatively, they are able to substantiate the contention which they have hitherto put forward that any scheme for the carrying out of article VII must redound to the benefit of both parties and not to that of Guatemala alone. If this last contention were sound, the past history of the case would afford strong evidence that no scheme fulfilling this condition is, in fact, practicable at the present date unless, indeed, it were on the lines of the recent proposal of His Majesty's Government, which Guatemala rejected. This in its turn would affect the question (see paragraph 16 above) of the right of Guatemala to hold up the boundary settlement, for if it were established that any scheme for carrying out article VII must benefit both parties, there would be strong ground for arguing that, so long as His Majesty's Government do not refuse to carry out article VII and do not unreasonably reject suitable schemes for implementing it, Guatemala would have no right to refuse to recognise the boundary.

19. It would seem, therefore, that the whole case turns largely on the merits of the Guatemalan argument that, in spite of its wording, article VII was really intended only as compensation to Guatemala for a cession of territory, and that, in consequence, the mere fact that no scheme can be found which will be to the benefit of both parties is not necessarily conclusive as to the obligation of His Majesty's Government; that in return for the boundary settlement something is due from His Majesty's Government, so that, if circumstances make it impossible to devise a scheme coming within the strict terms of the article, then some alternative concession must be made by His Majesty's Government with a view to affording Guatemala the necessary quid pro quo, and that in the meantime the recognition of the boundary can properly be held up. If this contention were sound, it would presumably not be a sufficient reply to point to the Puerto Barrios Railway as, in fact, fulfilling the objects of article VII so far as Guatemala was concerned, since this railway was constructed by Guatemala alone and did not constitute any consideration moving from the British side.

20. A memorandum is attached (Paper E) in which the question is discussed whether or not the boundary settlement did, in fact, involve a disguised cession of territory to the Crown. From this it will be seen that British Honduras was undoubtedly in possession of territory claimed by Guatemala and once part of Guatemala or of the former Spanish Empire, but which, by the boundary settlement was declared to be (and at all material times to have been) British territory. The fact that Guatemala claimed the territory does not, of course, necessarily mean that the claim was a good one, or that a good British title thereto had not, in fact, been acquired by prescription, in such a manner as to be defensible even if no treaty settlement had supervened. There is, indeed, some ground for thinking that this may have been the case and that a good British title under international law may already have been in existence at the time of the Convention of 1859. On the other hand, it is evident that this title was not certain, while it is, in any event, clear (and this was the opinion given by the Law Officers in their second report in 1884) that Guatemala did not recognise any such title and could not have been brought to agree to the boundary articles without something further which could be regarded as affording her the necessary compensation. A question arises here how far, having regard to the clear and unconditional wording of the Convention and the absence of any expressed connexion between the boundary settlement and article VII (indeed, the boundary articles expressly purported to define the pre-existing boundary), it would be open to the Guatemalan Government to give evidence of the circumstances in which the Convention was made so as, e.g., to vary its apparently plain meaning. The Permanent Court of International Justice has held that where the meaning of a treaty is plain on the face of it, regard will not be had to surrounding circumstances or preparatory documents. This view is, however, much less likely to be taken by a tribunal deciding the matter ex aequo et bono (if it were decided to refer the case to such a tribunal). In any event, such evidence might in this case perhaps be held to be admissible under an exception analogous to those which obtain in English law and which permit evidence of, e.g., collateral terms, or of surrounding circumstances in order to show the true nature of an agreement. A further point which would support the Guatemalan contention is the fact that the road or waterway which was to be constructed under article VII was to be wholly within Guatemalan territory. It is difficult to see how such a road or waterway could ever have been of any real benefit to British Honduras. (On the other hand, it does seem that the British negotiator, Mr. Wyke (see his despatch attached to Paper E) expected some reciprocal benefit.) The Guatemalan Government have also consistently and from the start put forward the view of article VII, as compensation for a cession of territory, and although the contention was, on the British side, strenuously rejected in the correspondence dealt with in paragraph 8 above (Paper A), this denial is probably to be accounted for on the same ground as the refusal of the British negotiator of the Convention of 1859 to allow any mention of a cession of territory to be inserted into the Convention (i.e., pre-occupation about the possible effect on the United States in connexion with the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty—see Paper E).

21. If the court came to the conclusion that something was still due from His Majesty's Government, it seems very likely, having regard to all the circumstances, that it would consider that liability was best discharged by a payment of money. It is a matter of considerable difficulty to estimate what sum might be awarded. On the one hand, the court might take the view that His Majesty's Government had made considerable efforts in the face of great difficulties to carry out the article; and in view of the failure of the Guatemalan Government to ratify the abortive Convention of 1863 or to make any mention of the matter between the end of the last century and the present day, and of the changed circumstances generally (including the existence of the Puerto Barrios Railway), it might consider that the liability of His Majesty's Government could be discharged by a comparatively small payment. On the other hand, it is possible that the court might direct a substantial payment, and, in this connexion, that it might be guided by the sum of £50,000, mentioned in the Convention of 1863.

22. Sir Samuel Hoare would be grateful if you would take the above matters into your consideration, and if you would furnish him with your opinion on the following questions:—

- (1) Are the Guatemalan Government justified in refusing to agree the final demarcation of the boundary, pending a satisfactory settlement of the question of article VII of the Convention of 1859? (It is realised that the answers to this question may depend in part on the answer to question (2), particularly as regards point (2) (i)—and see end of paragraph 18 above.) Could it be argued that by reason of the exchange of notes of 1931 (Paper C) the Guatemalan Government have in fact already recognised the boundary and are precluded from refusing to do so now unless they are prepared to challenge the correctness of the British unilateral demarcation (see paragraph 17 above)?

(2) Are His Majesty's Government still under any liability in respect of article VII, and, if so, what is the nature and extent of that liability? In your reply to this question would you give your views on the following points:—

- (i) Are His Majesty's Government justified in the view they have hitherto advanced that any scheme to implement article VII must be to the benefit of both parties? Alternatively, is the Guatemalan contention correct that this article (at any rate at the present date) comports obligations on His Majesty's Government alone? (In this connexion, see paragraph 13 above.)
- (ii) Are His Majesty's Government correct in thinking that they are under no obligation to contribute towards the cost of the Puerto Barrios Railway, as such?
- (iii) Would it be possible for His Majesty's Government to contend that the Puerto Barrios Railway achieves the objects which article VII was intended to fulfil and that the article is, in consequence, discharged or obsolete and that His Majesty's Government no longer have any obligations thereunder (see paragraph 19 above)?
- (iv) Do you consider that an arbitral tribunal deciding the matter ex aequo et bono, if it came to the conclusion that His Majesty's Government were under some liability in respect of article VII, and that such liability was now unilateral in character, would direct it to be discharged by a money payment; and, if so, what sum might such a tribunal be expected to award having regard to all the circumstances of the case?

23. Sir Samuel Hoare would also be glad of any observations which you may feel disposed to offer generally on the case.

I have, &c.
J. M. TROUTBECK.

List of Papers.

Paper A.—Printed correspondence respecting the survey of the boundary line between Guatemala and British Honduras; and the construction of a road between Guatemala and the Atlantic coast. (1859-85.) (Confidential 5490.)

Paper B.—Map (not reproduced).

Paper C.—Exchange of notes between His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and the Government of Guatemala respecting the boundary between British Honduras and Guatemala. (Cmd. 4050.)

Paper D.—Memorandum on the efforts which have been made to fix the boundary between British Honduras and Guatemala. (A 2271/56/8/1933.)

Paper E.—Memorandum on the origins of the United Kingdom-Guatemalan Boundary Convention of 30th April, 1859. (Annex No. I.)

Report.

1. We are unable to read the Convention of 1859 as if it were composed of two independent and unrelated parts. The high contracting parties might by their conduct treat the obligations under one part of the Convention as satisfied, leaving the other part still to be performed, but failing such a treatment of the subject matter of the contract, the Convention must in our opinion be performed in its entirety by each party as a condition of the fulfilment of his obligations by the other party. Assuming, therefore, article VII still to be in force, we are of opinion that the Guatemalan Government are justified in refusing to agree the final demarcation of the boundary until His Majesty's Government are ready and willing to perform their obligation under article VII of the Convention. So far as concerns the contention that the Guatemalan Government have, in fact, already recognised the boundary and that, therefore, nothing under that part of the Convention remains to be done, we think the argument is unsound. The notes exchanged in 1931 only relate to the terminal points marked by the concrete monuments. The agreement then reached represents an important step in the demarcation of the boundary, but the intermediate line still remains to be surveyed, and agreed by commissioners appointed by each party. The British unilateral demarcation of the boundary is not, in our opinion, binding ipso facto on the Guatemalan Government, though no doubt it may at any time be accepted by Guatemala as fixing the boundary.

2. We think it difficult to contend in view of the recent correspondence to which we are referred that His Majesty's Government are now under no liability in respect of article VII. The long lapse of time coupled with the change in circumstances is perhaps the strongest argument in support of such a contention. The correspondence, however, of 1933 is inconsistent with the view that either party regarded article VII as spent and no longer in force. We are satisfied that no tribunal would hold His Majesty's Government freed from all obligation under article VII. On the other hand, we think the right view would be to hold the Guatemalan Government under an obligation in terms of article VII, that is to say, to act conjointly with His Majesty's Government. The construction of the railway by the Guatemalan Government at their own expense may make them unwilling to incur further expense in constructing a road which would now be useless, or at any rate an extravagant liability so far as they are concerned. It is unlikely, however, that they will adopt this attitude as long as they are expecting or requiring His Majesty's Government to come to some arrangement, and in these circumstances while we think His Majesty's Government are under no obligation to contribute towards the cost of the railway as such, a money payment by His Majesty's Government on the footing of the railway already constructed being the easiest communication between the Atlantic seaboard and the Capital of Guatemala would, in effect, be a discharge of the contractual obligation. Such a solution would be in our opinion much more likely to emerge from a reference to an arbitral tribunal deciding the matter ex aequo et bono, than a decision that article VII had been satisfied by the construction of the railway by the Guatemalan Government alone. This last view, it may be observed, is not the view presented by His Majesty's Government in the notes passing in 1933.

It is the case that article VII refers to the benefit to the commerce of England which will result from the building of the road. Mr. Wyke's despatch of the 30th April, 1859, suggested that one benefit would be the diversion of trade from American vessels on the Pacific to British vessels on the Atlantic. So far as British Honduras is concerned, it is not clear what benefit he contemplated, and it is not right, in our opinion, to suggest that a benefit to British Honduras was an essential element in the proposal. The words in the Convention on this matter seem to us rather to recite a belief or hope than to state a condition of performance. The fact that it is conceived that no benefit would ensue to British commerce from the construction of a road, in our opinion affords no ground for releasing His Majesty's Government from their obligation under article VII.

We have no material on which to base an estimate of the amount of any payment which such an arbitral tribunal would be likely to fix. We find it difficult to think of arguments which would justify a less sum than was thought proper in 1863, and there is at least one argument, namely, the increase of cost of road works as compared with 1863, which would point to a larger sum than £50,000. An offer of £50,000 would probably be sufficiently tempting to the Guatemalan Government to bring about a settlement.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
D. B. SOMERVELL.

Law Officers' Department,
October 28, 1935.

Annex No. I.

[A 3991/430/8]

The Origins of the United Kingdom-Guatemalan Boundary Convention of April 30, 1859.

It appears that under a treaty between the United Kingdom and Spain of 1783 His Majesty's Government obtained certain rights of occupation for the purpose of cutting, loading and carrying away logwood in the territory between "the Rivers Wallis or Belize and the Rio Hondo." By a further treaty of 1786 this territory was extended southward to the River Sibun, but still only for the purpose of cutting wood.

1935

British occupation further south beyond the River Sibun as far as the River Sarstoon (i.e., the boundary laid down in the Convention of 1859), did not take place until after the treaty of 1786, but there appears to be considerable doubt as to when the British claim was in practice extended to this further area. It can be safely assumed that the process was gradual and that any claim which may have arisen to sovereignty over the territory to the south of the River Sibun must have come into being after actual penetration by the logwood cutters had taken place. One thing is clear; that in 1859 Her Majesty's Government had no treaty claim to this territory.

A further complication was introduced into the negotiations by the Bulwer-Clayton Treaty of the 19th April, 1850, between the United Kingdom and the United States. One of the terms of this treaty was that neither party should occupy, or fortify, or colonise, or assume or exercise any dominion over any part of Central America. The United States Government apparently contended that the ancient kingdom of Guatemala formed part of Central America for the purpose of this treaty. The territory between the Sibun and Sarstoon Rivers, however, had been included in the ancient kingdom of Guatemala, and the United States Government accordingly claimed that Great Britain was by the terms of the Bulwer-Clayton Treaty bound to withdraw from the district in question, without reference to whether her title to it was good or bad.

Reference is made to the difficulties above referred to in the instructions sent to the British negotiator Mr. Wyke on the 16th February, 1859, with regard to the conclusion of the 1859 Convention (see first item in correspondence in Paper A). In the same despatch a draft convention was enclosed for the guidance of the United Kingdom negotiator. This contained a definition of the frontier, and an outline of the procedure which was to be adopted for its demarcation, but nothing whatever on the lines of article VII of the Convention as finally adopted.

The reasons for the inclusion of this article will be found in Mr. Wyke's report on the negotiations (attached hereto—Annex IA). It will be seen that Mr. Wyke explained that the Guatemalan Government, and more especially the President, maintained that they had definite rights to the greater portion of the territory at that time actually occupied by British wood-cutters. Mr. Wyke added that since Her Majesty's Government had no legal right beyond that of actual possession he was bound to offer some compensation to the Guatemalans. He had been instructed, however, in the despatch above referred to, not to accept any part of the proposed boundary as a cession from the Republic of Guatemala, since by so doing Her Majesty's Government would be violating the stipulations of the Bulwer-Clayton Treaty. In this circumstance Mr. Wyke explained that he hit on a plan for getting round the difficulty. This plan was the inclusion of the present article VII, and the Convention was thereupon at once accepted by the Guatemalans. Mr. Wyke expressed the hope that he had not culpably exceeded his instructions in obtaining what he considered was a double advantage (that is to say, a conclusion of the boundary question and trading advantages for the settlement of Belize) at the price of a comparatively trifling sacrifice. In a subsequent despatch his action was approved, with the concurrence of the Colonial Office, and the Convention was duly ratified in the form in which it now stands.

Annex No. IA.

(No. 27.)
My Lord,

Guatemala, April 30, 1859.

In my despatch No. 20 of the 31st ultimo I pointed out the difficulty I should have to overcome in negotiating with this Government the Convention for settling the limits between the settlement of Belize and this republic, and a draft of which was enclosed in your Lordship's despatch No. 5 of the 16th February last.

This difficulty has proved even greater than I anticipated, owing to the constant opposition of the President, General Carrera, who would not hear of unconditionally surrendering what he called his country's rights to the greater portion of the territory now actually occupied by our wood-cutters in the settlement.

As in point of fact we have no legal right, beyond that of actual possession, to the tract of country between the Rivers Sibun and Sarstun, which formerly belonged to the ancient Kingdom of Guatemala, this opposition was the more difficult to be overcome, without agreeing to give them some compensation, which, on the other hand, would have been contrary to your Lordship's instructions, whereby I was desired not to accept any part of the proposed boundary as a cession from the Republic of Guatemala, as by doing so we should be violating the stipulations of the Bulwer-Clayton Treaty.

Under these circumstances, it became evident that my negotiations must fail, unless I could hit on a plan whereby they would find some inducement for agreeing to my terms, and which should at the same time not be open to the objection above alluded to of receiving, as it were, a title to any part of the British occupation from this republic.

Now, as the commerce of this State with Belize and the Atlantic Coast generally has been falling off rapidly of late years, owing to the communication with the Pacific Coast being so much easier from the existence of a good carriage road between this city and the port of San José, it struck me that the compensation they claimed might in some sort be afforded if we aided them in the construction of a practicable cart road to the port of Izabal, on the Atlantic Coast, whereby the old commercial relations with Belize would be renewed, and both contracting parties mutually benefited without either appearing to receive a favour from the other.

As we are rapidly losing the carrying trade of this republic, which the American steamers on the Pacific and the Panamá Railway are depriving us of, it becomes, of course, important, if possible, to turn the course of trade again into its old channels, and when by so doing we could at the same time succeed in acquiring a good and legal title to our settlement of Belize, the want of which at present forms our weakest point in the whole Central American question, it appeared to me, I should be justified in somewhat exceeding my instructions if by so doing I could bring about so positive a good.

Such being the actual state of the case, I did not hesitate to accept this responsibility, and, by so doing, I at last succeeded in getting this Government to accept the Convention word for word and without a single alteration, on the condition that an additional article should be added to it, whereby both contracting parties agree conjointly to use their best efforts by the construction of a cart road for re-establishing the ancient communication between this capital and the Atlantic coast near Belize, whereby the commerce of England will benefit on the one hand, and the prosperity of that portion of this republic be materially increased on the other.

Thus modified, the Convention was this day signed by Don Pedro de Aycinena and myself, at the same time that its ratification by this Government was handed to me by him.

I have herewith the honour to enclose said Convention, and I trust in signing it as it stands, that I shall not have incurred your Lordship's displeasure for having so far exceeded my instructions, when by so doing I consider that I have obtained a double advantage at the price of, comparatively speaking, a trifling sacrifice.

As I come home by the same packet that brings this despatch, I shall have the honour of communicating personally to your Lordship all further details with reference to this matter which it is necessary that you should be informed of.

I have, &c.

(Signed) CHARLES LENNOX WYKE.

The Right Hon.
The Earl of Malmesbury, &c.,
Foreign Office.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

[W 1563/1563/98/1935]

No. 5.

[February 20, 1935]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Diplomatic privilege and immunity for officials of International Labour
Office.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, November 5, 1934.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to request that you will be so good as to favour him with your opinion on the question whether the officials of the International Labour Office, including its representatives in England, are entitled to diplomatic privilege and immunity. The consideration of this question may be prefaced by the general proposition that where diplomatic privileges and immunities (which include, of course, immunity from criminal proceedings) are dependent on the terms of a treaty or other international instrument, it is necessary that the language of the instrument, on its true construction, should extend without reasonable doubt to the persons in respect of whom the claim arises.

2. Article 7, paragraph 4, of the Covenant of the League of Nations (which formed Part I of the Treaty of Versailles) provides that "representatives of the members of the League and officials of the League when engaged on the business of the League shall enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities." The International Labour Office was also set up under the Treaty of Versailles, Part XIII, articles 387-427; but these articles contain no provision conferring any diplomatic status on the officials of the International Labour Office. Such status, if it exists at all, must, therefore, derive from the terms of article 7, paragraph 4, of the Covenant, and if officials of the International Labour Office, when engaged on the business of the International Labour Office can, for the purposes of article 7, paragraph 4, be regarded as "officials of the League engaged on the business of the League," they would appear to be entitled, in the territories of all the members of the League, to whatever privileges and immunities are conferred by this provision.

3. It should be mentioned that there has never been any question but that the members of the ordinary League Secretariat itself are entitled to these privileges and immunities, and the same applies to the representatives of the Secretariat in London and elsewhere. There has, it is true, been discussion as to what class of persons employed in or by the Secretariat can be regarded as actual "officials" and "engaged on the business of the League" within the meaning of article 7, paragraph 4, of the Covenant and as to whether, and if so to what extent, the fact (where it is the case) that the officials are British subjects affects the position. The point on which your opinion is requested, however, is whether, assuming that certain officials of the League Secretariat are entitled to diplomatic privileges and immunities, officials of the same standing in the International Labour Office can be regarded as being on a similar footing in this respect. The International Labour Office, it should be observed, is housed in a separate building from the League Secretariat, and has a secretariat of its own. Like the League Secretariat, it also has representatives in London. The position in regard to International Labour Office representatives in London is that it has never been decided how far they have any right to claim such diplomatic privileges as, e.g., freedom from arrest and from process in the courts, and relief from income-tax on their emoluments, foreign remittances, &c. So far as income-tax is concerned, it is understood that, in practice, the representatives of the office in London have not been asked to pay tax on their official salaries.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

4. The question whether officials of the International Labour Office are to be regarded as entitled to diplomatic privileges under article 7, paragraph 4, of the Covenant seems to depend on the three following factors:—

(i) The first is whether officials of the International Labour Office can be regarded as being officials of the League at all. This question would, in its turn, appear to be dependent on whether the International Labour Office is an organ of the League or whether, on the other hand, it is an independent body analogous in its own sphere to the League Secretariat, but not actually an organ of the League of Nations. If it appears that the International Labour Office is, in fact, an organ of the League, it would seem to follow that its officials must, in a general sense, be officials of the League, even though the Labour Office may enjoy a considerable measure of autonomy with a machinery and procedure largely independent of the ordinary League Secretariat.

(ii) Nevertheless, although the officials of the Labour Office may, by reason of the fact that the Labour Office is an organisation of the League, be officials of the League, it may still be the case that they are not officials of the League within the meaning of article 7, paragraph 4. The validity of this contention would depend upon showing that the term "officials of the League" in that provision must be understood as applying to officials of the ordinary League Secretariat only.

(iii) Further, it may also be that the words "business of the League" in article 7, paragraph 4, are to be understood as applying only to the business discharged through the Secretariat and not to the business discharged through the Labour Office, as such. (Here it must be noticed that, since article 7, paragraph 4, contains no commas, the words "when engaged on the business of the League" qualify not only the phrase "officials of the League" but also the term "representatives of the members of the League" to whom diplomatic privileges are also accorded "when on the business of the League.") On the above basis it would follow that, although officials of the Labour Office may be officials of the League, they would not, even when discharging their official duties, be engaged on the business of the League within the meaning of article 7, paragraph 4, and would not, therefore, be entitled to any diplomatic privileges. It is proposed to begin by discussing the first of the above questions, after which the remaining two, which are largely interdependent, will be considered together.

5. The first question is whether officials of the Labour Office are officials of the League at all, and this depends on whether the Labour Office is a League organ or not. In this connexion it is to be noticed in the first place that article 23 (a) of the Covenant of the League, without setting up any specific labour organisation, provides that the members of the League "will endeavour to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labour for men, women and children both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and for that purpose will establish and maintain the necessary international organisations." The manner in which the members of the League of Nations fulfil this undertaking in the Covenant is through the Labour Organisation, which includes the International Labour Office, set up under Part XIII, articles 387-427, of the Treaty of Versailles. These articles are annexed hereto (Paper A). As a matter of history, it must be noticed that the Labour Organisation came into practical being before the ordinary Secretariat of the League, and that at its first session it was, as a result of a special resolution of the Supreme Council of the Peace Conference, attended by two States (Germany and Austria) which were not then members of the League, though they afterwards became such. This latter point is referred to further in paragraph 6 (v) below. In view of the provisions of article 425 of the Treaty of Versailles, however, the fact that the Labour Organisation came into being before the League Secretariat does not seem to be of much significance, seeing that article 425 specifically provides for this contingency and emphasises the intended connexion between the two bodies.

6. The provisions of Part XIII of the Treaty of Versailles principally to be noticed in connexion with the present question are as follows:—

(i) The Preamble to Part XIII begins by reciting "Whereas the League of Nations has for its object the establishment of universal peace, and such a peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice." It goes on to state that existing conditions of labour are a peril to the peace of the world and require improvement and that certain provisions have accordingly been agreed upon.

[13464]

N

(ii) The first of these provisions (article 387) states that—

“A permanent organisation is hereby established for the promotion of the objects set forth in the Preamble.

“The original members of the League of Nations shall be original members of this organisation, and hereafter membership of the League of Nations shall carry with it membership of the said organisation.”

(iii) The next article (article 388) states the nature of this organisation, which is to consist of (1) a General Conference of Representatives of the Members, and (2) an International Labour Office controlled by the Governing Body described in article 393.

(iv) From the foregoing provisions it would seem permissible to conclude that the organisation in question, including the International Labour Office, is an organisation established for the promotion of the objects set forth in the Preamble to Part XIII, which are there stated to be the objects of the League and which are in substance the same as those of article 23 (a) of the Covenant. In consequence, it would appear that the organisation is a League organisation. Any doubts on the matter would in any event appear to be set at rest by the wording of the next relevant article (article 392) which specifically states that—

“The International Labour Office shall be established at the seat of the League of Nations as part of the organisation of the League.”

(v) It seems nevertheless desirable to draw attention to certain features in the Constitution of the International Labour Office which, but for the clear wording of article 392, would tend to make it doubtful whether the Office can be regarded as “part of the organisation of the League.” For instance, the second paragraph of article 387 (quoted in sub-paragraph (ii) above) appears on one view to distinguish between membership of the League and membership of the Labour Organisation as though they were entirely distinct and separate bodies, having, however, similar membership; and it is to be noticed that, in point of fact, although all members of the League are members of the Labour Organisation set up under articles 387 and 388, there are or have been countries members of the latter but not of the League. For instance, the United States, though not a member of the League, has just announced her adhesion to the Labour Organisation.⁽¹⁾ This does not, however, seem to be of any conclusive significance. The fact that an institution is a League organ does not necessarily mean that its membership need be confined to members of the League, or that non-members may not be permitted to join it. The fact, therefore, that some members of the Labour Organisation are not members of the League may afford some evidence in favour of the view that the Labour Office is not a League organ; but the evidence is not conclusive, and is, indeed, weakened by the fact that at any rate all members of the League are members of the Labour Office. It may be, of course, that, even if, in the territories of members of the League, officials of the International Labour Office can claim diplomatic status, they could not do so in the territories of members of the Labour Organisation who are not also members of the League and are not, in consequence, bound by article 7, paragraph 4, of the Covenant. This result would not, however, affect this country, which is a member of the League. Moreover, it might well be argued that countries which become members of the Labour Organisation must in the circumstances be regarded as having tacitly assented to any special status attaching to the officials of the International Labour Office; and that if they choose to participate in and benefit from the activities of the organisation on the same terms as other members, they cannot at the same time expect to escape the burdens which the latter have to bear.

⁽¹⁾ It has never been decided how far this practice is strictly legal or consistent with the terms of article 387 of the Treaty of Versailles. A note on the subject, prepared in the Foreign Office, is attached as Paper B. A recent example of the same thing is Japan's declaration of her intention to remain a member of the Labour Organisation after her notice to secede from the League takes effect. On the other hand, Germany, in leaving the League of Nations, apparently also intends to cease being a member of the Labour Organisation.

See also the Advisory Opinion of the Permanent Court of International Justice in the case of the Free City of Danzig and the International Labour Organisation. Series B, No. 18. The majority of the court refrained from dealing with this question, but Judge Anzilotti deals with it in his dissenting opinion.

(vi) Again, articles 409, 411 and 420 all provide for direct dealings between Governments and the Governing Body of the International Labour Office and not communication through the Secretary-General of the League.

(vii) Similar doubts might also be raised by the wording of paragraph 1 of article 427 (section II of Part XIII) which states that—

“The high contracting parties, recognising that the well-being of industrial wage earners is of supreme international importance, have framed, in order to further this great end, the permanent machinery provided for in Section I and associated⁽²⁾ with that of the League of Nations.”

7. These points hardly seem, however, to afford sufficient ground for ignoring the clear words of article 392 (quoted in paragraph 6 (iv) above); and the statement therein made, that the International Labour Office is part of the organisation of the League, is confirmed by other articles of Part XIII, which, while indicating that the International Labour Office is to a great extent an organism separate from the League Secretariat, and broadly in control of its own policy, also show that it has a very definite connexion with the latter, especially in financial matters. Thus article 399, after providing that members of the Labour Organisation are to pay the expenses of their own delegates, goes on to state that—

“All the other expenses of the International Labour Office . . . shall be paid to the Director (of the International Labour Office) by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations out of the general funds of the League.

“The Director shall be responsible to the Secretary-General of the League for the proper expenditure of all monies paid to him in pursuance of this article.”

In this connexion, it is to be noticed that the Secretariat of the League and the International Labour Office have a common budget, in the sense (a) that members do not make separate payments in respect of each organisation, but one single payment, being their contribution to the League of Nations as a whole; and (b) that the payments to be made to the International Labour Office are appropriated each year out of this single fund by the Assembly of the League.

8. The following points may also be noticed:—

(i) Under article 393 the Council of the League of Nations is given the duty of deciding “any questions as to which are the members (of the Labour Organisation) of chief industrial importance.” The relevancy of this is that eight of the twelve persons representing Governments on the Governing Body of the International Labour Office are nominated by the members of the Labour Organisation which are of chief industrial importance.

(ii) A variety of functions are also allotted to the Secretary-General of the League, emphasising the latter's integral connexion with the International Labour Office. Under article 398 he is to give his assistance to the International Labour Office when required. Under articles 405 and 407 he is made responsible for circulating any convention or recommendation adopted by the General Conference of the Labour Organisation. Article 406 also provides that International Labour Office conventions are to be registered by the Secretary-General. Under article 412 he is charged with the duty of nominating, upon the application of the Governing Body, the Commissions of Enquiry, to which are to be referred any complaints that the provisions of any convention are not being effectively observed. (On the other hand, the panel from which such commissions are to be constituted is partly controlled by the Governing Body, which has a right of scrutiny and rejection in regard to all persons to serve on the panel.) The Secretary-General is also (under article 415) made the channel of communication between any such commission and the Governments concerned in the complaint.

(iii) The provisions of Part XIII, dealing with the settlement of disputes by reference to the Permanent Court of International Justice and the provisions of article 426 appear further to emphasise the connexion between the Labour Organisation and the League. The same may be said of article 422, which requires that any amendment of Part XIII shall be ratified by the States whose representatives compose the Council of the League.

9. Even if, however, the position were that the International Labour Office was completely unconnected with the ordinary League Secretariat and with the ordinary League machinery of Council and Assembly, the point would seem to be irrelevant, having regard to the explicit terms of article 392, constituting the International Labour Office a part of the organisation of the League, and it would appear that the general conclusion to be drawn from all the relevant provisions is that the International Labour Office, though in many respects independent, is none the less a League organ.

⁽²⁾ Not italics in original.

10. Two arguments of a general character have been advanced against the adoption of this view, besides those founded on the doubts as to the true interpretation of certain articles of Part XIII of the Treaty of Versailles, referred to in paragraph 6 above. In the first place, it is urged that, whereas in the case of the officials of the League Secretariat itself the Council and Assembly of the League can exercise control and see that the privileges and immunities accorded are not abused, no such control can be exercised over the International Labour Office, which, except as regards financial matters and such other specific matters as have been noticed above, is virtually autonomous. In other words, it is said that, although, technically, the International Labour Office may be a League organ, it is not an organ over which the League, acting through its constituent bodies—the Council and Assembly—can exercise any control except in a very restricted sphere. This argument assumes that all the organs of the League must necessarily be under one and the same central and unified control, but it is not clear on what this assumption is based. In point of fact, there is due control in regard to the International Labour Office through its Governing Body, which, under article 393 of the Treaty of Versailles, consists of representatives of the Governments who are members of the Labour Organisation and of certain other persons. Further, under article 400, any such Government may make suggestions for placing any given matter on the agenda for the next conference: the agenda being settled by the Governing Body.

11. It has also been suggested that article 392 of the Treaty of Versailles (see paragraph 6 (iv) above) is not conclusive, inasmuch as the fact that an institution is "part of the organisation of the League" does not necessarily make it an organ of the League, and that in this connexion a distinction must be drawn between the League stricto sensu, i.e., the member States working through Assembly, Council and Secretariat, and the League lato sensu, as including connected but semi-independent bodies, such as the International Labour Office and the Permanent Court. There is ground for thinking, however, that the distinction sought to be drawn is an unreal one in this connexion, affecting only the machinery by which the institution works, and not its actual status and position. In theory there might have been created, all as organs of the League, a number of institutions totally unconnected in their ordinary everyday working, and related only in that they were all organs of the same basic institution.

12. On the assumption that the International Labour Office is in fact an organ of the League, and its officials in consequence officials of the League in the general sense of the term, the question still remains (see paragraph 4 (ii) and (iii) above) whether they are "officials of the League," and "engaged on the business of the League," within the actual meaning of article 7, paragraph 4, of the Covenant. The argument that they are not, may be developed as follows. Bearing in mind the principle enunciated in the opening paragraph of this reference that, where a right to diplomatic privilege depends on the terms of a treaty, that right must, on the true construction of the treaty, be shown to extend without reasonable doubt to the persons in respect of whom it is claimed, it may be said that in the present case a natural presumption arises that article 7, paragraph 4, was only intended to apply to officials of the ordinary League Secretariat engaged on the business of the Secretariat, i.e., the ordinary business of the League as popularly understood. This presumption, it may be argued, arises because article 7, paragraph 4, figures in the Covenant and the Covenant only, and the Covenant was, in this connexion, concerned with the creation of the League as ordinarily understood, the Labour Office coming into being under separate provisions, outside the Covenant. In consequence, it may be said, if it be found that two bodies are set up separately, under different provisions, having different (though in certain respects inter-related) constitutions, and called and known by different names (one of them the League and the other the International Labour Office); and if, further, the provisions creating the former contain a stipulation conferring the right to diplomatic privilege, and those creating the latter do not; then a presumption arises that such terms as "officials of the League," "business of the League" were intended to refer only to the League as set up by the instrument containing them—the Covenant.

13. The arguments against this view may be stated as follows:—

(i) According to the ordinary canons of construction, words are to be taken in their plain and literal sense unless a clear presumption to the contrary arises, and in this case it may be thought that no such presumption does arise. Although the League, as that term is popularly understood, and the Labour Office were set up under separate sets of provisions, those provisions (see paragraph 2 above) were all originally contained, and still are contained, in a common instrument, the Treaty of Versailles, of which the Covenant forms Part I, and the constitution of the Labour Organisation Part XIII. The connexion between the two sets of provisions is moreover emphasised by article 23 (a) of the Covenant (see paragraph 5 above), in pursuance of which the Labour Organisation was created; by the Preamble to Part XIII (see paragraph 6 (i) above), which specifically refers to the League; and by article 392 of the Treaty of Versailles constituting the Labour Office an organ of the League (see paragraph 6 (iv) above). Other points of contact are set out in paragraphs 6–8 above, particularly the end of paragraph 7 and the end of paragraph 8 (iii). Treaty instruments (in this case the Treaty of Versailles), like contracts, are normally to be interpreted as a whole, and in view of this principle, and of the above-mentioned interconnexions, it may be thought that no presumption can arise that article 7, paragraph 4, was intended to apply only to the officials of, and business discharged through, the Secretariat. In that case, the words of that provision must, it would seem, be read according to their plain literal meaning as including all persons who are in fact officials of the League, and as covering the ordinary business of any organ of the League. If, moreover, it be established (see above paragraphs 5–11) that the framers of the Treaty of Versailles did, indeed, intend to constitute, and did constitute, the Labour Office an organ of the League, it may be thought that, even though the Labour Office was given a name and constitution of its own, they would have regarded the terms of article 7, paragraph 4 (of Part I of the Treaty of Versailles, the Covenant), as necessarily covering the Labour Office, and would have considered it superfluous to insert any specific provision about diplomatic privilege into Part XIII of the treaty.

(ii) Some significance may also attach to the fact that article 7, paragraph 4, does not say "officials of the League engaged on the business of the League," but "officials of the League when engaged on the business of the League," and that the phrase "when engaged on the business of the League" qualifies (see paragraph 4 (iii) above) not only "officials of the League," but in addition "representatives of members of the League," who are also accorded diplomatic privilege "when engaged on the business of the League." These facts, particularly the use of the word "when" in connexion with "representatives of the members of the League," suggest that the real intention of the phrase "when engaged, &c.," was to limit the claim to privilege to those occasions on which the persons concerned are engaged generally on "League" business, in contradistinction to private business or business other than "League" business. It is, in fact, clear that this must certainly be one effect of the phrase "when engaged, &c." (though it may not be the only one), for it is evident that there could not have been any intention to grant under article 7, paragraph 4, any general immunity to, e.g., representatives of the members of the League. It is only when in or proceeding to and from Geneva or elsewhere on "League" business that they can claim immunity by reason of this particular provision. This consideration does not, of course, necessarily exclude the possibility that the framers of article 7, paragraph 4, intended the term "League" business to be understood a priori as applying only to the ordinary business of the League, as generally and popularly understood; so that in order to claim privilege it would be necessary to show both (a) that the business was League business in that sense, and (b) that the claimant was engaged on it.

14. One further argument of a general character must be noticed against the view that officials of the International Labour Office are entitled to diplomatic privileges. This argument is based on the fact that under article 19 of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice the members of the court, when engaged on its business, are specifically stated to enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities. It is argued that the Permanent Court is at least as much a League organisation as the International Labour Office, since it was set up in consequence of article 14 of the Covenant, is financed out of the ordinary

1935

League budget "in such a manner as shall be decided by the Assembly upon the proposal of the Council" (article 33 of the Statute of the Court), and has its judges appointed by the Assembly and the Council (article 4 of the statute). In spite of this, it is urged, it was evidently not considered sufficient to rely on the provisions of article 7, paragraph 4, of the Covenant as automatically applying to the court, and a specific provision concerning diplomatic privilege was inserted in the Statute of the Court; yet in the case of the International Labour Office (which, on this view, is not to any greater extent than the court an organisation of the League) no such specific provision is to be found in its statute (i.e., in Part XIII of the Treaty of Versailles).

15. The inclusion of a special clause about diplomatic privilege in the Statute of the Court can, however, be explained on other grounds:—

(i) Article 7, paragraph 4, of the Covenant refers to "officials," and it may well have been doubted whether judges of the court could in any circumstances be regarded as "officials" at all, whereas there can be no doubt that the officials of the International Labour Office are "officials," whether they are officials of the League or not. An official is usually held to mean someone who acts under control and supervision, and receives instructions; this is not the case with the judges of the court who, in the exercise of their judicial functions, are completely independent.

(ii) Under article 392 of the Treaty of Versailles (see paragraph 6 (iv) above) it is specifically stated that the International Labour Office is an organisation of the League, and this may have been regarded as raising a necessary presumption that its officials must be officials of the League under article 7, paragraph 4, of the Covenant (see end of paragraph 13 (i) above). But no provision corresponding to article 392 exists in the Statute of the Court. In point of fact, in spite of its close connexion with the League, some doubt may well be felt as to the propriety of regarding as an organ of the League such an institution as the Permanent Court.

16. Turning to the practice of countries as regards according diplomatic privileges to officials of the International Labour Office, it is clear that by far the most important country in this respect is Switzerland, which has to bear almost the whole of the burden created by the grant of such privileges. In 1921 the Swiss Government entered into a provisional agreement with the Secretary-General of the League concerning diplomatic privilege, under which diplomatic privilege was recognised for the personnel both of the Secretariat and of the International Labour Office. This agreement is attached as Paper C. It was replaced in 1926 by a modus vivendi, which is still in force. This is attached as Paper D. It will be seen that under this agreement also no distinction is made between officials of the League Secretariat and the International Labour Office (there referred to as the B.I.T.—Bureau international du Travail), and in point of fact the officials of both organisations receive similar treatment in Switzerland. Both institutions are classed indiscriminately in the modus vivendi under the general heading of "Organismes de la Société des Nations à Genève." The only distinction drawn is between categories of officials, those of superior class receiving full privileges, while subordinate officials are accorded privileges of a limited character. This distinction applies equally to both institutions. At the time when the arrangement was entered into, there were about 150 persons in the League Secretariat enjoying full privileges, and about 190 in the International Labour Office. Of the subordinate class, the corresponding numbers were 225 and 115.

17. Enquiries were made by His Majesty's Government in 1923 of a number of governments, mainly in Central Europe, which, owing to the presence of League officials in their territory, might be expected to be especially interested in this matter. From the answers received it appeared that in France, Italy, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Austria, Greece, Bulgaria and Latvia, no distinction was made between officials of the League Secretariat and of the International Labour Office. Germany and Roumania replied that the matter had not yet been decided. The Polish Government, on the other hand, replied that officials of the International Labour Office were not regarded as being entitled to diplomatic privileges in Poland on the grounds (a) that Part XIII of the Treaty of Versailles contained no stipulation conferring diplomatic status on those officials, and (b) that they had no political mission to fulfil, their functions being purely technical in character. It is not known whether the practice of any of the above countries has changed in the decade since these enquiries were made.

18. The question whether officials of the International Labour Office stand on the same footing as those of the League Secretariat has been considered by jurists and by the Institut de Droit international. The general conclusion has been that they do.^(*)

19. I am to request that you will be so good as to take the above matters into your consideration and to state whether in your opinion the officials of the International Labour Office are entitled in the matter of diplomatic privilege to rank with officials of the League Secretariat proper for the purposes of article 7, paragraph 4, of the Covenant. Sir John Simon would also be grateful for any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to make.

I have, &c.

P. LEIGH-SMITH.

(*) E.g., Frei (De la Situation juridique des Représentants des Membres de la Société des Nations et de ses Agents, 1929, p. 34):

"Les Agents du Bureau international du Travail.—Pouvons-nous considérer les agents du B.I.T. (I.L.O.) comme des agents de la Société des Nations, et les mettre en cette qualité au bénéfice des immunités de l'article 7 du Pacte? Nous avons vu, à propos des représentants des membres de la Société, que l'on peut envisager l'Organisation internationale du Travail comme un organe de la Société des Nations. Le lien qui, en vertu du Traité de Versailles, unit l'Organisation du Travail à la Société est encore plus intime en ce qui concerne le B.I.T., puisque l'article 392 stipule expressément que le B.I.T. sera établi au siège de la Société des Nations et fera partie de l'ensemble des institutions de la Société. L'article 398 l'autorise à demander le concours de la Société des Nations dans toutes les questions à l'occasion desquelles ce concours pourra être demandé. Par conséquent, si nous avons admis que l'Organisation internationale du Travail est un organe de la Société des Nations, à plus forte raison le B.I.T. peut-il être considéré comme partie intégrante de cette dernière. Il est donc logique d'admettre, comme l'Institut de Droit international, que les agents du B.I.T., c'est-à-dire le directeur et ses collaborateurs immédiats, sont des agents de la Société, et qu'ils jouissent comme tels des privilèges et immunités diplomatiques de l'article 7 du Pacte, principe que la Suisse a admis sans difficulté dans les arrangements conclus en 1923 et 1926 avec le Secrétaire général."

The view taken by the Institut de Droit international at its Vienna session in August 1924 was as follows:—

(Annuaire de l'Institut de Droit international, vol. XXXI, pp. 107-8.)

"Sous le nom d'agents de la Société des Nations au sens de l'article 7, alinéa 4, du Pacte, il faut entendre:

"1. Les personnes qui, nommées par l'Assemblée, le Conseil, le Secrétaire général de la Société des Nations ou par ses délégués spécialement qualifiés, accomplissent, pour son compte ou sous son contrôle, des actes de fonctions de nature politique ou administrative;

"2. Le directeur du Bureau international du Travail et ses collaborateurs immédiats."

See also J. Secretan, Les Immunités diplomatiques, p. 44 et seq., passim; and Kauffman, Die Immunität der Nicht-Diplomaten.

List of Papers.

- A. Articles 387-427 of Treaty of Versailles. [Treaty Series, No. 4 (1919)]
- B. Foreign Office Library Memorandum of the 7th June, 1933 (with annex). [W 8594/38/98/1933]
- C. Agreement of 1921 between the Swiss Government and the Secretary-General of the League of Nations. [T 9384/5918/350/1923]
- D. League of Nations document of the 18th September, 1926. [W 1866/38/98/1933]

Report.

We have come to the conclusion that the officials of the International Labour Office are entitled in the matter of diplomatic privilege to rank with officials of the Secretariat of the League of Nations for the purposes of article 7, paragraph 4, of the Covenant of the League. Article 23 (a) of the Covenant imposes upon the members of the League the obligation to establish and maintain the necessary international organisations. Part XIII of the Treaty of Versailles is clearly, in our opinion, intended to provide for the establishment of one such international organisation in pursuance of the first recital in the preamble to Part XIII that the League of Nations has for its object the establishment of universal peace.

1935

When the whole of the articles contained in Part XIII of the Treaty, and particularly article 392, are read it is impossible, in our opinion, to come to any other conclusion than that the International Labour Office is a part of the League, with the result that officials of the Office are officials of the League. Inasmuch as under article 387 the International Labour Office is established for the promotion of that which is stated to be the object of the League of Nations, namely, the establishment of universal peace, the officials of the International Labour Office when engaged upon its business are, in our opinion, engaged on the business of the League.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
D. B. SOMERWELL.

*Law Officers' Department,
February 20, 1935.*

1936

THIS DOCUMENT IS THE PROPERTY OF H.M. BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office

CONFIDENTIAL.

(15053)

REPORTS BY THE
LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1936

(ii)

LIST OF REPORTS

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked 1^A, &c.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
GENERAL.
1a	Law Officers... [Treasury Solicitor]	Jan. , 1936	Convention and Protocol relating to the Immunities of State-owned Ships: as to whether ratification by His Majesty's Government will necessarily involve legislation ...	1
1b	Law Officers for Scotland [Treasury Solicitor]	Feb. 26, 1936	Ditto ...	11
1c	Attorney-General ... [Colonial Office]	May 20, 1936	Laying before Parliament before submission to The King of Orders in Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act and British Settlements Act ...	12
MOROCCO.
1	Law Officers...	Jan. 22, 1936	Application to British subjects of legislation imposing taxes in the Spanish Zone of Morocco ...	15
RUSSIA.
2a	Law Officers and Mr. Andrewes- Uthwatt [Treasury Solicitor]	July 30, 1936	Recovery by the Crown, as bona vacantia , of assets of the Moscow Industrial Bank, a destroyed Russian corporation...	99
SPAIN.
2	Attorney-General ...	Sept. 5, 1936	Applicability of the Foreign Jurisdiction Act to a civil war ...	105
3	Law Officers...	Sept. 15, 1936	Form of proclamation of neutrality to be issued in the event of decision by His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom to recognise that state of war exists between parties to civil conflict in Spain ...	111

(iii)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS)

1936

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.

Cases cited are indicated by italics.

ACT—COM.

A.

Acts of Parliament—
Admiralty Suits Act, 1868, 12.
British Settlements Act; laying before Parliament of Orders in Council under, prior to submission to the King, 12–15.
Carriage by Air Act, 1932, 7.
Crown Suits (Scotland) Act, 1856, 12.
Foreign Enlistment Act; application to civil war, 105–110.
Ditto; reference to, in proclamations of neutrality, 112.
Foreign Jurisdiction Act; laying before Parliament of Orders in Council under, prior to submission to the King, 12–15.
Supreme Court of Judicature Act; proposed amendment as regards claims v. foreign States, 9–10, 12.

Attorney-General v. Great Southern and Western Railway Company of Ireland, 8.

B.

Banks—Destruction of banking corporations by Soviet law, 100–101.
Banque Internationale de Commerce de Petrograd v. Goussakov, 102.
Belligerency—see Insurrection.
Bona vacantia—Assets of Moscow Industrial Bank held by Midland Bank, Limited, 99–104.

C.

Capitulations—
In Egypt, 56–58.
British rights in Morocco, 16–17.
Rights of other Powers in Morocco, 17.
Claims—
In respect of collision, salvage, contract, &c., relating to State-owned ships; effect of Convention and Protocol relating to Immunities of State-owned ships, 1–12.
Enforcement in the United Kingdom Courts of claims v. Dominion Governments, 8.
British claims v. Soviet Union, 99–104.
Collisions—Claims against State-owned ships, 1–12.
Companies—see also Corporations.

9161 [14996]

COR—INS.

Corporations—Assets of dissolved corporations, 99.
Courts of Law—
Suits against the Crown in tort; position under Convention and Protocol relating to Immunities of State-owned Ships, 2–3, 5.
Courts of this country have no jurisdiction over foreign sovereign States, their ships, &c., 7–8.
Enforcement in United Kingdom Courts of claims v. Dominion Governments, 8.
Customs—
Consumption duties in Morocco; see Taxes.
Tariff autonomy for Egypt, 56–58.

D.

Dominions—Position under declarations of neutrality by His Majesty's Government, 111–113.
Duff Development Company, Limited, v. the Kelantan Government, 7.
Duties—see Taxes.

E.

Egypt—Capitulations and tariff autonomy, 56–58.
Enlistment—Application of Foreign Enlistment Act to civil war in Spain, 105–110.

F.

Fenton Textile Association, Limited, v. Krassin and Others, 7.

I.

Insurrection—
Application of Foreign Enlistment Act to civil war, 105–110.
Recognition of insurgents as belligerents, 107.
Form of proclamation of neutrality by His Majesty's Government, 111–113.

a

(iv)

JUR—PRO.

J.

Jurisdiction—
In cases of claims against State-owned ships, 1-12.
Courts of this country have no jurisdiction over foreign sovereign States, 7-8.
British extra-territorial rights in Morocco, 16-17.
Rights of other Powers in Morocco, 17.

L.

Lazard Brothers and Company, Limited, v. Midland Bank, Limited, 101, 102.
Limitation of Liability—Law does not apply to the Crown, 6.
Lord Nelson—Salvage claim, 4.

M.

Marquis of Huntly—Salvage claim, 4.
Midland Bank, Limited—Assets of Moscow Industrial Bank held by, 99-104.
Mighell v. the Sultan of Johore, 7.
Morocco—British treaty rights, 16-17.
Morocco (French Zone)—Application to British subjects of legislation imposing taxes, 18, 43-49, 53-55.
Morocco (Spanish Zone)—Application to British subjects of legislation imposing taxes (consumption duties and gate taxes), 15-97.
Moscow Industrial Bank—Destroyed by Soviet law; assets held by Midland Bank, Limited, 99-104.

N.

Neutrality—
Of His Majesty's Government in civil wars, 107.
Ditto; Form of proclamation of neutrality, 111-113.
Ditto; Position of Dominions, 111-113.
Newbattle, 7.

O.

Orders in Council—Laying before Parliament before submission to the King of Orders in Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act and British Settlements Act, 12-15.

P.

Palestine—Submission to Parliament of draft Order in Council establishing a Legislative Council of Palestine, 12-15.
Parliament—Laying before Parliament of draft Orders in Council before submission to the King, 12-15.
Porto Alexandre, 7.
Property—Recovery by the Crown, as bona vacantia, of assets of Moscow Industrial Bank held by Midland Bank, Limited, 99-104.

REC—WAR.

R.

Recognition—Of insurgents as belligerents; issue of proclamation of neutrality, 107, 111-113.
Regulations, King's—Application to British subjects in Morocco of local legislation, 17-19.
Russia—see Soviet Union.
Russian and English Bank v. Baring Brothers and Company, Limited, 99, 100, 102.
Russian Bank for Foreign Trade, 101, 102.
Russo-Asiatic Bank, 101.

S.

Salvage—Claims against State-owned ships, 1-12.
Sea—Sovereignty over land reclaimed from, 117-122.
Sovereignty—Over land reclaimed from the sea, 117-122.
Soviet Union—Destruction of corporations by Soviet law, 99-104.
Spain—
Civil War; prevention of enlistment of volunteers, 105-110.
Ditto; form of proclamation of neutrality should His Majesty's Government recognise state of war, 111-113.

T.

Tariffs—see Customs.
Taxes—
Application to British subjects of legislation imposing consumption duties and gate taxes in Morocco (Spanish Zone), 15-97.
Ditto; in Morocco (French Zone), 18, 43-49, 53-55.

Treaties—

Involving legislation, 7.
Affecting British rights in Morocco, 16-17, 21-43.
Franco-German Convention, 1911 (Morocco); effect of British accession upon British treaty rights, 19-20.
Convention and Protocol relating to Immunities of State-owned ships, 1-12.
Carriage of Goods by Air Convention, 7.

V.

Vessels—Immunities of State-owned ships, 1-12.
Vessels of War—Immunities, 1-12.

W.

War—Civil war; see Insurrection.

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office

CONFIDENTIAL

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.: 1936

GENERAL

[W 647/647/50/1936]

No. 1^A.

[Treasury Solicitor]

[January 1936]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

A CONVENTION relating to the immunities of State-owned ships was signed at Brussels on the 10th April, 1926, on behalf of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and some sixteen other countries. (The official text is in the French language, but a copy of a provisional English translation is also sent.) Certain aspects of the convention as so signed rendered it not acceptable to this country, and as a result of representations made in that regard, an additional protocol was signed at Brussels in May 1934, of which a copy (in French and with English translation) is also herewith. The opinion of the Law Officers is now desired on the question whether the ratification of the convention and protocol by His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom will necessarily involve legislation.

By article 1 of the convention, ships belonging to or operated by States, cargoes belonging to them and cargoes and passengers carried on State-owned ships, as well as the States which own such ships, so far as concerns claims in respect of the operation of such ships or in respect of the carriage of such cargoes, are subject to and have the benefit of the same rules of liability and the same obligations as those applicable in the case of privately owned ships, cargoes and equipment; and by article 2, as regards such liabilities and obligations, the rules relating to the jurisdiction of the courts, actions at law and procedure shall be the same as for merchant ships and cargoes belonging to private owners.

By article 3, the provisions of articles 1 and 2 shall not apply to ships of war, State-owned yachts, survey vessels, hospital ships, auxiliary vessels, supply ships and other vessels belonging to or operated by a State and employed exclusively at the time when the claim arises on Government and non-commercial service, and such ships shall not be subject to seizure, arrest or detention by any legal process, nor in any proceedings in rem. Claimants shall, however, have the right to proceed before the appropriate court of the State, which owns or operates the ship, without that State being able to rely on its immunity, in the following cases:—

1. Actions in respect of collision or other accidents of navigation.
2. Actions in respect of salvage or in the nature of salvage, and in respect of general average.
3. Actions in respect of repairs, necessities or contracts relating to the ship.

9161 [14996]

B

The article applies the same rules to State-owned cargoes carried on board any of the above-mentioned ships, and further by its final paragraph provides that State-owned cargoes carried on board merchant ships, but for Government and non-commercial purposes shall not be subject to seizure, arrest or detention by legal process, nor to any proceedings in rem. Claims, however, relating to such cargoes in respect of collisions and perils of the sea, of salvage and of general average, as well as claims in respect of contracts, may be prosecuted before the court having jurisdiction under article 2.

By article 4, States are entitled to rely on all defences, prescriptions and limitations of liability available to private ships and their owners; any necessary adaptation or modification of the law relating to such defences, prescriptions and limitations of liability shall form the subject of a special convention, but, in the meantime, the necessary steps for the purpose may be effected by municipal legislation in conformity with the spirit and principles of the convention.

Under article 5, a diplomatic certificate is conclusive evidence that a ship or cargo falls within the terms of article 3, but only for the purpose of obtaining the discharge of any seizure, arrest or detention effected by judicial process. Article 6 provides that while the provisions of the convention are to be applied in each contracting State, there is no obligation to extend the benefit of it to non-contracting States and their subjects, and that any such extension may be made subject to a condition of reciprocity. The second paragraph of article 6, however, stipulates that nothing in the convention shall prohibit the contracting State from regulating by its own laws the rights given to its nationals before its own courts. Under article 7 in time of war a contracting State has the right to suspend the application of the convention, in which case neither ships belonging to or operated by that State, nor cargoes belonging to it, shall be subject to any arrest, seizure or detention by a foreign court of law, but claimants have the right to take proceedings before the tribunal having jurisdiction by virtue of articles 2 and 3.

Article 1 of the protocol of May 1934 provides that ships chartered by States, whether for time or voyage, provided that they are exclusively employed on governmental non-commercial service, as well as the cargoes which such ships may carry, may not be arrested or detained in any way, but this immunity in no way prejudices the other rights and remedies available to interested parties. Article 2 provides that article 3 of the convention may be relied upon by States in favour of ships belonging to or operated by them at the moment of seizure, arrest or detention, if they are employed exclusively in governmental non-commercial service. Article 3 confers upon a State the right itself to appear before the tribunal concerned to prove the status of ship or cargo by production of the diplomatic certificate referred to in article 5 of the convention. By article 5, it is agreed that nothing in article 2 of the convention limits or affects in any manner the application of the national rules of procedure in matters where the State is a party.

His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom are desirous of ratifying the convention as interpreted by the additional protocol, but, before they do so, they require to be advised whether such ratification will necessitate any and, if so, what legislation.

In order to consider this question, it will be desirable to deal separately with—

- (1) Claims made in this country against vessels owned by His Majesty's Government.
- (2) Claims made in this country against vessels owned by foreign States parties to the convention.

Dealing, therefore, in the first place, with claims against vessels owned by the Crown, the Law Officers will appreciate that, if the obligations in that regard under the convention can only be carried out by giving to foreign subjects the right to take proceedings in respect of collisions, and salvage and other matters by exactly the same procedure as applies between subject and subject, the whole question of proceedings against the Crown is at once opened up. It will be remembered that, notwithstanding the report of the Committee on Proceedings against the Crown, a copy of which is herewith (Document 3), the Cabinet did not authorise the introduction of the Bill which the committee recommended, because of the dangers which would follow if statutory right were given to the subject to sue the Crown in tort. If, in order to ratify this convention, it is necessary to legislate giving rights to foreign subjects to sue the Crown in tort and in contract in respect of claims against vessels owned by the Crown, it is inconceivable that such rights should not also be given to British subjects, with the result that the Government would find itself forced by what may be termed "a side wind" to introduce the Crown Proceedings Bill, although hitherto it has not deemed it advisable to do so. It is, therefore, necessary to see whether the convention can be fully implemented by His Majesty's Government in so far as claims against the Crown are concerned without legislation.

Turning now to the convention. The Law Officers will observe that, under the convention (article 1 and article 3), Government-owned vessels are divided into two classes, article 1 vessels being Government-owned ships engaged in ordinary commercial services and article 3 ships being ships of war, State-owned yachts, survey vessels, hospital ships, auxiliary ships, supply ships and other Government vessels employed on Government and non-commercial service.

It will also be observed that, under article 2, ships engaged on commercial services (i.e., article 1 ships) are to be subject to the same rules as to jurisdiction, rights of action and procedure as apply to privately owned merchant ships, but this article does not apply to article 3 ships in the case of which special provision is made by that article that there shall be no seizure, arrest or detention by any legal process, nor to any proceedings in rem, but that claimants shall have the right to proceed before the appropriate court in this country in cases of:—

- (a) Collision;
- (b) Salvage and general average;
- (c) Repairs, necessities and other contractual obligations; and that no claim for immunity can be made by the Crown with regard to any such claim.

The effect of article 3, therefore, would seem to be that, so long as a contracting State undertakes to accept liability in respect of the matters set out therein and provides a competent tribunal to decide any question as to such liability, the obligations under the article will be fulfilled. The exclusion from article 3 of the provisions of articles 1 and 2 must mean that the same procedure which applies in the case of claims in respect of privately owned ships and the same courts which deal with those claims need not be made available with regard to claims falling under article 3.

His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom are mainly concerned with article 3 because practically all Government-owned ships fall within that article and it is not the policy of the Government to engage its ships in purely commercial undertakings which would bring them within the provisions of article 1. There are, however, isolated cases in which fleet auxiliaries owned by the Admiralty are occasionally chartered to private oil companies either for a voyage or for a time, and to these ships when so employed article 1 would apply; but these cases are rare, and, as has been stated above, the substantial question for consideration is whether it is necessary to legislate with regard to claims to be made against the Crown in respect of vessels falling within article 3, or whether the practice which at present exists with regard to claims against the Crown is not a sufficient compliance with the convention.

Article 3, as has been stated, deals with three kinds of claim:—

- (a) Collision.
- (b) Salvage and general average.
- (c) Contractual obligations.

(a) With regard to collision claims, as counsel are aware, the practice is for the Crown to supply the name of the officer in command of the vessel against whom proceedings may be taken in respect of damage caused by his ship. As a matter of law, the claimant has a right to sue the officer committing the tort, and it is and has for a long time been the practice of the Crown to supply the officer's name and to pay any damages which may be awarded against him, subject to the limitation of liability which would be available in respect of the ship if she were privately owned. This procedure, which is well known, has been invariably adopted by foreign claimants, and no suggestion has ever been made by a foreign Government that that procedure does not afford a satisfactory method of determining any claims which its subjects may have. Indeed, in some instances, it has been treated by foreign States as a basis upon which to afford to British subjects reciprocal treatment by foreign Governments in respect of claims in respect of their Government-owned ships.

(b) So far as claims for salvage are concerned, the practice of the Crown when such a claim is made in respect of services to one of its ships is to refer the assessment of the award to the arbitration of one of the counsel practising in the Admiralty Court. This procedure follows the practice usually adopted in commercial circles at the present time, when, as is well known, most claims for salvage are dealt with on Lloyd's Form of Salvage Agreement, which contains a provision for arbitration before an arbitrator nominated by the Committee of Lloyds. It may be thought that theoretically such procedure does not give the claimant a right to pursue his claim before the appropriate court within the meaning of the article, but this procedure undoubtedly affords a machinery working on legal principles, just as much as does the machinery of a court of law. There have, however, been cases in the past where the immunity of the Crown has been waived, and claims for salvage against the Government have been allowed to proceed before the Admiralty Court (see the Lord Nelson in Edwards' Reports of Cases in Admiralty, p. 79, and the Marquis of Huntley, 3 Haggard 246), and in the unlikely event of a foreign State contending that its subjects were entitled to have a claim for salvage adjudicated upon in a court of law, it may be that the Crown could submit to the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court so that the court could deal with the claim as an ordinary salvage action or at any rate as an arbitrator.

(c) With regard to claims of a contractual nature, the procedure by petition of right is available. It is true that this procedure involves a discretion in the matter of the grant of a "fiat," but since the refusal of a fiat in any case of contract falling within the convention would involve a breach of the convention, it is thought that the possibility of such a refusal may be disregarded.

For these reasons it is submitted that so far as claims falling within article 3 are concerned, there is no necessity to legislate, and that if the existing procedure is adopted with regard to claims falling within that article, no foreign State could successfully contend that His Majesty's Government were not carrying out their international obligations under the convention.

It is now necessary to deal with claims falling within articles 1 and 2 of the convention in respect of Government-owned ships engaged on commercial services. As has been previously stated, it is only in rare cases that any Government ship would be so engaged, having regard to the existing policy of the Government not to engage in State trading. It may therefore be that even if articles 1 and 2 impose an obligation on the Government to afford to foreign subjects exactly the same rights of action and rules of procedure, as in the case of claims against privately owned ships (a matter which is discussed below) the Government would be justified in leaving the matter where it is at any rate for the present, having regard to the extreme unlikelihood of any claim being made against any Government-owned ship within article 1.

It is true that upon the face of articles 1 and 2, it would appear that a contracting State is under an obligation to impose the same rules of liability in respect of vessels falling within article 1, as are imposed on privately owned ships, and under article 2, for the purposes of enforcing such liabilities, to apply the same rules of jurisdiction, rights of action and procedure as apply in the case of claims against privately owned vessels and cargoes.

It is, however, necessary in construing article 2 to refer to article 5 of the amending protocol (Document 2). This article expressly provides that nothing in article 2 of the convention is to be taken as in any way limiting or affecting the application of rules of procedure prescribed by the municipal law with regard to proceedings to which the State is a party. It will be remembered that the amending protocol was proposed by His Majesty's Government, and in submitting article 5 for the approval of the other contracting States it was pointed out that under the municipal law of most countries claims against the State were subject to a special code of procedure, and that under article 2 as it stood there was an obligation to apply the same procedure to claims against the State as applied to private claims.

It was further stated that such a proposal could not have been contemplated by the delegates who signed the original convention, and for that reason the amending article 5 was proposed. This article was accepted by the contracting Governments. It is therefore clear that, by retaining the existing Crown procedure and not applying to claims against the Crown the same rules of procedure as apply between private parties, His Majesty's Government would not be contravening the convention.

It may, however, be said that article 2 deals not only with "procedure," but also with "rules of jurisdiction" and "rights of action" (French text, "compétence des tribunaux" and "actions en justice"), whereas article 5 of the amending protocol merely deals with procedure. It must be remembered, however, that this convention is an international document, which has to be interpreted in a number of systems of law, and that phrases such as those mentioned above are not by any means used exclusively and may be in our system of law redundant. A reference to the opening of the proceedings at the conference in 1926 shows that the original draft did not contain the expression "actions en justice," and that this term was only inserted because there was a difference of opinion on the part of members of the drafting committee as to whether that term or the term "procedure" should be used. It was ultimately decided to solve the problem by using both expressions.

With regard to the expression "jurisdiction of the courts," this, it is submitted, has no further purpose than to lay down the general principle that the tribunals determining questions of liability should be the same as in the case of private disputes. In truth, it would seem that, according to English canons, the expression "rules of procedure" covers everything that was intended to be covered by the three expressions used in article 2. The term "procedure" includes all legal remedies and everything connected with the enforcement of a right, which includes process, evidence, rules of limitation, remedies, methods of execution and the like (see Dicey, 4th edition, pp. 31, 798-9 and 801) and the determination of the particular tribunal before which a party can submit his claim (see Bar, (1), 2nd edition, p. 861).

The claims which can be made under article 1 must be either in respect of contracts, torts or salvage services. In so far as claims in contract are concerned, the existing procedure by Petition of Right would seem to fulfil the obligations contemplated by article 2. So, too, with regard to collision claims and other claims in tort, a legal right to sue the officer committing the tort exists, and so long as His Majesty's Government undertakes the burden of the proceedings and the implementing of any judgment, no complaint can, it is submitted, be made that the article is not being carried out.

With regard to salvage claims, the same questions arise as are dealt with earlier in this case relating to claims of that nature arising under article 3.

It is therefore submitted that, even in cases to which articles 1 and 2 apply, the maintenance of the existing practice and procedure would, particularly in view of article 5 of the protocol, justify ratification of the convention as modified by the amending protocol without the necessity for any further legislation.

It should also be borne in mind that if, contrary to expectations, any difficulty should arise in the future, it would be always open to His Majesty's Government to reconsider the question of legislation in the light of experience of the working of the convention.

It has, moreover, been suggested that an additional argument in support of this view may be gathered from the discussions which took place at Brussels in 1926, when the convention was under discussion. A copy of the report of the discussions upon article 2 extracted from the procès-verbal of the convention is sent herewith (Document 4). From this it will be seen that, in explaining the article and the obligation undertaken by the contracting Governments thereunder, the president says:—

"It is possible that in certain States which are determined to pay what they are acknowledged to be liable for, it may not be considered necessary to institute any special procedure if this does not exist. In other countries, in the case of debt due from the State, one imagines the inclusion of a credit in the budget or some other measures. We must leave this question to the good faith of the countries signing this convention, relying, in fact, on the feeling that they will respect their undertakings. We cannot meddle with their internal public law."

(1) Bar, L. Von, Theory and Practice of Private International Law: 2nd edition, Gillespie (1892).

It is true that this statement follows upon a reference particularly to execution, and no doubt the president had in mind the question as to how any judgment could be enforced against a State, but quite clearly the report of the discussions shows that the framers of the convention were not anticipating that it would be necessary to impose exactly the same practice and rules as apply in the case of private individuals.

Furthermore, at the end of the discussion the general feeling of the conference seems to have been summed up in the final statement of the president, a translation of which is as follows:—

“The article does not deal with the question of public law. There are two aspects in the practical application of this article. There is, first, the case of a commercial vessel belonging to a State which is the object of an action in a foreign State. In the foreign State the convention will be given its full and complete effect. The State ship will be treated as a private ship and the State interested in it will not be able to complain of that. But the situation will be different in the territory of the State which is a party to the suit. In that case, when the claimant wishes to enforce his rights, he will have to comply with the law of that State and rely on its good faith.”

The president was drawing the distinction between actions brought against a State-owned ship in a foreign court under the convention and actions brought against State-owned ships in the courts of the country to which the ship belongs, and although perhaps from the context it may be thought that he still had in mind the question of execution, the statement which he made is, in fact, wide enough to cover the general principle that where a State ship was being sued in the courts of its own country, the existing law and practice would be applied and the claimant would have to rely upon the good faith of the State in question to meet its obligation.

It may, however, be thought that if this construction is given to article 2, that article would be meaningless, but that is not so, because it would still have its full application with regard to proceedings against State ships in the courts of any country other than that to which the ship belongs.

At the same time it is not suggested that too much weight should be attached to the discussion referred to in the preceding paragraphs. It is true that, according to the principles of treaty interpretation laid down by the Permanent Court of International Justice, recourse may be had to “preparatory work” in cases where the meaning of a particular provision is not clear. But in the first place it is quite possible that the discussion in question was really confined to the sole question of execution, and that accordingly it is only in connection with that question that the discussion could be looked at for the purpose of interpreting the convention. In the second place, the court has laid down that “preparatory work should not be used for the purpose of changing the plain meaning (‘le sens naturel’) of a text,” and it may well be that an attempt to make use of the discussion in question for the purpose of interpreting the provisions of the convention in the sense suggested above might be regarded as inconsistent with this principle.

Before leaving the question of proceedings against the Crown in the courts of this country, it is perhaps desirable to consider the provisions of article 4, and, in particular, the question of the limitation of liability. Under the existing practice, the Crown effectively limits its liability by agreeing to accept the liability under a judgment against its officer up to, but only up to the extent to which it could limit its liability if the Merchant Shipping Act applied to it. It has been suggested that under the convention, the Crown would not be able to adopt this course in that the present law relating to limitation does not apply to the Crown and that, until that law is so applied, article 4 cannot be relied upon.

It is doubtful, however, whether there is very much risk in this point being taken and until it is, it is thought unnecessary to legislate upon it. The Crown is recognised by the Admiralty Court as entitled to share in a limitation fund, though not bound by the Merchant Shipping Act (see the Zoe, 1886, 11 P.B., p. 72, and the Mineral, 1919, 1 Lloyd's List Reports, p. 269). The court will also accept payment by the Admiralty in damage actions of the amount assessed as its limited liability—or rather that of its officer—and attend to the due distribution of the fund so paid in of those entitled to claim against it (see the Cyrano, 1918, folio 676).

Turning now to the question of the enforcement of the liabilities and obligations arising under the convention against foreign States and their vessels before the courts in this country, it seems clear from the dicta in such cases as Mighell v. the Sultan of Johore (1894, 1 Q.B., 149), the Porto Alexandre (1920, p. 30), and the Duff Development Company (Limited) v. the Kelantan Government (1924, A.C., 797), that as matters stand the courts in this country have no jurisdiction over foreign sovereign States, or the ships or other property owned by such States, whether engaged in commerce or not; a foreign Sovereign may submit to the jurisdiction, but the submission to be effective must take place at the time when the jurisdiction is invoked. Moreover, no process of execution or arrest can issue against a Sovereign litigant or his property (see, e.g., the Newbattle, 10 P.D., 33). But it must be noted that in those cases the submission under consideration has been in the nature of a private arrangement by agreement or otherwise between the foreign State and the individual, and the entirely different question of the effect of a formal acceptance of the jurisdiction by a treaty entered into with His Majesty has not been in debate.

It is understood that the present practice of the Office of the Supreme Court is to refuse to accept any writ presented for sealing which on the face of it is clearly directed against a foreign State; but that the authorities there would feel no difficulty in instructing the officers concerned that writs purporting to be in connexion with matters under the convention and directed against a State which had ratified the convention should be sealed in the ordinary course, and if, of course, the writ were merely directed against “the owners” of a particular ship, there would be no apparent ground for the responsible officials to refuse to issue it. It would then be for the State concerned, if it felt aggrieved, to take the appropriate step to set the writ and proceedings founded thereon aside. Any necessary rules as to the service of such writs could, it is thought, be made under the existing general rule-making powers (Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1925, section 99; attention may be especially called to sub-section (3); “rules of court made under this section shall apply to all proceedings by or against the Crown”). On this understanding, it is submitted that this aspect of article 2 of the convention also does not necessarily involve legislation. Ratification of the convention would deprive the State concerned of any ground for diplomatic protest, and the situation being one which has not previously been considered in the cases which have come before the courts in regard to the position of foreign States, it is at the least very probable that on the attention of the court being called to the convention and to its ratification both by His Majesty's Government and by the Government of the foreign State, it could properly and would hold that it had jurisdiction to allow the case to proceed to judgment, and also (where that was desired by the plaintiff) to order the arrest of the ship or other property by way of security, through bail or otherwise, to meet judgment. “I see no reason why sovereign States should not come to an agreement as to the rights and duties of their respective envoys, ordinary or extraordinary, or why such agreement should not enlarge or restrict the immunities which otherwise would be due under the well-established usage of nations.” (Lord, then Lord Justice, Atkin in the Fenton Textile Association (Limited) v. Krassin and Others 38 T.L.R., 258, at p. 262.) This dictum seems equally applicable to all State immunities, as the immunities of envoys form but one class of such immunities. The convention does not restrict or defeat the existing rights of His Majesty's subjects, but enlarges those rights, and therefore is effective in law by virtue of the prerogative in regard to treaty making, and must be given effect by the courts without legislation. (As to the cases in which treaties involve legislation, reference may be made to the article by Professor A. D. McNair at p. 59 of the British Year Book of International Law for 1928).

It is true that in the case of the convention in regard to the carriage of goods by air special provision (see section 2 of the Carriage by Air Act, 1932) was made in respect of the jurisdiction of the courts of the United Kingdom, but it seems doubtful if any such provision was essential.

It is, however, by no means free from doubt whether, in the absence of legislation, the courts of this country would entertain claims against foreign States or would order the arrest or seizure of their ships. It may be said that the basic principle applicable in the case of proceedings against a foreign Sovereign or his property is that the courts have no jurisdiction, and that consequently they will only assume jurisdiction when it is clearly demonstrated to them that the Sovereign has waived his privilege in the particular case submitted to them. It may not be possible, therefore, for any act or agreement by a foreign Sovereign to be construed as submission to the jurisdiction unless it be done or agreed with reference to a particular case which has arisen and in which the courts are being asked to exercise their jurisdiction. It is upon this principle that the courts have in terms stated that the submission must be made at the time when the courts are being asked to exercise jurisdiction (see in re Suarez (1918) L.J. 180), and that it has been held that, notwithstanding the submission by a foreign Sovereign to the jurisdiction, no execution in respect of a judgment then obtained can ensue against the Sovereign's property without his further submission. It is therefore submitted that, as one of the most important benefits conferred upon British subjects by the convention is the power to sue foreign States in this country with the right of arrest and seizure, legislation in this limited respect is desirable for the purpose of providing for the jurisdiction of the courts of the United Kingdom over foreign States and for execution against their property. As there are already two other conventions which have been signed by His Majesty's Government, and which it is understood are about to be ratified, entailing the acceptance of similar jurisdiction by the courts of the United Kingdom over foreign State-owned aircraft, and further conventions relating both to ships and aircraft are not unlikely to be entered into in the future, it is a matter for consideration whether, if such legislation is held to be desirable, it would not be better to proceed by way of a Bill amending the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, e.g., by providing for the exercise of jurisdiction where His Majesty has by Order in Council or otherwise certified that specified foreign States have agreed to submit to it, rather than to follow the precedent of section 2 of the Carriage by Air Act, 1932, and legislate for each particular convention.

On the aspect of proceedings against foreign Government-owned ships and cargoes, legislation may perhaps be thought to be necessary to enable the courts to act in all the various cases which may arise upon the diplomatic certificate as to the particular interests of the State given conclusive evidential value by article 5 (on this point reference may be made to pp. 137-139 of the judgment of Mr. Justice Hill in the case of the Jupiter (No. 3), 1927, p. 122), and to secure the re-exemption from the jurisdiction of our courts of the ships and cargoes affected by a declaration of suspension under article 7.

There is one other difficult aspect of the matter, to which attention must be drawn, arising from the fact that Dominion ships and cargoes may be affected by the convention and protocol, and that machinery should be available accordingly to deal with claims by proceedings in this country in the appropriate cases against Dominion Governments who have ratified the convention. The position with regard to the enforcement in the courts of this country of claims against a Dominion Government is uncertain. In the case of Attorney-General v. Great Southern and Western Railway Company of Ireland (1925 A.C. 754, at p. 779), Lord Phillimore said that, in his opinion, a petition of right cannot properly be brought in the courts here if the liability sought to be enforced is one which would have to be made good by a Dominion Exchequer. In any event, difficult constitutional questions arise as to the presentation of a petition and the advice on which it should be based, and a petition could only be presented in respect of claims in contract. There have been precedents of cases in tort in Dominion courts brought against the responsible officer of one of His Majesty's ships, and no objection has been raised to the jurisdiction where the tort occurred in Dominion waters.

These difficulties would seem to emphasise the desirability of avoiding legislation so far as claims against the Crown are concerned.

The Law Officers are requested to advise—

1. Whether, so far as claims made in this country against vessels to which article 3 applies, the existing law and practice will justify His Majesty's Government in ratifying the convention without legislation.
2. Whether, so far as claims made in this country against vessels to which articles 1 and 2 apply, the existing law and practice will justify His Majesty's Government in ratifying the convention without legislation.
3. If the answer to questions 1 or 2 is in the negative, upon what matters is legislation necessary?

4. Whether legislation is necessary in the case of claims against foreign States, and, if so, whether it is, in the opinion of the Law Officers, preferable to proceed by way of general amendment to the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, rather than by way of a Bill limited to the purposes of the convention now under consideration.
5. Generally upon the case.

List of Papers.

- (1) Copy of the convention relating to the Immunities of State-owned Ships, with provisional English translation. (W 12981/559/50/1933.)
- (2) Copy of protocol additional to the convention, with provisional English translation. (W 12981/559/50/1933.)
- (3) Copy of report of the Crown Proceedings Committee.
- (4) Extract from procès-verbaux of the Conference on International Maritime Law held at Brussels in April 1926 (Annex A). (W 9405/85/50/1927.)

Opinion.

1. In considering first liability in tort the important words of article 3 are in our view "the claim to immunity shall not be open." So long as the Crown is, in law, not liable for the torts of its servants, we are of opinion that as a matter of construction the above words are not being complied with. It is suggested that the practice under which the appropriate officer is sued and the State, in fact, satisfies the judgment or order made by the court amounts to a fulfilment of the convention. If the convention had merely stated that claimants should get damages to the same extent as they would if the ships had been privately owned we should have accepted this argument. In the words which we have quoted above, however, the convention goes beyond this, and in our opinion the practice itself under which the officer is sued shows clearly that so far as the court proceedings are concerned the immunity which the convention says shall not be open is being recognised by the procedure adopted. We also think that the practice of referring salvage actions to arbitration would not be a compliance with that part of the convention which refers to the proper courts of the State. With regard to claims in contract for which procedure by Petition of Right is available we are of opinion that this is a compliance with the convention and no objection could be raised to it. On the other hand under the present practice as stated in the case, it would appear that claimants do, in effect, get the compensation contemplated by the convention. Whether in these circumstances His Majesty's Government would be "justified" in ratifying the convention without legislation is a question of policy as well as of law. On the whole, we think that such a course would be justified. It must, however, in our opinion, be realised that the Government may be pressed to comply fully and strictly with the terms of the convention, and in that event legislation would be necessary. It may well be that no such objection will be raised.

2. We answer this question in the same way. It is suggested that article 5 of the protocol can be construed as covering everything in article 2. We do not think article 5 could be so construed. It would be pointed out at once that if this had been intended it is difficult to explain why only one of the three matters dealt with in article 2 is embodied in article 5. Although it is no doubt right to say that the phrases in article 2 should not necessarily be given the same meaning as they have technically in English law, we think it is clear, reading articles 1 and 2 together, that the principles of liability, including the principle under which the owner or employer is responsible for the torts of his servants, should be the same in the case of State-owned as they are in the case of privately-owned ships.

3. If legislation should ever become necessary it would, in our opinion, have the effect that in all cases covered by the convention the claimant had the same right of action against the State as he has against a private owner where the ship is privately owned. Its general nature is, we think, clear from the terms of the convention and our answers to Questions (1) and (2). Article 5 of the protocol makes it clear that so far as articles 1 and 2 are concerned rules of procedure need not be identical, and, indeed, so far as execution is concerned they could not be. We think, although it is not expressly so stated, that the same principle would apply to article 3. The claim to immunity which article 3 negatives refers, in our opinion, to liability and not to the rules of procedure or the method of enforcing the liability as laid down by the court.

1936

10

GENERAL

4. In our opinion legislation is necessary, and we think it would be preferable to proceed by way of amendment to the Supreme Court of Judicature Act on the lines suggested having regard to the fact that there are other conventions on which the same point may be raised.

5. We have nothing to add.

T. W. H. INSKIP.

D. B. SOMERVELL.

*Law Officers' Department,
January 1936.*

Annex A.

(Paper No. 4.)

Extract from Procès-verbaux of Conference on International Maritime Law held at Brussels in April 1926.

"ARTICLE 2.

"Pour ces responsabilités et obligations, les règles concernant la compétence des tribunaux, les actions en justice et la procédure sont les mêmes que pour les navires de commerce appartenant à des propriétaires privés et que pour les cargaisons privées et leurs propriétaires."

M. le Président: Il n'a été apporté à ce texte aucune modification de principe. Mais la Commission de rédaction s'est demandé si le texte primitif, qui parlait de règles de procédure, comprenait le droit de saisie et englobait tant la saisie conservatoire que la saisie-exécution. Telle était sans doute la pensée des rédacteurs et telle a été la nôtre à la commission. Mais une assez grande divergence de vues s'est produite quant aux termes à employer, étant donnée la diversité des conceptions de droit interne. Pour les uns, les mots "les actions en justice" suffisent; d'autres ont soutenu que mieux valait dire: "règles de procédure." Nous avons repris les deux expressions pour être certains de ne rien omettre. Il est bien entendu qu'en ce qui concerne les modalités de la procédure de saisie chaque Etat applique sa loi, mais le traité ne sera loyalement exécuté que si les mesures à prendre pour organiser cette procédure sont efficaces. Il est possible que dans certains Etats, bien décidés à payer ce dont ils seront reconnus redevables, il ne soit pas estimé nécessaire d'organiser une procédure spéciale, si elle n'existe pas. Dans d'autres pays, en cas de créance à charge de l'Etat, on envisage l'inscription d'un crédit au budget ou bien d'autres mesures encore. Nous devons abandonner cette question à la bonne foi des pays qui vont signer cette convention, confiants, en effet, dans le sentiment qu'ils ont du respect de leurs engagements. Nous ne pouvons toucher à leur droit public interne. A l'étranger, le texte sera d'une application générale, et les navires, quoique propriété d'un autre Etat, pourront être saisis comme les navires appartenant à un armateur privé. Mais à l'intérieur, c'est-à-dire dans le pays dont les navires seront en cause, nous nous en référons au droit de ce pays et à sa loyauté.

M. Ripert: Au sujet de l'article 2, j'ai à faire une déclaration au nom de la délégation française. Je ne demande pas une modification du texte de l'article 2, mais j'ai déjà eu l'honneur d'indiquer à la conférence pourquoi il est impossible, en France et sans doute aussi en d'autres pays, d'appliquer exactement à l'Etat la procédure et les voies d'exécution en vigueur à l'égard des armements privés. Notre président a indiqué dans son rapport que l'article 2 devrait être entendu en ce sens que si, dans un pays déterminé, la procédure ou une voie d'exécution contre l'Etat était soumise à des règles particulières, ce sont ces règles que l'on suivrait dans ce pays. Toutefois, comme l'article 2 est conçu en termes absolus et porte que les règles concernant la compétence, les actions en justice et la procédure sont les mêmes que pour les navires de commerce appartenant à des propriétaires privés, je tiens à faire la déclaration suivante:

GENERAL

11

"La délégation française déclare que, les voies d'exécution ordinaires n'étant pas applicables en France contre l'Etat et les biens de l'Etat étant insaisissables, l'application de l'article 2 de la présente convention ne pourra être demandée en France que sous réserve des principes du droit public français concernant la procédure et les mesures d'exécution contre l'Etat et l'insaisissabilité des biens de l'Etat."

M. le Président: Je donne acte à la délégation française de cette déclaration. Elle rentre dans les réserves que je viens d'indiquer moi-même dans mon exposé et que tous les pays peuvent donc invoquer, même sans les formuler expressément. Je le répète: Il ne s'agit pas de toucher au droit public. Il y a deux aspects dans l'application pratique de cet article: il y a d'abord le cas d'un navire de commerce appartenant à un Etat et qui est l'objet d'une action à l'étranger. A l'étranger, la convention produira son plein et entier effet; le navire d'Etat sera traité comme un navire privé et l'Etat intéressé ne pourra s'en plaindre. Mais la situation sera différente sur le territoire de l'Etat en cause; ici, quand un créancier voudra faire valoir ses droits, il devra se soumettre au droit de cet Etat et s'en remettre à sa bonne foi.

M. Bals: La délégation roumaine s'associe à cette déclaration.

M. Berlingieir: La délégation italienne de même.

M. Kawai: La délégation japonaise également.

[W 1851/647/50/1936]

No. 1^B.

[Treasury Solicitor]

[February 26, 1936]

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown for Scotland.

IN considering the questions appended to the case,⁽¹⁾ we have had the advantage of perusing the opinion of the Law Officers in England. That opinion is, of course, based upon existing law and practice in England, and, in so far as the law and practice in Scotland does not differ, we have reached the same conclusions as are set forth in that opinion. In what follows we have had regard to the matters in which there are or may be differences in the Scottish law and practice, and from that point of view we answer the queries as follows, namely:—

1. So far as the law and practice of Scotland are concerned, we reach the same conclusion as that set out in the opinion of the Law Officers in England. The immunity of the Crown in Scotland from actions based on delict—which corresponds to tort in England—is, in substance and effect, the same as in England; and in practice, the action lies and is taken against the individual or officer by whom the delict was committed. Standing that immunity, it appears to us impossible to affirm with strict accuracy that in Scotland the existing law and practice conform to the requirements of the convention that "a claim to immunity shall not be open." The same view, in our opinion, falls to be expressed as regards salvage proceedings in Scotland, as to which we have ascertained that, although there appears to be no reported case in which the question has been raised, the procedure which would be followed would not differ from that which is followed in England, namely, by submission to arbitration. With regard to claims in contract, no difference arises in Scotland, where, although proceedings by way of petition of right are unknown, the procedure is regulated by statute. Actions against the Crown or Departments of State (other than the Admiralty)

⁽¹⁾ The case referred to is identical with that submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown in England—W 647/647/50/1936.]

[14996]

c 2

Convention and Protocol relating to the Immunities of State-owned Ships: as to whether ratification by His Majesty's Government will necessarily involve legislation.

1936 are brought against the Lord Advocate (Crown Suits (Scotland) Act, 1856), while actions by or against the Admiralty are subject to the provisions of the Admiralty Suits Act, 1868. Subject, accordingly, to these observations, we agree mutatis mutandis with the answer to this query contained in the opinion of the Law Officers in England.

2 and 3. We agree with and adopt the views expressed in the opinion of the Law Officers in England.

4. With regard to the enforcement of liabilities and obligations arising under the convention against foreign States and their vessels before the courts in Scotland, we are of opinion that those courts might, in obedience to the principles and dicta set forth in the case, decline ex proprio motu to entertain proceedings against a foreign State. The existing code which regulates for Scotland the jurisdiction and procedure in the Court of Session and Sheriff Courts is contained in a series of statutes extending from 1808 to 1933 inclusive. We agree with the view of the English Law Officers that legislation on this aspect of the matter is necessary, or at least advisable, and we are of opinion that it should preferably take the form of a general amendment to the provisions contained in the code above referred to.

5. We have nothing to add.

T. M. COOPER.

ALBERT RUSSELL.

Edinburgh, February 26, 1936.

[L 5007/13/405/1936]

No. 1^c.

[May 20, 1936]

Sir G. Bushe (Colonial Office) to the Attorney-General.

Dear Attorney,

Colonial Office, May 14, 1936.

THE Secretary of State has asked me to consult you in the following matter:—

Demands have recently been made in both the House of Commons and the House of Lords that the draft of an Order in Council which (if the project is proceeded with) will be submitted to The King in Council for the purpose of establishing a Legislative Council of Palestine should be laid before Parliament. Similar demands have also been made in respect of an Order in Council which it is proposed to submit to His Majesty in Council with reference to the occupancy of the highlands in Kenya. I enclose a copy of the various questions and answers on the subject, and also a copy of a motion in the House of Lords which has not yet been disposed of.

The first Order in Council to which I have referred would be made under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, and the second would be made under the British Settlements Act.

Now there are certain instruments—Letters Patent and Orders in Council—such, for example, as those providing for the constitution of a conquered colony which are made under the prerogative and nothing else. I imagine that as to these it would be agreed that it would not be proper to lay them before Parliament or to publish them prior to their submission to The King. The question is whether the same principle obtains with reference to Orders under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act and the British Settlements Act.

As regards the former, the origin of The King's jurisdiction in foreign countries must, I think, have been derived from his prerogative power of making treaties. Doubts, however, arose as to whether he could exercise this jurisdiction by Orders made in this country, and the first general Foreign Jurisdiction Act of 1843 recites that whereas Her Majesty has power and jurisdiction within diverse countries and places out of Her Majesty's dominions, and whereas doubts have arisen how far the exercise of such power and jurisdiction is controlled by and dependent on the laws and custom of this realm, that it is expedient that

Laying before Parliament before submission to The King of Orders in Council
under the Foreign Jurisdiction
Act and British Settlements
Act.

such doubts should be removed; and then proceeds to enact "that it is and shall be lawful for Her Majesty to hold, exercise and enjoy the foreign jurisdiction so obtained."

In the Act of 1890, which consolidates the Foreign Jurisdiction Acts, the doubts are no longer expressed, but the phrase "it is and shall be lawful" is retained in section 1, which proceeds to provide that the jurisdiction should be exercised and enjoyed in the same and as ample a manner as if Her Majesty had acquired that jurisdiction by the cession or conquest of territory.

The effect, therefore, seems to be that The King's jurisdiction in foreign countries is to be exercised in the same way as similar jurisdiction is exercised in a conquered colony. Parliament, as you know, does not legislate directly for the protectorates or mandated territories, and where it is desired that an Act should be applicable to such places provision is inserted giving His Majesty power to apply it by Order in Council. The arrangement, therefore, by which under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act it was recognised, or established (whichever may be the true view), that The King possessed, and could exercise, jurisdiction in foreign countries by Order in Council as if they were conquered colonies has been scrupulously observed for forty-six years. I need scarcely add that there is no provision in the Foreign Jurisdiction Act for laying Orders in draft, but it is provided that Orders are to be laid before Parliament after they have been made.

Turning now to the British Settlements Act, 1887, the position was that, while there was undoubted right in the prerogative to legislate for a conquered colony, the position in relation to a settlement was uncertain. The 1887 Act, which consolidates some earlier Acts, was passed for the purpose of giving the Crown power to legislate for British territories although not acquired by cession or conquest, and to create dependent legislatures in those possessions. Here, again, I think that as a result the power to legislate was delegated to The King. There is no provision for the laying of Orders in Council before Parliament in draft, and I cannot help thinking that The King's powers under this Act, as under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, are in the nature of prerogative powers.

The position, therefore, seems to be this:—

- (1) There is no obligation to lay Orders in draft either under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act or the British Settlements Act.
- (2) That if I am right in my suggestion that powers under these Acts are in the nature of prerogative powers, it would not be proper to lay the Orders in draft or to publish the text before they are submitted to The King in Council.
- (3) That the responsibility for advising The King to make these Orders rests upon His Ministers, and that the power of Parliament in the matter is to criticise or to correct the Government after the event if it disapproves of what has been done.

The Secretary of State, however, has always realised that there arise from time to time some proposals, such as the institution of a Legislative Council in Palestine, in which Parliament is keenly interested, and his policy in such a case has been to lay on the table of the House a paper containing a summary of the proposals which it is proposed to bring into force.

Apart from the principle involved, there is obvious inconvenience in laying in draft the actual text or Orders in Council where the procedure in the matter is not regulated by statute whether as to the powers of Parliament in relation to the draft, or to the time within which any action may be taken by Parliament on the draft, or as to the effect of any action if it is taken. I venture to think, therefore, that a compromise by which the substance of proposals is communicated in advance to Parliament so giving an opportunity to discuss the general principles involved is a reasonable one, and that it would be dangerous, and might be regarded as a breach of the prerogative, to commence at this date to lay before Parliament any draft Orders which it is proposed in due course to submit to His Majesty under the two Acts to which reference has been made. Moreover, it must be remembered that if these Orders are to be laid here in draft it would not be possible to prevent their discussion in the Legislature of the colony or territory concerned or, indeed, in the Legislature of any other part of the Empire which might regard itself as interested. The Indian Legislature, for example, would certainly regard itself as interested in an Order in Council relating to the occupancy of the highlands of Kenya. Both of these possibilities envisage action which would be in the highest degree undesirable.

Would you be so good as to let me know whether you agree, or, if you do not, what you think is the correct position in the matter?

I am sending a copy of this letter to Wigram, who will naturally be interested in the discussion.

GRATTAN BUSHE.

List of Papers.

- No. 1.—Parliamentary Question and Answer, November 14, 1934 (Kenya). (Parliamentary Debates, Commons, vol. 293, columns 1941–1942.)
 No. 2.—Parliamentary Question and Answer, May 7, 1936 (Kenya). (Parliamentary Debates, Commons, vol. 311, column 1876.)
 No. 3.—Parliamentary Question and Answer, February 12, 1936 (Palestine). (Parliamentary Debates, Commons, vol. 308, columns 927–928.)
 No. 4.—House of Lords Debate on Palestine, March 5, 1936. (Parliamentary Debates, Lords, vol. 99, columns 925–940.)
 No. 5.—House of Lords Motion. (Annex I.)

Report.

The Attorney-General to Sir G. Bushe.

I agree entirely with your first two propositions, subject to a possible proviso to the last sentence of proposition 2, which will be clear from my remarks on your third proposition.

I agree, of course, that the responsibility for advising The King to make these Orders rests upon His Ministers. On the other hand, there appears to me nothing unconstitutional in Ministers obtaining the views of Parliament by any appropriate procedure on the subject-matter with regard to which they are proposing to advise His Majesty. I agree that it would not be proper to publish the text of an Order as a Draft Order, but I do not at the moment see any objection to Ministers placing before Parliament in the form of proposals for discussion what might later appear textually as provisions of the Order. Although, therefore, the "power" of Parliament may be, as you state, to criticise or correct the Government after the event, it is also, I think, true to say that it is within the power of Ministers to obtain the views of Parliament upon either principle or detail before they finally make up their minds as to the terms of the Draft Order they propose to lay before His Majesty. I do not think in effect there is any difference between us in principle, but it does not seem to me that the course I have suggested could in any way be regarded as a breach of the prerogative should Ministers in any particular case think it proper to adopt it. I have not gone into the question of the parliamentary procedure under which discussion could be raised, but it would not, of course, be a formal motion for approval of the proposals as such.

With regard to the last page of your letter, I am not sure that I appreciate why discussions in colonial Legislatures or the Indian Legislature might not equally take place where the procedure you refer to is adopted, under which the substance of proposals is communicated in advance to Parliament.

I suppose a case could be made for a reconsideration of the whole matter on the ground that under statute many Orders in Council of far less importance have, in fact, to be laid before and approved by Parliament. That, however, raises a very big issue, and if you care to have a talk with me about it at any time that could be arranged.

DONALD SOMERVELL.

*Law Officers' Department,
 May 20, 1936.*

ANNEX No. I.

(Paper No. 5.)

The Lord Ker (M. Lothian)—To move, to resolve, that this House considers that if an elected Council is established in Palestine it should at this stage be representative and not responsible in character, and that any Order in Council setting up a Legislative Council for Palestine should be laid on the table of both Houses of Parliament for one month in order that Parliament may have an opportunity of discussing it before it is promulgated.

MOROCCO

[W 664/261/28/1936]

No. 1.

[January 22, 1936.]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, July 22, 1935.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of Secretary Sir Samuel Hoare, to request your opinion on the following matter:—

2. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom are engaged in a dispute with the Spanish Government arising out of the enactment and application to British subjects of certain legislation imposing taxes in the Spanish Zone of Morocco. His Majesty's Government contend that the application of these taxes to British subjects is contrary to His Majesty's treaty rights in Morocco and your opinion is desired on the prospects of a favourable judgment if His Majesty's Government brought the dispute before the Permanent Court of International Justice. His Majesty's Government appear to have the right to do so by unilateral application seeing that both His Majesty's Government and the Spanish Government have accepted the jurisdiction of the court under the Optional Clause (article 36 (2) of the statute of the court).

3. The taxes in dispute fall into two classes:—

- (a) Consumption duties (i.e., duties imposed on goods consumed in the zone). The duties to which exception has been taken by His Majesty's Government are contained in a number of dahirs, dated the 29th June, 1934, which create new, and increase existing, taxes (details of which are given in Tangier despatch No. 88 of the 23rd July, 1934, and enclosures thereto (Paper I (1)); and in a vizirial decree and dahir of the 20th September, 1934, imposing a consumption tax on imported wheat flour and its derivatives (details of which are given in Tangier despatch No. 128 of the 13th October, 1934, with enclosure (Paper I (2)).
- (b) Gate taxes (i.e., taxes imposed on goods entering towns). A gate tax on local produce entering towns in the Spanish Zone and on goods imported into the zone by sea was imposed by a dahir and vizirial decree of the 1st September, 1931, modified, at the instance of His Majesty's Government by a vizirial decree of the 17th March, 1932. This tax was made applicable to British subjects by King's Regulation No. 2 of 1932 (Paper II). A dahir and vizirial decree of the 1st November, 1934 (details of which are given in Tangier despatch No. 23 of the 9th February, 1935, with enclosures—Paper III), has been issued, the effect of which is that the tax becomes leviable on imported goods only. It is this dahir and decree of 1934 which is in dispute with the Spanish Government.

Application to British subjects of legislation imposing taxes in the Spanish Zone of Morocco.

4. The contentions of His Majesty's Government are briefly set out with regard (a) to the consumption duties in the note and aide-mémoire of the 8th March, 1935, from His Majesty's Ambassador in Madrid to the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs (Annex 44 of Paper IV) and in the note and aide-mémoires of the 19th March, 1935, which were communicated by His Majesty's consul at Tetuan to the High Commissioner for Spain in Morocco (Paper V); and with regard (b) to the gate tax in the note of the 30th March, 1935, from His Majesty's Ambassador in Madrid to the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs (Annex 50 of Paper IV). These contentions, however, are not readily intelligible without an understanding of the whole treaty position in Morocco. Full information concerning this position and the various disputes which have arisen with regard to it is given in the Foreign Office memorandum which is submitted as Paper IV. It may, however, be convenient to outline the more important features.

5. In 1856 Her Majesty Queen Victoria concluded with the Sultan of Morocco (then an entirely independent State) two treaties: (i) a General Treaty (Paper VI (1)), and (ii) a Commercial Convention (Paper VI (2)). Neither of these treaties is made terminable, and it is common ground that they are in force except in so far as they have been modified by later instruments, though there may be some dispute as to the extent to which certain later instruments have affected their provisions. The essential features of these treaties for present purposes are:—

- (i) That they confer on His Majesty extra-territorial (or capitulatory) jurisdiction in respect of British subjects in Morocco (articles 8–14 of the General Treaty).
- (ii) That by article 7 of the Commercial Convention goods imported into Morocco by British subjects are not subject to any import duties higher than 10 per cent. (to which an additional special tax has been added by virtue of article 66 of the Act of Algeciras (see paragraph 8 below)).
- (iii) That by article 4 of the General Treaty British subjects are not to be obliged "to pay under any pretence whatever any taxes or impositions" (certain exceptions to this rule have been created by subsequent instruments).

In this connexion attention is invited to paragraphs 11–17 of Paper IV, where the effect of the provisions of these two treaties is explained.

6. A number of other Powers acquired similar treaty rights in Morocco, and also the right under most-favoured-nation provisions each to claim individually whatever had been granted by Morocco to any other. The result was that the Capitulations and privileges gave rise to a number of abuses, and the situation was such that grave prejudice was caused to the interests and administration of the country. In 1880 an international conference was held at Madrid to ameliorate the position by the introduction of certain reforms, and this conference resulted in the conclusion of the Madrid Convention (Paper VII (1)). In derogation from the general immunity from local taxation enjoyed by British subjects and other privileged foreigners, article 13 of this convention sanctioned under certain conditions the levying of gate taxes upon capitulatory foreigners, and detailed regulations with regard to such taxes were agreed by the Powers in 1881 (Paper VII (2)) and again in 1896 (Paper VII (3)). In this connexion attention is invited to paragraphs 22 and 23 of Paper IV. The gates taxes now under dispute, however, cannot be justified under these regulations.

7. As the result of a series of diplomatic instruments beginning in 1903 and ending in 1923, the present situation in Morocco was brought about, whereby, although the Sultan of Morocco retains a nominal sovereignty over the whole country, France exercises a protectorate over the greater portion of the country, a second portion known as the Spanish Zone is administered by Spain and a third smallest area known as the Tangier Zone is under an international administration. It is, however, not disputed that the older treaties remain in force in all three zones except in so far as they have been modified or replaced by provisions in the subsequent instruments, as has been the case to some extent; for example, in the Tangier Zone, an international tribunal has been set up, and all the Powers (except the United States) have renounced in that zone the exercise of their extra-territorial jurisdiction. His Majesty's Government have not surrendered their extra-territorial jurisdiction either in the French Zone or in the Spanish Zone, though all the other Powers except the United States of America have now done so.

8. The above-mentioned series of instruments begins with the Anglo-French Declaration of the 8th April, 1904, with regard to Egypt and Morocco (see in particular articles 2 and 4, Paper VIII), and the Franco-Spanish Declaration and Convention of the 3rd October, 1904 (Paper IX, Nos. 1 and 2), and the Anglo-French Exchange of Notes of the 6th October, 1904 (Paper IX, Nos. 3 and 4).

The next instrument is the Act of Algeciras of 1906 (Paper X) to which all the Powers then enjoying substantial treaty rights in Morocco were parties and which introduced by agreement of the Powers certain changes and reforms in Morocco, of which some are relevant to the question of the taxation of British subjects (see paragraphs 31–49 of Paper IV). Under the Algeciras Act and subsequent regulations approved by the Powers, certain further taxes were made leviable on British subjects and other privileged foreigners (see paragraphs 51–54 of Paper IV).

There followed in 1909 a Franco-German Declaration (Paper IX, No. 5), and in 1911 a Franco-German Convention (Paper IX, No. 6), which was accompanied by an Exchange of Notes (Paper IX, Nos. 7 and 8). The Franco-German Convention of the 4th November, 1911, is important in connexion with the present question because His Majesty's Government acceded to it on the 14th November, 1911, and it is considered possible, in so far as the Spanish Government may endeavour to resist the contentions of His Majesty's Government in the present dispute on legal grounds, that the Spanish Government will rely on articles 1 and 4 of this Franco-German Convention. In this connexion attention is invited to Paper IV, paragraphs 62–71.

The series of instruments was completed by the Franco-Moroccan Protectorate Treaty of the 30th March, 1912, and the Franco-Spanish Convention of the 27th November, 1912 (see Paper IV, paragraphs 8–91, and also paragraphs 92–93, with regard to the recognition by His Majesty's Government of the French and Spanish protectorates), and by the Tangier Convention of 1923 creating the international régime in the Tangier Zone (Paper IV, paragraphs 100–113).

9. His Majesty's extra-territorial jurisdiction in the French and Spanish Zones of Morocco is exercised by British consular courts and by the Supreme Court for Gibraltar under the Morocco Orders in Council, 1889–1929, Consolidated (Paper XI). Proceedings can only be taken against British subjects in these courts, which according to the Order in Council apply English law, together with such local legislation as has been made applicable to British subjects by King's Regulations under article 143 of the Consolidated Order. Numerous King's Regulations covering local legislation, including legislation imposing taxation, have been made in both zones. Examples of early King's Regulations relating to taxation are given in paragraphs 51–54 of Paper IV, and Paper XII contains a series of recent King's Regulations enforcing on British subjects in the Spanish Zone various Spanish taxes. Payment of a tax by a British subject can only be enforced by proceedings in these courts, though in practice the local authorities in many cases can by one means or another bring pressure on British subjects to pay taxes otherwise than by legal proceedings. Apart from the special taxes covered by treaty provisions which have been already referred to, His Majesty's Government contend that the Spanish authorities are not entitled to demand from British subjects taxes not agreed to by His Majesty's Government and made applicable by King's Regulation, and the present dispute has arisen because the Spanish authorities are by indirect means enforcing payments of such taxes from British subjects.

10. The contention of His Majesty's Government in regard to consumption taxes in the Spanish Zone is briefly as follows: Each of the dahirs of the 29th June, 1934, relating to consumption taxes, provides that the tax will be collected on importation into the zone of the goods concerned. By article 7 of the United Kingdom Commercial Convention of 1856, goods imported into Morocco are subject to a maximum customs duty of 10 per cent., to which a special tax of 2½ per cent. has been added by article 66 of the Act of Algeciras; this maximum duty of 12½ per cent. is levied on all goods imported into the Spanish Zone. By article 4 of the United Kingdom–Morocco General Treaty of 1856 British subjects "shall not be obliged to pay, under any pretence whatever, any taxes or impositions"; this exemption has been modified in regard to certain taxes by subsequent instruments, which do not, however, affect the present question of consumption taxes. Consequently, the new taxes may be held to constitute either an increase in the customs duties, contrary to article 7 of the Commercial Convention of 1856, as modified by article 66 of the Act of Algeciras, or an increase in the internal duties of the Spanish Zone, contrary to article 4 of the General Treaty of 1856. In either case, the taxes involve direct discrimination between goods imported and similar goods produced locally. The conditions on which His Majesty's Government would be prepared to issue, at the specific request of the Spanish Government, the necessary King's Regulations in respect of these consumption taxes are shown in the note and aide-mémoire of the 8th March, 1935, which were communicated to the Spanish Government by His Majesty's Embassy at Madrid, as reported in Sir George Grahame's despatch No. 150 of the 13th March last (Annex 44 of Paper IV).

11. As regards the gate tax in the Spanish Zone, His Majesty's Government contend that in virtue of the special arrangements governing the tax as laid down in article 13 of the Madrid Convention of 1880 (Paper VII (1)) and in the regulations thereunder of 1881 and 1896 (Papers VII (2) and (3)), and also of the provisions of article 4 of the General Treaty of 1856 (Paper VI (1)), no taxes of this nature can be applied to British subjects unless agreed to by His Majesty's Government and made binding on British subjects by King's Regulation. Representations on this basis have been addressed to the Spanish Government by His Majesty's Ambassador at Madrid (Annex 50 of Paper IV).

12. Having stated the contentions of His Majesty's Government it is necessary to consider what is the answer which the Spanish Government would be likely to endeavour to make to them if the case came before the Permanent Court. Up to the present the Spanish Government have not returned any answer to the notes which have been addressed to them setting out the claims of His Majesty's Government. They have confined themselves to requests for a general discussion about the situation in the Spanish Zone of Morocco. His Majesty's Ambassador at Madrid has now been instructed to make a final appeal to the Spanish Government to agree to the proposals of His Majesty's Government, and to state that, in view of the attitude adopted by the Spanish Government to their representations, His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom feel compelled to take active steps to bring the question before the Permanent Court of International Justice (Paper XIII).

13. It is surmised that the Spanish Government would argue that, while the contentions of His Majesty's Government are in accordance with the law as it existed up to the time of the accession of His Majesty's Government to the Franco-German Convention of 1911, after that date a change was introduced by article 1 of that convention. This surmise is based partly upon certain vague references to this convention which have from time to time been made by the Spanish authorities, but more particularly upon the arguments which the French Government have made in the past when similar questions arose in the French Zone. It is to be noted, however, that the French Government, though they have never formally abandoned their arguments based on the Franco-German Convention, have not in practice insisted upon them. In practice the French Government have asked for the application to British subjects of legislation in the French Zone imposing taxes, and in general His Majesty's Government have acceded to such requests. In some cases, however, His Majesty's Government have first obtained alterations in the legislation in question in order to remove discriminatory features, or, alternatively, special assurances as to the manner in which such legislation should be applied.

14. Recently a similar question arose in the French Zone also with regard to gate taxes, and for the present at any rate the matter has been settled in a manner consistent with the claims of His Majesty's Government with regard to the treaty position by an exchange of notes of the 29th January, 1935 (Paper IV, Annex 1). This exchange of notes, however, contained a number of provisions and it has not yet been brought into force (Paper IV, paragraphs 116-122), and it is possible that it will never come into force owing to difficulties with regard to the arrangements contemplated in matters other than the gate tax. Consequently, it is not certain that His Majesty's Government will not be faced in the French Zone with the same question as has arisen in the Spanish Zone and which is the subject of the present reference.

15. The arguments which have been made in the past, based upon the Franco-German Convention of 1911, and the answers to these arguments and the situation in practice are fully discussed in Paper IV (see, in particular, paragraphs 72-79, 97-99 of Part I and the whole of Parts II and III of that memorandum). Some interesting comments on the treaty régime in Morocco have also been made recently by M. Basdevant, a legal adviser to the French Ministry for Foreign Affairs, and by M. de Saint-Quentin, of the French Ministry for Foreign Affairs, at a lecture given to the French Colonial Union in Paris in January 1934 (Paper XIV).

16. The contention of His Majesty's Government is that article 1 of the Franco-German Convention does not create any alteration in the legal position arising from the existing treaties, but is an obligation requiring His Majesty's Government to adopt a certain policy in connexion with reforms and legislation which the Protectorate Governments wish to put into operation, namely, that His Majesty's Government will be ready to accept, and, so far as is necessary, take the measures to implement any reasonable policy or legislation which the Protectorate Governments wish to put into force. His Majesty's Government must be consulted about the measures and appreciate them for themselves, but, provided on examination they are not found to conflict either in spirit or in letter with the most-favoured-nation principles and the freedom of trade which are so carefully safeguarded in the Franco-German Convention itself, they will accept the measures and take the steps necessary to apply them to British subjects. As indicated in Paper IV (Annex 44) and Paper V, and Paper IV (Annex 50), this is precisely the policy which His Majesty's Government are adopting with regard to the measures which have occasioned the dispute. They are ready to accept all of them, provided that their treaty rights are recognised and a minimum of modifications made in order to remove from the measures in question those features which constitute discrimination or are contrary to the freedom of trade.

17. The contention on the other side is that the Franco-German Treaty has the effect of rendering all consent by His Majesty's Government unnecessary for the legal application to British subjects of measures of taxation, though it is admitted that action by His Majesty's Government is necessary to render the taxes enforceable by legal proceedings, and it is presumed that the argument is that it is obligatory on His Majesty's Government automatically to make the necessary King's Regulations. As regards this contention, particular attention is invited to the following amongst the other points which are set out in the passages referred to above of Paper IV:—

- (i) The contention, if it is right, goes too far, since, if the Franco-German Convention has the effect which is stated, the capitulatory rights have also disappeared, but this is not contended.
- (ii) It is entirely inconsistent with the position in practice in both zones since the date of the Franco-German Convention. A particularly strong instance of this will be found in paragraphs 145 and 146 of Paper IV, where the Spanish Government went so far in admitting His Majesty's Government's point of view that they actually refunded taxes collected from British subjects previous to the date of the making of the King's Regulation.
- (iii) In the French Zone the official Règlement Douanier admits the limits created by the Commercial Convention of 1856 and the Act of Algeciras as regards the amounts of customs duties. It is accepted in Morocco that the customs duties in the French and Spanish Zones must be the same (see paragraph 78 of Paper IV).
- (iv) The contention is inconsistent with the draft treaty of 1919 mentioned in paragraph 97 of Paper IV.

18. Sir Samuel Hoare, therefore, requests the Law Officers to take the above-mentioned Papers into consideration and to advise him whether they concur in the opinion of the legal advisers to the Foreign Office, that, if the questions now in dispute with the Spanish Government were referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice, it should be expected that His Majesty's Government would be successful.

I have, &c.
P. LEIGH-SMITH.

List of Papers.

- I (1).—Tangier despatch No. 88 of July 23, 1934 (extracts only). [W 7075/4202/28/1934]
 I (2).—Tangier despatch No. 128 of October 13, 1934. [W 9273/4202/28/1934]
 II.—King's Regulation (Spanish Zone) No. 2 of 1932.
 III.—Tangier despatch No. 23 of February 9, 1935. [W 1402/976/28]
 IV.—Foreign Office memorandum on treaty rights respecting customs and taxation in Morocco, July 1, 1935 (Confidential 14630). (Annex A.)
 V.—Tetuan despatch No. 28 of March 19, 1935 (with enclosures) to His Majesty's Consul-General at Tangier. [W 2781/29/28/1935]
 VI (1).—United Kingdom-Morocco General Treaty, December 9, 1856. (Parliamentary Paper, 1857.)
 VI (2).—United Kingdom-Morocco Commercial Convention, December 9, 1856. (Parliamentary Paper, 1857.)
 VII (1).—Madrid Convention regarding the right of protection in Morocco, July 3, 1880. (Parliamentary Paper, C.-3053.)
 VII (2).—Regulations of 1881 under the Madrid Convention of 1880. (State Papers, Vol. 72, p. 636.)
 VII (3).—Regulations of 1896 under the Madrid Convention of 1880. (Annuaire du Maroc, 1905, p. 221.)
 VIII.—Anglo-French Declaration of April 8, 1904. (Parliamentary Paper, Cd. 5969.)
 IX.—Parliamentary Paper, Morocco No. 4 (1911) (Cd. 6010), containing—
 (1) Franco-Spanish Declaration, October 3, 1904.
 (2) Franco-Spanish Convention, October 3, 1904.
 (3) French Ambassador to Lord Lansdowne, October 6, 1904.
 (4) Lord Lansdowne to French Ambassador, October 6, 1904.
 (5) Franco-German Declaration, February 8, 1909.
 (6) Franco-German Convention, November 4, 1911.
 (7) German Foreign Secretary to French Ambassador at Berlin, November 4, 1911.
 (8) French Ambassador at Berlin to German Foreign Secretary, November 4, 1911.
 X.—Act of Algeciras, April 7, 1906. (Parliamentary Paper, Cd. 3302.)
 XI.—Morocco Orders-in-Council, 1889-1929, Consolidated.
 XII.—King's Regulations (Spanish Zone) respecting consumption duties.
 XIII.—Despatch to His Majesty's Ambassador at Madrid, No. 377, July 11, 1935. [W 5076/976/28/1935]
 XIV.—Tangier despatch No. 91 of June 18, 1935. [W 5615/29/28]

Report.

In so far as the Spanish Government rely upon the provisions of the Franco-German Convention of 1911 as justifying the application to British subjects of the legislation imposing the taxes in question in the Spanish Zone without the concurrence of His Majesty's Government, we are of opinion that the contentions of the Spanish Government are not well founded. We are not aware of any other ground upon which the Spanish Government rest their case, and we therefore concur in the opinion of the legal advisers to the Foreign Office that His Majesty's Government should be successful if the questions now in dispute with the Spanish Government were referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice.

T. W. H. INSKIP.
 D. B. SOMERVELL.

*Law Officers' Department,
 January 22, 1936.*

(14630)

ANNEX A.

(Paper No. IV.)

TREATY RIGHTS RESPECTING CUSTOMS AND TAXATION
IN MOROCCO.I.—Review of Treaty Provisions.

THE Portuguese were the first Europeans to obtain a foothold in Morocco, Ceuta being taken by them in 1415. The disastrous expedition of King Sebastian in 1578 brought about the downfall of Portuguese power in Morocco, and Mazagan, their last possession, was evacuated in 1579. At this period Spain had come into the possession of such towns as Ceuta, Melilla and Alhucemas, which, together with certain islets off the Mediterranean coast, formed the so-called "presidios," and were later extended so as to form the present Spanish Zone in Morocco.

2. Between 1760 and 1770 several treaties of peace and friendship were concluded with Morocco by Great Britain (1760 and 1765), Sweden (1763), Denmark, France and Spain (1767).

3. The Danish treaty provides (article 5) that "les négociants danois peuvent en toute assurance venir dans l'Empire de Maroc, voyager, vendre et acheter dans toutes les provinces . . . sans être obligés de payer aucun droit d'entrée et sortie plus sur ce que paient les autres négociants des nations chrétiennes; . . ."

4. The French treaty of 1767 contains in article 2 provision for freedom of commerce: "Les sujets respectifs des deux Empires pourront voyager, trafiquer et naviguer en toute assurance . . . par terre et par mer . . . sans craindre d'être molestés ni empêchés . . ." Article 5 states that "les marchands français pourront vendre et acheter dans toute l'étendue de l'Empire du Maroc, comme ceux des autres nations, sans payer aucun droit de plus," together with most-favoured-nation treatment as to import and export duties. Article 11 provides for the establishment of consuls, and also "ceux qui seront au service des consuls, secrétaire, interprète, courtier ou autres, tant au service des consuls que des marchands, ne seront empêchés dans leurs fonctions et ceux du pays seront libres de toute imposition et charge personnelle." Articles 12 and 13 regulate consular jurisdiction in civil and penal matters.

5. The Spanish treaty of 1767, together with the later treaties of 1780 and 1799, were abrogated by the treaty of 1861, but the treaty of 1799 is notable in that for the first time the import duty was fixed at a maximum of 10 per cent. ad valorem, while specific duties are laid down for articles exported.

6. In 1825 a treaty was concluded between Sardinia and Morocco. Article 2 provided for freedom of commerce by sea and land and for most-favoured-nation treatment. Articles 18 and 22 regulated consular jurisdiction.

7. In 1836 the United States concluded a treaty. Article 14 provides that commerce with the United States shall be on the same footing as is the commerce with Spain or as that with the most-favoured-nation for the time being, and their citizens "shall . . . have full liberty to pass and repass our country and seaports whenever they please, without interruption." Article 20 also provides that "whatever indulgence, in trade or otherwise, shall be granted to any of the Christian Powers, the citizens of the United States shall be equally entitled to them." Other articles regulate United States consular jurisdiction.

8. The establishment of the French in Algeria in 1830 was an important development in Morocco's external relations. The revolt of the Algerian chieftain Abd-el-Kader led to Franco-Moroccan hostilities (1843-44), which were terminated by a convention signed at Tangier the 20th September, 1844. This convention contemplated the conclusion of conventions to delimit the boundaries and to regulate the political and commercial relations of the two countries.

7871 [11543] [12684]

B

Meanwhile, the old treaties were to be scrupulously respected and observed and France was to enjoy in all things treatment of the most favoured nation. The Treaty of Lalla Marnia of the 18th March, 1845, defined the boundaries. Commercial relations, however, continued to be based on the treaty of 1767 until the commercial agreement of 1892.

9. Two years after the Treaty of Lalla Marnia the Spanish possessions in North Africa were consolidated into a Captain-Generalship. A chronic state of hostilities with the Riff tribes ensued, which ultimately culminated in 1859 in a war between Spain and Morocco. Peace was re-established by the Treaty of Tetuan of the 26th April, 1860, and the Treaty of Madrid of the 30th October, 1861, by which Spain obtained certain territorial adjustments and the promise of a commercial treaty.

10. During this period Great Britain enjoyed a predominating influence in Morocco and the terms of the treaties of Lalla Marnia and Tetuan were largely determined by British pressure. In 1856 Great Britain concluded a general treaty and a commercial convention with Morocco, which laid down a new basis for the economic status of foreigners in Morocco.

11. General Treaty of 1856.—Article 3, corresponding to article 11 of the French treaty of 1767, provides for the Chargé d'Affaires and the consuls or vice-consuls being at liberty to choose interpreters and servants, either from the Mussulmans or others, who shall not be compelled to pay any capitation tax, forced contribution or other charge.

12. Article 4 sets out the personal privileges to be enjoyed by British subjects in Morocco, and provides that "they shall not be obliged to pay, under any pretence whatever, any taxes or impositions."

13. By certain articles (mainly articles 8, 9, 14, 16, 18) British subjects, as defendants, are only amenable to the British consular courts and are immune from the local jurisdiction. Jurisdiction is exercised by British consular courts and by the Supreme Court of Gibraltar under the Morocco Orders in Council, 1889-1929, Consolidated. These extra-territorial rights possessed by the United Kingdom in Morocco have never been surrendered. Consequently, as British subjects are exempt from taxation by article 4, no new tax can legally be levied on British subjects unless His Majesty's Government have agreed to the tax and a King's Regulation, under article 143 of the Morocco Orders in Council, 1889-1929, Consolidated, has been issued making it applicable to British subjects. Payment of the tax can only be enforced by proceedings in a British consular court.

14. Article 20 extends the privileges granted by the treaty to British subjects and "those who are under her (i.e., Her Majesty Queen Victoria) government or protection," and any subsequent privileges granted to any other Power are to be extended to all British subjects in every respect, as to the subjects of such other Power.

15. The treaty contains no provisions for termination.

16. The Commercial Convention of 1856 includes the following privileges:—

- (a) British subjects are to enjoy in Morocco the same protection and privileges as are or may be enjoyed by the nationals of the most favoured nation.
- (b) Further, they have the right to buy or sell in Morocco all articles except those specified by name as being subject to monopolies or prohibitions, viz.:—
 - (i) The following imported goods: tobacco pipes for smoking, opium, sulphur, powder, saltpetre, lead, arms of all kinds and ammunition of war; and
 - (ii) The following goods of domestic production: leeches, bark, tobacco and other herbs used for smoking (article (1) and (2)).

(c) As regards goods purchased for export and exported by British subjects—

- (i) Except the goods referred to in (b) (ii) above, British subjects can export Moroccan produce on any vessels on terms as favourable as the subjects of any foreign country or native subject (article 6 (2)).

- (ii) No tax or charge is to be levied except one export duty and no permit is to be required, and the goods may be conveyed to port and exported free of hindrance unless the goods belong to a class whose export from Morocco has been prohibited generally for some temporary purpose (see (iii) below) (article 3 and article 9).
- (iii) The export of grain or other articles from Morocco may be prohibited, but only if applied to subjects of every other nation. There are provisions under which British subjects must be allowed to dispose of stocks in their possession (article 5, and see also 7, paragraph 2).
- (iv) The export duty is limited according to a tariff laid down in the treaty and British subjects have most-favoured-nation rights (article 7).

(d) As regards imports into Morocco—

- (i) There is to be no prohibition of imports by British subjects except in the case of goods referred to in (b) (i) above (article 6).
- (ii) No import duty higher than 10 per cent. ad valorem is to be charged on goods imported by British subjects (article 7); and when once this duty has been paid, no further duty is to be paid on these goods even if they are conveyed by sea from one port to another in Morocco and embarked and disembarked more than once (article 8).
- (iii) The customs duties paid by British subjects shall not be higher than those paid on similar goods imported by the subjects of any foreign Power or native subjects (article 6).

(e) As regards British vessels—

The anchorage, tonnage, import or other duties levied on British vessels or on goods imported or exported in them shall not be greater than is levied on national vessels or goods carried by them, and, in any case, not exceed certain specified rates (article 10).

17. By article 14 the convention is subject to revision at the demand of either party, "but until such revision shall have been accomplished by common consent and a new convention shall have been concluded and ratified, the present convention shall continue and remain in full force and effect."

18. In 1858 a declaration was signed regulating commercial relations between the Netherlands and Morocco by the grant of most-favoured-nation treatment.

19. On the 20th November, 1861, Spain concluded the commercial treaty as provided for in the Treaty of Madrid of the 30th October, 1861. It is based on the United Kingdom-Morocco General Treaty and Commercial Convention of 1856, and thus provides for freedom of commerce (article 44), for exemption of Spanish subjects from taxes or impositions (article 5), for limitation of import duties to 10 per cent. ad valorem, and for specific duties on exports identical with those in the United Kingdom commercial convention (article 50). Spanish subjects are accorded most-favoured-nation treatment as regards persons and commerce (articles 15, 44, 49, 50). The rights of Spanish consular jurisdiction are laid down in articles 10, 11 and 16, the provisions being modelled on those in the United Kingdom General Treaty of 1856. Article 3 contains the same provisions as article 3 of the United Kingdom General Treaty of 1856 and article 11 of the French Treaty of 1767 as to interpreters and servants of the Chargé d'Affaires and consuls being exempt from personal taxes. The treaty abrogates previous commercial treaty instruments between Spain and Morocco.

20. In 1862 Belgium concluded a treaty of friendship and commerce with Morocco, by which the commercial relations of the two countries were based on most-favoured-nation treatment.

21. In 1863 France concluded an agreement with Morocco ("Règlement" Bécclard) dealing with the right of protection. It has already been stated that article 11 of the French Treaty of 1767, and articles 3 of the United Kingdom

General Treaty of 1856 and of the Spanish Treaty of 1861 dealt with this matter to a limited extent. The "règlement" of 1863 defined the categories of natives in Morocco that were to enjoy the protection of the representatives of France (a capitulatory Power), with the result that they became subject to capitulatory rights. The "règlement" became international by the accession of other Powers: Belgium, Sardinia, Sweden, United Kingdom, United States. This system of protection gave rise to difficulties and abuses, and it was with a view to remedy the unsatisfactory position that a conference was held in Madrid in 1880 which drew up the Madrid Convention of that year.

22. The convention confirmed the "règlement" of 1863 except as modified by the new convention. The contracting Powers are the United Kingdom, Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Hungary, Italy, Morocco, Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and United States of America, i.e., all the Powers possessing rights of consular jurisdiction in Morocco. Apart from the conditions laid down as to the manner in which protection may be granted, the following provisions should be mentioned. According to article 3, persons protected as employees of consuls, vice-consuls or consular agents "shall not be liable to any dues, imposts or taxes whatsoever, excepting as stipulated in articles 12 and 13." Article 11 gave foreigners the right to hold property in Morocco, purchase to be effected with the prior consent of the Sherrefian Government. Article 12 provided that foreigners and protected persons who are proprietors or renters of cultivated land, as well as brokers in agricultural matters shall pay an agrarian tax. The tax was to be fixed by a special regulation between the representatives of the Powers and the Moorish Minister for Foreign Affairs. Article 13 provided that foreigners, protected persons and brokers who own beasts of burden shall pay the gate tax, which was also to be fixed by special regulation as in the case of the agrarian tax. The gate tax was not to be augmented without a fresh agreement with the representatives of the Powers.

23. The agricultural tax remained inoperative as regards foreigners and protected persons until 1913. The gate tax, which was covered by the international regulations of 1881 and 1896 and a dahir of 1917, together with subsequent amending dahirs, will be dealt with in a later stage of this memorandum. The Madrid convention also provides (article 17) for the right of most-favoured-nation treatment in Morocco for all the contracting Powers. It seems to proceed on the basis that the rights acquired by the capitulatory Powers independently by their bilateral treaties are extended to all the others and, so to speak, codified, and not thenceforth to be modified save by the consent of all the Powers.

24. The Treaty of Commerce between Germany and Morocco of 1890 was abrogated by the Treaty of Versailles (similarly, the treaty between Austria and Morocco of 1830 was abrogated by the Treaty of Saint-Germain).

25. In 1892 a commercial agreement, as contemplated by the Tangier Treaty of 1844, was concluded between France and Morocco in the form of an exchange of letters between the French Minister at Tangier and the Moroccan Minister for Foreign Affairs. This agreement reduced to 5 per cent. the import duty, and also reduced the export duty, on certain specified articles. The concessions embodied in the agreement extend to other countries by virtue of most-favoured-nation treatment.

26. The importance attached by His Majesty's Government to their rights under the General Treaty and Commercial Convention of 1856, and under the Madrid Convention of 1880, is shown by an incident that occurred in 1893. In that year the French Legation at Tangier proposed the imposition of certain taxes on exports designed to raise a revenue for the Tangier Sanitary Commission, and contended that the Moorish Government would have the right to levy them on foreigners without the consent of the Powers. His Majesty's Government maintained that this contention was inadmissible. By article 4 of the General Treaty of 1856 British subjects shall not, under any pretence whatever, be obliged to pay any taxes or impositions, and the proposed impost, though made to take the form of an export duty, was in reality a municipal tax. Moreover, the imposition of a tax which would fall mainly upon British subjects would be at variance with the provision of most-favoured-nation treatment for British subjects in the commercial convention of 1856 and the Madrid Convention of 1880. Consequently, His Majesty's Minister at Tangier was instructed to state that His Majesty's Government would not consent to any tax unless it was equitably levied and did not press unduly upon British subjects.

27. On the 8th April, 1904, was signed the important declaration between the United Kingdom and France regarding Egypt and Morocco. Article 2 runs:—

"The Government of the French Republic declare that they have no intention of altering the political status of Morocco.

"His Britannic Majesty's Government, for their part, recognise that it appertains to France, more particularly as a Power whose dominions are continuous for a great distance with those of Morocco, to preserve order in that country, and to provide assistance for the purpose of all administrative, economic, financial and military reforms which it may require.

"They declare that they will not obstruct the action taken by France for this purpose, provided that such action shall leave intact the rights which Great Britain, in virtue of treaties, conventions and usage, enjoys in Morocco, including the right of coasting trade between the ports of Morocco, enjoyed by British vessels since 1901."

Article 4 runs:—

"The two Governments, being equally attached to the principle of commercial liberty both in Egypt and Morocco, declare that they will not in those countries countenance any inequality, either in the imposition of customs duties or other taxes, or of railway transport charges."

"This mutual engagement shall be binding for a period of thirty years. Unless this stipulation is expressly denounced at least one year in advance, the period shall be extended for five years at a time."

There has been no notice of denunciation.

Article 7 runs:—

"In order to secure the free passage of the Straits of Gibraltar, the two Governments agree not to permit the erection of any fortifications or strategic works on that portion of the coast of Morocco comprised between, but not including, Melilla and the heights which command the right bank of the River Sebou.

"This condition does not, however, apply to the places at present in the occupation of Spain on the Moorish coast of the Mediterranean."

By article 8—

The two Governments, inspired by their feeling of sincere friendship for Spain, take into special consideration the interests which that country derives from her geographical position and from her territorial possessions on the Moorish coast of the Mediterranean. In regard to these interests the French Government will come to an understanding with the Spanish Government.

The agreement which may be come to on the subject between France and Spain shall be communicated to His Britannic Majesty's Government.

28. There were also certain secret articles attached to the declaration, of which the following may be quoted:—

Article 2.—His Britannic Majesty's Government have no present intention of proposing to the Powers any changes in the system of the Capitulations, or in the judicial organisation of Egypt.

In the event of their considering it desirable to introduce in Egypt reforms tending to assimilate the Egyptian legislative system to that in force in other civilised countries, the Government of the French Republic will not refuse to entertain any such proposals, on the understanding that His Britannic Majesty's Government will agree to entertain the suggestions that the Government of the French Republic may have to make to them with a view of introducing similar reforms in Morocco.

Article 3.—The two Governments agree that a certain extent of Moorish territory adjacent to Melilla, Ceuta, and other présides should, whenever the Sultan ceases to exercise authority over it, come within the sphere of influence of Spain, and that the administration of the coast of Melilla as far as, but not including, the heights on the right bank of the Sebou shall be entrusted to Spain.

Nevertheless, Spain would previously have to give her formal assent to the provisions of articles 4 and 7 of the Declaration of to-day's date, and undertake to carry them out.

She would also have to undertake not to alienate the whole, or a part, of the territories placed under her authority or in her sphere of influence.

29. Spain gave her accession to the declaration, and on the 3rd October, 1904, signed with France another declaration in which both Powers expressed their firm attachment to the integrity of the Moroccan Empire under the sovereignty of the Sultan. A secret convention of the same date between France and Spain fixed (articles 2, 4 and 5) the boundaries of the sphere of influence which fell to Spain by virtue of her possessions on the Moorish coast of the Mediterranean. In that zone the same right of action was reserved to Spain as was reserved to France by the second paragraph of article 2 of the United Kingdom-France Declaration of 1904, which amounted to the right of preserving order and of providing assistance for the purpose of all administrative, economic, financial and military reforms that might be required. Spain agreed not to exercise this right of action during the first period—not to exceed fifteen years from the date of signature—that the convention was to be in force. France agreed that during the same period she would inform the Spanish Government previously of the advice she might tender to the Sultan of Morocco so far as the Spanish sphere of influence was concerned. After the expiry of the first period and as long as the status quo was maintained, France would not exercise her right of action with the Moroccan Government in respect of the Spanish sphere except in agreement with the Spanish Government. Article 3 of the secret convention laid down that in the event of the continuance of the political status of Morocco and of the Shereefian Government becoming impossible, or if for any cause the status quo could no longer be maintained, Spain might freely exercise her right of action in the territory which henceforward should constitute her sphere of influence. By article 9, "la ville de Tanger gardera le caractère spécial que lui donne la présence du corps diplomatique et ses institutions municipales et sanitaires." By article 11, "les Espagnols continueront de jouir au Maroc des droits que leur assurent les traités, conventions et usages en vigueur" By article 12, "les Français jouiront dans les régions désignées aux articles 2, 4 et 5, de la présente convention, des mêmes droits qui sont, par l'article précédent, reconnus aux Espagnols dans le reste du Maroc." By article 15, in the event of the denunciation of the United Kingdom-France Declaration of 1904, the French and Spanish Governments "se concerteront pour l'établissement d'un régime économique qui répond particulièrement à leurs intérêts réciproques."

30. A secret agreement between France and Spain of the 1st September, 1905, for the carrying out of the secret convention of the 3rd October, 1904, provided [III (2)] that "Les Espagnols et les Français . . . jouiront pour toujours au Maroc, dans l'exercice de leurs professions et la réalisation de leurs opérations commerciales et industrielles en cours ou projetées, des mêmes droits et privilèges, de manière que l'état juridique des sujets et ressortissants des deux nations soit constamment le même. Les marchandises des deux pays jouiront pour leur introduction, circulation et vente dans l'Empire, d'un traitement identique. Les deux hautes parties contractantes emploieront tous les moyens pacifiques en leur pouvoir et se prêteront mutuellement leur concours auprès du Sultan et du Makhzen en vue d'empêcher que, présentement comme dans l'avenir, cette clause ne vienne à être modifiée par l'autorité marocaine par suite de l'établissement de règles différentes en ce qui concerne l'état juridique des personnes et des conditions auxquelles seront soumises les marchandises des deux nations."

31. The Anglo-French and Franco-Spanish agreements of 1904 caused Germany to claim an interest in the Moroccan question, and the visit of the German Emperor to Tangier in 1905 brought about the first Moroccan crisis. This crisis led to the Franco-German agreements of the 8th July and the 28th September, 1905, which traced the programme of a future conference, the intention of which was that it should internationalise the Moroccan question. The conference took place at Algeciras in 1906, and an Act was drawn up, signed by Austria, Belgium, France, Germany, Hungary, Italy, Morocco, Netherlands, Portugal, Russia, Spain, Sweden, United Kingdom and United States of America. The United States signature (and ratification) was made with a reservation declaring that in subscribing to the regulations and declarations of the Act and in consenting to their application to United States citizens and interests in Morocco the United States Government assumed no obligation or responsibility as to the measures which may be necessary for their enforcement.

32. The preamble embodies the principle of economic liberty and equality (which is referred to again in article 105): the signatory Powers "inspired by the interest which attaches to the reign of order . . . in Morocco, and having recognised that this desirable end could only be attained by means of the introduction of reforms based upon the threefold principle of . . . economic liberty without any inequality have resolved" &c.

33. The reforms provided for by the Act relate to various matters which are dealt with in six chapters.

34. Chapter I relates to the organisation of the police.

35. Chapter II deals with the suppression of the illicit traffic in arms. Article 13 provides that "throughout the whole extent of the Shereefian Empire the importation of, and trade in, warlike arms . . . and all materials destined exclusively for the manufacture of ammunition are prohibited," except in cases specified in articles 14 and 15. (This is of interest as showing that Morocco could not prohibit imports save by consent of the Powers.) Article 18 provided for the regulation of the trade in non-rifled sporting or high-priced arms of foreign make by a Shereefian order made in conformity with the advice of the Diplomatic Body at Tangier, whose decision shall be declared by a majority of votes. Article 24 provides that where a vessel anchored in a port open to commerce is suspected of carrying arms or other prohibited goods for importation into Morocco, the Shereefian customs officers shall so inform the competent consular authority, in order that the latter may, with the assistance of the Shereefian customs officer, proceed to such enquiries, inspection or search as may be necessary. By article 15, in cases of importation of prohibited goods by sea at a port not open to commerce, the Moorish customs authorities may take the vessel to the nearest port, to be there handed over to the consular authority, who shall have the right to seize and retain it until payment of the fines.

36. Chapter III deals with the creation of a State bank. Article 45 runs:—

"Actions instituted by the Bank in Morocco shall be tried before the consular court of the defendant or before the Moorish courts, in accordance with the rules of competence laid down in the treaties and Shereefian firmans.

"Actions brought against the Bank in Morocco shall be tried before a special court composed of three consular magistrates and two assessors. The Diplomatic Body shall draw up annually the list of magistrates and assessors and of their substitutes.

"This court shall in such actions apply the rules of law, procedure and competence laid down by French law in matters of commerce. Appeals from judgments pronounced by this court shall lie to the Federal Court at Lausanne, whose decision shall be final."

37. Chapter IV embodies a declaration concerning an improved yield of the taxes and the creation of new sources of revenue.

38. Article 59 deals with the "tertib." This comprises: "(i) l'impôt des cultures annuelles; (ii) l'impôt des arbres fruitiers; (iii) l'impôt sur le bétail." The article runs:—

"As soon as the "tertib" shall have been regularly enforced on Moorish subjects, the representatives of the Powers at Tangier shall impose it upon their nationals within the Empire. It is, however, understood that the said tax shall not be imposed on foreigners except—

"(a) Under the conditions prescribed by the regulations made by the Diplomatic Body at Tangier under date of the 23rd November, 1903.

"(b) In the localities where it shall be actually collected from Moorish subjects.

"The consular authorities shall retain a proportion of the amount levied upon their nationals in order to cover the expenses incurred in drawing up the lists and collecting the tax.

"The rate of such deduction shall be fixed by agreement between the Makhzen and the Diplomatic Body at Tangier."

39. Article 60 recognises, in accordance with article 11 of the Madrid Convention of 1880, the right of foreigners to acquire real property throughout the Shereefian Empire. At ports open to trade the Sultan's authorisation is to be general and not in respect of each purchase. At other places the general authorisation is to be limited to purchases within a radius of 2 kilom. around the towns.

40. Article 61 recognises in principle a tax on town buildings, a portion of the revenue to be set aside for municipal roads and hygiene, and generally for improvements and conservancy in towns. The article also states:—

"The tax shall be leviable on Moorish or foreign proprietors without any distinction; but the tenant or custodian of the key shall be responsible therefor to the Moorish Treasury.

"Regulations made by common agreement between the Shereefian Government and the Diplomatic Body at Tangier shall fix the rate of the tax, lay down the manner of collecting and applying it, and determine what proportion of the resources thus created shall be devoted to meeting the cost of improvements and of conservancy in the towns.

"At Tangier such proportion shall be paid to the International Sanitary Council, which shall determine the manner of its application until a municipal organisation shall have been created."

41. Article 64 runs:—

"The conference takes note of the proposals formulated by the Shereefian delegates respecting the establishment of new taxes on certain trades, industries and professions.

"If, as the result of the collection of such taxes from Moorish subjects, the Diplomatic Body at Tangier should consider that their levy should be extended to foreigners, it is hereby stipulated that the said taxes shall be exclusively municipal."

42. By article 65 the conference accepted a proposal for the introduction, with the co-operation of the Diplomatic Body, of a stamp duty on contracts; transfer tax on real estate; statistical and weighing dues on goods despatched coastwise; passport fee levied from Moorish subjects; and eventually quay and lighthouse dues.

43. Article 66 provided that—

"As a temporary measure, goods of foreign origin shall, on their entry into Morocco, pay a special tax of 2½ per cent. ad valorem. The total revenue derived from this tax shall form a special fund, which shall be devoted to meeting the expenditure on, and execution of, public works undertaken for the development of navigation and trade generally in the Shereefian Empire.

"The programme of the works and the order of their execution shall be settled by agreement between the Shereefian Government and the Diplomatic Body at Tangier."

The article further provided that the moneys belonging to the special fund shall be deposited in the Morocco State Bank, and that public contracts shall be awarded in the form and according to conditions laid down in regulations drawn up by the Diplomatic Body at Tangier conjointly with the Sultan's representative. In connexion with this special tax, article 33 provided that its proceeds should be paid into the State Bank, together with such revenues as it may eventually hypothecate as security for its loans, the bank being specially charged with their service (exception being made of the 1904 loan, which is governed by a special contract); while article 36 provided that the proceeds shall form a special fund, for which the bank shall keep a separate account, and which shall be employed in accordance with the rules laid down by the conference.

44. By article 67 the conference expressed the hope that the export duties would be reduced on chick-peas, maize, barley and wheat.

45. Article 70 deals with berthage or anchorage dues, which were fixed by treaties with certain Powers. According to the article, the Powers were prepared to consent to revision of the dues, and the Diplomatic Body at Tangier was charged with drawing up, in agreement with the Makhzen, the conditions of revision.

46. Chapter V embodies regulations respecting the customs and the suppression of fraud and smuggling. The various articles contain provisions for protecting the Moorish customs against illicit importing and exporting, by measures agreed on with the capitulatory Powers and involving the collaboration of the consular authorities. According to article 102, every confiscation, fine or penalty shall be pronounced, in the case of foreigners, by the consular courts, and in the case of Moorish subjects by the Shereefian courts.

47. Article 75 of the Algeciras Act provides that in the event of any modifications of the provisions of Chapter IV an understanding must be arrived at between the Makhzen and the Diplomatic Body.

48. Article 104 provides that the regulations in Chapter V concerning the customs and suppression of fraud and smuggling, shall, after two years, be open to revision by the Diplomatic Body at Tangier in agreement with the Makhzen.

49. The Algeciras Act contains no provision as to termination.

50. It may be convenient here to mention the steps that were taken for the execution of some of the more important taxes provided for in the Act of Algeciras.

51. The "tertib" remained inoperative as regards foreigners until 1913, when regulations were drawn up and approved by the Diplomatic Body, and applied to British subjects by a King's Regulation. The international regulations were modified and replaced by two dahirs of the 10th March and the 11th March, 1915, together with an "arrêté" of the 14th March, 1915, regulating its levy. The dahirs and "arrêté" were made applicable to British subjects by a King's Regulation. An "arrêté" of the 15th February, 1921, abrogated the "arrêté" of the 14th March, 1915, but it was not made the subject of a King's Regulation.

52. The urban tax or tax on town buildings was covered by international regulations drawn up on the 10th January, 1908, which provided for revision after a period of six years. Revision was effected by a dahir of the 24th July, 1918, modified by a dahir of the 22nd May, 1919, and these two dahirs, together with dahirs of the 23rd June, 1923, and the 16th February, 1924, were, at the request of the French Resident-General, applied to British subjects in the French Zone by King's Regulation No. 6 of 1924.

53. The stamp tax was regulated by a dahir of the 15th December, 1917, which was made applicable, as regards the French Zone, to British subjects, by King's Regulation No. 1 of 1918. The dahir of 1917 was modified by a dahir of the 22nd December, 1923, which was likewise applied to British subjects by King's Regulation No. 4 of 1924.

54. The "patentes" tax (article 64 of the Act of Algeciras) was regulated by a dahir of the 9th October, 1920, which was made applicable to British subjects by "The 'Impôt des Patentes' (French Zone) Regulation, 1920." This dahir was amended by one of the 23rd May, 1922, and applied to British subjects by "The 'Impôt des Patentes' (French Zone) Amendment Regulation, 1922."

55. In 1909 an incident arose affecting British treaty rights as regards taxation, which recalled the incident of 1893 (see paragraph 26). The Sultan, without consulting the Powers, issued instructions for the collection from foreigners and protected persons at Fez of dues from which they had hitherto been exempt—market dues on woollen, cotton and silk garments, second-hand clothes, drapery, slippers, silver, arms, charcoal, wheat (resale), butter, oil, preserved meats, vegetables, wood, salt, wool. The Foreign Office approved the action of His Majesty's Minister in giving instructions for protected persons, pending a decision by the Powers, to pay the dues under protest and warning the Moorish authorities that repayment would be demanded. At the same time, His Majesty's Minister was reminded of the attitude taken up by His Majesty's Government with regard to the 1893 incident.

56. On another occasion, in 1909, tax was levied, in accordance with instructions issued by the Sultan, on goods belonging to a British-protected

Conf. 9617,
No. 380.

Conf. 9617,
Nos. 392 and 405.

Conf. 9617,
No. 392.

person, which had already paid import duty. His Majesty's Minister at Tangier pointed out to the Moorish Government that the tax was a breach of treaty stipulations, and referred to article 4 of the General Treaty of 1856. The modification of this stipulation in regard to certain specified taxes by the Madrid Convention and the Algeciras Act did not affect the general principle that except where His Majesty's Government had given their assent to any special tax being levied on British subjects or British-protected persons, they were absolutely exempt from all taxes or impositions whatever. His Majesty's Government agreed with this view, and the sum collected was, in fact, returned.

57. This case also raised a point which is of interest in connexion with the provision in the commercial convention of 1856, limiting to 10 per cent. ad valorem the duty on goods imported by British subjects. The point was whether goods of British origin should be exempted from any further tax, even though they had passed out of British hands and were in the possession of Moorish subjects. The view of His Majesty's Government was that any such taxation was contrary to the spirit and intention of both the commercial treaty of 1856 and the Algeciras Act. In ancient treaties, such as the Capitulations, it was customary to provide for the safety and good treatment of the British merchant, and to secure as an element of such good treatment that the goods which he brought to the foreign country should not pay more than a certain fixed rate of duty. This stipulation was preserved in British treaty arrangements with Morocco, probably on account of the primitive system of government prevailing there. Treaties on the modern model regard the nationality of the goods instead of that of the merchant who carries them; and that this was the view held by all the treaty Powers to be applicable in Morocco, was clearly proved by the wording of article 66 of the Algeciras Act, which does not speak of goods in the hands of the merchant, but provides that as a temporary measure goods of foreign origin shall, on entry, pay a special tax of 2½ per cent. ad valorem. The intention was clearly that such goods should not be subject to any dues exceeding the treaty rates plus 2½ per cent., and its effect would be entirely nullified if additional taxes could be imposed on the same goods inland. The French, Spanish, German and some of the other representatives concurred in the view of His Majesty's Government, and His Majesty's Minister suggested to the doyen that the Diplomatic Corps should address a protest to the Makhzen, declaring that the Powers absolutely refused to allow taxes to be imposed on goods of foreign origin over and above those authorised by treaty, even if the goods belonged to Moroccan citizens. There is nothing to show whether effect was actually given to this suggestion. In connexion with this point it may also be held that article 66 of the Act of Algeciras (which speaks of goods of foreign origin), article 4 of the United Kingdom-France Declaration of 1904, article 4 of the Franco-German Convention of 1911 (paragraph below), and, possibly, by implication, the United Kingdom-France Transit Agreement of the 24th August, 1916 (paragraph 96 below), prohibit inequality based on the origin of goods.

58. It has been said that the intention of the Algeciras Act was to internationalise the Moroccan question, but in effect France found herself in the main free to settle the lines of her Moroccan policy. However, disorders in Morocco hindered the application of French policy, and various incidents brought Germany into the field of diplomatic discussion. On the 9th February, 1909, France signed a declaration with Germany which ran:—

“Le Gouvernement de la République française, entièrement attaché au maintien de l'intégrité et de l'indépendance de l'Empire chérifien, résolu à y sauvegarder l'égalité économique, et par suite à ne pas y entraver les intérêts commerciaux et industriels allemands, “Et le Gouvernement impérial allemand, ne poursuivant que des intérêts économiques au Maroc, reconnaissant d'autre part que les intérêts politiques particuliers de la France y sont étroitement liés à la consolidation de l'ordre et de la paix intérieure et décidé à ne pas entraver ces intérêts,

“Déclarent qu'ils ne poursuivront et n'encourageront aucune mesure de nature à créer en leur faveur ou en faveur d'une Puissance quelconque un privilège économique et qu'ils chercheront à associer leurs nationaux dans les affaires dont ceux-ci pourront obtenir l'entreprise.”

59. In March 1910 France concluded agreements with Morocco embracing the evacuation of the Shawia (the coastal region of which Casablanca and Settat are the principal centres), the evacuation of the Algerian frontier region and a French loan to Morocco.

60. On the 16th November, 1910, Spain concluded an agreement with Morocco with the object of reaching a settlement of the difficulties that existed in the Spanish frontier regions. The agreement dealt with three main objects: (i) The administration of the occupied region in the Riff and of the territory lying near the Spanish fortresses of Alhucemas and Peñon de Vélez; (ii) Ceuta frontier arrangements; (iii) Melilla war indemnity.

61. In 1911 anarchy in Morocco rose to a head, and the Sultan, besieged in Fez, appealed to France for assistance. A French expeditionary force marched on Fez and raised the siege. Germany now renewed her claims to a voice in Moroccan affairs, and the despatch of a German gunboat to Agadir brought about the second Moroccan crisis. Negotiations followed between France and Germany which resulted in the important convention of the 4th November, 1911.

62. Article 1 of this convention runs:—

“Le Gouvernement impérial allemand déclare que, ne poursuivant au Maroc que des intérêts économiques, il n'entravera pas l'action de la France en vue de prêter son assistance au Gouvernement marocain pour l'introduction de toutes les réformes administratives financières et militaires dont il a besoin pour le bon gouvernement de l'Empire comme aussi pour tous les règlements nouveaux et les modifications aux règlements existants que ces réformes comportent. En conséquence, il donne son adhésion aux mesures de réorganisation, de contrôle et de garantie financière que, après accord avec le Gouvernement marocain, le Gouvernement français croira devoir prendre à cet effet, sous la réserve que l'action de la France sauvegardera au Maroc l'égalité économique entre les nations.

“Au cas où la France serait amenée à préciser son contrôle et sa protection, le Gouvernement impérial allemand, reconnaissant pleine liberté d'action à la France, et sous la réserve que la liberté commerciale, prévue par les traités antérieurs, sera maintenue, n'y apportera aucun obstacle. . . .”

Accordingly, by article 2, the German Government “ne fera pas obstacle à ce que la France, après accord avec le Gouvernement marocain, procède aux occupations militaires du territoire marocain qu'elle jugerait nécessaire au maintien de l'ordre et de la sécurité des transactions commerciales. . . .”

63. Article 4 runs:—

“Le Gouvernement français déclare que, fermement attaché au principe de la liberté commerciale au Maroc, il ne se prêtera à aucune inégalité pas plus dans l'établissement des droits de douane, impôts et autres taxes, que dans l'établissement des tarifs de transport par voie ferrée, et notamment dans toutes les questions de transit.

“Le Gouvernement français s'emploiera également auprès du Gouvernement marocain afin d'empêcher tout traitement différentiel entre les ressortissants des différentes Puissances; il s'opposera notamment à toute mesure, par exemple la promulgation d'ordonnances administratives sur les poids et mesures, le jaugeage, le poinçonnage, &c., qui pourraient mettre en état d'infériorité les marchandises d'une Puissance. . . .”

64. Article 6 modified to some extent the privileges secured under the Act of Algeciras with regard to adjudications for public works. The article provides that the French Government will see to it that works and supplies required for the construction of roads, railways, posts, telegraphs, &c., will be granted in accordance with the rules of adjudication, and that such rules will not place the nationals of any Power in a position of inferiority. It goes on to provide, however, that the exploitation of such “grandes entreprises” as those above mentioned may be “librement concédées à des tiers” by the Moroccan Government.

The fifth paragraph of article 6 runs:—

“De même, le Gouvernement français s'emploiera auprès du Gouvernement marocain pour que, durant la période où restera en vigueur l'article 66 de l'Acte d'Algeciras, il confie à un ressortissant d'une des Puissances représentées au Maroc un des trois postes de délégué chérifien au Comité spécial des Travaux publics.”

This reference to article 66 of the Algeciras Act being in force is an indication as to the retention of the limits of customs duties.

65. Article 9 provides for the reference to an arbitrator of complaints brought by foreign nationals against the Moorish authorities or agents, which have not been found capable of adjustment through the intermediary of the French consul and the consul of the interested Power. This mode of procedure was to continue pending the introduction of a "régime judiciaire inspiré des règles générales de législation des Puissances intéressées et destiné à remplacer, après entente avec elles, les tribunaux consulaires."

66. By article 12, the two Governments undertake, at the request of the Moorish Government, to endeavour, in agreement with the other Powers and on the basis of the Madrid Convention, to secure the revision of the lists and position of foreign protégés and mokhalats, and also to move the signatory Powers to introduce such modifications into the Madrid Convention "que comporteraient . . . le changement du régime des protégés et associés agricoles."

67. Article 13 abrogated all contrary stipulations in previous treaty instruments.

68. By article 14 the convention was to be communicated to the Powers signatory of the Algeciras Act, and the two Governments engaged to support each other in obtaining the accession of those Powers.

69. According to Basdevant's Traité et Conventions en vigueur entre la France et les Puissances étrangères, the convention of 1911 was acceded to by all the Powers signatory of the Act of Algeciras on the following dates: Austria-Hungary, December 28, 1911; Belgium, April 24, 1912; Spain, November 6, 1912; United States, December 15, 1911; Great Britain, November 14, 1911; Italy, November 7, 1911; Morocco, November 6, 1911; Netherlands, March 15, 1913; Portugal, May 14, 1913; Russia, November 15, 1911; Sweden, November 11, 1911. So far as the accession of the United States is concerned, the above statement appears to be incorrect, as the United States Government in their note of the 15th December, 1911, to the French Ambassador in Washington deliberately refrained from expressing any opinion on the political parts of the Franco-German Convention, and as regards the articles relating to commercial rights and the administration of justice, pointed out that accession could only be done by and with the advice and consent of the United States Senate. The United States Government were willing, when the proper time came, to enter into negotiations for new treaty arrangements regarding extra-territorial rights and rights of United States protégés, and in general to agree in principle to the other articles of the Franco-German agreement provided that the commercial and other advantages secured by existing United States treaties were preserved.

70. The accession of the United Kingdom was made on the explicit understanding that the provisions of articles 4 and 7 of the United Kingdom-France Declaration of 1904 were in no way affected, that British subjects in Morocco would receive no less favourable treatment than that accorded to the subjects of any other Power, and that adequate arrangements would be made for placing the town and municipal district of Tangier definitely under international control.

71. There were also explanatory notes annexed to the convention of 1911. By these notes it was agreed that "dans l'hypothèse où le Gouvernement français croirait devoir assumer le Protectorat du Maroc, le Gouvernement impérial n'y apporterait aucun obstacle," and that "l'adhésion du Gouvernement allemand, accordée d'une manière générale au Gouvernement français par l'article 1^{er} de ladite convention, s'applique, naturellement, à toutes les questions donnant matière à réglementation et visées dans l'Acte d'Algésiras." The French Government promise that as soon as the judicial system contemplated by article 9 of the convention is instituted and the consular courts are replaced, German nationals shall be placed in exactly the same conditions as French nationals. The view was expressed also that the expression "les changements du régime des protégés" in article 12 of the convention "implique l'abrogation, si elle est jugée nécessaire, de la partie de la Convention de Madrid qui concerne les protégés et associés agricoles."

72. The Franco-German Convention of 1911 is contended by the French Government to have effected important modifications of previous treaty rights in Morocco. This contention is developed in the course of diplomatic correspondence between the British and French Governments arising out of the consumption and gate taxes in the French Zone, an aspect which is dealt with later on in this memorandum. It may be useful, however, at this point to set out statements made in the debate in the French Senate and from certain other sources which bear on the interpretation and effect of the convention.

73. In the debate in the French Senate the president of the Foreign Affairs Commission (M. Deschanel) said:—

"Nous ne sommes pas maîtres des tarifs! Mais est-ce donc là une nouveauté et pouvons-nous espérer autre chose? Pouvons-nous supprimer le passé, les grands intérêts commerciaux de l'Angleterre, notre accord de 1904 avec elle, établissant la liberté commerciale, et l'Acte d'Algésiras qui la consacrait au profit de toutes les Puissances? Et d'autre part, pouvons-nous supprimer ce traité de commerce que l'Allemagne, devançant et déjouant l'Angleterre, avait réussi à conclure avec le Maghzen?"—(French Senate, December 16, 1911.)

74. The rapporteur (M. Long) referred to article 4 of the convention, according to which the French Government declared that "il ne se prêtera à aucune inégalité, pas plus dans l'établissement des droits de douane, impôts et autres taxes que dans l'établissement des tarifs de transport." M. Long said: "On peut regretter l'impossibilité où nous serons d'établir au Maroc une barrière douanière qui aurait pu nous assurer, comme dans certaines de nos colonies, le privilège exclusif du commerce du Maroc. Mais enfin ce n'est pas là un nouveau régime." It was necessary (he said) to compare the article with the provisions of (the first paragraphs of) article 4 of the Anglo-French Declaration of 1904, which were couched in almost similar terms. M. Long went on to say:—

"Ce qui est à retenir, par exemple, de cet article 4 [Franco-German Convention], c'est que ces clauses qui ne font que préciser le principe posé à l'article 1^{er} montrent du moins très clairement que le Gouvernement marocain reprend le plein exercice de sa souveraineté en ce qui concerne l'établissement des droits de douane, impôts et autres taxes, puisque, précisément, cet article 4 n'en subordonne l'établissement à aucune autre restriction que le respect du principe de l'égalité."

"Sous le régime d'Algésiras, les articles 75 et 76 imposaient l'adhésion du Corps diplomatique à tout établissement ou remaniement d'impôts. L'Etat marocain reprend à cet égard sa pleine et entière liberté, sauf une restriction spéciale aux minerais de fer. En ce qui concerne les douanes, l'article 103 [sic: ? 104] de l'Acte d'Algésiras imposait cette adhésion diplomatique à toute revision. Aujourd'hui, le Gouvernement marocain retrouve à cet égard le plein exercice de sa souveraineté, dans la limite, bien entendu, de ses obligations conventionnelles qui dérivent des traités passés avec diverses Puissances. . . ."—(French Senate, December 18, 1911.)

75. The President of the Council (M. Caillaux) said: "Il n'est pas douteux que c'est chose sérieuse de s'engager à instituer la porte ouverte et à exclure tout tarif différentiel. Mais ce régime n'existe-t-il que pour le Maroc? Quel est donc le régime du Congo? Il est le même. Que dis-je? Il est plus rigoureux." M. Caillaux went on to remark that, in the Congo conventional basin, customs duties were limited to a maximum of 10 per cent. for goods of any origin. "Au Maroc les droits sont actuellement de 12;50 pour cent, ce qui ne fait pas une grosse différence; mais on n'est pas lié pour la quotité, on est lié seulement sur la question de principe."—(Senate, December 18, 1911.)

76. M. Poincaré (President of the Council in the succeeding French Government) said, in a subsequent debate on the same question:—

"Cette disposition [regarding economic equality and freedom of commerce in article 4] implique évidemment, pour le Gouvernement marocain le droit d'établir des impôts ou des taxes applicables aux étrangers, sans aucune autre condition que le respect de l'égalité de traitement."

"Le Gouvernement marocain, il est vrai, a signé . . . un certain nombre de traités avec les Puissances européennes: en 1856 avec la Grande-Bretagne; en 1861 avec l'Espagne; en 1890 avec l'Allemagne; . . .

"Mais . . . les clauses de ces traités qui seraient en contradiction avec l'accord du 4 novembre tomberaient vis-à-vis des nations adhérentes en vertu de l'article 13.

"Au reste, toutes ces conventions ont été conclues pour des durées très brèves : . . . Sans doute . . . il a été stipulé qu'après l'expiration de ces délais, ces traités demeureraient en vigueur jusqu'à ce qu'ils eussent été révisés d'un commun accord. Mais . . . il serait contraire au droit public moderne que cette clause pût être interprétée dans le sens de la perpétuité du statu quo. Et, tout en respectant scrupuleusement l'égalité économique, qui est le grand principe consacré par le traité du 4 novembre 1911, le Gouvernement français s'emploiera à résoudre, au mieux des intérêts français et marocains, ces délicates questions de tarifs douaniers. . . ." (Senate, February 10, 1912.)

77. The compilation: Traités, Codes et Lois du Maroc, published by P.-Louis Rivière, which is prefaced by a letter from General Lyautey, concludes the introduction (Tome I) with the following passage:—

"L'édifice conventionnel qui a précédé, au Maroc, l'établissement du Protectorat français demeure debout dans son ensemble. D'une part, en effet, les dispositions des traités antérieurs à la Conférence d'Algésiras n'ont été infirmées qu'autant qu'elles se trouvent contraires à celles de l'Acte du 7 avril 1906; pour le reste, elles demeurent en vigueur. D'autre part, les clauses de cet Acte n'ont été entamées dans leur principe ni par le Traité de Protectorat signé à Fez, le 30 mars 1912, ni par le Traité de Versailles, ni par aucune convention ultérieure. L'Acte d'Algésiras demeure la charte internationale du Maroc."

78. The Réglementation douanière of the Service des Douanes et Régies du Maroc (1931) in the section (128) on import tariff states: "Les marchandises d'origine étrangère sont passibles, à leur entrée au Maroc, d'un droit de douane de 10 pour cent ad valorem," and mentions Morocco's treaties with Spain of 1799 and 1861, with the United Kingdom of 1856 and with Germany of 1890. (The special tax of 2½ per cent. under article 66 of the Act of Algéciras is also mentioned.) In the section (162) on exportation it is stated: "Les traités passés par l'Empire chérifien avec les diverses Puissances étrangères ont fixé le taux des taxes de sortie à percevoir sur les produits d'origine marocaine. Le tarif des droits d'exportation, actuellement appliqué, résulte des dispositions combinées des traités des 9 décembre 1856 (anglo-marocain), 20 novembre 1861 (hispano-marocain), 1^{er} juin 1890 (germano-marocain) et 21 octobre 1892 (franco-marocain), dont les stipulations ont été rendues applicables à tous les États en vertu de la clause de la nation la plus favorisée insérée à l'article 17 de la Convention de Madrid du 3 juillet 1880 et du principe de l'égalité économique entre toutes les Puissances posé par l'Acte d'Algésiras." Again, in regard to the origin of goods, the publication states (paragraph 54) that, in conformity with the provisions of the Act of Algéciras and of article 17 of the Madrid Convention, article 4 of the Anglo-French Declaration of 1904, article 4 of the Franco-German Convention of 1911, article 1 of the Anglo-French Agreement of the 24th August, 1916, "il n'est fait aucune distinction, à l'entrée au Maroc, au point de vue de l'application du tarif, en raison de l'origine ou de la provenance des marchandises." In this connexion attention may be drawn to the observations in paragraph above. A despatch of the 21st November, 1911, from His Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin recorded that the German Government, according to a statement of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in the Reichstag on certain points connected with the Morocco Convention, were of the opinion that all German treaty rights in respect of Morocco remained in force in virtue of the axiom of international law that treaties contracted by a State continued to be operative after a protectorate has been established over such State. Any complaints which Germany might have to make to Morocco in regard to her treaty rights would in future be addressed to the Sultan through French channels.

79. It may be admitted that by their accession to the Franco-German Convention of 1911 His Majesty's Government engage to adopt a benevolent attitude towards the French authorities in Morocco as regards the introduction of all reforms of an administrative, judicial, economic, financial and military nature, necessary for the good government of the country, and as regards all new regulations and modifications of existing regulations required by such reforms. Dahirs have, in fact, been issued during the French protectorate (see paragraph 80 et seq. below), modifying or replacing former regulations drawn up with the approval of the Diplomatic Body, as in the case of the "tertib" and the urban tax. The "tertib" regulations of 1913, as approved by the Diplomatic Body, contained a final article providing for revision after two years on the demand of one of the Algéciras Powers. The French Ambassador in London in a note of the 26th March, 1913, stated that the French Government "estime que l'application de cette disposition serait peu compatible avec le plein exercice du protectorat et des droits qui lui ont été reconnus par l'accord du 4 novembre 1911. Il formule donc à cet égard des réserves." In the minutes on the paper, the view was taken that the French Government were no doubt right on this point, and, in reply, His Majesty's Government took note of the reservation. Nevertheless, the benevolent attitude of His Majesty's Government in such respects is without prejudice to their already existing treaty rights, which are unaffected by the Franco-German convention. It can be admitted that the provisions of the convention regarding adjudications modify previous regulations based on the Act of Algéciras. It cannot be contended that the judicial reforms under the convention affect British rights of consular jurisdiction, and His Majesty's Government do not admit that any of the commercial and fiscal privileges under British treaties have lost their force by virtue of the Franco-German convention. The moral obligation of His Majesty's Government to apply dahirs to British subjects by King's Regulations in order not to embarrass the French Government in carrying out measures necessary for the good government of Morocco is subject to there being no actual discrimination against British trade. (The same principle applies to the Spanish Zone, see paragraph 82 et seq. below.)

80. The conclusion of the convention of 1911 with Germany left France free to enter into negotiations with Morocco, with the result that a protectorate treaty was signed at Fez on the 30th March, 1912.

81. By the first paragraph of article 1 of this treaty, which may be compared with the first paragraph of article 1 of the Franco-German Convention of 1911, France and Morocco "sont d'accord pour instituer au Maroc un nouveau régime comportant les réformes administratives, judiciaires, scolaires, économiques, financières et militaires que le Gouvernement français jugera utile d'introduire sur le territoire marocain."

By the third paragraph of article 1 the French Government "se concertera avec le Gouvernement espagnol au sujet des intérêts que ce Gouvernement tient de sa position géographique et de ses possessions territoriales sur la côte marocaine."

By the final paragraph of the article, "la ville de Tanger gardera le caractère spécial qui lui a été reconnu et qui déterminera son organisation municipale."

By article 2, the Sultan agrees that the French Government should proceed with such military occupation of Moorish territory as may be deemed necessary for the maintenance of order and the security of commercial transactions, and should undertake police measures on land and in Moroccan waters.

Article 4 runs:—

"Les mesures que nécessitera le nouveau régime de Protectorat seront édictées, sur la proposition du Gouvernement français, par Sa Majesté chérifienne ou par les autorités auxquelles elle en aura délégué le pouvoir. Il en sera de même des règlements nouveaux et des modifications aux règlements existants."

Article 5:—

"Le Gouvernement français sera représenté auprès de Sa Majesté chérifienne par un Commissaire Résident général, dépositaire de tous les pouvoirs de la République au Maroc, qui veillera à l'exécution du présent accord."

"Le Commissaire Résident général sera le seul intermédiaire du Sultan auprès des représentants étrangers et dans les rapports que ces représentants entretiennent avec le Gouvernement marocain. Il sera, notamment, chargé de toutes les questions intéressant les étrangers dans l'Empire chérifien. Il aura le pouvoir d'approuver et de promulguer, au nom du Gouvernement français, tous les décrets rendus par Sa Majesté chérifienne."

Article 6 :—

"Les agents diplomatiques et consulaires de la France seront chargés de la représentation et de la protection des sujets et des intérêts marocains à l'étranger."

"Sa Majesté le Sultan s'engage à ne conclure aucun acte ayant un caractère international sans l'assentiment préalable du Gouvernement de la République française."

82. The French Protectorate Treaty of 1912 was followed by the Franco-Spanish Convention of the 27th November, 1912, defining the French and Spanish positions in Morocco.

By article 1 :—

"Le Gouvernement de la République française reconnaît que, dans la zone d'influence espagnole, il appartient à l'Espagne de veiller à la tranquillité de ladite zone et de prêter son assistance au Gouvernement marocain pour l'introduction de toutes les réformes administratives, économiques, financières, judiciaires et militaires dont il a besoin, comme aussi pour tous les règlements nouveaux et les modifications aux règlements existants que ces réformes comportent, conformément à la déclaration franco-anglaise du 8 avril 1904 et à l'Accord franco-allemand du 4 novembre 1911."

"Les régions comprises dans la zone d'influence déterminée à l'article 2 resteront placées sous l'autorité civile et religieuse du Sultan, suivant les conditions du présent accord."

"Ces régions seront administrées, sous le contrôle d'un haut-commissaire espagnol, par un khalifa choisi par le Sultan sur une liste de deux candidats présentés par le Gouvernement espagnol. Les fonctions du khalifa ne seront maintenues ou retirées au titulaire qu'avec le consentement du Gouvernement espagnol."

"Le khalifa résidera dans la zone d'influence espagnole et habituellement à Tétouan; il sera pourvu d'une délégation générale du Sultan, en vertu de laquelle il exercera les droits appartenant à celui-ci."

"Cette délégation aura un caractère permanent. En cas de vacance, les fonctions de khalifa seront, provisoirement et d'office, remplies par le pacha de Tétouan."

"Les actes de l'autorité marocaine dans la zone d'influence espagnole seront contrôlés par le haut-commissaire espagnol et ses agents. Le haut-commissaire sera le seul intermédiaire dans les rapports que le khalifa, en qualité de délégué de l'autorité impériale dans la zone espagnole, aura à entretenir avec les agents officiels étrangers, étant donné d'ailleurs qu'il ne sera pas dérogé à l'article 5 du Traité franco-chérifien du 30 mars 1912."

"Le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté le Roi d'Espagne veillera à l'observation des traités et spécialement des clauses économiques et commerciales insérées dans l'Accord franco-allemand du 4 novembre 1911."

"Aucune responsabilité ne pourra être imputée au Gouvernement chérifien du chef de réclamations motivées par des faits qui se seraient produits sous l'administration du khalifa dans la zone d'influence espagnole."

83. By article 7 :—

"La ville de Tanger et sa banlieue seront dotées d'un régime spécial qui sera déterminé ultérieurement; elles formeront une zone comprise dans les limites décrites ci-après."

84. By article 10 :—

"Les impôts et ressources de toutes sortes dans la zone espagnole seront affectés aux dépenses de ladite zone."

85. By article 11 :—

"Le Gouvernement chérifien ne pourra être appelé à participer à aucun titre aux dépenses de la zone espagnole."

86. Article 13 provides an arrangement for each zone to receive the produce of its own customs. The Tangier customs receipts are to be divided between the international, Spanish and French zones, according to the ultimate destination of the goods. The following provisions may be quoted :—

"Les deux Gouvernements conviennent :

"1. Que, balance faite des recettes douanières que chacun des deux administrations zonaires encaissera sur les produits introduits par ses douanes à destination de l'autre zone, il reviendra à la zone française une somme totale de 500,000 pesetas hassani se décomposant ainsi :

"2. Que les recettes douanières encaissées par le bureau de Tanger devront être réparties entre la zone internationalisée et les deux autres zones, au prorata de la destination finale des marchandises. En attendant que le fonctionnement des chemins de fer permette une exacte répartition des sommes dues à la zone française et à la zone espagnole, le service des douanes versera en dépôt à la Banque d'Etat l'excédent de ces recettes, paiement fait de la part de Tanger."

"Les administrations douanières des deux zones s'entendront par l'entremise de représentants, qui se réuniront périodiquement à Tanger, sur les mesures propres à assurer l'unité d'application des tarifs."

87. Article 18 runs :—

"En ce qui concerne le Comité des Valeurs douanières, le Comité spécial des Travaux publics et la Commission générale des Adjudications, durant la période où ces comités resteront en vigueur, il sera réservé à la désignation du khalifa de la zone espagnole un des sièges de délégué chérifien dans chacun de ces trois comités."

"Les deux Gouvernements sont d'accord pour réserver à chaque zone et affecter à ses travaux publics le produit de la taxe spéciale perçue dans ses ports en vertu de l'article 66 de l'Acte d'Algésiras."

"Les services respectifs seront autonomes."

"Sous condition de réciprocité, les délégués de l'administration de la zone française voteront avec les délégués du khalifa dans les questions intéressant la zone espagnole et notamment pour tout ce qui concerne la détermination des travaux à exécuter sur les fonds de la taxe spéciale, leur exécution, et la désignation du personnel que cette exécution comporte."

88. Article 19 :—

"Le Gouvernement de la République française et le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté catholique se concerteront en vue de :

"1. Toutes les modifications qui devraient être apportées dans l'avenir aux droits de douane;

"2. L'unification des tarifs postaux et télégraphiques dans l'intérieur de l'Empire."

89. Article 21 :—

"Le Gouvernement de la République française et le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté catholique s'engagent à provoquer la revision, d'accord avec les autres Puissances et sur la base de la Convention de Madrid, des listes et de la situation des protégés étrangers et des associés agricoles visés par les articles 8 et 16 de cette convention."

"Ils conviennent également de poursuivre auprès des Puissances signataires toute modification de la Convention de Madrid que comporteraient, le moment venu, le changement du régime des protégés et associés agricoles, et éventuellement l'abrogation de la partie de ladite convention concernant les protégés et associés agricoles."

90. Article 24 :—

"Le Gouvernement de la République française et le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté catholique se réservent la faculté de procéder à l'établissement, dans leurs zones respectives, d'organisations judiciaires inspirées de leurs législations. Une fois ces organisations établies et les nationaux et protégés de chaque pays soumis, dans la zone de celui-ci, à la juridiction de ces tribunaux, le Gouvernement de la République française, dans la zone d'influence espagnole, et le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté le Roi d'Espagne, dans la zone d'influence française, soumettront également à cette juridiction locale leurs nationaux et protégés respectifs.

"Tant que le paragraphe 3 de l'article 11 de la Convention de Madrid du 3 juillet 1880 sera en vigueur, la faculté qui appartient au Ministre des Affaires étrangères de Sa Majesté chérifienne de connaître en appel des questions de propriété immobilière des étrangers fera partie, pour ce qui concerne la zone espagnole, de l'ensemble des pouvoirs délégués au khalifa."

91. The letters annexed to the Franco-Spanish Convention of the 27th November, 1912, dealt with the appointment of the Khalifa, and also stated that "pour les relations diplomatiques des Gouvernements étrangers avec le Sultan, il est bien entendu, en effet, que la mention faite dans la présente convention (see article 1) de l'article 5 du Traité franco-chérifien du 30 mars 1912 en réserve à la France le monopole."

92. The French protectorate over Morocco was recognised by His Majesty's Government in December 1914, such recognition being announced in the following notice, dated the 19th December, 1914, published in the London Gazette :—

"His Majesty's Government having been informed that the Government of the French Republic have recognised the British protectorate over Egypt, His Britannic Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs hereby gives notice that His Majesty's Government adhere to the Franco-Moorish Treaty of the 30th March, 1912."

93. On the other hand, His Majesty's Government have not acceded to the Franco-Spanish Convention of the 27th November, 1912, although the position of Spain in the Spanish Zone has been accepted de facto by His Majesty's Government.

94. Shortly before the conclusion of the Franco-Spanish Convention of 1912 France and Italy signed, on the 28th October, 1912, an agreement to the effect that the two countries "confirment leur mutuelle intention de n'apporter réciproquement aucun obstacle à la réalisation de toutes les mesures qu'ils jugeront opportun d'édicter, la France, au Maroc, et l'Italie, en Libye," and that most-favoured-nation treatment should be reciprocally assured to their nationals, products, establishments and enterprises.

95. On the 11th June, 1914, an agreement was concluded between Switzerland and France. By article 1 Switzerland is to enjoy in the French Zone "liberté économique, sans inégalité aucune, telle qu'elle résulte de l'Acte général d'Algésiras du 7 avril 1906 et des conventions internationales subséquentes," and also unconditional most-favoured-nation treatment. By article 2 Switzerland renounced capitulatory privileges in the French Zone. By article 3 "les traités et conventions de toute nature en vigueur entre la Suisse et la France sont, sauf clause contraire, étendus à la Zone française de l'Empire chérifien, pour autant que cette extension n'est pas contraire au contenu même desdits accords ou n'est pas incompatible avec l'égalité économique stipulée au § 1 du présent arrangement." All the Powers have renounced their rights of consular jurisdiction in the French Zone with the exception of the United States and the United Kingdom. Many of the instruments of renunciation contain the provision set out in article 3 of the above agreement with Switzerland of 1914.

96. On the 24th August, 1916, an agreement was concluded between the United Kingdom and France respecting trade with Morocco and Egypt in transit through British and French territories in Africa. Article 1 runs :—

"Goods exported from or despatched to the United Kingdom, which may be despatched to or emanate from Morocco, and which pass in transit through . . . territories bordering on Morocco and belonging to France or recognising her sovereignty . . . shall be accorded a treatment exactly similar to that applied to goods exported from or despatched to France . . . so far as concerns customs duties and other dues to which they may be liable in the territories through which they pass in transit, so far as concerns railway rates and imposts, so far as concerns the customs regulations in force affecting their ingress and egress, so far as concerns the method of transit, and, in general, so far as concerns all customs facilities."

This agreement, it may be noted, deals with goods of United Kingdom origin.

97. In 1919, as the result of negotiations between His Majesty's Government and the French Government, a draft convention was drawn up concerning Egypt and Morocco. In May of that year, however, it was learned that the French Government would not consent to sign the convention until the question of Tangier and of the Spanish Zone had been disposed of. In a despatch from Paris to Lord Curzon reporting the French attitude, Lord Balfour stated : "The convention is very near completion. In fact, the text is agreed and a covering letter to M. Pichon had already been drafted. The questions of Tangier and of the Spanish Zone, moreover (as the French Government know very well), have nothing to do with this convention. If, therefore, the French Government really intended at the eleventh hour to refuse signature, this would have amounted to a bad breach of faith, and I should have proposed to take a strong line with the French Government." In view, however, of certain considerations affecting Egypt, it was decided not to press the French to sign; the negotiations were suspended and the convention was never signed. Nevertheless, it seems reasonable to contend that the French Government at the time accepted the principles contained in the draft of the convention as ready for signature.

98. The preamble of the draft convention ran :—

"His Britannic Majesty's Government and the Government of the French Republic, deeming that, by reason of the recognition by the former of the French protectorate in Morocco, and by the latter of the British protectorate in Egypt, the time has arrived for giving full measure of effect to the declaration of the 8th April, 1904, both in Egypt and in the French Zone of Morocco, in which territories the two respective Governments henceforward assume responsibility for the maintenance of peace, order and good government;

"And cognisance having been taken by the British Government of the guarantees afforded to them by the laws already promulgated in the French Zone of Morocco, and by the Government of the French Republic of the guarantees afforded to them by the Egyptian draft judicature Law for Unified Tribunals;

"Have determined to substitute the provisions contained herein for the régime at present prevailing in Egypt so far as relates to French nationals, and in the French Zone of Morocco so far as relates to British nationals."

99. Article 1 provides for the renunciation of British capitulatory privileges in the French Zone.

By article 5—

"All treaties between Great Britain and Morocco are and shall remain abrogated so far as concerns the French Zone. Pending, however, the conclusion of a new treaty of commerce and navigation, the commercial convention of the 9th December, 1856, between Great Britain and Morocco, supplemented by article 68 of the Act of Algéciras of the 7th April, 1906, relative to the export of cattle, shall remain in force except as regards any stipulations incompatible with article 1 of the present convention."

This implies that the Commercial Convention of 1856 was considered to be still valid.

100. As regards Tangier, article 9 of the Secret Franco-Spanish Convention of 1904, article 1 of the French Protectorate Treaty of 1912 and article 7 of the Franco-Spanish Convention of 1912 recognised the existence of a special régime there. It was not, however, until 1923 that a convention was drawn up laying down the organisation of the Tangier Zone. The convention was signed at Paris on the 18th December, 1923, by the United Kingdom, France and Spain. It was ratified by these Powers and acceded to by Belgium, Netherlands, Portugal and Sweden. Italy became a party when the revising agreement of the 25th July, 1928, was concluded between the United Kingdom, France, Italy and Spain, to which also Belgium, Netherlands, Portugal and Sweden acceded.

101. The statute defines the Tangier Zone as lying within the boundaries fixed by the Franco-Spanish Convention of 1912. Under the sovereignty of the Sultan, whose rights in this respect are not prejudiced by the statute, the zone is to enjoy legislative and administrative autonomy, although in respect of diplomatic matters there is to be no derogation from the provisions of article 5 of the French Protectorate Treaty of 1912, the French Resident-General being, therefore, the channel of communication vis-à-vis foreign Powers. Thus, article 5 runs:—

"The Tangier Zone shall possess, under authority delegated by His Shereefian Majesty and subject to the exceptions provided for, the most extensive legislative and administrative powers. This delegation of authority shall be permanent and general, except in diplomatic matters, where there shall be no derogation from the provisions of article 5 of the Protectorate Treaty of the 30th March, 1912.

"The duly constituted authorities of the zone may, however, negotiate with the consuls on questions of interest to the zone within the limits of its autonomy."

102. Article 13 abrogates Capitulations in the zone, together with the system of protection. The provisions of the Madrid Convention of 1880 remain in force so far as concerns naturalisation.

103. By article 7—

"The Tangier Zone shall respect all treaties in force.

"Economic equality among nations, resulting from such treaties, shall continue to be observed in Tangier, even if the said treaties are subsequently abrogated or modified."

104. Paragraphs 1 and 2 of article 8 run:—

"International agreements concluded in the future by His Shereefian Majesty shall only extend to the Tangier Zone with the consent of the International Legislative Assembly of the zone.

"By exception, international agreements to which all the Powers signatories of the Act of Algéiras are contracting parties or shall have acceded apply automatically to the zone."

105. According to article 20—

"The Tangier Customs shall levy duties and taxes only on goods destined exclusively for consumption in the zone.

"Goods landed at Tangier and destined for the use or consumption in the French or Spanish Zones shall enjoy the benefit of the ordinary rules of transit, warehousing or temporary admission, the proper customs duties being collected at the custom-houses of the zone of consumption.

"The transit regulations will be based on the conclusions of the Barcelona Conference of 1921.

"Similarly, imported goods arriving through the French or Spanish Zones shall pay custom duty on entering the Tangier Zone.

"Export duties will be leviable only on goods originating in the zone."

106. Article 29 provides that the Sultan shall nominate a Mendoub to represent him at Tangier, who will promulgate the legislation passed by the international assembly and countersigned by the Resident of the Committee of Control. The legislative powers are vested in an International Legislative Assembly under the presidency of the Mendoub and composed of representatives of the foreign and native community (article 32). A Committee of Control, consisting of the consuls de carrière of the Powers signatory of the Algéiras Act, has the right of veto over the laws and regulations voted by the Assembly (articles 30 and 31). By the fifth paragraph of article 30 it will be the duty of the Committee of Control to ensure the observance of the régime of economic equality and the provisions of the Statute of Tangier.

107. Article 28 provides that Moroccan subjects shall enjoy complete equality with the nationals of the Powers in the matter of duties and taxes of all kinds. They shall pay exactly the same duties and taxes.

108. Articles 32 and 33 provide for the drawing up of certain fiscal enactments, including a duty on alcohol, registration and stamp taxes, and consumption duties on sugars, colonial products, candles and beers.

109. Article 55 abrogates all contrary clauses of previous treaty instruments.

110. A Shereefian dahir was promulgated on the 16th February, 1924, organising the administration of the Tangier Zone, articles 11 and 12 of which run:—

Article 11—

"L'Administration de la zone est tenue de respecter les traités actuellement en vigueur entre Nous et les Puissances.

"S'étendent notamment de plein droit à la Zone de Tanger les accords internationaux auxquels toutes les Puissances signataires de l'Acte d'Algéiras sont parties contractantes ou auront adhéré.

"En cas de désaccord entre les stipulations desdits traités et les lois et règlements établis par l'Assemblée législative internationale, les stipulations des traités prévaudront.

"L'Administration de la Zone veille d'une façon spéciale à l'observation des articles 3, 7 (paragraphe 2), 8 (paragraphe 3), 10, 11 et 12 de la convention en date du 18 décembre 1923."

Article 12—

"Les accords internationaux, conclus à l'avenir par Notre Majesté chérifienne, ne s'étendront à la Zone de Tanger qu'avec l'assentiment de l'Assemblée législative internationale. Il en sera de même de Nos décrets rendus conformément à l'article 5 du Traité de Protectorat du 30 mars 1912.

"Par exception, s'étendront de plein droit à la Zone de Tanger:

"1. Les accords internationaux auxquels toutes les Puissances signataires de l'Acte d'Algéiras seront parties contractantes ou auront adhéré;

"2. Toutes dispositions législatives applicables aux deux Zones française et espagnole et relatives:

"(a) Au fonctionnement des services postaux et télégraphiques chérifiens avec l'étranger ainsi qu'à l'unification des tarifs y applicables;

"(b) Au commerce des armes et des munitions à leur usage."

111. So far as customs duties are concerned, the position in Tangier is the same as in the rest of Morocco. The duties are limited to 10 per cent., together with the special tax of 2½ per cent. authorised by the Act of Algéiras.

112. As regards consumption and other taxes, there is no question of the issue of King's regulations providing for their application to British subjects, as the Capitulations in the zone have been abolished. The Tangier Statute has also authorised certain consumption and other duties, which brings the Tangier Zone more or less into line with the legislation in the French and Spanish Zones. The United Kingdom, being a party to the Tangier Statute, and being represented on the Committee of Control, must be held to have agreed to fiscal measures as ratified by the Committee of Control. The United Kingdom Government would have a right to protest against any proposed fiscal measures outside the Tangier Statute which were contrary to British treaty rights. For example, it was considered that the United Kingdom Government would have been entitled to protest, on treaty grounds, against the new gate tax in Tangier on goods entering by sea; His Majesty's consul-general was authorised to agree to it, but he made it clear that this approval must not be considered as prejudicing the question of right. Any new consumption taxes not covered by the Tangier Statute would have to be agreed to by His Majesty's Government in the person of their representative on the Committee of Control.

113. The consent of the United States Government, who alone of the Algéiras Powers retain their capitulatory rights in the Tangier Zone, is necessary for the application of fiscal measures to United States citizens.

114. Although, as has been explained, Morocco is divided into three zones for administrative purposes, the sovereignty of the Sultan over the territory as a whole has not been prejudiced. As regards the customs, Morocco must be regarded as an economic unity; the customs regulations of the French Zone recognise this principle, and article 13 of the Franco-Spanish Convention of 1912, which created the Spanish Zone of Morocco, and articles 20 and 21 of the Tangier Statute appear to be based on the same principle.

115. Consumption taxes are leviable in each zone irrespective of whether they have been paid in another zone. Gate taxes are levied in each zone on goods entering by sea and on local goods. Both these taxes are dealt with in detail in subsequent portions of this memorandum.

116. Negotiations have recently taken place between His Majesty's Government and the French Government with regard to the desire of the latter to see introduced into Morocco certain measures and reforms of an economic character, and on the 29th January, 1935, an agreement was signed, in the form of exchanges of notes (Annex 1), providing for reforms of this nature in respect of the French Zone.

The broad lines of the agreement are as follows:—

- (i) Quotas are to be imposed on cotton and silk goods; cement; iron and steel, and machinery; motor vehicles; tyres; refined sugar.
- (ii) In return for the quota advantages, His Majesty's Government have agreed to an increase of the customs duties, at present fixed at a maximum of 12½ per cent. ad valorem, to a general level of 15 per cent. ad valorem. The duties on certain goods, of particular interest to Moroccan industry, and of comparatively little interest to United Kingdom trade, are to be raised to 25 per cent. Certain other goods are placed on the free list, and the duty on coal (other than anthracite) is to be reduced to 10 per cent. ad valorem.
- (iii) A new system of customs valuation is to be substituted for the present system.
- (iv) An assurance is given by His Majesty's Government to consider favourably requests for reciprocal advantages for Moroccan nationals or goods.
- (v) The opportunity is taken to reach a practical settlement of the question of the application to British subjects of gate taxes in the French Zone (see paragraph below).

The notes are to enter into force on a date to be agreed upon between the two Governments as soon as possible after the 1st January, 1935.

117. It is stated in the notes that the acceptance of His Majesty's Government "only extends to the particular measures . . . specified, and does not extend to any alteration of these measures, and is, moreover, conditional upon all the measures specified being put into force. . . . His Majesty's Government's acceptance of these measures is given by His Majesty's Government in waiver of their treaty rights, and in no way prejudices the assertion of these rights as regards any measures other than those specified. . . ." The French Government likewise reserved their point of view as regards treaty rights.

118. The principal treaty provisions which the proposed changes touch upon are:—

- (i) As regards Customs Duties.—Article 7 of the Anglo-Moroccan Commercial Convention of 1856, limiting import duties to 10 per cent. ad valorem. The French Government have contended in the past that, as a result of the accession of the United Kingdom to the Franco-German Convention of 1911, or, alternatively, to the Franco-Moroccan Protectorate Treaty of 1912, Morocco has acquired the right to complete tariff autonomy. His Majesty's Government have resisted this contention (see paragraphs 126, 128–130, 161–164). The agreement with the French Government of the 29th January last, in which His Majesty's Government give their consent to certain tariff changes, may be taken as tending to confirm the treaty rights of His Majesty's Government by constituting a virtual admission by the French Government that they were not able to impose such changes without the consent of His Majesty's Government.
- (ii) As regards quotas, the position is not so clear.
- (a) It might be held that article 6 of the United Kingdom Commercial Convention of 1856, under which merchandise imported by British subjects may not be prohibited, provides a basis for protesting against the introduction of quota restrictions without the consent of His Majesty's Government. As, however, quota restrictions were not known at the time the convention was concluded, it is not certain whether such a contention would succeed in an international court.
- (b) The introduction of quota restrictions appears to be contrary to the principle of "economic liberty," which is referred to in the preamble to the Act of Algeciras, and more specifically reserved in the Franco-German Convention of 1911. It must be admitted, however, that these words are vague and general and might not alone be sufficient to support a case against quota restrictions. Here again, the consent given by His Majesty's Government to the introduction of specific quotas would strengthen the case for resisting the introduction of further quota restrictions without their consent.

119. In considering the position of other Powers, it appears at first sight that the French Government are bound only to obtain the consent of His Majesty's Government (Anglo-Moroccan Commercial Convention of 1856) and of the Spanish Government (Spanish-Moroccan Treaty of 1861) for the introduction of increased customs duties. (It should also be noted that in the Franco-Italian agreement relative to Libya and Morocco of the 28th October, 1912 (see paragraph 94 above), Italy agreed not to raise any obstacle to any of the measures which France may judge opportune to issue in Morocco.) It might, however, be contended (a) that all the Powers which have most-favoured-nation rights, either through separate treaties (e.g., Italy, Switzerland, United States of America, Denmark, Belgium, the Netherlands), or through the Madrid Convention of 1880 (e.g., also Norway, Portugal, Spain and Sweden), can rely on the British and Spanish treaties until they are abrogated, as a waiver is not an abrogation; (b) that article 66 of the Act of Algeciras shows that the 10 per cent. limit has become part of the general Algeciras system for Morocco; (c) that increased import duties, unless accepted by all the signatories of the Act of Algeciras and not only by certain of them for their own benefit, infringe the principle of equality laid down in the preamble of the Act. It has also been pointed out (paragraph 118 (ii)) that quota restrictions may possibly be considered to infringe not only article 6 of the Anglo-Moroccan Commercial Convention of 1856, but also the principle of economic liberty laid down in the preamble to the Act of Algeciras and in the Franco-German Convention of 1911, to which most of the Algeciras Powers have acceded.

120. It would, therefore, be open to all the above Powers, in the event of France failing to obtain their consent before introducing increased tariffs or quotas, to bring a case before the Permanent Court of International Justice. As regards the Act of Algeciras, the fact that the French Government had considered it necessary to obtain the consent of His Majesty's Government to the introduction of the measures would tend to strengthen the case of the Algeciras Powers against them.

121. The French Government are endeavouring to obtain the consent of the other Powers concerned to the new economic reforms.

122. Having regard to the customs unity of the Moroccan Empire (paragraph 114 above), it is proposed eventually to conclude, in respect of the Spanish Zone, an Anglo-Spanish exchange of notes on lines similar to the Anglo-French exchange of notes, and also, as provided for in the Anglo-French exchange of notes, to extend eventually to the Tangier Zone the new increased customs duties. It is also proposed that the Anglo-Spanish exchange of notes should embody a practical settlement of the outstanding consumption duties in the Spanish Zone now in dispute, in the same way as the Anglo-French exchange of notes have provided a practical settlement of the gate taxes in the French Zone.

II.—Consumption Duties in the French Zone.

123. As already observed, the official French thesis as regards the overriding effects of the Franco-German Convention of 1911 on previous treaty stipulations has been advanced in the diplomatic correspondence regarding consumption duties.

124. In 1914 His Majesty's Government were informed of a proposal of the authorities in the French Zone to impose a consumption duty on sugar. British interests were not appreciably affected, and there was, therefore, no desire to embarrass the French Government by protesting against its imposition. His Majesty's Ambassador at Paris was instructed to inform the French Government, however, that His Majesty's Government must "in principle reserve all the commercial privileges which they enjoy under existing treaties with Morocco, which privileges are in no way diminished by their recognition of the French protectorate" (Annex 2).

5795/5795/
1915103648/5795/
1919

125. In their reply of the 8th January, 1915, the French Government stated that they had no intention of submitting British subjects in Morocco to any measure which deprived them of such privileges without the prior consent of His Majesty's Government. This had been the procedure in the case of the tax on alcohol. If the Shereefian Government did proceed with the proposed tax on sugar it could not be exacted from British subjects unless with the consent of His Majesty's Government (Annex 3).

126. In a note of the 24th July, 1915, the French Government informed His Majesty's Government of the decision to introduce the sugar tax and, as British interests were not appreciably affected, they trusted that His Majesty's Government would not object. Another reason for counting upon the consent of His Majesty's Government was that "l'adhésion du Gouvernement britannique aux réformes de tout ordre que nous introduisons au Maroc doit être considérée en droit comme accordée une fois pour toutes par la reconnaissance faite le 19 décembre dernier du Traité de Protectorat français sur le Maroc. Le Gouvernement du Roi a également adhéré, au moins implicitement, au Traité franco-allemand du 4 novembre 1911; . . . Il est superflu de rappeler que les deux actes précités stipulent dans leur article 1^{er} le pouvoir réglementaire absolu du représentant de la République au Maroc." After comparing the British position in Egypt with the French position in Morocco, the French Government went on to state that "nous avons consenti, tant que le statu quo ne serait pas modifié en Egypte, à prévenir le Gouvernement britannique de nos intentions de réformes au Maroc, confiants qu'il n'y refuserait pas un assentiment qu'en droit strict nous ne nous croyons pas tenus de proposer" (Annex 4). In informing the French Government that His Majesty's Government agreed to the imposition of the sugar tax, His Majesty's Ambassador at Paris was instructed to add that, as regards the general questions raised in M. Delcassé's note of the 24th July, 1915, His Majesty's Government had certainly recognised the French protectorate in Morocco, but that they felt confident the French Government would agree that it was better to leave till quieter times the discussion of the renunciation of British and French extra-territorial treaty rights and jurisdiction in Morocco and Egypt respectively (Annex 5).

127. The French view is also expounded in reply to certain reserves made by the Italian representative at Tangier in connexion with the consumption tax on sugar. It is not known what form the Italian representations took, but the reply of the French Resident-General of the 10th January, 1916, is annexed (Annex 6). The French Resident-General based his attitude on articles 1 and 4 of the Franco-German Convention of 1911, and on the passage in the explanatory letters annexed to the convention (see paragraph 71 above), where it is stated that "l'adhésion . . . accordée d'une manière générale . . . par l'article 1^{er} de ladite convention, s'applique naturellement à toutes les questions donnant matière à réglementation et visées dans l'Acte d'Algésiras." It was agreed that the protectorate had thus "l'autonomie douanière comme l'autonomie fiscale," and the accession of the Italian Government precluded all right to object to the imposition of such taxes.

128. The imposition in the French Zone in 1919 of further consumption taxes on tea, coffee, chicory, &c., raised again the question of principle, and on instructions from His Majesty's Government, His Majesty's Ambassador at Paris and His Majesty's agent at Tangier addressed representations to the French Government and to the Resident-General at Tangier respectively (Annexes 7 and 8). These representations took the line that by the Anglo-Moroccan Commercial Convention of 1856, supplemented by article 66 of the Act of Algéciras, the maximum customs duty on goods imported by British subjects is 12½ per cent. ad valorem, and a tax on the same goods, amounting to an increase in the import duty, required the previous consent of His Majesty's Government. The instructions referred to M. Delcassé's notes of the 8th January and the 24th July, 1915, and pointed out that most of the rights enjoyed by British subjects under the treaty and convention of 1856 and the Act of Algéciras fell under one or other of the categories of questions over which the French Government claimed to possess absolute power, as a consequence of their convention with Germany of 1911 and the protectorate treaty with Morocco of 1912. If the French contention were admitted, the British treaty would no longer exist—a view which His Majesty's Government could not countenance. It was a recognised principle that when a third party assents to a protectorate of one State over another, the protected State is not thereby absolved from any treaty obligations which it may have incurred towards the assenting Power. The French Government themselves had adopted this attitude in regard to their treaty rights in Zanzibar. As showing that the French Government had not been consistent in their attitude, the instructions referred to certain articles in the draft convention relating to Morocco and Egypt (see paragraphs 97-99), negotiated by the French and British Governments in 1918-19, including article 5, which specifically maintained in force the Commercial Convention of 1856, and could not have been regarded by the negotiators as a dead letter. His Majesty's Government, therefore, found it necessary to protest against the imposition of the dues without their previous agreement having been formally requested and obtained, and regarded the goods imported by British subjects as exempt from their incidence.

128301/51217/
1919

129. In their reply of the 21st November, 1919 (Annex 9), the French Government again asserted that, by virtue of the treaties of the 4th November, 1911, and the 30th March, 1912, the Shereefian Government, "est maître de ses tarifs douaniers," subject to the principle of economic equality, although it was not then intended to use this power. The new taxes were not customs duties, but internal consumption taxes applicable to colonial products of any origin. The French Government agreed, however, that as Great Britain had not renounced her capitulatory privileges, the dahir in question could not be enforced on British subjects until made applicable to them by King's Regulations. Meanwhile, instructions were being sent to the Resident-General not to levy the tax on the goods imported by British subjects for their personal consumption, but this exemption would not apply to goods imported for their commercial clientèle, as this would be contrary to the principle of economic equality.

130. On the 20th February, 1920, His Majesty's Embassy at Paris addressed another note to the French Government (Annex 10) reiterating the arguments in the Embassy's note of the 8th November, 1919 (Annex 7), which had not been refuted by the French Government. The duties themselves were a matter of relatively slight importance, and His Majesty's Government had no wish to embarrass the Protectorate authorities in raising the funds necessary for the proper administration of the zone. The French Government, however, not merely requested, but claimed as a right that the duties should be made applicable to British subjects regardless of the treaties of 1856 and the Act of Algéciras, and His Majesty's Government were therefore obliged to insist on the obvious fact that the treaties of 1856 and the Act of Algéciras and all others signed by Great Britain before the Franco-Moorish Treaty of 1912, unless and until they were specifically modified or abrogated, remained in force. As regards the distinction between goods imported by British subjects for their household consumption and those imported for their commercial clientèle, His Majesty's Government considered that article 7 of the Commercial Convention of 1856 and article 66 of the Act of Algéciras, expressly preclude the imposition of duties in excess of 12½ per cent. ad valorem on any goods imported by British subjects, whether for their own consumption or for that of their clientèle.

131. A misunderstanding then arose as a result of which the French Government were under the impression that permission had been given by His Majesty's Government for the application of the new consumption taxes to British subjects, whereas the permission given had reference only to certain new customs regulations regarding ship's stores at the ports (see Annexes 11-14). On being informed of the real position and that His Majesty's Government maintained their previous attitude, the French Government, in a note of the 23rd March, 1920, made an appeal to the friendship of His Majesty's Government, and referred to the French attitude in Egypt. "Le Gouvernement de la République ne doute pas que le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté ne s'emploie à rendre possible à la Puissance protectrice du Maroc l'exercice de ses droits dans ce pays comme le Gouvernement de la République fait en Egypte en ce qui concerne les mesures édictées par le Haut-Commissariat britannique ou par l'autorité militaire britannique" (Annex 15).

132. About this time, His Majesty's Government were considering a modification of their attitude. In a letter to the Board of Trade of the 18th March, 1920, it was pointed out that the French Government were adopting a reasonable attitude as regards the application of certain duties to French citizens in Egypt. His Majesty's Government held, nevertheless, that just as the Egyptian Government must hold themselves bound to obtain the consent of the 155305/51217/

1919A 1484/638/
28/1920A 700/700/28/
1920
A 1217/638/
28/1920A 1227/638/
28/1920

French Government to legislation affecting the rights of French citizens under the Capitulations, so the French Government were under similar obligations in Morocco. Despite this, however, the Foreign Office did not consider it advisable that the theoretical right of British subjects to be relieved, by virtue of the Capitulations and the Act of Algeciras, from obligations which fell on French and other nationals in Morocco, should in practice be generally insisted on. There was no reason, apart from treaties, why British subjects should not pay the taxes which others paid, and the benefits of which were shared by the community at large. It might be necessary to withhold King's Regulations in order to emphasise a point of principle or to resist a tax aimed obviously at British interests in particular, but save in such exceptional cases it was felt that it would be advantageous if taxation in Morocco were made binding on British subjects with the least possible delay.

A 1949/1959/
638/28/1920

133. These considerations, together with the fact that the refusal of His Majesty's Government to admit the application to British subjects of the consumption duties on tea, coffee, spices, &c., had been maintained long enough to constitute an effective protest against the manner in which those duties were imposed, led His Majesty's Government to propose a solution of the dispute, which was put to the French Government in August 1920 (Annexes 16 and 17).

A 3259/638/
28/1920

134. This proposal was that taxation imposed in Egypt and Morocco should so far as possible be applied to French and British nationals, pari passu, and His Majesty's Government expressed willingness to impose new duties on British subjects in Morocco as and when similar duties became operative as regards French citizens in Egypt. (The particular duty then in question was that on alcohol.) The French Government replied, however, that the application of taxes to British subjects in Morocco should take effect as soon as the French Government agreed to the application to their own nationals of taxes in Egypt, irrespective of the attitude of third Powers in Egypt (enclosure in Annex 17).

A 6383/638/
28/1922

135. The argument on this point was not pursued. As regards the Egyptian duty on alcohol, the assent of all the Powers concerned was obtained and the duty imposed. Accordingly, in June 1921, instructions were given by His Majesty's Government that the increased consumption duty on alcohol in Morocco should be made applicable to British subjects.

W 5005/6194/
1416/28/1921

136. Early in 1922 His Majesty's Government learned that British subjects were actually paying the increased consumption duty on sugar and the duty on candles, which had not yet been made applicable to them by King's Regulations. Payment of the duties was made at the Customs, together with import duty, and goods could only be withdrawn from the Customs on production of a receipt for import duties, consumption duties and aconage charges. The refusal of His Majesty's Government to make the duties applicable to British subjects appeared, therefore, to be of no real utility. Moreover, the duties in themselves were not unreasonable. It was decided, therefore, to make these duties applicable to British subjects, and King's Regulations were accordingly issued (Nos. 1 and 2 of 1922).

W 782/782/
28/1922

W 1133/782/
28/1922

137. The French authorities in Morocco were also showing a tendency to consult His Majesty's Government before the actual publication of the dahirs. This was done in the case of the duty on sugar and candles referred to above (see Marshal Lyautey's note of the 30th June, 1921, Annex 18), and it was also done in January 1923, when an enquiry was made (see Annex 19) whether His Majesty's Government would be prepared to assent to a proposed dahir increasing the consumption duties on sugar, tea, coffee and pepper, and make them applicable to British subjects. As regards the latter, it was decided to make a virtue of necessity, and the dahir was made applicable to British subjects by King's Regulations (Nos. 1 and 4 of 1923). At the end of 1924, however, the French authorities abandoned the procedure of informing His Majesty's Government before the issue of a dahir. In December the French Resident-General at Rabat communicated to His Majesty's consul-general two dahirs increasing the consumption duties on alcohol and sugar, which were to be put into operation immediately. The Resident-General admitted that the consent of His Majesty's Government was legally necessary to make the duties applicable to British subjects, but said that they would, nevertheless, be collected at once, though an exception might be theoretically possible as regards goods imported by a British subject for his personal use, and he considered this action was justified having regard to what

W 7554/1416/
28/1921

W 303/503/
193/28/1923

W 10743/
10765/11285/
10743/28/1924

had passed when the question was thrashed out between the two Governments in previous years (see Annex 20). His Majesty's consul-general, on instructions from the Foreign Office, pointed out to the French authorities, in a note of the 7th January, 1925 (see Annex 21), that while His Majesty's Government endeavoured to co-operate with the French Administration by applying reasonable taxation to British subjects, they did not admit and had never admitted, the right of the French authorities to anticipate their consent. As the duties were not open to objection in themselves, King's Regulations were issued making them applicable to British subjects.

W 10765/
11285/10743/
28/1924

W 518/518/
28/1925

138. Similarly, a dahir of the 6th January, 1926, imposing consumption duties on petrol, rubber tyres, playing-cards and matches was made operative prior to its notification to His Majesty's consul-general at Rabat, and Sir A. Ryan again drew the attention of the Resident-General to the attitude taken up by His Majesty's Government in regard to their consent being anticipated by the French authorities. The tax was made applicable to British subjects by King's Regulation, but in a note to the Resident-General regarding the King's Regulation, Sir A. Ryan made a reservation, worded in wide terms, concerning the innovation introduced by extending the new tax to already existing stocks. Sir A. Ryan's reservation was to the effect that the decision of His Majesty's Government in this particular case was not to be considered as a precedent for the future. "S'il était saisi d'autres demandes en vue d'étendre à ses ressortissants de nouvelles taxes de consommation futures, le Gouvernement britannique garderait sa pleine liberté d'appréciation et d'action tant en ce qui concerne les taxes elles-mêmes qu'en ce qui concerne leur applicabilité aux stocks."

W 773/778/
28/1926

W 5190/778/
28/1926

139. In 1930 a dahir was issued imposing certain consumption duties in the French Zone. The provisions of the dahir relating to soya-bean oil and to frozen meat appeared to constitute both discrimination against products from abroad and a real measure of protection for local products. Accordingly, the French protectorate authorities were informed (see Annex 22) that, although His Majesty's Government were prepared to apply the dahir to British subjects, they did not feel they could do so until they were convinced that British interests would not be prejudiced. The manner in which the soya-bean oil and frozen meat duties appeared to be discriminatory and protective was explained to the French authorities and a request made that the dahir should be amended. Satisfactory modifications were made and an amending dahir issued which His Majesty's Government were able to apply to British subjects by King's Regulation.

W 9727/6730/
28/1930

W 11584/
12930/6730/
28/1930

W 3777/421/
28/1931

140. A dahir of the 4th June, 1929 (supplemented by a later one of the 1st June, 1933), prohibited the import of cereals into the French Zone except by special permit in the event of local supplies being insufficient. In the view of His Majesty's Government this prohibition was contrary to the principle of commercial liberty and the "open door" in Morocco and in contradiction to articles 2 and 6 of the Commercial Convention of 1856. In a note of the 10th June, 1929, His Majesty's consul-general at Rabat made express reserves regarding the application of the dahir to British subjects on this basis (see Annex 23), and on the 11th July, 1929, His Majesty's Ambassador at Paris was instructed to lodge a protest with the French Government on the same grounds (see Annex 24). The French Government justified their action by contending that it was necessary in order to safeguard the vital interests of the country, a principle that was embodied in the Geneva Convention of 1927 regarding import and export prohibitions. "Si une telle restriction est admise d'une manière générale par la Convention de Genève de 1927, a fortiori doit-elle être acceptée à l'égard d'un pays dont la production ne bénéficie d'aucune protection, hormis un droit de douane fixé ne variant à 10 pour cent, auquel s'ajoutent 2½ pour cent ad valorem perçus au titre de la taxe spéciale" (see Annex 25). As it appeared to be the fact that the prohibition was in the best interests of Morocco, and as British interests appeared to be only slightly affected, His Majesty's representative at Paris was instructed to inform the French Government (see Annex 26) that, while still of the opinion that the dahir was a violation of the convention of 1856, His Majesty's Government were anxious not to cause the French Government any embarrassment in Morocco and were willing to waive their objections, provided that their action did not constitute a precedent and

File W 5683/
5683/28/1929

W 9038/5683/
28/1929

that the principle of commercial equality and of the "open door" was maintained.

141. An attempt was made to obtain from the French protectorate authorities an assurance to the effect that the prohibition was provisional only, and that a certain quantity of British fine flour should be allowed for the year 1934. As, however, there appeared no likelihood of obtaining this assurance, His Majesty's consul-general at Rabat was instructed in November 1934 to state that His Majesty's Government only waived their request in order not to embarrass the protectorate authorities, and reserved the right to reopen the matter should any foreign fine flour be permitted to enter at any future date. When making this statement, His Majesty's consul-general also intimated that His Majesty's Government were prepared to issue a King's Regulation if the authorities so requested. No such request was made, but a King's Regulation (No. 1 of 1935) was issued in February 1935 covering the dahirs in question.

142. Dahirs of the 13th July, the 21st August and the 15th November, 1933, and of the 23rd May and the 22nd November, 1934, were also issued dealing with the establishment of a wheat fund ("caisse du blé") and imposing taxes for the benefit of the fund on the principal cereals, both on import and export. On instructions from the Foreign Office, His Majesty's consul-general at Rabat pointed out to the protectorate authorities in November 1934 that His Majesty's Government took particular exception to the provisions which imposed import duties on wheat and other cereals, contrary to article 7 of the Anglo-Moroccan Commercial Convention of 1856. At the same time he intimated the willingness of His Majesty's Government to issue a King's Regulation on a request being made therefor. No such request was made by the French authorities, but a King's Regulation (No. 2 of 1935) was issued in February 1935 covering all the dahirs in question.

143. It should be borne in mind in connexion with the issue of King's Regulations Nos. 1 and 2 of 1935 above that in the interval between notifying to the protectorate authorities the willingness of His Majesty's Government to issue the regulations on a request being made and their actual issue, His Majesty's Government concluded the agreement of the 29th January, 1935, with the French Government, one of the objects of which was to clear the ground of outstanding matters at issue in respect of the French Zone.

144. The above account deals only with consumption duties which have given rise to controversy regarding treaty rights. The following schedule contains a list of dahirs issued and of the corresponding King's Regulations.

Date of dahir or "arrêté."	Commodities.	Date of King's Regulation.
Oct. 18, 1914	Alcohol	April 22, 1915.
Dec. 12, 1915	Sugar	June 5, 1916.
June 2, 1916	Alcohol (amendment)	October 23, 1916.
Nov. 24, 1916	Alcohol (amendment)	July 25, 1917.
Nov. 23, 1917	Sugar (amendment)	April 8, 1918.
Mar. 6, 1920	Alcohol (amendment)	July 11, 1921 (published August 30, 1921).
July 5, 1921	Sugar (amendment)	March 20, 1922 (published April 12, 1922).
July 5, 1921	Candles	March 20, 1922 (published April 12, 1922).
Jan. 21, 1922	Beer	January 22, 1922 (published May 19, 1922).
Mar. 18, 1922	Beer (amendment)	April 13, 1922 (published July 17, 1922).
Oct. 1, 1917
June 8, 1922	Sugar, goods containing sugar, saccharine, &c.	February 10, 1923 (published April 27, 1923).
June 8, 1922
Jan. 8, 1923
Jan. 13, 1923
Aug. 25, 1919	"Colonial Produce" (tea, coffee, chicory, &c.)	February 10, 1923 (published May 23, 1923).
Jan. 8, 1923	Alcohol (wines, vermouth, &c.)	October 29, 1923 (published December 20, 1923).
Aug. 11, 1923
Dec. 4, 1924	Alcohol (amendment)	March 25, 1925.
Dec. 4, 1924	Sugar, goods containing sugar, saccharine, &c. (amendment)	March 26, 1925.
Jan. 6, 1926	Petrol essences, rubber tyres, inner tubes, playing-cards and matches	May 27, 1926.

Date of dahir or "arrêté."	Commodities.	Date of King's Regulation.
Nov. 24, 1927	Alcohol, wines, vermouth, &c.	May 10, 1928.
Jan. 10, 1928	Sugar, goods containing sugar, chocolate and cocoa	May 21, 1928 (duties payable as from date of King's Regulation).
June 20, 1930	Sugar, goods containing sugar, tea, chocolate, petrol essences, rubber tyres, inner tubes, lubricating oils, vegetable oils and frozen meat	March 28, 1931 (partly applicable only as from date of King's Regulation).
Dec. 28, 1930
Sept. 14, 1932	Ditto. (amendment)	February 1, 1933 (applicable as from September 14, 1932).
Nov. 3, 1932	Wheat	April 6, 1933.
June 4, 1929	Import of cereals	February 4, 1935.
June 1, 1933
July 13, 1933
Aug. 21, 1933	Wheat Fund	February 5, 1935.
Nov. 15, 1933
May 23, 1934
Nov. 22, 1934

N.B.—In addition to those listed above, there have been a number of amending dahirs and "arrêtés" in respect of which there were at the time no corresponding King's Regulations. These deal with modifications in the rates of duties, the classification of various products, &c. The only products not included in, or related to, commodities mentioned in the schedule are explosives, in respect of which consumption duties were levied by "Arrêté viziriel" of the 12th January, 1922, for which no corresponding King's Regulation was issued.

III.—Consumption Duties in the Spanish Zone.

145. Consumption duties were first imposed in the Spanish Zone by a dahir dated the 27th February, 1922, which referred to the measure as an "internal tax upon the consumption of sugar, tea and coffee . . . which shall be leviable from the moment of the importation of the said products into the zone." The Spanish Government, instead of approaching His Majesty's Government when the dahir was issued, in order that it might be made applicable to British subjects and protected persons, waited until the 1st November to do so, and in the intervening period the Spanish authorities attempted to levy the new duties on British-protected persons. On the 21st December, 1922, a note (see Annex 27) was sent to the Spanish Ambassador protesting against the illegal practices of the Spanish authorities, but expressing readiness to issue a King's Regulation, with effect from the date of issue, as soon as goods illegally detained by the Spanish authorities had been released unconditionally. Further difficulties arose owing to the failure of the Spanish authorities to refund in full the deposits paid by British subjects and protected persons in order to secure the release of their goods, and a note was sent to the Spanish Ambassador on the 3rd April, 1923, again protesting against the practices of the Spanish authorities and making it clear that His Majesty's Government would not issue the necessary King's Regulation until satisfaction was obtained. The necessary instructions were sent to the Spanish authorities (see Annexes 28-30). On the 22nd June, 1923, His Majesty's agent reported that, the full amounts deposited having been refunded, he had that day issued a King's Regulation applying the dahir to British subjects and protected persons, with effect as from that date.

146. Meanwhile, on the 15th June, 1923, the attention of the Spanish Ambassador had been called to the fact that His Majesty's Government had received from the Spanish Government no official notification of, or a request to apply to British subjects, a further dahir imposing a consumption duty on alcohol in the Spanish Zone, thereby implying that His Majesty's Government were prepared to issue a King's Regulation provided the necessary formalities were carried out. In this case also the Spanish authorities had endeavoured to make the tax applicable to British subjects, and in notes of the 22nd May, 1923, and the 22nd June, 1923 (see Annexes 31 and 32), His Majesty's vice-consul at Tetuan

W 10151/6578/
28/1922

W 2375/1928/
28/1927

W 4950/1928/
28/1923

W 4620/1928/
28/1923

W 4829/1928/
28/1923 made it clear that His Majesty's Government could not consent to the collection of this tax from British subjects prior to the issue of a King's Regulation and unless the sums already paid by British subjects were refunded. On the 9th July, 1923, the Spanish Ambassador addressed a note to the Foreign Office (Annex 33) asking that the dahir imposing the duty on alcohol might be applied by King's Regulation to British subjects and protected persons, on receipt of which instructions were sent to his Majesty's agent at Tangier to prepare a draft King's Regulation.

W 5554/1928/
28/1923 147. Before action was taken, the question arose as to whether or not United States and Netherlands nationals and protected persons were exempt from the payment of consumption duties, and it was ascertained from His Majesty's agent at Tangier that, while the duties on sugar, coffee and tea had been rendered applicable to such nationals and protected persons, nothing had been settled as regards their payment of the duty on alcohol. On the 27th December, 1923, a note was addressed to the Spanish Chargé d'Affaires (Annex 34) stating that His Majesty's Government, in view of the non-application of the tax on alcohol to United States and Netherlands nationals, hesitated to proceed definitely with a step that would place British subjects at a disadvantage compared with other foreign nationals in the same position; and this was followed by a note of the 22nd January, 1924 (Annex 35), stating that, while His Majesty's Government were anxious to meet the request of the Spanish Government, they would not feel justified in applying the tax on alcohol to British subjects at that moment in view of the facts that there were still outstanding at Tetuan certain deposits improperly levied from British subjects and protected persons, and that no requests had been addressed by the Spanish Government to the United States and Netherlands Governments to make the tax applicable to their nationals.

W 343/343/
28/1924 148. On the 11th September, 1924, the Spanish Embassy called attention to the introduction of further taxes in the Spanish Zone, including a consumption tax on beer, and expressed the hope that there would be no impediment to their application to British subjects and protected persons; they added that their Government proposed shortly to institute certain other consumption taxes on a small number of additional articles, including candles. The Foreign Office enquired whether the United States and Netherlands Governments had been similarly approached. It was learned subsequently that the Spanish authorities were collecting the tax on beer from British subjects, and it was decided that, pending a definite decision, British subjects should be advised to pay under protest and that the Spanish authorities should be informed that His Majesty's Government would claim a refund of such illegally levied moneys. After much delay in securing a refund from the Spanish authorities for amounts illegally levied, King's Regulations were issued on the 28th November, 1925, applying the duties on both alcohol and beer to British subjects and protected persons (see correspondence in Annexes 36 and 37). As regards the duty on candles, this was made applicable to British subjects and protected persons by King's Regulation issued on the 30th December, 1927, after an exchange of notes between His Majesty's consul at Tetuan and the Spanish Delegate-General (see Annexes 38, 39), by which the latter agreed to refund amounts illegally levied and also to apply the dahir to candles which might in the future be manufactured in the Spanish Zone.

W 139/139/
28/1928 149. In February 1930 the Spanish Government drew the attention of His Majesty's Ambassador at Madrid to a series of new dahirs, including some relating to consumption taxes, and asked that the necessary measures might be taken by His Majesty's Government to make them applicable to British subjects and protected persons (see Annex 40). Instructions were sent to His Majesty's consul at Tetuan to issue the necessary King's Regulations, and His Majesty's Ambassador at Madrid informed the Spanish Government accordingly (see Annex 41). This was the first occasion on which His Majesty's Government had failed to stipulate that the Spanish authorities should first refund the amount of taxes illegally collected from British subjects and protected persons. The departure from precedent had, however, been noticed by His Majesty's consul-general at Tangier, who had, on his own authority, instructed the acting British consul at Tetuan to adopt the procedure normally followed, and to make the issue of the King's Regulations contingent upon the settlement of claims for refunds. The Spanish authorities, however, believed, or affected to believe, that the acting British consul was acting without instructions in delaying the issue of the King's Regulations pending a settlement of the claims, and showed no disposition to make the required refund. It was, therefore, decided to inform the Spanish Government officially that the issue of the King's Regulations would be delayed accordingly; this was done in a note from His Majesty's Ambassador at Madrid. Subsequently, the Spanish authorities having continued in their refusal to make the desired refunds, the whole question was reconsidered by the Foreign Office, when the following considerations were taken into account:—

W 8201/1027/
28/1930

- (a) The suspension of the issue of the King's Regulations, pending satisfaction of the claims, might result in the accumulation of the latter over a long period, and, consequently, it would probably prove necessary, in order to settle the claims, and at the same time to maintain the legal rights of His Majesty's Government, to make the eventual King's Regulations retrospective to the date when it was first decided to issue them.
- (b) The Spanish authorities had been successfully levying the duties on British subjects without King's Regulations having been issued—an undesirable situation.
- (c) It was more important that His Majesty's Government's extra-territorial rights should be preserved than that the claims of British subjects, which, though legally good, had no particular merit, should be promptly met.

150. After consultation with His Majesty's consul-general at Tangier it was decided to issue King's Regulations, antedated to the 19th June, 1930, making applicable to British subjects the consumption duties on sugar, matches, colonial articles and wines, and not to make this action dependent upon the prior settlement of claims for refunds. His Majesty's consul-general at Tangier was informed accordingly, and asked to instruct His Majesty's consul at Tetuan so to inform the Spanish authorities, stating that His Majesty's Government had been influenced in their decision by their desire to prove agreeable to the Spanish Government and to avoid the possibility of British subjects being placed in an unduly advantageous position, but that they could not admit that duties could be levied on British subjects until the issue of King's Regulations. At the same time it was decided to take up the claims for refunds for the period prior to the 19th June, 1930, with the Spanish Government direct, and to urge them in future to arrange for due warning to be given to His Majesty's Government of the issue of such dahirs, in order to enable King's Regulations applying them to British subjects to be issued simultaneously in all cases where the dahirs did not appear to be either protective or discriminatory. The Spanish Government expressed their inability to meet the claims, on the grounds, firstly, that such action would confer an extraordinary advantage upon British subjects and protected persons, and, secondly, that it was the consumer, not the British trader, who really paid the tax. In view of the attitude of the Spanish Government and of the facts that most of the goods on which the duties were imposed were of foreign, rather than of British, origin, and that in the French Zone corresponding King's Regulations were always issued after the entry into force of such dahirs and antedated, the question was considered of antedating the four King's Regulations to the 15th January, 1930, the date of the issue of the dahirs in the Spanish Zone. His Majesty's consul-general at Tangier, in view of the determination of the Spanish Government at that time to do their utmost to undermine the capitulatory régime, deprecated the action suggested, and advanced the proposal that the claims should be held in reserve as a future bargaining asset; this policy was adopted, the four King's Regulations were not further antedated, and nothing more was said to the Spanish Government.

151. By a dahir of the 31st March, 1934, a tax on imported wheat and flour described as a "consumption tax," although not applied to goods produced locally, was imposed; no request was received from the Spanish authorities for the issue of a King's Regulation, and protests were made in writing by His Majesty's consul at Tetuan. The Foreign Office took the view that, while the British commercial interest did not appear to be substantial, the tax was tantamount to an increase in the import duty above the maximum sanctioned by treaty, and it was desirable to maintain the principle that customs duties on goods imported into Morocco could not be so increased without the consent of His Majesty's Government. The dahir of the 31st March was subsequently modified by a dahir and Vizirial decree of the 20th September, 1934, but retained the

W 9195/1027/
28/1930

W 9649/1027/
28/1930

W 11172/1027/
28/1930

W 1541/501/
28/1931

W 3225/501/
28/1931

W 6647/4202/
28/1934

features of the previous dahir, to which His Majesty's Government took exception.

On the 29th June, 1934, twelve further dahirs were issued, four of which imposed new taxes, the remaining eight increasing the taxes already in force. All were described as "consumption taxes," although in two cases only (alcohol and candles) was local produce affected, so that again the action of the Spanish authorities amounted in practice to an increase in the customs duties. His Majesty's consul at Tetuan protested both orally and in writing to the Spanish High Commissioner against the general application of these measures before the consent of His Majesty's Government had been obtained, and also against the discriminatory nature of certain of the duties.

W 7075/4202/
28/1934

W 1181/29/
28/1935

152. On the 22nd January, 1935, the Spanish High Commissioner addressed a note to His Majesty's consul at Tetuan (Annex 42), in which the following contentions were advanced in defence of the dahirs above referred to:—

- (a) The world economic situation might be held to justify the overriding of treaty stipulations in the interests of the common good.
- (b) The dahirs applied to the trade of all countries, and therefore did not violate the Anglo-Moroccan Commercial Convention of 1856 or the Act of Algeciras, which laid down the principle of economic equality.
- (c) Prohibitions of import, if of general application, did not infringe the British Commercial Treaty of 1856 or the principle of economic liberty without inequality in the Act of Algeciras. Such measures had been taken in the French Zone.
- (d) State monopolies were held to be customary in international relations.

W 1791/29/
28/1935

153. As this note revealed an unsatisfactory attitude on the part of the Spanish authorities, His Majesty's Ambassador at Madrid and His Majesty's consul at Tetuan were instructed, on the 2nd March, 1935 (Annex 43), to make formal protests to the Spanish Government against the dahirs issued on the 29th June, 1934, which, with one exception, imposed taxes on imported goods only, and against the dahir and Vizirial decree of the 20th September, 1934, which imposed a consumption tax on imported wheat, flour and its derivatives. The view of His Majesty's Government was that the taxes either involved an increase in the customs duties, contrary to article 7 of the Anglo-Moroccan Commercial Convention of 1856, as modified by article 66 of the Act of Algeciras, or represented an increase in internal duties contrary (as regards enforcement on British subjects) to article 4 of the Anglo-Moroccan General Treaty of 1856. A note on the above lines, and an aide-memoire stating the assurances required by His Majesty's Government before the necessary King's Regulations could be issued, were left at the Spanish Ministry of State (see Annex 44). It was, at the same time, intimated to the Spanish Government that His Majesty's Government would be obliged to consider bringing the matter before the Permanent Court of International Arbitration unless their views on the matter were met. Similar representations were made by His Majesty's consul at Tetuan.

154. The following schedule includes a list of dahirs issued and of the corresponding King's Regulations, excluding those of 1934, in respect of which no King's Regulation has been issued:—

Date of dahir.	Commodities.	Date of King's Regulation.
Feb. 27, 1922	Sugar, coffee and tea	June 22, 1923.
Apr. 15, 1922	Alcohol	November 28, 1925.
Aug. 9, 1924	Beer	November 28, 1925.
Aug. 6, 1927	Sugar, coffee and tea (amendment)	November 21, 1927.
Aug. 6, 1927	Candles	December 30, 1927.
Dec. 30, 1929	Alcohol (amendment)	April 5, 1930.
Dec. 30, 1929	Petrol	September 19, 1930.
Dec. 30, 1929	Powder, ammunition and explosives	September 19, 1930.
Dec. 30, 1929	Wines	November 24, 1930 (applied as from June 19, 1930).
Dec. 30, 1929	Matches	November 24, 1930 (applied as from June 19, 1930).
Jan. 20, 1930		June 19, 1930).
Dec. 30, 1929	Spices	November 24, 1930 (applied as from June 19, 1930).
Dec. 30, 1929	Sugar, coffee and tea (amendment)	November 24, 1930 (applied as from June 19, 1930).

It is understood that, so long as the special régime enjoyed by the United Kingdom remains in force in Morocco, the fines and penalties contemplated in article 9 of the regulations in question can only be enforced against British nationals with the assent of His Majesty's consular authorities in Morocco, under a procedure which can be agreed subsequently.

3. The Administration of the French Zone will modify the Arrêté Viziriel of the 31st July, 1933, in such a manner that the gate taxes applicable to the products enumerated below shall be the same as those applicable to similar local products:—

Yarns and tissues of cotton, pure or mixed, and all articles manufactured from yarns or tissues of cotton, pure or mixed.

Yarns and tissues of flax, hemp or artificial silk, and all articles manufactured from yarns or tissues of flax, hemp or artificial silk, pure or mixed.

Yarns and tissues of wool, pure or mixed, and all articles manufactured from yarns or tissues of wool, pure or mixed.

It is understood that His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom undertakes to apply the provisions of the above-mentioned "arrêté" as thus modified to British nationals, as well as the provisions of any other regulations concerning the gate taxes which have been made up to the time of signature of the exchange of notes of this day's date, in so far as these regulations have not already been applied to British nationals.

These measures and reforms being agreed to, the Government of the French Republic desire to receive, in return, an assurance that, on the analogy of the reciprocity clause adopted by the Council of the League of Nations in September 1930 in respect of the A and B Mandates, His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom will give favourable consideration to requests made to it with a view to securing in commercial matters to persons belonging to Morocco, or to goods imported therefrom, advantages corresponding to those accorded in Morocco to British nationals and to United Kingdom goods.

The French Government propose that the arrangements referred to in the preceding paragraphs should be put into force as soon as possible after the 1st January, 1935, as may be agreed upon between the Government of the Republic and His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom.

I have, &c.

CH. CORBIN.

List A.

Products to be made subject to the Quota System.

Cement.
Cotton tissues.
Natural silk tissues.
Artificial silk tissues.
Iron and steel, manufactures of iron and steel, and machinery.
Motor vehicles and parts thereof.
Pneumatic tyres and tubes and solid tyres.
Refined sugar.

List B.

Products to be made subject on Importation to a Duty of 25 per Cent. ad valorem.

Cement.
Edible pastes.
Seed oils.
Motor vehicles and parts thereof.

ANNEX 1.

Exchange of Notes between His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and the French Government regarding contemplated Economic Measures and Reforms in Morocco (the French and Tangier Zones), January 29, 1935.

Note No. 1.

M. Corbin to Sir John Simon.

(Translation.)
Your Excellency,

*French Embassy,
London, January 29, 1935.*

AS His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom are aware, it is the desire of the Government of the Republic to see introduced in Morocco certain measures and reforms of an economic character, and discussions on this matter have recently taken place between representatives of our two Governments. I have now the honour to state that, as concerns the French Zone, the measures and reforms which the French Government propose to introduce are as follows:—

I.—Quotas.

1. The importation of the products enumerated in List A annexed hereto will be subjected to a quota system conforming to the rule of economic equality.
2. Accordingly, the quotas shall be calculated as follows:—

A global quota will be fixed each half-year for each of the products enumerated in List A, taking as basis the imports in the last corresponding period for which statistics have been published. Thus, in 1935, the global quotas for the first half-year will be fixed in accordance with the statistics for the first half of 1933, and those for the second half of 1935 in accordance with the statistics for the second half of 1934.

Within the theoretical global quotas thus fixed, which may be increased or reduced in accordance with economic necessities, each exporting country will receive a quantitative share proportional to the imports from it of the product in question in the period 1928 to 1933 inclusive.

3. In the event of a quota not being exhausted during the half-yearly period for which it was fixed, the Government of the Protectorate may, on request made to it, carry forward the unused balance to the following half-year.

4. The management of the quotas shall be arranged by the Protectorate Government, in concert with the corporative organisations designated for this purpose by the Government of each of the exporting countries.

II.—Tariffs and Gate Taxes.

1. Customs duties to come into force at the same time as the quota system above described.

The articles enumerated in List B annexed hereto will be made subject to a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem (including the 2½ per cent. duty established by the Act of Algeciras), subject to the observations contained in the said list.

Products necessary for agriculture, such as agricultural machinery, &c., as well as raw materials necessary for industry, such as coal having a volatile content greater than 10 per cent., &c., will be made subject to reduced duties. In the case of the coal above mentioned, the duty shall be 10 per cent. ad valorem (including the duty of 2½ per cent. ad valorem established by the Act of Algeciras).

Other articles, except those to which duty-free entry will be accorded, shall be subject to a normal tariff of 15 per cent. ad valorem (including the duty of 2½ per cent. established by the Act of Algeciras).

2. As the collection of the full amount of the ad valorem customs duties depends on their correct assessment, the French Government propose the adoption by the Protectorate Government of the draft regulations annexed hereto,⁽¹⁾ which are designed to improve the conditions of collection of these duties.

⁽¹⁾ Not reproduced.

186. By a subsequent exchange of notes of the 5th and 7th June, 1930, a provisional commercial agreement was concluded between the United Kingdom and Egypt on the basis of reciprocal most-favoured-nation treatment as regards goods. This exchange of notes was to remain in force until the 16th February, 1931, unless previously replaced by a treaty, and has been prolonged since for periods of one year.

187. Provisional commercial agreements on a most-favoured-nation basis were also concluded with the other capitulatory Powers, but no other Power appears to have made the proviso contained in Sir P. Loraine's note of the 16th February, 1930.

Foreign Office, July 1, 1935.

capitulatory treaties, and it was stated that it was the treaty of 1809 and the Capitulations before that date, with their 3 per cent. duty, to which His Majesty's Government would have the right to revert. According to the Law Officers' report of 1889, however, it is the treaty of 1838 that should have been mentioned. Having regard to the principle that what has been modified is annulled, there is considerable doubt whether the claim to revert to capitulatory rights as regards customs duties which was subsequently modified by terminable treaties is a valid one. But the case for reverting to the 1838 treaty is not so weak as that for reverting to the 1809 treaty.

181. In February 1929 the Egyptian Government announced their intention to establish the Egyptian tariff by legislative means and to conclude conventions in virtue of such legislation. They accordingly gave formal notice of denunciation of the United Kingdom-Egypt Commercial Convention of 1889, which would thus terminate on the 16th February, 1930. According to the view of His Majesty's Government, on the disappearance of Egypt's commercial treaties, there was a case in strict law for claiming that, under the Capitulations, His Majesty's Government could insist that Egypt should revert to a customs flat rate of 3 per cent. The disappearance of the Capitulations in Turkey, it was considered, need not be held to affect the position. But general, as opposed to legal, considerations made it impracticable to insist on such an obligation, and it was thought desirable, while making a reservation of our rights, to ensure a reasonable measure of compliance with our wishes, by the judicious use of the lever afforded by the Capitulations.

182. In March 1929 the Egyptian Minister of Finance informed Lord Lloyd, that while fully maintaining their legal rights, the Egyptian Government were desirous of removing any unnecessary apprehensions as to the new legislative proposals, and agreed to publish the draft Customs and Excise Law, with the tariff schedules, in order to enable interested parties to make suggestions and alterations.

183. On the 30th May, 1929, Lord Lloyd addressed a note to the Egyptian Minister for Foreign Affairs acknowledging the notification of the denunciation of the commercial convention of 1889 and welcoming the assurances given by the Minister of Finance in March. The note concluded with the statement that the denunciation automatically terminated, as from the 16th February, 1930, the temporary derogations from capitulatory rights contained in the existing "Règlement douanier égyptien," which were accepted by article 12 of the denounced convention. "The full and formal consent of His Majesty's Government is an essential condition precedent to the exercise by the Egyptian Government after the 16th February, 1930, of powers of this kind and of jurisdiction over British subjects contrary to the Capitulations." A copy of Lord Lloyd's note was sent to the representatives of capitulatory Powers in Egypt.

184. The draft customs law and schedules were published on the 18th December, 1929, and it was feared that the interval before the enforcement of the law was too short to provide adequate opportunity for interested parties to formulate suggestions. However, it became realised that if serious economic results were to be avoided, it was essential that the new tariff should not be delayed after the 17th February, 1930.

185. It only remained, therefore, to consider in which form the consent of His Majesty's Government should be communicated to the Egyptian Government. On the 16th February, 1930, a note was addressed to the Egyptian Government by Sir P. Loraine in a form which appeared adequately to safeguard the position in regard to the Capitulations. In this note His Majesty's Government recorded "their acceptance of the law, together with the tariff schedule as now published, or with such minor modifications as may be lawfully introduced, the new Excise Law, and the continued application of the existing 'Règlement douanier' to British subjects and goods of British origin, and to take the necessary steps to inform British subjects established in Egypt." The note also stated that in order to avoid any possible misunderstanding "this acceptance must be regarded as provisional for one year as from the 17th February, and subject to the proviso that British subjects and goods of British origin will enjoy most-favoured-nation treatment in any circumstances that may arise during the year, and that the double duty contemplated in article 2 of the law will in no circumstances be applied to British subjects and goods of British origin."

Conf. 13656,
No. 103.

Conf. 13656,
No. 114.

VI.—Egypt and Tariff Autonomy.

172. The possibility of the French Government drawing an analogy between the position of Morocco as regards tariff autonomy and that of Egypt makes it desirable to give some account of the development of the question in Egypt.

173. By the treaty of 1809 between Great Britain and Turkey and by the older Capitulations most-favoured-nation treatment was obtained for British subjects and ships and a limit of 3 per cent. was fixed for duties on goods imported by British subjects.

174. The convention with Turkey of 1838 confirmed the privileges conferred on British subjects and ships by the existing Capitulations except as specifically altered by the present convention. The convention contained a most-favoured-nation clause as regards British subjects and ships, but the import duty was fixed at 3 per cent. plus a 2 per cent. internal duty.

175. A treaty of 1861 was concluded between Great Britain and Turkey in substitution of the convention of 1838, and, unlike the convention of 1838 and previous treaties, was terminable after a certain period. The treaty of 1861 confirmed "now and for ever all the previous Capitulations, with the exception of those clauses which it is the intention of the present treaty to modify." It contained a most-favoured-nation clause for British subjects and ships, and the import duty was now limited to 8 per cent. for articles imported from British territory. Similar treaties were concluded by Turkey with other capitulatory Powers.

176. An Ottoman firman of 1867 gave Egypt independence as regards customs duties, and another firman of 1873 gave Egypt power to conclude separate commercial conventions.

177. In 1882-83 Turkey exercised her right to terminate the British Treaty of 1861 and nine other treaties with other Powers which expired about the same date. There remained, however, five treaties which still had some years to run, and pending the conclusion of a new treaty, His Majesty's Government claimed most-favoured-nation treatment under the Capitulations as regards the 8 per cent. import duty. The Turkish Government contended, however, that the Capitulations as regards the import duty had been modified once and for all by the 1861 treaty, and when that treaty terminated the Capitulations on that point came to an end. The dispute appears to have been compromised, Turkey being willing, in fact, to grant most-favoured-nation treatment, though not admitting the obligation in principle.

178. There are two Law Officers' opinions bearing on this point. An opinion of 1883 advised that, on the termination of the 1861 treaty, there was a complete reversion to the status quo before the treaty of 1838. An opinion of 1889 advised—

- (i) That the Capitulations entitled British subjects to most-favoured-nation treatment.
- (ii) That the practice of the Porte with regard to the modification of the Capitulations by terminable treaties would be sufficient if shown to be constant to establish the position that the Capitulations revive on the termination of the treaties modifying them.

(As to (ii) it does not seem possible to establish evidence of such constant practice.)

- (iii) That (contrary to the opinion of 1883) the 1838 treaty should be held to have revived on the termination of the treaty of 1861.

179. In 1884 Egypt concluded a commercial treaty with Greece, and in 1889 one with Great Britain, and between 1892 and 1906 commercial agreements were concluded with most of the capitulatory Powers, all being terminable. As a result, while those treaties lasted, Egypt was unable to raise customs duties above 8 per cent. The last treaty was one with Italy, and it was on the termination of this in 1930 that Egypt claimed to have freedom to introduce a new tariff.

180. The position in this respect was considered in 1922, when a despatch was addressed to Lord Allenby, in which His Majesty's Government asserted the view that the capitulatory Powers on the termination of their temporary commercial agreements could claim the rights resulting from their non-terminable enumerated products shall be the same as those applicable to similar local products. In return, His Majesty's Government undertake to apply the provisions of the decree as modified to British nationals, as well as the provisions of any other gate tax regulations which have been made up to the time of signature of the exchange of notes, in so far as they have not already been applied to British nationals.

V.—Gate Tax in Spanish Zone.

167. New regulations for the collection of the gate tax in the Spanish Zone were introduced by a dahir of the 1st September, 1931, modelled on the French dahir of the 20th April, 1917. The dahir, which was published on the 25th September, 1931, had not been brought to the notice of His Majesty's consul at Tetuan, though the Spanish delegate-general, in the course of verbal representations by His Majesty's consul regarding certain points in the dahir, admitted that this should have been done before the dahir was issued.

168. On instruction from the Foreign Office His Majesty's consul at Tetuan drafted a King's Regulation making the tax applicable to British subjects. Mr. Gurney, His Majesty's consul-general at Tangier, however, drew attention to what appeared to be discrimination arising from the different rates of tax levied on soya-bean oil and olive oil. On instructions from Mr. Gurney, His Majesty's consul at Tetuan reminded the local authorities that until a King's Regulation was issued, the dahir was not applicable to British subjects. At the same time he made a formal protest against its having already been applied to them, and stated that, pending reference to His Majesty's Government, he made all reserves on the question of the apparent discrimination as regards soya-bean oil.

169. On the 24th February, 1932, the Foreign Office pointed out to Mr. Gurney that the discrimination in the tax between olive oil and soya-bean oil was not a breach of British most-favoured-nation rights, and explained the policy of His Majesty's Government in regard to the enforcement of dahirs. "Where the dahir is in contradiction of their treaty rights His Majesty's Government have a clear and proper case for refusing to enforce it. This is not so in the present case. Where the dahir is, though not contrary to treaties, in fact discriminatory against British trade, the case comes very near the line. It may be good policy to use the capitulatory position for what it is worth, to try to get the dahirs amended so that they will not be discriminatory against British trade in fact, even though in form they are not discriminatory. This lever should not, however, be used too frequently because it is not a very strong one, and the use of it is apt to prejudice the capitulatory position itself. In spite of the fact that, strictly speaking, the Spanish authorities are not entitled to levy the taxes on British subjects until the King's Regulation is made, it is the case . . . that in practice they both can and do. . . . In view of these considerations His Majesty's Government were disposed to enforce by King's Regulation all dahirs imposing taxation which cannot be said to be contrary to the letter of the treaty rights of His Majesty's Government."

170. Unless any fresh arguments were brought forward, His Majesty's consul at Tetuan was to be authorised to issue the necessary King's Regulation. A vizirial decree was issued on the 17th March, 1932, equalising the rates of gate tax payable on olive and other edible oils, and a King's Regulation was issued on the 7th July, 1932, making the dahir and vizirial decrees applicable to British subjects as from the 1st January, 1932.

171. The above regulations have since been modified by a dahir and a vizirial decree of the 1st November, 1934, the effect of which is that the gate tax will be leviable on imported goods only. His Majesty's Ambassador at Madrid and His Majesty's consul at Tetuan were instructed (March 1935) to make representations to the Spanish Government and Spanish Zone authorities setting out the treaty rights of His Majesty's Government, and pointing out that the new regulations infringe the principle of equalisation of taxes between imported and local products; that His Majesty's Government will be unable to accept them unless amended in this respect; that if they are not amended and are nevertheless applied to British subjects without the consent of His Majesty's Government, the latter reserve the right to make claims for refund of duties; and, finally, that prior notice of intended measures of this nature should be given to British consular officers (Annex 49). The text of the note addressed to the Spanish Government is contained in Annex 50. Similar representations have been made by His Majesty's consul at Tetuan.

[11543]

F 2

W 13455/
13455/28/1931

W 1751/583/
28/1932

W 2313/583/
28/1932

W 1751/583/
28/1932

W 4075/583/
28/1932

W 8092/583/
28/1932

on imported goods after their arrival in Morocco, as opposed to the levy on goods transported from one town to another, and also to any modifications of the rate of the tax as fixed by the regulations accepted by the Diplomatic Body at Tangier. His Majesty's Government were willing, in accordance with their general policy, to waive their rights to a certain extent as regards justifiable changes in the rate of the tax, and they had, in fact, agreed to certain changes of this kind in the past. But His Majesty's Government had never abandoned their rights, and could not agree to any differentiation in the levy of the tax as between imported goods and local products. Consequently, they were obliged to protest against the tariffs recently promulgated.

161. The reply, dated the 7th July, 1934, of the French Resident-General (Annex 46) challenged the whole basis of British treaty rights in Morocco. The French contention is that article 13 of the Madrid Convention, regarding the gate tax, has lapsed, and articles 1 and 4 of the Franco-German Convention of 1911 gives France entire freedom as regards the establishment of duties and other taxes, subject to economic equality and commercial freedom. Article 13 of the convention of 1911 abrogates all contrary treaty stipulations. The Shereefian Government, therefore, considered they had an absolute right to modify the gate tax as they thought proper and of their own initiative.

162. This contention is the same as that put forward on earlier occasions by the French Government, and refuted in notes addressed by His Majesty's Ambassador at Paris to the French Government (see paragraphs 126, 128-130).

163. It was thought possible that a practical settlement of the question of the gate tax might be reached in the course of the pending general trade discussions with the French Government, but the French attitude has been to make the removal of the discrimination against imported goods in the levy of the gate tax and similar taxes dependent upon the recognition of the right of the protectorate authorities to tariff autonomy. This is, however, not acceptable to His Majesty's Government, since it is essential to maintain in principle the rights under article 7 of the Anglo-Moroccan Commercial Convention of 1856 and article 66 of the Act of Algeciras, whereby the customs duty on goods imported by British subjects into Morocco is limited to 12½ per cent. ad valorem. Even if His Majesty's Government admitted certain agreed increases in customs duties as part of an arrangement reached during the pending trade discussions, it would have to be made clear that such increases were to be regarded as agreed derogations from the terms of the convention of 1856.

164. On instructions from His Majesty's Government, His Majesty's Embassy at Paris, in a note of the 9th November, 1934 (Annex 47), drew the attention of the French Government to the above correspondence between His Majesty's consul-general at Rabat and the French Resident-General, and expressed the surprise of His Majesty's Government at the latter's attitude. His Majesty's Government were unable to accept any suggestion that the removal of discrimination against imported goods in the levy of the gate tax should be dependent on the recognition of the right of the protectorate authorities to tariff autonomy. His Majesty's Government had stated that they might be willing to admit certain agreed increases in customs duties, but such increases would have to be regarded as agreed derogations from the principle laid down in the Anglo-Moroccan Commercial Convention of 1856 (article 7). But, with reference to the contentions of the Resident-General, His Majesty's Government were unable to comprehend how their accession to an agreement between France and Germany could be held to modify Morocco's obligations under previous treaties, and they therefore requested the repeal of the recent illegal modification of the gate tax.

165. In their reply of the 22nd November, 1934 (Annex 48), the French Government stated that they were unable to agree that the treaties of 1904 and 1911 had no bearing on the question of the gate tax. They considered, however, that it was useless to continue the discussion on the judicial aspect, and desired to reach a practical settlement of the matter in the course of the negotiations between the two Governments regarding the introduction of certain economic reforms in Morocco (see paragraph 116 above).

166. This practical settlement is embodied in Note No. 1 (II (3)) of the agreement of the 29th January, 1935 (see Annex 1), between His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and the French Government on the following lines. The French Government agree to modify the vizirial decree of the 31st July, 1933 (paragraph 160 above), so that the gate taxes applicable to certain

W 6720/1142/
28/1934

1936

33

IV.—Gate Tax in the French Zone.

155. By article 13 of the Madrid Convention of 1880, "les étrangers . . . payeront la taxe dite des portes. La quotité et le mode de perception . . . seront . . . l'objet d'un règlement spécial entre les représentants des Puissances et le Ministre des Affaires étrangères de Sa Majesté chérifienne. Ladite taxe ne pourra être augmentée sans un nouvel accord avec les représentants des Puissances." Regulations were issued with the concurrence of the Powers on the 30th March, 1881 (State Papers, Vol. 72, p. 636), and on the 2nd June, 1896 (Annuaire du Maroc, 1905, p. 221).

156. Up to 1917 the tax was not levied in ports on goods imported by sea; it was only on leaving the ports for the interior that the tax was paid by foreign goods, and it had thus always been a purely internal duty. A dahir of the 20th April, 1917, was sent home by Sir H. White, which replaced the regulations of 1881 and 1896, the most important modification being that the tax was now to be paid at the customs-house, though on behalf of the municipal authorities, at the same time as the import duty. In a later despatch Sir H. White reported that, in accordance with article 5 of the dahir, the municipal authorities at Casablanca had considerably raised the gate tax on wool, which had called forth strong protests from British merchants. The head of the Cabinet diplomatique informed His Majesty's consul at Casablanca that the French protectorate authorities had the right to make new regulations and to modify those already existing even to the extent of modifying the tariff of taxes fixed by the Maghzen in concert with the Diplomatic Body at Tangier under the provisions of the treaties. Sir H. White deplored the apparent intention of the French to put into force measures which would be resisted in normal circumstances and to face His Majesty's Government with a fait accompli after the war.

157. On the 2nd June, 1917, instructions were sent to Sir H. White by the Foreign Office pointing out that it was desirable to maintain British commercial rights in Morocco, and instructing him to make suitable representations pointing out the objections to the dahir. Before receiving the instructions, Sir H. White had written privately to the Resident-General saying that it was not necessary to discuss the question of principle as the views of His Majesty's Government were well known, but asking why the protectorate authorities had made such a heavy increase in the gate tax on wool without previous warning. No reply was received, and on the 25th July, 1917, Sir H. White again wrote privately to the Resident-General stating the case more fully. He quoted M. Delcassé's statement of 1915 that a tax could not be exacted from British subjects without the consent of His Majesty's Government, and added that he hoped an amending dahir would be drawn up and official conflict avoided. No reply was received.

158. In February 1918 Sir H. White reported to the Foreign Office that he had received no reply to his private representations on the dahir of 1917, and proposed, in view of the lapse of time and the pending negotiations between the two countries regarding the abolition of Capitulations, that he should take no further action. This proposal was approved. No King's Regulation was ever issued.

159. The question of the application of a gate tax in Tangier on goods entering by sea arose in 1927. His Majesty's consul-general considered that, although His Majesty's Government would be entitled to object on treaty grounds, it might be desirable to accept in the present instance, and he was authorised, in view of the urgent necessity of raising revenue, and of the fact that His Majesty's Government had tacitly acquiesced in the gate tax on goods arriving by sea in the French Zone, to raise no further objection.

160. Further alterations were made in the gate tax as applied in the French Zone, and by a decree of the 31st July, 1933, a new tariff was introduced providing for increased duties on certain imported products. His Majesty's consul-general at Rabat pointed out that, as a result of the progressive changes, the tax has become equivalent to an additional and protective import duty. After consulting the Board of Trade, it was decided to make strong representations to the authorities of the French Zone. Accordingly, on the 28th April, 1934, His Majesty's consul-general at Rabat addressed a note (Annex 45) to the French Resident-General, which, after stating the legal position based on the Madrid Convention of 1880 and the Regulations of 1881 and 1896, went on to observe that the assent of His Majesty's Government was necessary both to the levy of the tax

[11543]

53

41

Note No. 2.

Sir John Simon to M. Corbin.

Your Excellency,

Foreign Office, January 29, 1935.

With reference to your Excellency's note (No. 1), I have the honour to state that His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, in accordance with article 1 of the Franco-German Convention of 1911 regarding Morocco, to which they have acceded, and in accordance with their general friendly policy of not availing themselves of their treaty rights in Morocco to obstruct the introduction of administrative and economic measures which are desirable for the well-being of the French Zone of Morocco, hereby declare their acceptance of the economic measures and reforms specified in your Excellency's note. This acceptance only extends to the particular measures therein specified and does not extend to any alteration of these measures, and is, moreover, conditional upon all the measures specified being put into force. I must, moreover, state that His Majesty's Government's acceptance of these measures is given by His Majesty's Government in waiver of their treaty rights and in no way prejudices the assertion of these rights as regards any measures other than those specified in your Excellency's note.

With reference to the penultimate paragraph of your Excellency's note, I have the honour to state that, on the analogy of the reciprocity clause adopted by the Council of the League of Nations in September 1930 in respect of the A and B Mandates, His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom will give favourable consideration to requests made to it with a view to securing in commercial matters to persons belonging to Morocco, or to goods imported therefrom, advantages corresponding to those accorded in Morocco to British nationals and to United Kingdom goods.

His Majesty's Government agree with the suggestion in the concluding paragraph of your note under reply that the time for the introduction of these measures shall be that subsequently agreed upon between the two Governments as soon as possible after the 1st January, 1935.

I have, &c.

JOHN SIMON.

Note No. 3.

M. Corbin to Sir John Simon.

(Translation.)

French Embassy.

Your Excellency,

London, January 29, 1935.

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your Excellency's note (No. 2) regarding certain economic measures and reforms which it is desired to introduce in Morocco.

I am instructed to inform you that the French Government, like His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, fully reserves its point of view in relation to the treaty aspects of the matter, while none the less agreeing to reach a practical solution in accordance with the notes (Nos. 1 and 2) exchanged between your Excellency and myself.

I have, &c.

CH. CORBIN.

Note No. 4.

M. Corbin to Sir John Simon.

(Translation.)

French Embassy.

Your Excellency,

London, January 29, 1935.

The Government of the Republic, as representing His Shereefian Majesty, desires the introduction in the Tangier Zone of certain increased customs duties.

[11543]

G

61

which are specified in the Annex of this note, and desires to know whether His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom is in agreement with this proposal.

It is understood that, if His Majesty's Government should agree to this proposal, it could only be brought into force when the conditions provided by article 8 of the Tangier Statute have been complied with.

I have, &c.

CH. CORBIN.

Annex relating to the increase of Customs Duties in the Tangier Zone.

1. The Articles enumerated in the list below will be made subject to a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem (including the 2½ per cent. duty established by the Act of Algeciras), subject to the observations continued in the said list:—

Products to be made subject on importation to a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Cement.
Edible pastes.
Seed oils.
Motor vehicles and parts thereof.

Products necessary for agriculture, such as agricultural machinery, &c., as well as raw materials necessary for industry, such as coal having a volatile content greater than 10 per cent., &c., will be made subject to reduced duties. In the case of the coal above mentioned, the duty shall be 10 per cent. ad valorem (including the duty of 2½ per cent. ad valorem established by the Act of Algeciras).

Other articles, except those to which duty-free entry will be accorded, shall be subject to a normal tariff of 15 per cent. ad valorem (including the duty of 2½ per cent. established by the Act of Algeciras).

2. As the collection of the full amount of the ad valorem Customs duties depends on their correct assessment, the French Government, representing His Shereefian Majesty, propose the adoption in the Tangier Zone of regulations designed to improve the conditions of collection of these duties.

Note No. 5.

Sir John Simon to M. Corbin.

Your Excellency,

Foreign Office, January 29, 1935.

With reference to your Excellency's note (No. 4), I have the honour to state that His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom are in agreement with the increases of Customs duties to be applied in the Tangier Zone as set forth in the Annex to your Excellency's note.

These increases can, however, only be brought into force when the conditions provided by the Tangier Statute have been fulfilled.

With reference to paragraph 2 of the Annex to your Excellency's note, His Majesty's Government would view favourably the introduction in the Tangier Zone, in accordance with the provisions of the Tangier Statute, of new Regulations to improve the conditions under which Customs duties are collected.

I have, &c.

JOHN SIMON.

ANNEX 2.

Sir Edward Grey to Sir F. Bertie (Paris).

(No. 742.)
Sir,

Foreign Office, December 28, 1914.

I transmit to your Excellency herewith a copy of a despatch from His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Tangier, respecting a proposal of the authorities in the French Zone in Morocco to impose a "droit de consommation" on sugar.

You should inform the French Government that His Majesty's Government understand that British interests will not be appreciably affected by the proposed duty, and that His Majesty's Government therefore have no desire to embarrass the French Government by protesting against its imposition. His Majesty's Government must, however, in principle, reserve all the commercial privileges which they enjoy under existing treaties with Morocco, which privileges are in no way diminished by their recognition of the French Protectorate.

I am, &c.

(For the Secretary of State).
RALPH PAGET.

ANNEX 3.

M. Delcassé to Sir F. Bertie (Paris).

January 8, 1915.

M. l'Ambassadeur,

Par sa lettre du 1^{er} de ce mois, votre Excellence a bien voulu me faire savoir que le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté ne pensait pas que les intérêts britanniques seraient affectés d'une manière appréciable par l'établissement d'une taxe sur le sucre au Maroc et n'avait d'ailleurs pas l'intention d'embarrasser le Gouvernement de la République en protestant contre cette mesure.

En même temps, Sir Edward Grey a prié votre Excellence de rappeler qu'en principe le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté considère que les privilèges commerciaux reconnus à la Grande-Bretagne par les traités en vigueur avec le Maroc n'ont subi aucune atteinte du fait de la reconnaissance du Protectorat français sur l'Empire chérifien.

En remerciant le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté de ses dispositions amicales à l'expression desquelles nous sommes très sensibles, je serais reconnaissant à votre Excellence de lui faire savoir qu'il n'est nullement dans les intentions du Gouvernement de la République de soumettre les ressortissants anglais au Maroc à aucune mesure qui les priverait de la jouissance desdits privilèges, sans qu'au préalable le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté ait bien voulu y donner son assentiment. Votre Excellence voudra bien se souvenir qu'il a été ainsi procédé lors de l'établissement dans la Zone française du Maroc d'une taxe sur l'alcool. Il est évident que la reconnaissance du protectorat français sur le Maroc ne saurait à cet égard avoir pour la Grande-Bretagne des effets autres que la reconnaissance du protectorat britannique sur l'Égypte n'en comporte pour la France.

Si le Gouvernement chérifien donne suite au projet de taxe sur les sucres auquel fait allusion la lettre de votre Excellence, ladite taxe ne pourra être exigée des ressortissants britanniques, au moins tant que le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté n'aura pas consenti à ce qu'ils y soient soumis. Je crois devoir ajouter que non seulement mon Département n'a pas eu connaissance de réclamations élevées à ce sujet par des ressortissants anglais, mais même aucun dahir chérifien n'a jusqu'ici été publié qui autorise la perception d'une telle taxe et justifie les craintes dont témoigne la communication précitée.

Agréer, &c.

DELCASSE.

ANNEX 4.

M. Delcassé to Sir F. Bertie (Paris).

July 24, 1915.

M. l'Ambassadeur,

J'ai l'honneur d'exposer à votre Excellence que la nécessité d'augmenter les ressources du Protectorat marocain va obliger le Résident général de la République à Rabat à frapper d'une taxe de consommation les sucres introduits dans la Zone française de l'Empire chérifien. Au cours de sa récente visite à Rabat, M. White a laissé aux fonctionnaires de la Résidence générale l'impression que cette taxe, qui n'affecterait pas d'une manière sensible les intérêts britanniques, ne soulèverait vraisemblablement pas en fait d'objection de la part du Gouvernement du Roi. Me référant à ma note du 7 janvier dernier, je veux espérer que le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté britannique approuvera les déclarations de son représentant à Tanger.

Le Gouvernement de la République est d'autant plus fondé à escompter un assentiment à la mesure envisagée que l'adhésion du Gouvernement britannique aux réformes de tout ordre que nous introduisons au Maroc doit être considérée en droit comme accordée une fois pour toutes par la reconnaissance faite le 19 décembre dernier du Traité de Protectorat français sur le Maroc. Le Gouvernement du Roi a également adhéré, au moins implicitement, au traité franco-allemand du 4 novembre 1911; dans sa lettre au Chargé d'Affaires de France à Londres en date du 14 novembre de la même année, le Principal Secrétaire d'Etat des Affaires étrangères déclarait en effet que, sous la réserve de la conclusion d'un arrangement destiné à placer la ville et le district municipal de Tanger sous un contrôle international, le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté avait "grand plaisir à donner son adhésion à la convention franco-allemande." Or, on peut dire qu'en ce qui concerne la France et la Grande-Bretagne l'arrangement relatif au statut de Tanger est conclu: la note de mon Département du 21 décembre 1914 constatait l'accord complet des deux Gouvernements à ce sujet. Cet accord, en raison des termes, rappelés plus haut, dont s'est servi Sir Edward Grey, emporte bien l'adhésion du Gouvernement de Sa Majesté au traité franco-allemand, dont le traité de Protectorat n'est d'ailleurs que la conséquence. Il est superflu de rappeler que les deux actes précités stipulent dans leur article 1^{er} le pouvoir réglementaire absolu du représentant de la République au Maroc. Il est également inutile d'ajouter que les nouvelles taxes déjà établies ou celles dont l'établissement est prochain seront égales pour tous et qu'il ne sera constitué à ce sujet de privilège au profit de personne.

Peut-être le Gouvernement britannique objectera-t-il que, si la déclaration du 19 décembre 1914 stipule que la reconnaissance du Protectorat français sur le Maroc est faite sous la forme d'une adhésion formelle aux dispositions explicites du traité franco-marocain du 30 mars 1912, cependant la proclamation du Protectorat britannique sur l'Égypte n'a amené jusqu'ici aucune modification du statu quo en ce qui concerne les intérêts français en ce dernier pays. Le Gouvernement de la République en convient aisément, mais il s'attend que le Gouvernement britannique ne tarde pas à tirer de l'établissement de son Protectorat sur l'Égypte les conséquences qu'il comporte et il ne croit pas qu'on puisse de bonne foi soutenir que les réformes introduites au Maroc, et dont tous les habitants sans aucune exception ont ressenti les bienfaits comme ils doivent tous en supporter les charges, aient, tout bien considéré, lésé les intérêts des sujets britanniques. Néanmoins, animés en ce qui concerne les affaires marocaines du même souci d'entente dont nous constatons partout les heureux effets, et dans un sentiment de courtoisie qui s'inspirait de l'esprit de l'accord du 8 avril 1904, nous avons consenti, tant que le statu quo ne serait pas modifié en Égypte, à prévenir le Gouvernement britannique de nos intentions de réformes au Maroc, confiants qu'il n'y refuserait pas un assentiment qu'en droit strict nous ne nous croyons pas tenus de provoquer.

Je serais heureux d'apprendre que votre Excellence aura bien voulu soumettre les considérations qui précèdent à la plus amicale attention de Sir Edward Grey et que le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté ne fera pas d'objection à l'établissement, dans la Zone française de l'Empire chérifien, d'une taxe modérée de consommation sur les sucres.

Agrérez, &c.
DELCASSE.

ANNEX 5.

Sir Edward Grey to Sir F. Bertie (Paris).

(No. 650.)

Sir,

Foreign Office, August 5, 1915.

With reference to your Excellency's despatch No. 284 of the 27th ultimo, regarding the imposition of a consumption tax on sugar imported into the French Zone in Morocco, I request that your Excellency will inform M. Delcassé that, as already stated in my despatch No. 742 of the 28th December last, His Majesty's Government recognise the reasons which prompt the French Government to impose this tax and have agreed to its imposition.

Your Excellency should add that, as regards the general questions raised by M. Delcassé, His Majesty's Government have certainly recognised the French Protectorate in Morocco, but that they feel confident the French Government will agree that it is better to leave till quieter times the discussion of the renunciation of British and French extra-territorial treaty rights and jurisdiction in Morocco and Egypt respectively.

I am, &c.

(For the Secretary of State).
W. LANGLEY.

ANNEX 6.

The Resident-General, Rabat, to the Italian Chargé d'Affaires, Tangier.

M. le Chargé d'Affaires,

Rabat, le 10 janvier 1916.

Vous avez bien voulu, par une lettre en date du 27 décembre dernier, me faire part d'objections qui s'opposeraient, à votre avis, à l'application du dahir chérifien paru au Bulletin officiel du 13 décembre dernier et portant établissement d'un droit de consommation sur les sucres.

L'argumentation présentée, en l'espèce, par la Légation d'Italie, repose, semble-t-il, sur une fausse interprétation de l'Acte général d'Algésiras.

Tout d'abord, il ne s'agit pas, contrairement à l'opinion émise par vous, de la création d'une des taxes municipales, les seules visées à l'article 64 de cet acte et qui, en vertu de son texte, ne pouvaient pas être étendues aux ressortissants étrangers sans le consentement du Corps diplomatique, mais bien d'un droit de consommation, applicable, notamment, aux sucres indigènes, ainsi qu'à ceux qui sont importés de la Zone espagnole dans celle du Protectorat français.

Le Gouvernement du Protectorat n'oublie pas les stipulations de l'Acte d'Algésiras, mais l'adhésion du Gouvernement royal à l'accord franco-allemand du 4 novembre 1911 et au traité de Protectorat, qui modifient profondément le régime antérieur, exclut toute controverse au sujet dudit droit, quelle qu'en soit la nature.

Vous n'ignorez certainement pas que, sous réserve du maintien de l'égalité économique, l'article 1^{er} de l'accord franco-allemand a conféré à la France les droits réglementaires, en matière économique et financière, dans la mesure où des réformes seraient nécessaires pour le bon gouvernement de l'Empire chérifien. Précisés par la lettre interprétative de l'accord du 4 novembre, où il est expressément stipulé que "l'adhésion accordée d'une manière générale au Gouvernement français par l'article 1^{er} de ladite convention s'applique, naturellement, à toutes les questions donnant matière à réglementation et visées dans l'Acte d'Algésiras," ces droits ont été, sans qu'il puisse subsister aucun doute, confirmés par l'article 1^{er} du traité du Protectorat.

L'adhésion du Gouvernement royal à ces différents accords et, notamment, à l'article 4 de l'accord franco-allemand qui, interdisant toute inégalité "dans l'établissement des droits de douane, impôts et autres taxes," confère au Protectorat l'autonomie douanière comme l'autonomie fiscale, sous la seule réserve du principe d'égalité, implique nécessairement son assentiment aux mesures de réorganisation fiscale édictées par le Protectorat.

D'une manière plus générale, cette adhésion nous garantit implicitement le consentement des Puissances aux réformes en dehors desquelles la France serait dans l'impossibilité d'exercer ses droits au Maroc et d'y remplir la mission qu'elle y a assumée.

La promulgation du nouveau dahir est donc, à la fois conforme à la logique et au droit et, d'ailleurs, n'a motivé aucune objection de la part des autres Puissances signataires des accords susvisés.

Veuillez agréer, &c.
SAINT-AULAIRE.

ANNEX 7.

His Majesty's Embassy, Paris, to French Government.

November 8, 1919.

His Majesty's Government have been informed by His Majesty's agent and consul-general at Tangier that by a Shereefian dahir of the 25th August, a "droit de consommation" has been imposed on certain articles of merchandise imported in the French Zone, such as tea, coffee, chicory, &c.

His Majesty's Minister has the honour, under instructions from His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to point out that the imposition of this "droit de consommation" amounting in fact to an increase in the import duties on the articles affected, without the previous consent of His Majesty's Government having been obtained, reopens a discussion left unfinished in 1915. At that time the immediate occasion for an exchange of notes was the imposition of a "droit de consommation" on sugar, but as His Majesty's Government raised no objection to this tax, of which, as a matter of fact, they were given due notice, and as they proposed that the question of French and British extra-territorial rights in Egypt and Morocco respectively should be left until quieter times, no discussion on general principles actually took place.

In view, however, of the recent dahir, Sir George Grahame is directed to recall the attention of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs to the fact that by the Anglo-Moroccan Commercial Convention of 1856, supplemented by article 66 of the Act of Algeciras, the maximum duty which can be imposed on goods imported into Morocco by British subjects is 12½ per cent. ad valorem, and that thus, if it is desired to impose on the same goods a tax amounting to an increase in the import duty, the previous consent of His Majesty's Government is required.

That this view was shared by the French Government on the 8th January, 1915, is proved by the following passage in a note of that date from the Minister for Foreign Affairs to His Majesty's Ambassador in Paris:—

"Il n'est nullement dans les intentions du Gouvernement de la République de soumettre les ressortissants anglais au Maroc à aucune mesure qui les priverait de la jouissance desdits privilèges sans qu'au préalable le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté ait bien voulu donner son assentiment. . . . Si le Gouvernement chérifien donne suite au projet de taxe sur les sucres, auquel fait allusion la lettre de votre Excellence, ladite taxe ne pourra être exigée des ressortissants britanniques, au moins tant que le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté n'aura pas consenti à ce qu'ils y soient soumis."

It should be noted that the above opinion was put on record within a month after the adhesion of Great Britain on the 19th December, 1914, to the Franco-Moorish Treaty of 1912, on which the claim of the Protectorate to the right to impose a "droit de consommation" without the consent of His Majesty's Government is based. The fact that M. Delcassé could approve such language so soon after the adhesion of His Majesty's Government to the treaty of 1912 appears to His Majesty's Government to show clearly that the French Government had no intention of construing that adhesion as an abrogation of British rights in Morocco acquired by previous treaties, and the same view is put on record in a note addressed by His Majesty's Ambassador in Paris to the Minister for Foreign Affairs on the 1st January, 1915.

It was not in fact until July 1915 that the theory on which the Protectorate authorities seem to be now acting was first formulated. In a note dated the 24th of that month and addressed to Sir F. Bertie, M. Delcassé expressed himself as follows:—

"... l'adhésion du Gouvernement britannique aux réformes de tout ordre que nous introduisons au Maroc doit être considérée en droit comme accordée une fois pour toutes par la reconnaissance faite le 19 décembre dernier du Traité de Protectorat français sur le Maroc."

Later on in the same note it is maintained that article 1 of both the Franco-Moorish treaty of 1912, and the Franco-German treaty of 1911 (to which the United Kingdom had adhered, subject to adequate arrangements being made for the internationalisation of Tangier), confer upon France "le pouvoir réglementaire absolu."

Absolute power, then, according to the precise wording of these articles, is claimed over the administrative, judicial, educational, economic, financial, and military spheres. But most of the rights enjoyed by British subjects under the Anglo-Moroccan treaty and convention of 1856 and the Act of Algeciras fall under one or other of the above categories, and it would logically follow, if this contention were admitted by His Majesty's Government, that these rights no longer survive, having (unknown at the time to either Government) ceased to exist on the 19th December, 1914.

This is not a view which can be accepted by His Majesty's Government. It is a recognised principle that when a third party assents to a Protectorate of one State over another, the protected State is not thereby absolved from any obligations which it may have incurred towards the assenting Power, and in support of this principle it is sufficient to instance the case of the British Protectorate over Zanzibar. There is nothing in the treaty of 1890 expressly retaining in force the earlier treaties between Zanzibar and other countries, but the French Government continue to claim in Zanzibar all their rights under earlier treaties which have not been abrogated by any special arrangement with His Majesty's Government.

His Majesty's Government observe that with regard to Morocco the French Government have not acted entirely in accordance with the theory propounded by M. Delcassé in his note of the 24th July, 1915; had they done so they would not have negotiated with Great Britain in 1918 the draft Morocco-Egypt Convention.

Article 2 of that draft convention provides for the abolition of the British consular courts in the French Zone; article 7 again lays down that His Majesty's Government shall renounce all the rights they possess in virtue of the Act of Algeciras regarding the establishment and functions of the State Bank of Morocco. But had the Administration of the Protectorate been in possession of the absolute power claimed in M. Delcassé's note, these arrangements, construed as judicial and financial reforms, need never have been made the subject of negotiation. Again, article 6 (sic)⁽¹⁾ specifically maintains in force the Commercial Convention of 1856, which evidently could not have been regarded by the negotiators of the draft convention as a dead letter.

Clearly then, if certain financial and economic rights admittedly survive, all the rights conferred by the earlier treaties must also survive, including the right to exemption from an import duty in excess of 12½ per cent. ad valorem.

In view of the considerations set forth above, Sir G. Grahame is instructed by Earl Curzon of Kedleston to protest to the French Government against the imposition of these dues without the previous consent of His Majesty's Government having been formally requested and obtained, and to state that His Majesty's Government cannot but regard the goods imported by British subjects as exempt from the incidence of these dues.

(1) This should be article 5. See paragraph 99 of memorandum.

ANNEX 8.

Sir H. White (Tangier) to French Resident-General.

M. le Résident général,

November 24, 1919.

I have the honour, under instructions from His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to inform your Excellency that his attention has been called to the dahir of the 25th August last, imposing a "droit de consommation" on tea, coffee and other commodities imported into the French Zone.

In the opinion of His Majesty's Government, the imposition of this tax, without the previous consent of His Majesty's Government having been obtained, reopens a discussion left unfinished in 1915. At that time the immediate occasion for an exchange of notes was the imposition of a "droit de consommation" on sugar, of which, in effect, His Majesty's Government were given due notice, and to the incidence of which their assent was previously obtained. As, however, they raised no objection to this tax and proposed that the question of the renunciation of French and British extra-territorial rights in Egypt and Morocco should be left to quieter times, no discussion on general principles took place.

In view, however, of the promulgation of the above-mentioned dahir without previous consultation with His Majesty's Government, I am to remind your Excellency that by the Anglo-Moroccan Commercial Convention of 1856, supplemented by article 66 of the Act of Algeciras, the maximum duty which can be imposed on goods imported into Morocco by British subjects is 12½ per cent. ad valorem. If, therefore, it is desired to impose on the same goods a tax amounting to an increase in the import duty, the previous consent of His Majesty's Government is indispensable.

That the French Government shared this view on the 8th January, 1915, is proved by the following passage in the note of that date from M. Delcassé:—

"Il n'est nullement dans les intentions du Gouvernement de la République de soumettre les ressortissants anglais au Maroc à aucune mesure qui les priverait de la jouissance desdits privilèges sans qu'au préalable le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté ait bien voulu donner son assentiment. . . . Si le Gouvernement chérifien donne suite au projet de taxe sur les sucres, auquel fait allusion la lettre de votre Excellence, ladite taxe ne pourra être exigée des ressortissants britanniques, au moins tant que le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté n'aura pas consenti à ce qu'ils y soient soumis."

It is important to note that the above opinion was put on record within a month after the adhesion of Great Britain to the Franco-Moorish Treaty of 1912 (the 19th December, 1914), for it would seem to be on the adhesion of Great Britain to that treaty that the claim of the Protectorate authorities to impose, without the consent of His Majesty's Government, a "droit de consommation" on imports is based. The fact that M. Delcassé could approve such language so soon after the adhesion of Great Britain to the treaty of 1912 clearly shows that the French Government had no intention of construing that adhesion as an abrogation of the British rights in Morocco acquired by previous treaties; and the same view was put on record shortly after in a communication on the subject addressed to the French Government by His Britannic Majesty's Ambassador at Paris.

It was not, in fact, till July 1915 that the theory on which the promulgation of the dahir in question would seem to be based was first formulated. In a note dated the 24th of that month addressed to His Majesty's Ambassador, M. Delcassé expresses himself as follows:—

"... l'adhésion du Gouvernement britannique aux réformes de tout ordre que nous introduisons au Maroc doit être considérée en droit comme accordée une fois pour toutes par la reconnaissance faite le 19 décembre dernier du Traité de Protectorat français sur le Maroc."

Later on, in the same note, it is maintained that article 1 of both the Franco-Moorish Treaty of 1912 and the Franco-German Treaty of 1911 (to which the United Kingdom had adhered, subject to adequate arrangements being made for the internationalisation of Tangier) confer upon France "le pouvoir réglementaire absolu."

Absolute power, then, according to the precise wording of these articles, is claimed over the administrative, judicial, educational, economic, financial and military spheres. But most of the rights enjoyed by British subjects under the Anglo-Moroccan Treaty and Convention of 1856 and the Act of Algeciras fall under one or the other of the above categories; and it would logically follow, if the contention of the French Government were admitted, that these rights now no longer survive, having (unknown at the time to either Government) ceased to exist on the 19th December, 1914.

This is not a view which His Majesty's Government can countenance. It is a recognised principle that when a third party assents to a Protectorate of one State over another the protected State is not thereby absolved from any treaty obligations which it may have incurred towards the assenting Power. In support of this principle it is sufficient to instance the British Protectorate over Zanzibar. There is nothing in the treaty of 1890 expressly retaining in force the earlier treaties between Zanzibar and other countries, but the French Government continue to claim in Zanzibar all their rights under the earlier treaties which have not been abrogated by any special arrangements with His Majesty's Government.

It is satisfactory to observe that the French Government has not acted, even as regards Morocco, consistently with the theory propounded by M. Delcassé; otherwise they would not have negotiated with Great Britain in 1918 the draft Morocco-Egyptian Convention.

Article (2) of that draft provides for the abolition of the British consular courts in the French Zone; article (7) again lays down that His Majesty's Government shall renounce all the rights which they possess in virtue of the Act of Algeciras regarding the establishment and the functions of the State Bank of Morocco. But had the Administration of the Protectorate been in possession of the absolute power claimed in M. Delcassé's note, these rearrangements, construed as judicial and financial reforms, need never have been made the subject of negotiation. Again, article (6) specifically maintains in force the commercial convention of 1856, which evidently could not have been regarded by the negotiators of the draft convention as a dead letter.

Clearly, then, if certain judicial, financial and economic rights admittedly survive, all the rights conferred by the earlier treaties must survive, including the right to exemption from an import duty in excess of 12½ per cent. ad valorem.

I have the honour, therefore, to inform your Excellency that His Majesty's Government find it necessary to protest against the imposition of these dues without their previous agreement having been formally requested and obtained, and must regard the goods imported by British subjects as exempt from their incidence.

I avail, &c.

HERBERT E. WHITE.

ANNEX 9.

French Ministry for Foreign Affairs to His Majesty's Embassy, Paris.

November 21, 1919.

Par sa note du 8 de ce mois, l'Ambassade de Sa Majesté britannique à Paris a exposé que le Principal Secrétaire d'Etat des Affaires étrangères estime que les dispositions du dahir du 25 août 1919 portant création d'une taxe intérieure de consommation sur les principales denrées coloniales et leurs succédanés ne sont pas applicables aux sujets et ressortissants de l'Empire britannique au Maroc tant que leur perception n'a pas été autorisée par un acte formel du Gouvernement de Sa Majesté.

Le Ministère des Affaires étrangères a l'honneur de faire savoir que le Gouvernement chérifien, ainsi que l'affirmait la note de M. Delcassé du 24 juillet 1915, est, pourvu que le principe de l'égalité économique soit respecté, maître de ses tarifs douaniers. Une telle maîtrise résulte des termes généraux des traités du 4 novembre 1911 et du 30 mars 1912 auxquels a adhéré, réserves faites en ce qui concerne le régime prévu pour Tanger, le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté britannique.

[11543]

H

Le Gouvernement chérifien ne se propose pas, au surplus, au moins pour l'instant, de faire usage de cette maîtrise douanière.

Il ne s'agit pas, en effet, d'un droit de douane, mais d'une taxe intérieure de consommation applicable à des produits coloniaux de toute origine. Les sommes escomptées de cette taxe sont nécessaires à l'équilibre du budget marocain et à l'achèvement de travaux publics dont le commerce britannique est appelé bénéficier.

Mais le Gouvernement français reconnaît volontiers que, tant que le Gouvernement britannique n'aura pas renoncé à ses privilèges capitulaires et que ses tribunaux consulaires continueront à fonctionner au Maroc, les infractions commises à toutes les dispositions législatives nouvelles non reconnues par l'autorité anglaise ne pourront pas être réprimées.

Aussi, le Gouvernement français se plaint à espérer que le Gouvernement allié voudra bien, comme il l'a fait en 1915 en ce qui concerne la taxe de consommation sur les sucres, provoquer les mesures nécessaires pour faire prendre par l'autorité consulaire britannique les règlements qui donneront aux infractions au dahir du 25 août 1919, dont le texte est ci-joint, une sanction qui ne peut venir, à l'égard des ressortissants anglais, que des juridictions consulaires de la Grande-Bretagne.

En attendant la promulgation de l'Ordre en Conseil sollicité, le Ministère des Affaires étrangères prescrit à la Résidence générale de la République à Rabat de ne pas faire appliquer aux sujets et ressortissants britanniques au Maroc les dispositions du dahir du 25 août dernier. A cet effet, les autorités chérifiennes autoriseront, sur demandes présentées par les consuls britanniques, la remise des produits visés au dahir sans le paiement de la taxe nouvelle. Il ne pourrait être question que des produits nécessaires à la consommation personnelle des sujets et ressortissants de l'Empire et à celle des personnes vivant sous leur toit. Toute mesure étendant le bénéfice d'une semblable disposition aux produits destinés à la clientèle commerciale des intéressés romprait en leur faveur la règle de l'égalité économique, qui est le fondement du droit contractuel au Maroc et dont le Gouvernement britannique n'a cessé de réclamer la stricte application.

ANNEX 10.

His Majesty's Embassy, Paris, to French Ministry for Foreign Affairs.

February 20, 1920.

With reference to the note from the Ministry for Foreign Affairs dated the 21st November, 1919, regarding the imposition of consumption duties in Morocco, His Majesty's Embassy has the honour, under instructions from His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to inform the Ministry for Foreign Affairs that, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, the terms of that note seem to be based not on any new arguments, but only upon a repetition of the thesis which was put forward in M. Delcassé's note of the 24th July, 1915, namely, that the adherence of Great Britain to the Franco-Moorish Treaty of 1912 confers upon the French Government, as of right, absolute discretion to impose upon British subjects in Morocco any taxes which they may consider advisable, regardless of the exemptions secured for British subjects by the earlier treaties, e.g., those of 1856 and the Act of Algeciras, which ostensibly remain unabrogated and in full force.

His Majesty's Embassy is instructed, in these circumstances, to set forth once more those arguments which have convinced His Majesty's Government that the French Government are not justified in maintaining the position which they have adopted.

The French Government state that their claim to impose taxation is based upon article 1 of the Franco-Moorish Treaty of 1912, which contemplates the introduction of "economic reforms." Having once adhered to the treaty containing this clause, Great Britain, it is argued, is bound to accept all such reforms. But this same clause contemplates the introduction of reforms of various other kinds, judicial, administrative, financial and educational. The logical conclusion to be drawn from this would seem to be that Great Britain is bound likewise to accept, amongst other things, all judicial reforms, and His Majesty's Government are led to enquire whether the French Government feel entitled to abolish at their discretion the British consular courts. It would not appear that they did feel so entitled, when they entered last year upon special negotiations with the British Government with this end in view, and, in these circumstances, His Majesty's Government are quite unable to understand which of the privileges secured by treaty for British subjects the French Government consider to have survived the Franco-Moorish Treaty of 1912, and which of these privileges have, in their opinion, ceased to exist. His Majesty's Government are bound to observe that, pending any specific explanation of this subject, they must continue to maintain that all such privileges exist unimpaired.

It was brought to the notice of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs in His Majesty's Embassy's note of the 8th November, 1919, that at the time when Great Britain adhered to the Franco-Moorish Treaty of 1912, the French Government did not envisage, any more than the British Government, the possibility of claiming the administrative freedom which the former now wish to exercise; and M. Delcassé's note of the 8th January, 1915, in which it was admitted that the French authorities had no right to deprive British subjects in Morocco of their privileges, except with the previous consent of His Majesty's Government, goes to prove this contention.

His Majesty's Government consider it only natural that neither Government should have conceived the possibility of making the claim which is now advanced by the French Government, for there is no precedent within the knowledge of His Majesty's Government for a protecting Power claiming that the mere avowal of an intention to introduce reforms in a protected country ipso facto absolves that country from the obligations towards other Powers previously incurred by it; and the theory on which the French Government wish to go in Morocco would not appear to be one on which they act in their relations towards the British Protectorate in Zanzibar, where they claim for their nationals all such rights accruing to them under earlier treaties as have not been specifically abrogated. His Majesty's Government observe that no attempt is made in the note from the Ministry for Foreign Affairs of the 21st November last to refute these arguments.

It is hoped by His Majesty's Government that this explanation will suffice to show why they are unable, on the grounds advanced by the French Government, to agree to the imposition of these duties upon British subjects. His Majesty's Government consider that the duties themselves are a matter of relatively slight importance, and they have no wish to embarrass the authorities of the Protectorate in raising the funds necessary for the proper administration of the zone. The French Government, however, does not merely request, but claims as a right, that such duties should be made applicable to British subjects regardless of the treaties of 1856 and the Act of Algeciras, and His Majesty's Government are obliged, in the face of this claim, to insist once more on the obvious fact that the treaties of 1856 and the Act of Algeciras, and all other instruments signed by Great Britain (?) prior to the Franco-Moorish Treaty of 1912, unless and until they have been specifically modified or abrogated, remain in force.

In the last paragraph of its note, the Ministry for Foreign Affairs states that it is willing to defer for the present applying the new duties to goods consumed in the households of British subjects, but that there can be no question of exempting the goods imported by British subjects for their commercial clientèle. His Majesty's Government must observe, however, that there is nothing in the treaties referred to in the preceding paragraph which go to justify such a distinction, and that article 7 of the Commercial Convention of 1856 and article 66 of the Act of Algeciras expressly preclude the imposition of duties in excess of 12½ per cent. ad valorem on any goods imported by British subjects whether for their own consumption or for that of their clientèle.

In bringing the above to the attention of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, Lord Derby is instructed once more earnestly to protest against the action of the Protectorate authorities in neglecting to request and to obtain the consent of His Majesty's Government before imposing these dues, and to repeat that in the view of His Majesty's Government the goods imported by British subjects are exempt from the incidence of the duties.

ANNEX 11.

Lord Derby (Paris) to Lord Curzon.

(No. 474.)

My Lord,

Paris, February 18, 1920.

In accordance with the instructions contained in your Lordship's despatch No. 313 of the 28th ultimo, I drew the attention of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs to the failure of the French authorities to follow the proper procedure in the case of certain new customs regulations which had been introduced by the Protectorate authorities in the French Zone of Morocco.

I have the honour to transmit to your Lordship herewith copy of the reply which I have received from the Ministry for Foreign Affairs on the subject. The Ministry admits that the penalties under such regulations cannot be enforced against British subjects except with the consent of the British authorities, and adds that the attention of the French Resident-General at Rabat has been drawn to the necessity of communicating in cases of this nature with His Majesty's diplomatic agent at Tangier, with a view to the application to British subjects of legislative measures introduced by the Shereefian Government.

I have, &c.
DERBY.

Enclosure in Annex 11.

Note from French Ministry for Foreign Affairs.

Par sa note du 4 février, l'Ambassade de Sa Majesté britannique a signalé au Ministère des Affaires étrangères que des règlements douaniers avaient été promulgués dans la Zone française de l'Empire chérifien qui, aux termes des traités, ne pouvaient être appliqués aux ressortissants britanniques sans l'assentiment préalable des autorités royales. L'Ambassade de Sa Majesté reconnaît d'ailleurs la justice et l'utilité des nouvelles règles édictées.

En prenant acte du jugement porté sur la nouvelle réglementation, le Ministère des Affaires étrangères a l'honneur de faire savoir à l'Ambassade d'Angleterre qu'il ne disconvient pas que, tant que le Gouvernement britannique n'aura pas renoncé au Maroc au bénéfice des privilèges qu'il tient des Capitulations, les infractions aux nouvelles dispositions édictées par le Gouvernement chérifien ne pourront être sanctionnées à l'égard des ressortissants britanniques qu'après que ces nouvelles dispositions auront été rendues obligatoires par les autorités anglaises. Le Ministère des Affaires étrangères appelle l'attention du Résident général de la République à Rabat sur la nécessité de se mettre dans des cas analogues en rapports avec l'agent diplomatique de Sa Majesté à Tanger pour lui demander de rendre applicables aux ressortissants britanniques les mesures législatives promulguées par le Gouvernement chérifien.

PALEOLOGUE.

Paris, le 16 février 1920.

[A 700/700/28]

ANNEX 12.

Earl Curzon to the Earl of Derby (Paris).

(No. 670.)

My Lord,

Foreign Office, February 25, 1920.

With reference to your Lordship's despatch No. 474 of the 18th February, relative to the new customs regulations in the French Zone of Morocco, I have to inform you that I have now instructed His Majesty's agent at Tangier, as soon as he is requested to do so by the Resident-General, to issue a King's Regulation making the new arrangements applicable to British ships.

I am, &c.
(For the Secretary of State),
R. SPERLING.

ANNEX 13.

French Ministry for Foreign Affairs to His Majesty's Embassy, Paris.March 6, 1920.

Le Ministère des Affaires étrangères a l'honneur d'accuser réception à l'Ambassade de Sa Majesté britannique de ses notes des 20 et 26 février et du 2 de ce mois.

Le Gouvernement de la République apprend avec la plus vive satisfaction que l'agent diplomatique de Sa Majesté à Tanger a reçu pour instructions de rendre applicables dans la Zone française du Maroc par un Ordre royal aux ressortissants britanniques les nouvelles taxes créées pour équilibrer le budget chérifien, dès que le Résident général de France au Maroc en aura fait la demande au représentant de l'Angleterre.

Des instructions analogues ayant déjà été adressées aux agents de la République en Egypte, la controverse juridique sur l'interprétation des traités à ce point de vue, se trouve n'avoir plus d'intérêt pratique.

Les traités du 4 novembre 1911 et du 30 mars 1912 confèrent bien à la France le droit absolu d'introduire au Maroc toutes les réformes nécessaires au bon gouvernement de l'Empire chérifien, et le Gouvernement français reconnaît à la Grande-Bretagne le même droit en Egypte. Mais, tant que les Capitulations restent en vigueur dans ces deux pays, il est nécessaire de recourir à l'intervention de l'autorité consulaire pour rendre applicables aux Anglais au Maroc, et aux Français en Egypte les nouvelles taxes établies. Cette nécessité n'a cessé d'être reconnue par le Ministère des Affaires étrangères, comme il est exposé dans les différentes notes adressées à ce sujet à l'Ambassade de Sa Majesté britannique.

ANNEX 14.

[A 1217/638/28]

Earl Curzon to the Earl of Derby (Paris).

(No. 895.)

My Lord,

Foreign Office, March 15, 1920.

I have not received copies of the notes addressed by your Excellency to the French Government on the 20th and 26th ultimo and 2nd instant, to which reference is made in your despatch No. 716 respecting the payment of duties by British subjects in Morocco. I am therefore unaware whether the French Government have any good reason for assuming from the text of those notes that His Majesty's Government propose to make all the new taxes instituted by the Administration in Morocco, applicable to British subjects.

Such a view is not in accordance with the instructions contained in my despatches Nos. 591 and 627 to which your Excellency refers, while my despatch No. 670 deals only with the new Customs Regulations (not the "droits de consommation"), to which His Majesty's Government have no objection.

I request that your Excellency will at once inform the French Government of the misunderstanding which appears to have arisen and make it clear that His Majesty's Government maintain the point of view stated in my despatch No. 591.

I am, &c.
(For the Secretary of State),
R. SPERLING.

ANNEX 15.

French Ministry for Foreign Affairs to His Majesty's Embassy, Paris.March 23, 1920.

Par sa note du 17 de ce mois l'Ambassade d'Angleterre à Paris a fait savoir au Ministère des Affaires étrangères que c'est par une interprétation inexacte de la note du 2 mars qu'il avait été compris que l'agent de Sa Majesté à Tanger était invité à rendre applicables à ses ressortissants au Maroc les nouvelles taxes créées pour équilibrer le budget chérifien. Sir H. White avait seulement reçu l'ordre d'appliquer aux navires portant pavillon britannique les règlements douaniers promulgués par le Protectorat.

Le Ministère des Affaires étrangères, en accusant réception de cette communication qu'il porte à la connaissance du Résident général de France à Rabat, a l'honneur de faire savoir à l'Ambassade de Sa Majesté qu'il fait un nouvel et confiant appel à l'amitié du Gouvernement britannique pour que son agent à Tanger soit invité à appliquer à ses ressortissants les mesures édictées par le Protectorat sous le régime de l'égalité économique pour permettre au Maroc un développement dont bénéficient au même titre les ressortissants de toutes les Puissances. Le Gouvernement de la République ne doute pas que le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté ne s'emploie à rendre possible à la Puissance protectrice du Maroc l'exercice de ses droits dans ce pays comme le Gouvernement de la République fait en Egypte en ce qui concerne les mesures édictées par le Haut-Commissariat britannique ou par l'autorité militaire britannique.

ANNEX 16.

[A 5259/638/28]

Earl Curzon to the Earl of Derby (Paris).

(No. 2809.)
My Lord,

Foreign Office, August 19, 1920.

I have to refer to your Excellency's despatch No. 828 of the 17th March, one enclosure to which deals with the payment by British subjects in Morocco of the consumption taxes imposed by the French authorities. The consideration of this question by His Majesty's Government was deferred for some time owing to the prospect that a convention regarding Egypt and Morocco would be shortly concluded with the French Government; but as no such arrangement has yet been arrived at, I think it desirable that I should not further delay explaining the attitude of His Majesty's Government towards the consumption taxes imposed in the French Zone of Morocco.

It appears to His Majesty's Government equitable that the taxation imposed in Egypt and Morocco should, so far as possible, be applied to French and British nationals, pari passu, and His Majesty's Government are prepared to impose new duties on British subjects in Morocco as and when similar new duties are imposed on French citizens in Egypt. Thus, in the present case, the French Government have consented to accept an increased duty on alcohol imported into Egypt, and His Majesty's Government are therefore disposed to apply to British subjects in Morocco the corresponding increase in the duty on alcohol imported into Morocco, as from the date on which the increased duty in Egypt comes into force.

It should, however, be observed that, although the French Government have consented to the Egyptian tax on alcohol, the tax cannot yet be imposed, as the consent of the Italian Government to the new duties is still being withheld.

His Majesty's Government therefore feel justified in deferring the issue of a King's Regulation in Morocco making the corresponding duty applicable to British subjects until the revised duty in Egypt actually becomes operative.

In informing the French Government of the course which His Majesty's Government propose to adopt in this matter, your Excellency should also point out that His Majesty's Government have, in matters relating to increases of the duties payable in Egypt, always followed the correct course of obtaining the consent of the interested Governments before the duties have been promulgated. In the case of the consumption duties in Morocco, on the other hand, the French Government have followed the contrary course of first authorising the promulgation of the new duties, and then claiming the assent of His Majesty's Government on the ground that it is essential to increase the revenue.

I am, &c.

CURZON OF KEDLESTON.

ANNEX 17.

The Earl of Derby (Paris) to Earl Curzon.

(No. 2868.)
My Lord,

Paris, September 8, 1920.

On receipt of your Lordship's despatch No. 2809 of the 19th August on the subject of the consumption taxes imposed by the French Government on British subjects in Morocco, I addressed a note to the Ministry for Foreign Affairs setting forth the arguments of His Majesty's Government contained therein.

I have now received a reply from the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, a copy of which I have the honour to transmit herewith, in which the French Government state that they are unable to accept the view taken by His Majesty's Government in this matter.

I have, &c.

DERBY.

Enclosure in Annex 17.

French Ministry for Foreign Affairs to His Majesty's Embassy, Paris.September 5, 1920.

Par sa note du 24 août dernier, l'Ambassade de Sa Majesté britannique à Paris a fait observer au Ministère des Affaires étrangères qu'il n'y avait pas, au point de vue de l'égalité des taxes de consommation, égalité entre les ressortissants français en Egypte et les ressortissants britanniques au Maroc. Ceux-ci, d'après le Gouvernement français, doivent se soumettre aux taxes établies par le Gouvernement chérifien. En Egypte, au contraire, par suite de refus de certaines Puissances d'acquiescer à ce régime, les taxes édictées par le Gouvernement égyptien ne sont pas applicables aux Français. Le Gouvernement britannique estime dès lors qu'il convient d'attendre pour la taxation des Anglais au Maroc que la taxation des Français soit possible en Egypte.

En accusant réception de cette communication, le Ministère des Affaires étrangères a l'honneur de faire savoir qu'à son avis la situation des ressortissants britanniques au Maroc ne peut dépendre de l'attitude prise par des Gouvernements tiers en Egypte. Le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté britannique a pris au Maroc vis-à-vis du Gouvernement français un engagement analogue à celui que le Gouvernement de la République a pris au regard du Gouvernement de la Grande-Bretagne en Egypte. Cet engagement est tenu dès l'instant que le Gouvernement français l'exécute en enjoignant à ses nationaux d'acquitter les taxes qui leur sont demandées. Le Gouvernement de la République attend avec confiance de l'amitié du Gouvernement britannique que des mesures analogues soient prises par lui au Maroc. Agir autrement serait entraver de la manière la plus regrettable l'œuvre de progrès entreprise au Maroc par la Puissance protectrice et dont il serait injuste que les ressortissants britanniques retirent les avantages sans prendre une part égale dans leur contre-partie fiscale.

ANNEX 18.

French Resident-General to His Majesty's Agent and Consul-General (Tangier).

M. l'Agent diplomatique.

Rabat, le 30 juin 1921.

J'ai l'honneur de vous faire connaître que d'impérieuses nécessités d'ordre budgétaire, qui ont leur origine dans la diminution importante du rendement des produits et impôts ad valorem, tels que la douane, le tertib, &c., m'ont amené, d'accord avec le Département des Affaires étrangères, à procéder, d'une part, à des compressions des dépenses, d'autre part, au relèvement de certaines taxes spécifiques destinées à assurer l'équilibre du budget de 1921. En conséquence, j'ai fait préparer deux dahirs, dont l'un porte relèvement de 50 pour cent de la taxe de consommation sur les sucres, et l'autre création d'une taxe de consommation de 40 francs par quintal sur les bougies.

Vous trouverez ci-joint un exemplaire de chacun de ces textes, qui seront soumis au sceau de Sa Majesté le Sultan et communiqués au Conseil de Gouvernement du 11 juillet.

Je vous serai très obligé de vouloir bien tenir cette communication comme strictement confidentielle jusqu'à la publication des textes au Bulletin officiel du Protectorat, dont vous serez prévenu par télégramme, et de prendre les dispositions nécessaires pour rendre applicables aux ressortissants britanniques de la Zone française de l'Empire chérifien ces nouvelles taxes que j'ai tenu, à cette fin, à porter à votre connaissance avant leur mise en vigueur.

Veillez agréer, &c.

LYAUTEY.

ANNEX 19.

Mr. Robertson to Lord Curzon.

(No. 3.) (Extract.)

My Lord,

Tangier, January 5, 1923.

I have the honour to inform your Lordship that M. Gracy, who is temporarily in charge of the French Agency here during the absence of M. de Carbonnel in the French Zone, called on me this morning and informed me that, in order to balance their budget, the Protectorate authorities have decided that it will very shortly be necessary to increase the consumption duties on sugar, tea, coffee and pepper. M. Gracy, who pointed out that this information should be treated as confidential on account of the possibility of speculation by merchants dealing in these goods, explained that he had communicated it to me so that I might enquire whether His Majesty's Government would assent to the proposed increases of duty and would be prepared to issue a King's Regulation making them applicable to British subjects.

ANNEX 20.

His Majesty's Consul-General, Rabat, to His Majesty's Consul-General, Tangier.

(Extract.)

Sir,

December 10, 1924.

I have the honour to transmit herewith copies of a note from the French Resident-General, dated the 5th December, with three enclosures relative to increases in the consumption duties payable in the French Zone on alcohol, sugar and articles containing sugar, except condensed milk.

* * * * *

3. As certain points were not clear to me I saw the acting head of the Cabinet Diplomatique on the 9th December, with the following results.

* * * * *

6. M. Rageot referred to the communication made to me as an act of courtesy. I observed that it might be courteous, but that, as I understood it, our assent to the increases was necessary to make them legally applicable to British goods. He admitted this, but said the increased duties would, nevertheless, be collected on all goods at once, though an exception might be theoretically possible in the case of goods imported by a British subject for his personal use.

7. I objected that in that case the French were simply forcing our hands. M. Rageot did not demur, but assured me that what they were doing was perfectly justifiable, having regard to what passed when the question was threshed out some years ago

ANNEX 21.

His Majesty's Consul-General, Rabat, to French Resident-General.

M. le Commissaire Résident général,

Rabat, le 7 janvier 1925.

Par une note du 5 décembre votre Excellence a bien voulu me communiquer certains textes relatifs à la majoration des droits de consommation sur le sucre, l'alcool et les produits les contenant, en me priant de faire le nécessaire dans le but de rendre légale l'application des nouvelles surtaxes aux ressortissants britanniques. Je n'ai pas manqué de transmettre cette demande au Gouvernement britannique et de lui faire part des explications orales que M. Rageot, faisant alors fonctions de Chef de votre Cabinet diplomatique, eut l'obligeance de me fournir sur ma demande dans notre entretien du 9 décembre.

Le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté, tout en manifestant sa volonté d'étudier la demande précitée dans un esprit bienveillant, m'a chargé de faire remarquer à votre Excellence qu'il s'est toujours montré disposé à prêter son concours aux autorités du Protectorat en ne pas tardant à rendre applicables à ses ressortissants toute taxe raisonnable décrétée par le Gouvernement chérifien, mais qu'il n'a jamais reconnu et ne saurait reconnaître à ces autorités le droit d'anticiper son consentement à la perception de nouvelles taxes, auxquelles les ressortissants britanniques ne peuvent être astreints qu'en vertu d'une "King's Regulation" en due forme.

Je me réserve de porter à la connaissance de votre Excellence dans une communication ultérieure la décision qui sera prise éventuellement par le Gouvernement britannique relativement aux surtaxes particulières dont il s'agit dans la note sus-citée.

Je profite, &c.

ANDREW RYAN.

ANNEX 22.

His Majesty's Consulate-General, Rabat, to French Residency-General.

M. le Délégué,

Rabat, le 12 septembre 1930.

Par lettre du 24 juin dernier j'ai eu l'honneur de faire connaître à M. le Commissaire Résident général que je ne manquerais pas de soumettre au Gouvernement britannique la demande dont il avait bien voulu me saisir visant l'application aux ressortissants britanniques en Zone française des dispositions d'un dahir du 20 juin portant création de certaines taxes intérieures de consommation et relèvement de certaines taxes existantes.

Le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté britannique, dont je viens de recevoir les instructions à ce sujet, tout en étant disposé à rendre les dispositions de ce dahir applicables aux ressortissants britanniques, se sent dans l'impossibilité de le faire avant qu'il soit assuré que les dispositions dont il s'agit ne portent pas atteinte aux intérêts britanniques.

Sous ce rapport l'attention de mon Gouvernement a été retenue par les taxes sur les huiles de soya et les viandes frigorifiées.

En ce qui concerne les huiles de soya il n'est pas douteux que la nouvelle taxe met ce produit en état d'infériorité vis-à-vis les huiles d'arachides. Comme ces deux sortes d'huiles se vendaient avant la promulgation du dahir au même prix à peu de chose près, il s'ensuit que les huiles de soya, auxquelles le commerce britannique s'intéresse beaucoup, ne peuvent plus concurrencer les huiles d'arachides, qui sont notamment de provenance française. Aussi paraît-il que l'imposition des huiles de soya ne donne pas lieu uniquement à cette discrimination en faveur d'un autre produit, mais elle constitue également une mesure de protection pour l'industrie locale des huiles d'arachides.

Quant aux viandes frigorifiées, le caractère protectionniste est clairement souligné dans les déclarations faites au Conseil du Gouvernement par M. le Directeur général des Finances. Selon le compte rendu publié par la presse locale,

M. Branly a donné les précisions suivantes sur le but visé par cette taxe: "La Chambre d'Agriculture de Rabat et du Gharb a réclamé avec insistance une taxation des viandes frigorifiées. La taxe sera fixée à 1 franc le kilo, chiffre modéré au regard des consommateurs, mais qui constituerait néanmoins une protection intéressante pour les éleveurs marocains." Ultérieurement la taxe fut portée à 2 francs le kilo afin de rendre encore plus efficace, dit-on, la protection accordée à l'élevage local. Il est également à noter que l'exclusion des animaux vivants de la portée du dahir semble établir une différence de traitement entre les viandes destinées à la consommation qui sont importées de France et celles en provenance d'autres pays.

Les taxes précitées paraissant donc au Gouvernement de Sa Majesté britannique comme des mesures de protection et de discrimination, je suis chargé de vous prier de bien vouloir lui donner votre assurance que les clauses imposant ces taxes seront modifiées. Le Gouvernement britannique tient en outre, et il serait également heureux de recevoir votre assurance à ce sujet, à ce que cette modification produise ses effets à compter de la date de l'entrée en vigueur du dahir en question et que toutes les taxes non prévues au dahir modificatif soient remboursées aux ressortissants britanniques qui les ont acquittées.

Veuillez agréer, &c.
T. C. RAPP.

ANNEX 23.

His Majesty's Consul-General, Rabat, to French Resident-General.

M. le Commissaire Résident général, Rabat, le 10 juin 1929.
Mon attention a été attirée sur la publication par la presse locale du 6 courant du texte d'un dahir qui a été pris par Sa Majesté le Sultan, en date du 4 juin 1929, interdisant d'une façon générale l'importation dans la Zone française de l'Empire chérifien des blés, des farines et des semoules. Bien que ce texte n'ait pas encore paru sur le Bulletin officiel du Protectorat, j'ai toute raison de croire à son authenticité. Il soulève une question tellement importante qu'il me semble nécessaire d'en saisir votre Excellence sans retard.

A part la perturbation qu'il apporte à la marche d'affaires commerciales intéressant à plusieurs points de vue mes ressortissants, le dahir en question me paraît être en contradiction formelle avec les dispositions des articles 2 et 6 de la convention commerciale passée entre le Maroc et la Grande-Bretagne le 9 décembre 1856, pour ne citer qu'un seul texte particulier, ainsi qu'avec le principe de la liberté commerciale reconnu comme base des rapports économiques entre le Maroc et les autres pays.

Dans ces conditions, tout en soumettant la question à l'appréciation du Gouvernement de Sa Majesté britannique, je crois devoir faire dès à présent les réserves les plus expresses concernant l'application du dahir soit aux marchandises de provenance britannique soit aux marchandises d'autre origine dont s'intéressent des ressortissants britanniques. Je réserve aussi le droit de mon Gouvernement de demander que tout ressortissant lésé de n'importe quelle façon par l'application du dahir soit indemnisé par les autorités compétentes.

J'ai l'honneur d'ajouter que je me tiens à la disposition de la Résidence générale pour communiquer au Foreign Office toute expression des vœux du Gouvernement chérifien sur les questions de principe soulevées par le dahir, au cas où votre Excellence estimerait utile de m'en faire part sans attendre la communication ultérieure que j'aurai probablement à vous adresser dès que j'aurai reçu les instructions que j'attends de Londres.

Veuillez agréer, &c.
ANDREW RYAN

[W 6421/5683/28]

ANNEX 24.

Mr. A. Henderson to Sir W. Tyrrell (Paris).

(No. 1577.)
Sir,

Foreign Office, July 11, 1929.

I transmit herewith a copy of correspondence with the Board of Trade and His Majesty's consul-general at Rabat in regard to the recent prohibition of the importation of certain cereals into the French Zone of Morocco.

2. I shall be glad if your Excellency will address a protest to the French Government against the prohibition on the ground that it constitutes a violation of articles 2 and 6 of the Anglo-Moroccan Commercial Convention of 1856.

I am, &c.
(For the Secretary of State).
I. KIRKPATRICK.

ANNEX 25.

French Ministry for Foreign Affairs to His Majesty's Embassy, Paris.

Paris, le 5 août 1929.

Par sa note du 17 de ce mois, l'Ambassade de Grande-Bretagne à Paris a fait savoir au Ministère des Affaires étrangères que l'attention du Gouvernement de Sa Majesté a été attirée sur un dahir du 4 juin 1929 qui prohibe l'entrée des blés, farines et semoules dans la Zone française de l'Empire chérifien. Motif pris de ce que cette interdiction constituerait une violation des articles 2 et 6 du traité de commerce anglo-marocain du 9 décembre 1856, elle a été chargée d'en demander le retrait.

Le Ministère a l'honneur de faire connaître à l'Ambassade qu'il ne croit pas que la protestation dont elle a bien voulu le saisir soit fondée.

Il est exact que, par l'article 6 du traité de commerce du 9 décembre 1856, le Maroc s'est interdit: (1) de prohiber les marchandises ou produits, à l'exception de ceux énumérés à l'article 2 dudit traité, importés par les sujets anglais; (2) d'établir une discrimination au détriment de ressortissants britanniques.

Le Gouvernement chérifien n'a pas manqué au second de ces engagements par le dahir du 4 juin 1929 qui respecte entièrement l'égalité économique puisqu'il atteint les marchandises de toutes provenances y compris, et pour la plus grande partie, les marchandises de provenance française.

Quant à l'engagement de ne pas établir de prohibitions à l'importation, il doit, comme toutes les clauses de ce genre, s'entendre sous la réserve implicite, consacrée par la doctrine et la pratique, que les dérogations à la règle de non-interdiction d'entrée sont légitimes lorsqu'il s'agit, dans des circonstances anormales, de sauvegarder les intérêts vitaux du pays.

En droit, la convention internationale de Genève du 8 novembre 1927, conclue en vue d'abolir d'une manière absolue les prohibitions à l'importation, dispose, dans son article 5: "que des mesures de prohibition peuvent être établies lorsqu'il s'agit de sauvegarder dans les circonstances extraordinaires et anormales les intérêts vitaux du pays."

Si une telle restriction est admise d'une manière générale par la Convention de Genève de 1927, a fortiori doit-elle être acceptée à l'égard d'un pays dont la production ne bénéficie d'aucune protection, hormis un droit de douane fixé ne varietur à 10 pour cent, auquel s'ajoutent 2½ pour cent ad valorem perçus au titre de la taxe spéciale.

Or, la mesure édictée par le dahir chérifien du 4 juin dernier répond indiscutablement à une préoccupation justifiée de sauvegarder les intérêts essentiels du pays.

Il est certain, en effet, que l'afflux de blés, farines et semoules livrables à bas prix dont était menacé le marché marocain eût entraîné une crise économique particulièrement grave qui, en atteignant non seulement la production, l'industrie et le commerce européens mais encore l'élément indigène, eût risqué de compromettre l'ordre public que tout Gouvernement a le devoir de maintenir sur son territoire.

[11543]

En fait, la mesure prise par le Gouvernement chérifien n'est pas sans précédents, soit à l'étranger, soit au Maroc.

La plupart des Puissances ont institué des prohibitions. En ce qui la concerne, la Grande-Bretagne a édicté le "dye-stuffs import regulation act 1920" dont l'application est générale et ce nonobstant la clause de réciprocité stipulée en faveur de l'Empire chérifien par le traité susvisé du 9 décembre 1856. Ce faisant, elle a donc estimé à bon droit, que les clauses générales relatives aux prohibitions n'étaient pas impératives et qu'elle pouvait s'en écarter à condition que les mesures prises s'appliquassent, sans discrimination, à tous les pays.

Le Maroc lui-même a, en ces dernières années, prononcé à plusieurs reprises des prohibitions d'importation (en particulier celles visant les blés, orges et leurs dérivés, dahir du 22 février 1921) sans provoquer aucune réclamation des Puissances étrangères. Il est permis de supposer que celles-ci n'auraient cependant pas manqué de protester si elles avaient estimé que ces mesures constituaient une atteinte aux traités régissant leurs relations commerciales avec l'Empire chérifien.

Pour ces raisons, le Gouvernement de la République, à son regret, ne voit pas la possibilité d'intervenir auprès du Gouvernement chérifien pour faire rapporter le dahir du 4 juin 1929.

ANNEX 26.

[W 9038/5683/28]

Mr. A. Henderson to Mr. N. M. Henderson (Paris).

Foreign Office, September 16, 1929.

Sir,
I have received your despatch No. 1137 of the 7th ultimo enclosing a copy of the reply of the French Government to the protest which was recently addressed to them on the subject of the dahir of the 4th June last regarding the importation of cereals into the French Zone of Morocco.

2. I observe that the French Government have endeavoured, as it was expected that they would, to justify their action on the plea that the prohibition of the import of wheat was essential for the well-being and prosperity of the French Zone and that in such circumstances the provisions of the Anglo-Moroccan commercial convention of 1856 did not apply. You will have observed from Sir A. Ryan's despatches Nos. 102 and 132 that both he and the British Chamber of Commerce in Morocco seem to consider that the French Government were justified in their contention that this dahir was necessary in the best interests of the country. It would further appear from the letter addressed by the British Chamber of Commerce to Sir A. Ryan on the 24th June last, that British interests are only directly affected by the dahir to a very small extent and that from the practical point of view little if any prejudice would be caused to British firms operating in Morocco if the dahir were to be made applicable to British subjects.

3. In these circumstances it seems to me undesirable that His Majesty's Government should persist in their protest against the dahir, and I shall therefore be glad if you will inform the French Government, in reply to their note of the 5th ultimo, that, while still of the opinion that the terms of the dahir constitute a violation of the provisions of the Treaty of 1856, His Majesty's Government are anxious not to cause the French Government any embarrassment in Morocco and are therefore willing, in view of the considerations advanced by the French Government, to waive their objections to the dahir, provided that it is clearly understood that their action in this case in no way constitutes a precedent, and that the principle of commercial equality and of the "open door" in Morocco is still maintained, unimpaired.

I am, &c.
(In the absence of the Secretary of State).
A. W. A. LEEPER.

ANNEX 27.

[W 10151/6578/28]

Marquess Curzon to M. Merry del Val.

Your Excellency,

Foreign Office, December 21, 1922.

In my note of the 28th November last, I had the honour to inform your Excellency that I was still awaiting a report from His Majesty's agent and consul-general at Tangier on the subject of the proposed application to British subjects of the dahir of the 27th February last imposing consumption duties on sugar, tea and coffee in the Spanish Zone of Morocco.

2. I have now received a report from Mr. Robertson from which it appears that the Spanish authorities at Tetuan, notwithstanding the fact that the dahir has not yet been made applicable to British subjects by King's Regulation, are attempting to levy the new consumption duties on British-protected persons. For example, the firm of I. and D. Cohen, who have for long enjoyed British protection, recently desired to withdraw a consignment of green tea from the customs, and presented a letter guaranteeing payment of the tax should it be made incumbent upon them to do so by the issue of a King's Regulation. The customs authorities refused to accept this letter of guarantee in lieu of a cash payment. Messrs. Cohen then deposited with His Majesty's vice-consul at Tetuan the amount of the tax, and the latter proposed to the Spanish authorities by way of compromise that they should order the release of Messrs. Cohen's consignment on the understanding that the sum in his hands would be paid to the competent authority upon the dahir being made applicable to British subjects by the issue of a King's Regulation having retroactive effect; and further that they should cause all other similar consignments to be released on the same terms. Although this proposal was a gratuitous concession which His Majesty's vice-consul was in no way bound to put forward, the Spanish authorities have as yet returned no reply and the goods of British-protected persons are still detained in the customs-house.

3. His Majesty's Government feel bound to protest strongly against these illegal practices. Nevertheless, they are prepared to issue a King's Regulation with effect from the date of issue as soon as they learn that the goods now illegally detained by the Spanish authorities have been released unconditionally.

4. Your Excellency will readily understand that His Majesty's Government must disclaim all responsibility for the delay in making the dahir applicable to British subjects and protected persons, which is due solely to the fact that the Spanish Government instead of approaching His Majesty's Government when the dahir was issued, waited until the 1st November to do so, and that meanwhile the Spanish authorities have been endeavouring to levy the consumption duties on British-protected persons, to whom the provisions of the dahir are admittedly not applicable.

I have, &c.

(For the Secretary of State).

G. H. VILLIERS.

ANNEX 28.

[W 2375/1928/28]

Marquess Curzon to M. Merry del Val.

Your Excellency,

Foreign Office, April 3, 1923.

In your Excellency's note of the 7th ultimo you were good enough to inform me that deposits made by British subjects and protected persons on account of consumption duties in the Spanish zone had now been refunded. The Spanish Government requested that in these circumstances the new duties should now be made applicable to British subjects by King's Regulation.

2. In reply, I regret to have to inform you that according to reports just received from His Majesty's agent and consul-general at Tangier effect has not yet been given by the local Spanish authorities to the instructions of the Spanish Government. Not only is it the case that deposits made by British subjects and protected persons have been refunded in part only and not in full, but British subjects and protected persons are being required by the local Spanish authorities to pay, and not merely to deposit, the amount of the duties, the authorities asserting that they have received instructions from the Spanish Government to enforce payment. Reiterated requests by His Majesty's vice-consul at Tetuan for written confirmation of this assertion have hitherto remained unanswered.

3. It is of course not open to question that these new duties cannot legally be levied from British subjects and protected persons in the Spanish Zone of Morocco until the necessary King's Regulation has been issued. On receipt of your note I was glad to think that this matter had now been disposed of, and I am correspondingly disappointed to find that I was mistaken. His Majesty's Government must reiterate their protest against practices which they feel sure the Spanish Government must deplore as much as they do. Manifestly, until the deposits which have been illegally exacted have been returned in full, it will be impossible for His Majesty's Government to issue a King's Regulation, which, as you are aware, they would have been perfectly ready to do had the Spanish Government approached them on the subject at the time when the dahir imposing the duties was first issued.

I have, &c.

(In the absence of the Secretary of State).

G. H. VILLIERS.

ANNEX 29.

M. Merry del Val to Marquess Curzon.

(Translation.)

My Lord,

Spanish Embassy.

London, April 16, 1923.

In reply to your note of the 3rd instant, I have the honour to inform your Lordship that immediately after receiving it I communicated its contents to my Government, and that I have this morning received the text of the instructions which, in view thereof, have been sent to the competent authorities of the Spanish Zone of the Protectorate of Morocco, in order that the amounts which have been demanded in respect of the tax on sugar, tea and coffee of British subjects and protected persons in that territory, though it was merely as a deposit, may be returned to them, and in order that the authorities may refrain from collecting this tax from British nationals and protégés until the King's Regulation approving the extension to them of the duty referred to is published.

I hope, therefore, shortly to be informed that the instructions in question have been carried into effect, and I shall hasten to acquaint your Lordship thereof with the request that the requisite King's Regulation above referred to may be promulgated as soon as possible.

I have, &c.

ALFONSO MERRY DEL VAL.

ANNEX 30.

M. Merry del Val to Marquess Curzon.

(Translation.)

My Lord,

Spanish Embassy.

London, June 9, 1923.

In accordance with the contents of my note under date the 16th April last, I have the honour to inform your Excellency that according to news which the Government of His Majesty the King, my august Sovereign, has received from the High Commissioner of Spain in Tetuan, the return of all money, whether paid on deposit or paid out, for the tax on sugar, coffee and tea in the Spanish Zone of the Protectorate to British subjects and British-protected subjects, which had been required of them without the Royal decree of His Britannic Majesty, extending to the above the application of the above tribute, having been published. In order to effect this, our authorities have relied on the registers in the customs-houses and the claims of the interested parties. In the same way will be returned all sums for which proof of payment can be established, in case the return has not been completely effected because of the possible absence of some claim.

On the other hand, ever since the 16th April last sugar, coffee and tea imported into the Spanish Zone of the Moroccan Protectorate have been delivered to British subjects and British-protected subjects free of all tax. Under these circumstances, and in view of the friendly attitude adopted by the British Government in this matter, I venture to beg your Excellency to transmit at your earliest possible convenience the necessary instructions for the publication of the Royal decree imposing the tax on sugar, coffee and tea in the Spanish Zone of the Moroccan Protectorate to the subjects and protected subjects of Great Britain.

I avail, &c.

ALFONSO MERRY DEL VAL.

ANNEX 31.

His Majesty's Vice-Consul, Tetuan, to Spanish Secretary-General.

(Translation.)

Sr. Secretario General,

Tetuan, May 22, 1923.

With reference to previous correspondence on the subject of the consumption tax on sugar, tea and coffee, I have the honour to draw your attention to the fact that British subjects are being required to pay a similar impost on alcohol imported by them, although the tax in question has not yet been approved by King's Regulation, a circumstance to which my predecessor directed the attention of your department in his letter of the 22nd August, 1922.

With a view to arriving at a prompt and satisfactory solution of this question, I venture to suggest that, as in the case of the consumption tax on sugar, tea and coffee, instructions be issued to the customs authorities of the zone to refund to British subjects and protégés the sums paid by them in respect of the consumption tax on alcohol, and to refrain from levying the said tax until a King's Regulation shall have been issued making it applicable to British subjects and protégés.

On the receipt of an intimation from you that instructions in this sense have been issued and of your official request that the tax be made applicable to British "ressortissants," I shall not fail to communicate without delay with my superiors recommending that the necessary King's Regulation be issued without delay.

I take, &c.

(Signature).

His Majesty's Vice-Consul.

ANNEX 32.

His Majesty's Vice-Consul, Tetuan, to Spanish Secretary-General

(Translation.)

Sr. Secretario General,

Tetuan, June 22, 1923.

With reference to my letter of the 22nd May relative to the consumption tax on alcohol, I have the honour to inform you that His Majesty's diplomatic representative in Tangier directs me to draw your attention to the fact that British subjects and protégés are still being required to pay this impost, and that the Customs Controller at Larache has informed the British vice-consul in that town that he has explicit instructions to collect the tax without distinction of nationality. I am therefore instructed to inform you that His Majesty's Government cannot consent to the collection of the said tax from British subjects prior to the issue of a King's Regulation, which they would, however, no doubt be prepared to issue without delay on receipt of an intimation that the measures outlined in my letter above mentioned had been adopted.

I take, &c.

(Signature).

His Majesty's Vice-Consul.

ANNEX 33.

M. Merry del Val to Marquess Curzon.

(Translation.)
My Lord.

*Spanish Embassy,
London, July 9, 1923.*

The Shereefian dahir dated the 15th April, 1922, enforcing the regulation respecting the amended tax on alcohol was published in the Official Bulletin of the zone of the Spanish Protectorate in Morocco on the 25th July, 1922.

The Spanish Government would be grateful to the British Government if the latter would be so good as to issue a King's Regulation applying the said tax to the nationals and protégés of Great Britain in the above-mentioned zone for the purposes of the payment thereof.

I have, &c.

ALFONSO MERRY DEL VAL.

ANNEX 34.

[W 9681/1928/28]

Marquess Curzon to Spanish Chargé d'Affaires.

Sir,

Foreign Office, December 27, 1923.

In M. Merry del Val's note of the 9th July last, and in subsequent correspondence, his Excellency urged that the consumption duty on alcohol in the Spanish Zone of Morocco should be applied by King's Regulation to British subjects. When, a few days previously, M. Merry del Val mentioned this matter to him in conversation, the Permanent Under-Secretary of State intimated that, in spite of the categorical instructions issued by the Spanish Government, there were still a number of cases in which the sums levied from British subjects had not actually been refunded.

2. Since then I have been waiting to hear from His Majesty's representative at Tangier that there were no further claims outstanding, and I have just learnt that there are none at Larache, but that the report from Tetuan is still awaited.

3. In the meantime it appears that this duty has not yet been applied to United States and Netherlands nationals, and I therefore hesitate to proceed definitely with a step which will place British subjects at a disadvantage compared with other foreign nationals in the same position. I shall be grateful if you will be so good as to acquaint me with the situation in this respect.

I have, &c.

(For the Secretary of State).

G. H. VILLIERS.

ANNEX 35.

[W 343/343/28]

Marquess Curzon to M. Merry del Val.

Your Excellency,

Foreign Office, January 22, 1924.

With reference to my note of the 27th ultimo, I have the honour to inform your Excellency that His Majesty's vice-consul at Tetuan has now reported that the local authorities do not appear yet to have received instructions to refund to British subjects and protected persons the amounts improperly levied in respect of the consumption duty on alcohol. So far as he can ascertain, no refunds have been made to Messrs. Perez and Murto and other British claimants, whilst in one case a refund has actually been refused.

2. In a further report His Majesty's agent and consul-general states that he has been informed by his United States and Netherlands colleagues that their Governments have not yet been requested by the Spanish Government to apply the duty on alcohol to their subjects and protected persons.

3. His Majesty's Government are anxious to comply with the request of the Spanish Government for the early application of the duty on alcohol to British nationals, but in the light of the reports referred to above, you will agree that they would not be justified in doing so at this moment.

I have, &c.

(For the Secretary of State).

R. H. CAMPBELL.

ANNEX 36.

Marquess Merry del Val to Mr. Chamberlain.

(Translation.)

Sir,

Spanish Embassy, London.

In your note of the 22nd January, 1924, your Excellency was good enough to inform me that it was not possible to publish a King's Regulation notifying to British nationals in the Spanish Zone of the Protectorate of Morocco their obligation to pay the duties on alcohol and beer until the total amount of these duties prematurely paid by British subjects and British-protected persons in the said zone had been refunded. In a communication dated the 21st instant the Spanish Government informed me that the total of the sums claimed up to the present date under this head had been paid. In view of this, I have to request your Excellency to take the necessary steps in order that there may be no further delay in despatching appropriate instructions to the British consular officers in the Spanish Zone of the Protectorate of Morocco that, upon the publication of the relative King's Regulation British subjects and British-protected persons may pay the new duties and be liable like the rest of the inhabitants of the Spanish Zone to the provisions of the regulations enforcing payment.

I have, &c.

EL MARQUÉS DE MERRY DEL VAL.

ANNEX 37.

[W 11162/1562/28]

Mr. Chamberlain to Marquess Merry del Val.

Your Excellency,

Foreign Office, December 10, 1925.

With reference to your note, I have the honour to inform your Excellency that the British consul at Tetuan issued on the 28th November last King's Regulations making applicable to British subjects in the Spanish Zone the dahirs imposing a markets tax on alcohol and beer.

I have, &c.

(For the Secretary of State).

C. W. ORDE.

ANNEX 38.

His Majesty's Consul, Tetuan, to Spanish Delegate-General.

(Translation.)

Sir,

December 24, 1927.

In my note of the 24th October I had the honour to inform your Excellency that my Government regretted that they were unable to apply to British subjects the dahir of the 6th August imposing a consumption duty on candles. The reason for this attitude on the part of my Government, as you are aware was that, as the duty was imposed only on imported candles, and not on such candles as might be manufactured within the zone, it partook of the nature of a customs duty rather than of a consumption duty, and thus constituted an infraction of international agreements on the subject of the customs régime in Morocco.

2. I am now, however, pleased to be able to inform your Excellency that, actuated by a desire in no way to embarrass your Administration, my Government have declared their willingness to sanction the dahir by King's Regulation immediately without any textual modifications provided your Excellency can be good enough first to give me formal assurances on two points. The first of these is that the amounts so far illegally levied on British subjects in respect of this duty shall be refunded. The total amount involved, as stated in my note of the 30th November, is 3,355 pesetas. The second assurance for which I am to ask is that the Makhzen will undertake to extend the application of the duty in question to candles manufactured within this zone so soon as such manufacture has reached sufficient importance to lead my Government to make a formal request in this sense.

[11543]

K

3. In communicating the foregoing to your Excellency, I have to add that, although my Government are prepared to accept the solution of the present difficulty on the lines which I have stated, they nevertheless venture to expect that, in any similar cases which may arise in future, due regard will be paid to treaty stipulations in the texts of the dahirs themselves.

4. I should be grateful if your Excellency could be good enough to give urgent attention to this matter so that, if you are prepared to accept the conditions set forth in this note, I may be able to issue the required King's Regulation before the close of the year.

I avail, &c.
G. C. ALLCHIN.

ANNEX 39.

Spanish Delegate-General to His Majesty's Consul, Tetuan.

(Translation.)
Sr. Consul,

December 28, 1927.

In reply to your note of the 24th December, received yesterday, in which you inform me that the Government of His Britannic Majesty is prepared to accept the text of the dahir on candle duty, and thus ready to issue the King's Regulation ordering the payment of the said duty by British subjects and protégés as soon as this High Commission gives assurances (i) that refund will be made of the sums paid by British subjects and protégés from the imposition of the duty until the publication of the said King's Regulation, and (ii) that the Makhzen undertakes to extend the application of the said duty to candles which may be manufactured within the zone, this High Commission has the pleasure to inform you that, duly authorised by the Government of His Catholic Majesty, it agrees to the two conditions set out above, and states that it will similarly bear in mind the desire expressed by the British Government that, in similar cases occurring in future, treaty stipulations will be taken into account in drawing up other dahirs. I therefore hasten to communicate to you the acceptance of both the conditions mentioned, so that, in accordance with the desire expressed in your note under reply, you may publish the King's Regulation before the end of the year.

I avail, &c.
DIEGO SAAVEDRA.

ANNEX 40.

Spanish Government to His Majesty's Ambassador, Madrid.

(Translation.)

Your Excellency,

February 11, 1930.

The High Commissioner of Spain in Morocco addressed on the 28th ultimo a note to Mr. A. E. Watkinson, consul of Great Britain, in Tetuan, requesting him to be good enough to take the necessary measures for the application to British subjects and protected persons in the Spanish Zone of the Protectorate in Morocco of the following dahirs of His Imperial Highness the Caliph:—

1. Dahir establishing a tax on carburants;
2. Dahir establishing a consumption tax on tobacco;
3. Dahir establishing a tax on colonial goods;

4. Dahir creating a consumption tax on powder, munitions and explosives;
5. Dahir establishing a consumption tax on all classes of wine imported into or made in the zone;
6. Dahir establishing a reduced tariff on denaturalised alcohols;
7. Dahir establishing a consumption tax on sugar, tea and coffee;
8. Dahir establishing in the zone of Spanish Protectorate in Morocco the "Personal Identity Card";
9. Dahir establishing a tax on fish caught in the jurisdictional waters of the zone and not entering into the same;
10. Dahir regulating the tax on the transmission of immovable property;
11. Dahir modifying the tariffs and rules of application of the patents tax; and
12. Dahir modifying the dispositions of the regulations relative to the stamp tax in the Spanish Zone of Protectorate in Morocco of the 7th August, 1924.

I have the honour to confirm this to your Excellency in support of the request referred to above, and to point out the great interest which His Catholic Majesty's Government has in the favourable reception of the said request on the part of His Britannic Majesty's Government.

I avail, &c.
E. DE PALACIOS

ANNEX 41.

His Majesty's Ambassador, Madrid, to Spanish Minister of State.

Your Excellency,

June 12, 1930.

With reference to your Excellency's note of the 11th February last, I have the honour, under instructions from His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to inform your Excellency that His Majesty's Government have authorised Mr. Watkinson, His Majesty's consul at Tetuan, to issue King's Regulations making applicable to British subjects all the dahirs mentioned in your note under reference, with the exception of those instituting a tax on tobacco, as well as those which deal with a system of personal identity cards and a reduced tariff on alcohol; in regard to the last dahir, the issue of necessary King's Regulations has already been authorised. Mr. Watkinson has also been instructed to issue King's Regulations in respect of two dahirs instituting a tax on matches and establishing certain rules concerning medical practitioners, in regard to which he was recently approached by the Protectorate authorities.

I am at the same time to inform your Excellency that, in regard to the King's Regulation concerning the consumption duty on petrol, His Majesty's Government will have no alternative but to repeal the King's Regulation should it be found in practice that oil refining companies of other nationalities receive more favourable treatment in regard to the payment of this tax.

I have, &c.
GEORGE GRAHAME.

ANNEX 42.

Spanish High Commissioner to His Majesty's Consul, Tetuan.

Sr. Consul,

January 22, 1935.

With reference to your despatch of the 18th July last regarding the publication in the Boletín oficial of the zone of a dahir dated the 29th June of that year relative to certain edible oils, I have the honour to inform you that I am directed by the High Commissioner to state that I disagree with your opinion that the said dahir is contrary to the international agreements in force.

The High Commission might have invoked the present economic situation, which is so widespread that there is no country in which treaties, statutes and privileges alike have not had to yield to the need for all classes of society, including members of foreign communities, to make their share of sacrifices for the common good. This is especially the case in the Spanish Zone of Morocco, where, thanks to the costly and prolonged efforts of the protecting Power, a state of peace and prosperity has been reached, and an organisation established which benefits in a marked degree the commerce of all those countries which trade with Morocco. It is right, therefore, that those merchants should contribute—on a scale which is moderate, indeed, when compared with the burden they have to bear in other countries—to the revenues of the zone. It is, however, unnecessary to mention these facts, because it is obvious that the High Commission, in publishing the dahirs in question, is merely exercising a right which is fully recognised, without departing from treaty obligations. Neither the Convention of Commerce and Navigation of the 9th December, 1856, nor the Act of Algeciras, which establish the principle of economic equality, are violated by the dahirs in question, since the duties created or increased are created or increased for the trade of all countries without exception.

Article 15 of the 1856 treaty states as follows: "Aucune prohibition, soit quant à l'exportation, soit quant à l'importation d'un article quelconque, ne s'appliquera aux sujets de toute autre nation." (Incorrect reference and incomplete quotation. Reference is to article 5 of the 1856 Convention of Commerce and Navigation, the last sentence of which runs: "No prohibition, either as to the exportation or importation of any article, shall apply to British subjects, unless such prohibition shall apply to subjects of every other nation."—A.M.M.) This condition being respected, as it is in the present case, and as the principle of "liberté économique sans aucune inégalité" referred to in the Act of Algeciras is also respected, the protests which you have been pleased to make are without foundation.

The right of tax and even prohibit the entry into Morocco of certain articles (provided the measure be a general one) has been exercised repeatedly, as is shown, for instance, by the prohibition of the entry of absinthe, &c., Moorish slippers ("babuchas"), &c., into the French Zone, and the existence of State monopolies, as is the usual customs in international relations.

The objection that the new taxes tend to favour the Spanish olive oil industry can hardly be sustained; for Spain is not the only producing country. Without quoting others, Great Britain herself possesses in her Empire olive-producing territories, so that Spain has no monopoly of olive oil. There has therefore been no infringement, from any point of view, of the Act of Algeciras.

LUIS TEMES.

ANNEX 43.

[W 1791/29/28]

Sir John Simon to His Majesty's Representatives at Madrid (No. 112) and Tangier (No. 56).

Sir,

Foreign Office, March 2, 1935.

With reference to my despatch No. 442 of the 19th October last regarding the imposition by the Spanish authorities of consumption duties on goods imported into the Spanish Zone of Morocco, I have to inform your Excellency that it has now been decided, in order to safeguard the position of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom under the relevant treaties, that formal protests shall be made to the Spanish Government in this matter. I shall accordingly be glad if you will now address a note to the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs on the following lines:—

2. On the 29th June last a number of dahirs were published in the Spanish Zone of Morocco creating new consumption taxes on certain goods imported into the zone and increasing the amount of existing taxes. With one exception, these taxes are stated in the dahirs to be on imported goods only. Moreover, on the 20th September last a Vizirial decree and dahir were issued imposing a consumption tax in the zone on imported wheat flour and its derivatives.

3. These new taxes may be held to constitute one of two things. Either they involve an increase in the customs duties of the zone and must be held contrary to article 7 of the Convention of Commerce and Navigation between the United Kingdom and Morocco, signed in Tangier in 1856, as modified by article 66 of the Act of Algeciras, or, on the other hand, they may represent an increase in the internal duties of the zone, in which case their enforcement on British subjects is contrary to article 4 of the General Treaty between the United Kingdom and Morocco, signed at Tangier in the same year. In either case, the new duties involve direct discrimination between goods imported into the zone and similar goods produced locally.

4. In these circumstances, His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom are obliged formally to protest against the dahirs in question. They are unable to acquiesce in measures, which infringe in this manner their treaty rights in Morocco, being applied without consent and must therefore request their repeal.

5. In handing this note to the Minister, you should make the following verbal communication, which you may embody in an aide-mémoire:—

His Excellency will be aware that His Majesty's Government have always been anxious to give every assistance to the authorities in the zone and have been willing, when specifically requested by the Spanish authorities, voluntarily to assent to taxes and regulations and to extend them to British subjects resident in the zone, by the issue of King's Regulations, provided that such taxes and regulations are not directly prejudicial to British interests or discriminatory against British trade. In the present case His Majesty's Government, without prejudice to their treaty rights, would be willing, at the specific request of the Spanish Government, to issue King's Regulations applying to British subjects in the zone all the increased duties referred to, subject only to the following reservations:—

- (1) His Majesty's Government would not be prepared to extend to British subjects the duties on edible seed oils and candles unless imported olive oil and locally manufactured candles were made liable to equivalent duties.
- (2) Nor could His Majesty's Government accept in their present form the consumption duties on imported wheat flour and derivatives of flour. The consumption duty on imported flour is at such a high level in comparison with the maximum selling price permitted within the zone by the vizirial decree that the import and sale of wheat is now economically impossible. Moreover, in view of the fact that domestic production of flour in the zone is not adequate to supply the requirements of the market, such a high rate of consumption duty cannot be justified on the grounds of economic necessity. While, therefore, His Majesty's Government have no desire to place any obstacle in the way of measures intended to benefit Moroccan agriculture, they are unable to acquiesce in the establishment of arbitrary rates of what are in effect import duties, which can only operate as a barrier to legitimate imports and must inevitably result in smuggling. His Majesty's Government would be prepared to issue the necessary King's Regulations in respect of these measures only if they were amended so that the rates of duty would be equitably adjusted in order to permit of the importation of British flour into the zone.

(To Tangier only.)

6. Mr. Monck-Mason should also point out, with reference to the Spanish High Commissioner's note of the 22nd January last, that the attitude of His Majesty's Government as set out in this aide-mémoire provides a complete answer to the second paragraph of the note. The present economic conditions cannot be held to justify the Spanish authorities in overriding British treaty rights, although they may justify the Spanish authorities in asking that His Majesty's Government should give favourable consideration to the request for the waiver of such rights in certain particular matters, a sympathetic attitude which is, in fact, being followed by His Majesty's Government. As regards the penultimate paragraph of the note of the 22nd January, His Majesty's consul may state that His Majesty's Government duly protested against the application of measures of prohibition in the French Zone as being contrary to British treaty rights unless voluntarily accepted by His Majesty's Government; that, in the recent case of Moorish slippers, His Majesty's Government, in pursuance of their general benevolent policy which they are equally ready to adopt towards the Spanish subjects by King's Regulation; and that, as regards monopolies, the position is regulated by treaty provisions, and His Majesty's Government would not fail to take exception to any monopolies other than those sanctioned by treaties and are unaware of the exact significance of the Spanish High Commissioner's reference in this connexion.

1936

90

(Madrid.)

6. Finally, you should express the sincere hope that the Spanish Government (unless they prefer to repeal the new duties) will see their way to avoiding any conflict with His Majesty's Government in this matter by requesting our formal concurrence in the dahirs, and by giving assurances on the specific points mentioned above, such as will enable His Majesty's Government to extend the force of the taxes to British subjects in the zone. If the Spanish Government should fail to give satisfaction to His Majesty's Government in either of these ways, His Majesty's Government will be obliged seriously to consider bringing the matter before the Permanent Court of International Justice.

(Madrid.)

7. His Majesty's consul at Tetuan is being instructed to make similar representations locally.

I am, &c.

JOHN SIMON.

ANNEX 44.

(1)

Sir G. Grahame (Madrid) to Sir John Simon.

(No. 150.)
Sir,

Madrid, March 13, 1935.

I have the honour, with reference to your despatch No. 112 of the 2nd instant, to transmit to you herewith copies of a note and of an aide-mémoire which, according to your instructions, were left by the counsellor of this Embassy with the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs regarding the imposition by the Spanish authorities of consumption duties on goods imported into the Spanish Zone of Morocco.

2. In accordance with those instructions, Mr. Snow informed Sr. Aguinaga of the sincere hope of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom that the Spanish Government would, unless they preferred to repeal the new duties, see their way to meeting the views of His Majesty's Government by requesting their formal concurrence in the dahirs in question, and by giving assurances on the specific points mentioned in the aide-mémoire. At the same time, Mr. Snow intimated to Sr. Aguinaga that, in the contrary case, His Majesty's Government would be obliged to consider bringing the matter before the Permanent Court of International Justice.

3. At one moment during the conversation, Sr. Aguinaga went so far as to admit the possibility of meeting the views of His Majesty's Government; but, reflecting, perhaps, that the decision lay with the Presidency of the Council (which is responsible for Moroccan affairs), he later confined himself to stating that the representations which had been made would be carefully considered.

I have, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAME.

71

(2)

Sir G. Grahame (Madrid) to Spanish Minister of State.

Your Excellency,

March 8, 1935.

Under instructions from His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I have the honour to approach your Excellency in regard to the following matter:—

On the 29th June last a number of dahirs were published in the Spanish Zone of Morocco creating new consumption taxes on certain goods imported into the zone and increasing the amount of existing taxes. With one exception these taxes are stated in the dahirs to be on imported goods only. Moreover, on the 20th September last a vizirial decree and dahir were issued imposing a consumption tax in the zone on imported wheat flour and its derivatives.

These new taxes may be held to constitute one of two things. Either they involve an increase in the customs duties of the zone and must be held contrary to article 7 of the Convention of Commerce and Navigation between the United Kingdom and Morocco, signed in Tangier in 1856, as modified by article 66 of the Act of Algeciras, or, on the other hand, they may represent an increase in the internal duties of the zone, in which case their enforcement on British subjects is contrary to article 4 of the general treaty between the United Kingdom and Morocco signed at Tangier in the same year. In either case the new duties involve direct discrimination between goods imported into the zone and similar goods produced locally.

In these circumstances His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom are obliged formally to protest against the dahirs in question. They are unable to acquiesce in measures, which infringe in this manner their treaty rights in Morocco, being applied without consent, and must therefore request their repeal.

I have, &c.

GEORGE GRAHAME.

(3)

Aide-Mémoire for His Excellency the Minister of State.

Spanish Zone of Morocco.

His Excellency will be aware that His Majesty's Government have always been anxious to give every assistance to the authorities in the zone and have been willing, when specifically requested by the Spanish authorities, voluntarily to assent to taxes and regulations and to extend them to British subjects resident in the zone, by the issue of King's Regulations, provided that such taxes and regulations are not directly prejudicial to British interests or discriminatory against British trade. In the present case His Majesty's Government, without prejudice to their treaty rights, would be willing, at the specific request of the Spanish Government, to issue King's Regulations, provided that such taxes and regulations are not directly prejudicial to British interests or discriminatory against British trade. In the present case His Majesty's Government, without prejudice to their treaty rights, would be willing, at the specific request of the Spanish Government, to issue King's Regulations applying to British subjects in the zone all the increased duties referred to subject only to the following reservations:—

(1) His Majesty's Government would not be prepared to extend to British subjects the duties on edible seed oils and candles unless imported olive oil and locally manufactured candles were made liable to equivalent duties.

(2) Nor could His Majesty's Government accept in their present form the consumption duties on imported wheat flour. The consumption duty on imported flour is at such a high level in comparison with the maximum selling price permitted within the zone by the vizirial decree that the import and sale of wheat is now economically impossible. Moreover, in view of the fact that domestic production of flour in the zone is not adequate to supply the requirements of the market, such a high rate of consumption duty cannot be justified on the grounds of economic necessity. While, therefore, His Majesty's Government have no desire to place any obstacle in the way of measures intended to benefit Moroccan agriculture, they are unable to acquiesce in the establishment of arbitrary rates of what are in effect import duties, which can only operate as a barrier to legitimate imports and must inevitably result in smuggling. His Majesty's Government would be prepared to issue the necessary King's Regulations in respect of these measures only if they were amended so that the rates of duty would be equitably adjusted in order to permit of the importation of British flour into the zone.

91

Madrid, March 8, 1935.

ANNEX 45.

His Majesty's Consul-General, Rabat, to French Residency-General.

April 28, 1934.

M. le Délégué,

L'attention du Gouvernement de Sa Majesté britannique dans le Royaume-Uni ayant été retenue par la question des droits de porte, j'ai l'honneur, en conformité d'instructions que je viens de recevoir, de soumettre son point de vue à votre Excellence.

Les conditions dans lesquelles les droits de porte s'appliquent aux étrangers sont établies par l'article 13 de la Convention de Madrid de 1880, aussi bien que par les règlements promulgués en vertu de cette convention avec l'approbation du corps diplomatique de Tanger en 1881 et 1896. La convention et les règlements disposent d'une manière expresse que la taxe ne pourra pas être augmentée sans un nouvel accord avec les représentants des Puissances signataires, tandis que les règlements n'autorisent que l'application de la taxe aux marchandises transportées d'une ville marocaine à une autre et aux produits indigènes qui entrent dans les villes.

Telle étant la situation juridique, il est évident que l'assentiment du Gouvernement de Sa Majesté britannique est nécessaire, premièrement, au prélèvement de la taxe sous aucune forme, non pas sur des marchandises transportées d'une ville à une autre mais, à leur arrivée au Maroc, sur des marchandises importées, et, deuxièmement, à une modification quelconque du taux de cette taxe tel que l'ont fixé les règlements acceptés par le corps diplomatique de Tanger.

Fidèle à sa politique habituelle le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté britannique est disposé, s'il en reçoit la demande, à déroger, dans une certaine mesure, de ses droits là où des changements du taux de la taxe pourraient se justifier. En effet, votre Excellence voudra bien admettre que dans le passé le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté n'a soulevé aucune objection à certaines modifications de cette nature qui ont été effectuées. Cependant le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté n'a d'aucune façon abandonné ses droits et ne saurait accepter que la taxe prélevée sur des marchandises importées diffère en n'importe quel degré de celle prélevée sur les produits indigènes. Il se trouve donc obligé de soulever la plus forte objection aux tarifs récemment promulgués.

En cette circonstance, je suis chargé de suggérer à votre Excellence l'opportunité d'une discussion de toutes les dérogations subies par les règlements de 1881 et 1896, discussion dont le but serait d'arriver à un accord satisfaisant les besoins de l'administration locale sans discrimination des importations britanniques.

Veuillez agréer, &c.

Le Consul général,

W. S. EDMONDS.

ANNEX 46.

French Residency-General to His Majesty's Consul-General, Rabat.

M. le Consul général,

July 7, 1934.

Par note du 28 avril dernier vous avez bien voulu me faire savoir que l'attention du Gouvernement de Sa Majesté britannique avait été retenue par la question des droits de porte. Votre Gouvernement estime qu'aux termes de l'article 13 de la Convention de Madrid de 1880 et des règlements de 1881 et 1896, toutes modifications en la matière auraient dû recevoir son assentiment. Il se voit donc obligé de protester contre les tarifs récemment promulgués et vous êtes chargé de suggérer au Gouvernement du Protectorat l'opportunité d'une discussion générale en vue d'arriver à un accord satisfaisant les besoins de l'administration locale sans discrimination des importations britanniques.

Tout en appréciant pleinement les sentiments amicaux exprimés dans votre note précitée, je crois devoir vous rappeler que les dispositions de l'article 13 de la Convention de Madrid sont devenues caduques. En effet, le traité franco-allemand du 4 novembre 1911 auquel le Gouvernement britannique a adhéré accorde au Gouvernement français au Maroc, par ses articles 1 et 4, une entière liberté en matière d'établissement d'impôts et autres taxes, sous la seule réserve de l'égalité économique et de la liberté commerciale.

L'article 13 du même traité abroge toutes clauses d'accord, convention, traité ou règlement contraires à ses stipulations.

Se fondant sur ces textes, et à condition d'assurer l'égalité de chances entre importateurs au Maroc, quelle que soit leur nationalité, le Gouvernement chérifien est convaincu de son droit absolu de modifier les droits de porte dans la mesure qu'il estime opportune et de sa seule initiative. En particulier, la simple équité l'autorise à frapper de droits différents le produit fini importé de l'étranger et le produit fabriqué au Maroc avec des matières premières ayant déjà acquitté, de ce chef, le droit de porte.

Je puis vous assurer que dans les modifications apportées ou à apporter aux droits de porte, le principe de l'égalité économique et de la liberté commerciale, qui reste la seule obligation contractuelle du Maroc en la matière, continuera à être respecté. Dans ces conditions, le Gouvernement du Protectorat ne peut que considérer comme étant sans objet la discussion suggérée par le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté britannique.

Veuillez agréer, &c.

H. PONSOT.

ANNEX 47.

His Majesty's Embassy, Paris, to French Ministry for Foreign Affairs.

November 9, 1934.

His Majesty's Embassy presents his compliments to the Ministry for Foreign Affairs and, under instructions from His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has the honour to invite their attention to recent correspondence which has been exchanged between the Resident-General of the Government of the Republic at Rabat and His Majesty's consul-general regarding the gate tax in Morocco.

2. As the Ministry will be aware, the conditions in which the gate tax is applicable to foreigners in Morocco were laid down in article 13 of the Madrid Convention of 1880, as well as in regulations subsequently issued thereunder by the Moroccan authorities with the approval of the Diplomatic Body at Tangier in 1881 and in 1896. It is expressly laid down in the convention and in the regulations that no increase in the amount of the tax shall be made except with the consent of the representatives of the signatory Powers. In addition, provision is only made in the regulations for the levying of the tax on goods transported from one town to another in Morocco and on local produce entering the towns. In 1917 the authorities of the French Protectorate made certain alterations in the rate of the tax and extended to it imports. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom entered a protest at the time, but, in order not to embarrass the Government of the Republic during the war, refrained from pressing their protest. His Majesty's Government have, however, recently received complaints of further modifications in the rate of the tax which discriminate against imported goods, and His Majesty's consul-general at Rabat was therefore instructed to make representations on this subject to the French authorities in Morocco.

3. The Resident-General at Rabat, in replying by note of the 7th July last to Mr. Edmonds's representations, ignored the argument therein put forward that the alteration of the rate of gate tax and its imposition on imported goods are contrary to article 13 of the Madrid Convention, and confined himself to stating that in virtue of the adherence of His Majesty's Government to the Franco-German Treaty of the 4th November, 1911, this article has ceased to be operative, and that the French Government enjoy in Morocco "une entière liberté en matière d'établissement d'impôts et autres taxes, sous la seule réserve de l'égalité économique et de la liberté commerciale."

4. His Majesty's Government had hoped that it might be possible to reach a practical settlement of this question in the course of the general trade discussions which are in progress regarding the commercial régime in Morocco. They were not, however, able to concur in the attitude adopted by the French negotiators in this matter in so far as the latter appeared to suggest that the removal of the discrimination against imported goods in the levy of the gate tax and similar taxes should be made dependent upon the recognition of the right of the Protectorate authorities to tariff autonomy. His Majesty's Government find it impossible to accept any such suggestion, since they cannot agree to abandon the rights of His Majesty's Government under article 7 of the Anglo-Moroccan Commercial Convention of 1856, whereby the rate of customs duty on goods imported by British subjects into Morocco are limited to 10 per cent. ad valorem, and the additional 2½ per cent. sanctioned by article 66 of the Act of Algéciras. It has been indicated to the French negotiators that His Majesty's Government might be prepared to admit certain agreed increases in the customs duties as part of the arrangement which is being discussed in the present negotiations, but it would have to be made clear in any agreement concluded on the subject that such increases were to be regarded as agreed derogations from the principle laid down in the convention of 1856.

5. His Majesty's Government are unable to conceal the surprise with which they learnt of the contents of M. Ponsot's communication of the 7th July. As the Ministry will doubtless recollect, the point of view of His Majesty's Government concerning their special rights under the early Moroccan treaties regardless of their participation in subsequent agreements has been made plain to the Government of the Republic on several occasions, and most recently in His Majesty's Embassy's memorandum of the 20th February, 1920. Since this date the rights of His Majesty's Government of control over taxation imposed upon British subjects in Morocco, which they consider to be incontestable, have been generally recognised in practice, and His Majesty's Government are therefore at a loss to understand why the same argument to which they had previously replied should now be advanced once again by M. Ponsot in his note of the 7th July to His Majesty's consul-general at Rabat. They are unable to comprehend how their adherence to an agreement concluded between the French and German Governments regarding French assistance to Morocco could be held to modify the obligations of the Moroccan Government under previous treaties, and in these circumstances His Majesty's Government would request the Government of the Republic to be so good as to intervene with the authorities of the Protectorate with a view to securing the repeal of the recent illegal modification of the gate tax.

November 9, 1934.

Annex 48.

French Minister for Foreign Affairs to His Majesty's Embassy, Paris.

November 22, 1934.

Le Ministère des Affaires étrangères a l'honneur d'accuser réception de la note No. 730 que lui a fait tenir l'Ambassade d'Angleterre à Paris le 9 de ce mois, au sujet de la revision des droits de porte au Maroc.

Il ne saurait se déclarer d'accord avec la thèse suivant laquelle les traités de 1904 et de 1911 seraient sans effet en matière de droits de porte au Maroc, l'établissement de ces droits restant régi par des taxes antérieures.

Il croit cependant inutile d'ouvrir une discussion juridique à ce sujet car la communication du Consul général de Grande-Bretagne à Rabat au sujet des droits de porte et la réponse de principe du Résident général appartiennent à un stade de la discussion qui se trouve dépassé par les conversations qui eurent lieu à Londres au mois de juin dernier.

La question du régime économique du Maroc ayant alors été examinée au cours de négociations commerciales entre le Gouvernement britannique et le Gouvernement français, il fut constaté, après consultation des divers départements ministériels anglais intéressés, que les deux Gouvernements, tout en réservant l'un et l'autre leur opinion en matière juridique, se trouvaient d'accord pour "approcher la question pratique dans un esprit accommodant."

Le Ministère des Affaires étrangères ne verrait que des avantages à rechercher, dans cet esprit, une solution à la question des droits de porte qui, d'ailleurs et parallèlement à la démarche du Consul général de Grande-Bretagne à Rabat, a déjà fait l'objet de conversations entre représentants qualifiés des deux Gouvernements, conformément à l'accord susmentionné.

En ce qui concerne les autres questions en cours de discussion, et dont Sir Robert Cahill a entretenu M. de La Baume par sa lettre du 12 de ce mois, le Ministère des Affaires étrangères se tient prêt à faire connaître sa réponse au cours de conversations qui pourraient avoir lieu comme l'été dernier avec le concours d'un agent du Protectorat.

Quant au projet d'évaluation des valeurs en douane au Maroc qui a été communiqué à M. Yeames le 26 septembre dernier, le Ministère des Affaires étrangères accèderait volontiers à la suggestion de Sir Robert Cahill de l'examiner indépendamment de la question des contingents et des droits de douane. Il désire néanmoins mentionner que le taux des droits de douane à instituer reste fonction de la perception exacte de ces droits. Aussi lui paraît-il indispensable que la mise en vigueur du nouveau système de perception des droits coïncide exactement avec l'établissement du nouveau tarif et des contingents.

Le Ministère des Affaires étrangères serait heureux que ces indications fussent retenues par le Gouvernement britannique en vue d'un règlement prochain de l'ensemble de la question dans un esprit amical et conformément à l'entente intervenue au mois de juin dernier.

ANNEX 49.

[W 2305/976/28]

Sir John Simon to Sir G. Grahame (Madrid).

(No. 153.)
Sir,

Foreign Office, March 19, 1935.

I transmit to your Excellency herewith copy of despatch from His Majesty's consul-general at Tangier regarding the issue by the authorities of the Spanish Zone of Morocco of a dahir and vizirial decree, dated the 1st November, 1934, modifying the existing gate tax regulations, and I have to request you to address a communication to the Spanish Government on the following lines:—

The conditions in which the gate tax is applicable to foreigners in Morocco were laid down in article 13 of the Madrid Convention of 1880 (State Papers, Vol. 71, p. 643), as well as in regulations subsequently issued thereunder by the Moroccan authorities, with the approval of the Diplomatic Body at Tangier, in 1881 (State Papers, Vol. 72, p. 638) and in 1896 (printed in the Annuaire du Maroc, 1905, p. 221). It is expressly laid down in the convention and in the regulations that no increase in the amount of the tax shall be made except with the consent of the signatory Powers. In addition, provision is only made in the regulations for the levying of the tax on goods transported from one town to another in Morocco and on local produce entering the towns. On the 1st September, 1931, the authorities of the Spanish Zone issued a dahir and vizirial decree, modified, at the instance of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, by a vizirial decree of the 17th March, 1932, which imposed a gate tax both on local produce entering towns and on goods imported by sea. His Majesty's Government agreed to accept these regulations and made them applicable to British subjects in the Spanish Zone by a King's Regulation. As regards the position in the French Zone, the notes exchanged between His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and the French Government on the 29th January last, embodying certain measures of economic reforms, include an undertaking by the Administration of the French Zone so to modify a vizirial decree of the 31st July, 1933, as to make the gate taxes applicable to certain enumerated products the same as those applicable to similar local products. In return for this undertaking His Majesty's Government have agreed to apply the provisions of the above-mentioned vizirial decree, as thus modified, to British subjects, as well as the provisions of any other regulations concerning gate taxes which have been made up to the time of signature of the exchange of notes, in so far as they have not already been applied to British subjects.

[11543]

M

His Majesty's Government are of the opinion that both in virtue of the special arrangements governing the gate tax, to which reference has been made above, and of the provisions of article 4 of the General Treaty of 1856 between the United Kingdom and Morocco, no taxes of this nature can be applied to British subjects unless agreed to by His Majesty's Government and made binding on British subjects by King's Regulation. While His Majesty's Government are unwilling to embarrass the Spanish authorities in their efforts to ensure the economic well-being of the zone, and while they are prepared, as heretofore, to co-operate by applying reasonable taxation to British subjects, they are unable to accept the dahir and vizirial decree of the 1st November, 1934, unless amended, in view of the fact that they infringe the principle of the equalisation of taxes as between imported and local products. This principle, as has been already pointed out, is embodied in the recent agreement between His Majesty's Government and the French Government, and His Majesty's Government earnestly trust that the necessary steps will be taken to amend the new gate taxes accordingly, in which event His Majesty's Government would be prepared to make them applicable to British subjects. If the regulations are not so amended, and if they are applied to British subjects without the consent of His Majesty's Government, the latter must reserve the right to put forward claims for the refund of taxes illegally levied.

Finally, in order to ensure in the future a greater measure of harmony in the application of measures of taxation in the Spanish Zone, His Majesty's Government desire to urge very earnestly that His Majesty's consular officers in the zone should be given prior notice of intended measures of this nature.

2. His Majesty's consul at Tetuan is addressing a similar communication to the Spanish High Commissioner.

I am, &c.
MAURICE PETERSON.

ANNEX 50.

Sir G. Grahame (Madrid) to Spanish Minister of State.

Your Excellency,

I have the honour, under instructions from His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to invite your attention to the issue by the authorities of the Spanish Zone of Morocco of a dahir and vizirial decree, dated the 1st November, 1934, modifying the existing gate tax regulations.

As your Excellency will be aware, the conditions in which the gate tax is applicable to foreigners in Morocco were laid down in article 13 of the Madrid Convention of 1880 (British State Papers, vol. 71, p. 643), as well as in regulations subsequently issued thereunder by the Moroccan authorities with the approval of the Diplomatic Body at Tangier in 1881 (British State Papers, vol. 72, p. 638) and in 1896 (printed in the Annuaire du Maroc, 1905, p. 221). It is expressly laid down in the convention and in the regulations that no increase in the amount of the tax shall be made except with the consent of the signatory Powers. In addition, provision is only made in the regulations for the levying of the tax on goods transported from one town to another in Morocco and on local produce entering the towns. On the 1st September, 1931, the authorities of the Spanish Zone issued a dahir and vizirial decree, modified at the instance of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, by a vizirial decree of the 17th March, 1932, which imposed a gate tax both on local produce entering towns and on goods imported by sea. His Majesty's Government agreed to accept these regulations, and made them applicable to British subjects in the Spanish Zone by a King's Regulation. As regards the position in the French Zone, the notes exchanged between His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and the French Government on the 29th January last, embodying certain measures of economic reforms, include an undertaking by the administration of the French Zone so to modify a vizirial decree of the 31st July, 1933, as to make the gate taxes applicable to certain enumerated products the same as those applicable to similar local products. In return for this undertaking, His Majesty's Government have agreed to apply the provisions of the above-mentioned vizirial decree, as thus modified, to British subjects, as well as the provisions of any other regulations concerning gate taxes which have been made up to the time of signature of the exchange of notes, in so far as they have not already been applied to British subjects.

Madrid, March 30, 1935.

His Majesty's Government are of the opinion that, both in virtue of the special arrangements governing the gate tax, to which reference has been made above, and of the provisions of article 4 of the General Treaty of 1856 between the United Kingdom and Morocco, no taxes of this nature can be applied to British subjects unless agreed to by His Majesty's Government and made binding on British subjects by King's Regulation. While His Majesty's Government are unwilling to embarrass the Spanish authorities in their efforts to ensure the economic well-being of the zone, and while they are prepared, as heretofore, to co-operate by applying reasonable taxation to British subjects, they are unable to accept the dahir and vizirial decree of the 1st November, 1934, unless amended, in view of the fact that they infringe the principle of the equalisation of taxes as between imported and local product. This principle, as has been already pointed out, is embodied in the recent agreement between His Majesty's Government and the French Government, and His Majesty's Government earnestly trust that the necessary steps will be taken to amend the new gate taxes accordingly, in which event His Majesty's Government would be prepared to make them applicable to British subjects. If the regulations are not so amended, and if they are applied to British subjects without the consent of His Majesty's Government, the latter must reserve the right to put forward claims for the refund of taxes illegally levied.

Finally, in order to ensure in the future a greater measure of harmony in the application of measures of taxation in the Spanish Zone, I am to urge your Excellency to take account of His Majesty's Government's earnest desire that His Majesty's consular officers in the zone should be given prior notice of intended measures of this nature.

I have, &c.
GEORGE GRAHAME.

RUSSIA

[N 5192/16/38/1936]

No. 2^A.

[Treasury Solicitor]

[July 30, 1936]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown and Mr. Andrewes-Uthwatt.

THE opinion of the Law Officers is desired upon the question whether a sum in sterling, which, with interest, amounts probably to over £500,000, and is held by the Midland Bank (Limited) to the credit of a Russian Banking Corporation created under Czarist and destroyed by Soviet law, and known in England as the Moscow Industrial Bank, can be recovered by the Crown as bona vacantia.

The principles of the law of England as to bona vacantia are simple, definite and comprehensive. All property within the jurisdiction which has no other owner belongs to the Crown. The subject was fully discussed in re Sir Thomas Spencer Wells, Swinburne-Hanham v. Howard, 1933, Ch. 29, and in the cases there cited.

These general principles, however, though simple in themselves, have on occasion been found difficult to apply. The difficulties have arisen, first, in connexion with the assets of dissolved corporations, and, secondly, where there has been a conflict between the law of England and the law of some other country.

With regard to the assets of dissolved corporations, until the decision in re Wells removed the difficulties, it was believed that the effect of the decision in In re Higginson and Dean, ex parte Attorney-General (1899) Q.B. 325 was that a debt due to a corporation disappeared when the corporation was dissolved, and that the Crown was entitled to claim as bona vacantia only sums which before the dissolution of the corporation had been held on trust for it. This view seems to have been present to the mind of Lord Atkin, in his judgment in Russian and English Bank v. Baring Bros. and Co. (Limited) (pp. 20, 21, 22 of transcript). It is clear that his attention had not been directed to the judgments in re Wells, in which, at p. 59, it was laid down that In re Higginson and Dean had been misunderstood, and that anything which could devolve upon the Crown as part of the estate of an intestate could become the property of the Crown upon the dissolution of a corporation.

On the question of conflict of laws, the application of the English law of bona vacantia to goods formerly the property of a foreign natural or juristic person may possibly depend upon the law of the country where that person was domiciled. In the case of a natural person, the question whether he has left surviving him anyone entitled in succession upon his death intestate is to be decided by the law of his domicile. If he has left no such person, and if his property is situate within the jurisdiction of the courts of the country of his domicile, it will fall to the fiscus of that country. In France, and, it is believed, in the majority of countries, the fiscus takes the property as bona vacantia, not claiming by any right of succession. Even in Scotland, where the Crown, in this connexion, is described as ultimus hæres, the expression is metaphorical and does not imply any idea of succession; in Torrie v. Munsli (1832), Court of Session, 10 S., pp. 597, 602, the Lord Ordinary said: "The right of the Crown to succeed to a bastard is not so much in the nature of succession as heir, as that all bona vacantia fall to the Crown." An important decision on the point is re Barnett's Trusts, 1902, 1 Ch. 847.

Before leaving the question of the law of England, it should be noted that s. 296 of the Companies Act, 1929, is not applicable to the present case; in the first place, it appears to relate only to companies registered under the Act; and, secondly, it is not retrospective (re Wells, ut supra, pp. 42, 48 and 63). Therefore, whatever the date of destruction of the Russian corporations, the matter must be decided under the common law relating to the prerogative, as was the case also in Higginson and Dean and in re Wells. It is interesting, however, to note that the legislature in s. 296 appears to have taken the same view of the rights

Recovery
by the Crown, as bona vacantia, of assets of the Moscow Industrial Bank, a destroyed
Russian corporation.

of the Crown as the Court of Appeal in re Wells, providing that "where a company is dissolved, all property and rights whatsoever . . . vested in or held on trust for the company immediately before its dissolution . . . shall . . . be deemed to be bona vacantia."

A further point of some importance is that the assets of dissolved companies fall to the Crown freed from all the liabilities of the company. Re Wells, p. 50. They are, of course, subject to rights in rem, so that the holder of an unsatisfied debenture will take priority of the Crown. Gough's Garages (Limited) v. Pugsley, 1930, 1 K.B. 615.

The question whether the conditions required by English law are fulfilled in the case of the fund under consideration will be dealt with later. It may be convenient if, before doing so, the general position and the facts as to the Moscow Industrial Bank are outlined.

It may first be remarked that it is proposed to describe the Russian juristic persons concerned as "corporations" rather than as "companies," and to refer to them as "destroyed" rather than as "dissolved," since the words "company" and "dissolved" suggest in the English courts a company registered under the Companies Acts, and a process of termination analogous to those laid down for English registered companies under the Acts. In continental countries, also, the word dissolution, it is believed, carries implications which do not arise from the facts now under consideration. To describe these Russian corporations as nationalised might create the impression that the State had taken over the business by succession and not by confiscation.

To begin with the general position, it is a matter of common knowledge that there is a large body of claims, amounting to something like £290 million, by persons in England in respect of losses which they suffered as a result of the revolution in Russia. There are also claims by creditors of specific corporations. It appears to be regarded as a hardship that there should remain in the hands of the English banks, in circumstances which will be outlined shortly, funds which admittedly do not belong to them and which might be applied in alleviation of financial suffering or in settlement of claims, and there has been a good deal of private and political pressure to induce the Crown to take steps to collect these funds, either by legislation, or as bona vacantia, and to apply the proceeds on an ex gratia basis, either for the benefit of sufferers generally, or in settlement of the claims of the English creditors of the corporations to which the funds belonged.

It has been felt that legislation would be unsatisfactory, both as being confiscatory in character and as disregarding the rights of the Crown in respect of bona vacantia.

If the funds could be recovered as bona vacantia the question of ex gratia grants is not without difficulty. The exercise of the granting power of the Crown is limited by the spirit of the agreement between King and Parliament underlying the surrender of the hereditary revenue by the Civil List Acts; the nature of this agreement is indicated in s. 46 (1) (vi) of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, as being that the power shall be exercised in accordance with the existing practice. The existing practice would not allow of the application by way of ex gratia grant of funds formerly the property of a specific corporation towards the satisfaction of moral claims not arising out of some transaction with the corporation in question. Thus creditors and perhaps shareholders of the corporation might be entitled to consideration. Claimants against another corporation or against the Russian Government would not. The Treasury, however, is of opinion that if these funds or any of them are in fact bona vacantia, it is the duty of the Crown to collect them, and thereafter to make the best possible use of them, leaving the precise method to be determined when the sums have been recovered.

The circumstances in which these funds have become immobilised is briefly as follows:—

The overthrow of the Czarist Government in Russia in 1917 was followed by decrees issued by the Soviet Government designed to effect the abolition of private banking and industrial corporations, the nullification of their shares, and the transfer of their assets to, and their ultimate confiscation by, the State.

The date of destruction of the banking corporations has been accepted by the House of Lords (Russian and English Bank v. Baring Bros. and Co. (Limited)) as not later than the 28th January, 1918. They accepted for the purposes of the case the findings of Mr. Justice Eve in In re Russian Bank for Foreign Trade and Russo-Asiatic Bank, 1934 Ch. 720. The evidence of Dr. Konkevitch, the expert in Russian law, upon whose opinion the learned judge founded his decision, will be found in Documents Nos. 2 and 3 sent herewith. Translations of the decrees are Document No. 4. With regard to the industrial corporations, the date is less easy to determine, and, it is thought, must be considered separately in each case.

In January 1918 there were a number of Russian banking corporations constituted under Czarist law which had branches in this country; others, either for their own purpose or on behalf of customers, had funds deposited with English banks, but had never had in this country any place of business. All these corporations presumably had been regularly created, with constitutions framed according to Czarist law, and their existence could be terminated only by the law of the country in which they were created. The U.S.S.R. was not recognised by His Majesty's Government as the de jure Government of Russia until 1924, and until that time its decrees, though enforced in Russia, had no validity as law in the English courts. So soon as the U.S.S.R. was recognised, its decrees were also recognised by the English courts as the law of Russia, with effect retroactively to 1917 (Lazard Bros. and Co. v. Midland Bank (Limited) (1933) A.C. 289, 297).

The result was to leave in the hands of certain English banks funds which may be classified as follows:—

1. Funds which were, or which may have been, the property of the Czarist Government,
2. Funds which were the property of a destroyed Russian corporation which had a branch in this country, and in respect of which a winding-up order had been made in this country, and
3. Funds which were the property of a destroyed Russian corporation which had no branch in this country and therefore in respect of which no winding-up order can be made (In re Lloyd Generale Italiano [1885] 29 Ch. D. 219).

Although difficult questions arise with regard to the funds comprised in categories 1 and 2 above, the present case is concerned only with funds falling within category 3.

No complete list of these funds is available, but certain information has been obtained about them from persons interested and from proceedings in the English courts relating to them.

It is, however, thought desirable to test the question of the Crown's rights, and it is thought that a suitable subject for a test case is the sum of over £500,000 held by the Midland Bank (Limited) to the credit of the Moscow Industrial Bank.

With regard to this sum, there are two sources of information, first, a memorandum compiled by Mr. David Allan, of Messrs. Allan, Charlesworth and Co., Chartered Accountants, and, secondly, two copies of entries from ledgers kept at the Midland Bank (Limited), made from certified copies of entries in the books of the Midland Bank (Limited) and produced during the examination of Mr. Baldry, the then head of the Legal Department of the Midland Bank, who was giving evidence for the bank upon the hearing of the position of V. Poliakov for a winding-up order against the Moscow Industrial Bank. In this second source the Moscow Industrial Bank is shown as having on the 23rd March, 1925, a credit balance of £59,195 4s. 10d. in respect of its Moscow account, and a credit balance of £348,803 6s. 9d. in respect of its Petrograd account.

There does not appear to be any method by which these statements can be made evidence in any other case; but it is submitted that they are sufficient to justify proceedings in some form which would leave the precise amount of the fund to be determined during the course of the action.

The information derived from Mr. Allan's memorandum is as follows:—

The Moscow Industrial Bank was a Russian company incorporated under the pre-revolutionary Russian laws. At the time of the revolution in 1917 the capital of the bank was 50 million roubles. The bank had several branches in Russia, but none abroad, but during the war it was engaged in business in this country.

The bank had two accounts in London with the Midland Bank (Limited). One account was the Moscow Industrial Bank, Petrograd account, the second was the Moscow Industrial Bank, Moscow account. The credit balance of the Petrograd account in favour of the Moscow Industrial Bank as appearing in the books of the Midland Bank (Limited) was, on the 31st December, 1929, £403,403 8s. 6d., and the credit balance of the Moscow account on the same date was £66,178 4s. 4d., making the total balance equal to £469,581 12s. 10d. This amount is exclusive of interest from the 30th June, 1924, to the 30th June, 1928, equal to £51,450 13s. 9d., which amount of interest was debited by the Midland Bank to the accounts of the Moscow Industrial Bank as having been previously credited in error and also exclusive of any further interest since the 30th June, 1928. The question of interest was raised in the proceedings of Lazard Bros. and Co. (Limited) v. Midland Bank (Limited) (1933 A.C. p. 289), and the final figure of the indebtedness of the Midland Bank was fixed in the Garnishee Order Absolute dated the 18th May, 1931, and made by Mr. Justice Roche at £542,730 14s. 7d., as on the date of the Garnishee Order nisi (the 12th December, 1930). The Garnishee Order Absolute was subsequently set aside by the Court of Appeal. An appeal from the judgment of the Court of Appeal was dismissed by the House of Lords.

It is suggested that as the judgment of Mr. Justice Roche has gone, it would not be advisable to adopt the figure as determined in his judgment though the fact that the Midland Bank was indebted to the Moscow Industrial Bank may be accepted. The uncertainty as to the figure may possibly be a factor in deciding upon the procedure to be adopted.

Whether the conditions in which this sum stands to the credit of the Moscow Industrial Bank in the books of the Midland Bank (Limited) are such that it has become bona vacantia by the Law of England is the question for consideration.

The first point is whether the fund is ownerless. As to this, the House of Lords in Russian and English Bank v. Baring Bros. and Co. (Limited), based its judgment on the assumption that the facts and dates accepted by Mr. Justice Eve in In re Russian Bank for Foreign Trade and Russo-Asiatic Bank, 1934, Ch. 720, were established. As has been said, in that judgment it was decided that the latest date when the banks could be regarded as possessing a juristic personality was the 26th January, 1918.

A corporation which has been destroyed by the law of the country of its origin has been destroyed everywhere. Banque Internationale de Commerce de Petrograd v. Goussakov (1923) 2 K.B. 682, 691. Lazard Bros. and Co. (Limited) v. Midland Bank (Limited) (1933) A.C. 289, 297, 302.

Neither Mr. Justice Eve nor the House of Lords enquired into the possibility of a claim by the Soviet Government as successors of the Czarist corporations. The terms of the Soviet decrees, the history of the executive acts which followed them, and the decisions of the English courts seem to make it unlikely that any such claim will be made, or, if made, could be successful. It is clear, however, from the remarks of Lord Blanesburgh (transcript, p. 16) that the possibility that some claim might be made by the Soviet Government will not be overlooked by any court before which the matter may come. The most probable claim would seem to be that the decrees in question had an extra-territorial effect and that the Soviet Government was entitled to the fund by virtue of the decrees and not as successor to the destroyed corporation.

The fund is situate within the jurisdiction of the English courts, and was so situate at the time when the corporation was destroyed; and it has been definitely held, both in the United States and in France, that the decrees of the Soviet Government made in December 1917 and January 1918 have no extra-territorial effect, because no Government has any power to confiscate property not within its jurisdiction. The English decisions most directly relevant are those of Mr. Justice Hill, affirmed by the Court of Appeal, in the Jupiter (No. 3), 1927, p. 122, 250; and of Mr. Justice Maugham, in In re Russian Bank for Foreign Trade, 1933, 1 Ch. 745. There is reason to believe that certain circulars issued by the Russian Government, which are referred to in the Jupiter (No. 3), at pp. 144 and 145, and commented upon by Mr. Justice Maugham (as above, at p. 767), operate as a disclaimer of any rights by the Russian Government over assets situate outside Russia. If the interpretation of these circulars should become material, an opinion would be obtained from Dr. Konkevitch, the expert in Russian law whose views were accepted as to the date of destruction.

The Chargé d'Affaires of the Russian Government in 1924 wrote to the Midland Bank (Limited) giving notice that his Government claimed all sums standing in the books of the bank to the credit of former Russian banking and other nationalised companies. The bank denied liability, and the claim has not been followed up.

If the Law Officers advise that, apart from the possible attitude of the Russian Government, the Crown can make a claim to the fund in question with reasonable prospects of success, the Russian Government will be approached before any action is taken. In any case, if proceedings are commenced, it may be necessary to give notice thereof to the Russian Government so that they may appear if they think fit.

With regard to the form of the proceedings, it is possible that the normal practice would be to proceed by English information (Robertson, Civil Proceedings by an action against the Crown, p. 310); in which case the true facts about the fund might be ascertained by interrogatories delivered in proceedings of that kind. On the other hand, if it is thought that the evidence as to the existence of the fund is sufficient a more practical method of procedure might be an action by the Attorney-General for an account of the money in the hands of the bank and payment of the amount found due.

The Law Officers and Counsel are requested to advise—

- (1) Whether the fund standing in the books of the Midland Bank (Limited), to the credit of the Moscow Industrial Bank is bona vacantia.
- (2) If it is, what proceedings should be taken for its recovery.
- (3) Generally on the case.

List of Papers.

- (1) Transcript of the shorthand notes of the judgments of the House of Lords in Russian and English Bank v. Baring Bros. and Co. (Limited) (N 2237/16/38/1936).
- (2) Copy affidavit of Dr. Konkevitch, sworn the 29th November, 1933.
- (3) Transcript of shorthand notes of cross-examination of Dr. Konkevitch, the 20th February, 1934.
- (4) Copies, decrees, &c., of the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic (list attached, Annex A).
- (5) Copies of entries from ledgers kept at Midland Bank (Limited).

Opinion.

1. In our opinion the Crown has a reasonable prospect of succeeding in proceedings directed to recovering as bona vacantia the fund standing in the books of the Midland Bank (Limited) to the credit of the Moscow Industrial Bank.

2. The proceedings should be by way of English information.

3. We think that it would be desirable before instituting any proceedings to take the whole position into consideration. The Crown is bound to be met with demands to apply any recovered assets towards satisfaction of claims against the Russian Government or Russian Banks or traders, and those demands would have to be considered. Whatever be the legal rights of the Crown, we assume that money recovered would be used in some way for meeting claims.

If that be so, the Crown would, we think, find itself committed to the general policy of collecting wherever possible ownerless Russian debts in this country. It would, secondly, be faced with the need for determining in accordance with workable principles the way in which the assets were to be applied.

As to the first matter, haphazard collection based on such information as to Russian debts as might come to the knowledge of the Crown would be difficult to justify, and information as to ownerless Russian debts could be obtained only as a result of returns made under the compulsion of some Act of Parliament.

As to the second matter, there is room for considerable difference of opinion as to the way in which recovered assets ought to be applied. Are unpaid creditors of the particular Russian corporation to have a preferential claim? Are creditors of a Russian corporation to be allowed to set off unsatisfied claims which they may have against other extinct Russian corporations or Russian traders? We understand some banks, and it may be the Midland Bank, have claims of this kind. Or are the recovered funds to be treated as applicable as a general fund for meeting unsatisfied claims against Russian concerns—or against the Russian concerns and the Russian Government?

In our view it would be a mistake for the Crown to institute any proceedings of the nature under review except as part of a predetermined policy, the object of which was to satisfy on defined lines claims against Russian traders.

It is also, we think, right to point out that there are grounds on which it could be argued that the Soviet Government has a title to the debts due to nationalised corporations. It may be that that Government would make no claim, but the point might well be raised and have to be dealt with.

4. We suggest for consideration whether it would not be desirable to attack the situation on entirely different and narrower lines and secure the passing of a short Act of Parliament giving jurisdiction to the Courts to wind up dissolved corporations which had assets in this country notwithstanding that such corporations had no place of business in this country, and possibly at the same time deal by legislation with the assets in this country of the former Russian Government.

DONALD SOMERVELL.

T. J. O'CONNOR.

A. ANDREWES-UTHWATT.

*Law Officers' Department,
July 30, 1936.*

ANNEX A.

(Paper No. 4.)

List of Decrees, &c.

1. Decree on the Nationalisation of Banking.—Published in No. 35 of the Gazette of the Workers' and Peasants' Government, the 17th December, 1917.
2. Decree of the Council of People's Commissars confiscating share capital of the former Joint Stock Banks.—No. 18 of the Gazette of the Workers' and Peasants' Government, the 26th January, 1918.
3. Order of the Principal Commissariat of the People's Bank.—No. 32, Izvestiya, the 12th April, 1918.
4. Order of the Head Office of the People's Bank.—No. 34, the 27th April, 1918.
5. Collection of Enactments and Orders of the Workers' and Peasants' Government.—No. 98 of 1918, published in No. 98 of the Collection of Enactments 1918, Article 997, and in No. 36 of the Economicheskaya Zhizn of the 19th December, 1918.
6. Decree of the Council of People's Commissaries of the 19th January, 1920 (Collection of Enactments and Orders of the Government of Workers and Peasants, Nos. 4 and 5, Article 25, promulgated in the Izvestiya of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee of Soviets, the 25th January, 1920).

SPAIN

[W 11524/9549/41/1936]

No. 2.

[September 14, 1936]

Lord Cranborne to the Attorney-General.

My dear Attorney-General,

Foreign Office, September 5, 1936.

I AM writing in the absence of the Secretary of State to ask your views on a difficult point which has arisen in regard to the application of the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870, to the civil war in Spain.

Applicability of the Foreign
Enlistment
Act to a civil war.

As you know, arrangements are virtually complete with other Powers for the application to Spain and Spanish territories of a general régime of non-intervention in the struggle now proceeding. Certain Powers, and in particular Germany and Italy, have made it an express condition of participation in this régime that it should be applicable not merely in the sense that no arms or war material will be allowed to go to either side, but also in the sense that there shall be no loans or subscriptions in favour of either side and that no volunteers shall be recruited outside Spain for the forces of either of the contesting parties.

It is with reference to the question of the enlistment of volunteers that I am now writing. The position is that, unless Section 4 of the Foreign Enlistment Act can be regarded as being applicable to the present case, so that it will be an offence under the Act to enlist in the military or naval forces of either side, we shall have no means of stopping such enlistment. This fact might give other countries a pretext for escaping from the Non-Intervention Agreement in regard to the export of arms, and would be a very serious matter. What is even more important, perhaps, from our point of view than actually being in a position to prosecute individual British subjects for enlisting with the contending forces would be to prevent the recruiting and enrolment in this country of volunteers for either side. As you know, the Foreign Enlistment Act, on the assumption that it is applicable, makes it an offence for any person within His Majesty's dominions, whether a British subject or not, to induce any other person to accept or agree to accept combatant service. This would effectively prevent recruiting, and, for the rest, once we had issued a warning that the Foreign Enlistment Act would be applied, we feel we should be faced at the worst only with a small trickle of British subjects going abroad for enlistment, who would, of course, thereby be laying themselves open to penalties on their return to this country. There would be no recruiting and no large-scale departures for Spain. We feel fairly certain that this situation, if it could be achieved, would be one which would not give any other Power a legitimate pretext for seeking to escape from the Non-Intervention Agreement in regard to the export of arms.

The question is, however, whether the Foreign Enlistment Act is applicable to the case of a civil war, as it would be in the case of a war between two foreign States proper in which this country was neutral. In this connexion I enclose a copy of the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870 (Paper No. 1). Sections 4-7, in conjunction with the definition of foreign State contained in Section 30, are the principal provisions relevant on the subject of enlistment; a copy of a letter, with its enclosures, which we wrote to the Home Office on the 26th August last on the subject of the applicability of the Act (Paper No. 2); and a copy of a private letter which I have received from the Home Secretary, in which, as you will see, he expresses some doubts as to the applicability of the Act, though he says that these doubts are not shared by his advisers, among whom, I believe, is the Director of Public Prosecutions (Paper No. 3). The Home Secretary suggests that you should be consulted. In view of the terms of his letter, however, and of the fact that the question is becoming urgent, we have not thought it necessary to submit the matter by a reference in the ordinary way, and we feel little doubt that the Home Secretary will agree with us in thinking that a more or less informal expression of your views is all that is required in the circumstances.

[14996]

E 2

The Foreign Office letter to the Home Office and the Home Secretary's letter to me are, I think, self-explanatory as to the issues involved, and all I need do here is to add some further comments in the light of his observations.

As you will see, the Home Secretary seems to agree that, in virtue of the definition of foreign State contained in Section 30 of the Act, enlistment in the forces of the legitimate Spanish Government would be enlistment in the service of a foreign State at war with another foreign State, since under the definition section (Section 30) the insurgents would appear to be a foreign State for the purposes of the Act. I am assuming for the purposes of the argument that the legitimate Government of Spain is, in fact, "at war" with the insurgents within the meaning of the Act. This, as you will see from our letter to the Home Office, is a point which may not be altogether clear, but, at any rate, the Home Secretary has not expressed any different view in regard to it from that which we ourselves hold. His doubt arises on the question whether the insurgents, though they may be a foreign State for the purposes of the Act, and "at war" with the Spanish Government, can be said to be "at peace" with His Majesty. Our feeling is that the answer to this question is in the affirmative, for various reasons. The Home Secretary's difficulty, I believe, is whether it is possible for His Majesty to be at peace with an entity with which, whatever it may be called, he is not in diplomatic relations. My advisers doubt whether the existence of diplomatic relations is really relevant, because it has often happened in the past that His Majesty has not been in diplomatic relations with foreign States or Governments, yet no one would have suggested that he was not at peace with them. For instance, diplomatic relations with Russia were completely suspended for years after the revolution and were not resumed until a measure of recognition had been extended to the Soviet Government. Yet I do not suppose that it would have occurred to anybody to say that this country was not capable of being at peace with Russia during that time merely because of the absence of diplomatic relations. In the same way, if the insurgents should succeed and become the Government of Spain, there may well be an interval before they are recognised as such, during which diplomatic relations will be suspended. Yet we shall, we trust, be "at peace" with them.

It seems to us that the question of war and peace is a question of fact and that if there are no hostilities between this country and a foreign community, which ex hypothesi is for the purposes of the Act to be deemed a "foreign State," we are entitled to take the view that His Majesty is at peace with that community.

Any other view would seem to lead to a contradictory result if the wording of Section 4 of the Act is considered. That section, in conjunction with the definition of foreign State in Section 30, appears to elevate an insurgent community into the position of a foreign State for the purposes of the Act. The words therefore "any foreign State at war with any foreign State" clearly contemplate that such a community may be "at war" with the other foreign State concerned. But if it is capable of being "at war" with this other foreign State, why is it not equally capable of being "at peace" with yet another foreign State, viz., His Majesty.

Coming to more general considerations, it will be apparent that if the Home Secretary's doubts are well founded the effect is to give Sections 4-7 of the Act a one-sided application in relation to a civil war. It is very difficult to suppose, however, that such can have been the intention of the framers of the Act. The definition of foreign State in Section 30, which is a very striking one, is difficult to explain on any other ground but that the framers of the Act deliberately intended the Act to be applicable as well to a civil war as to an ordinary war. It would seem inconsistent with any such intention to make the Act applicable only to enlistment with the insurgent forces in a civil war. The framers of the Act must, moreover, have been aware that His Majesty's Government have normally adopted an attitude of neutrality in civil wars and have often issued proclamations of neutrality in such cases; yet a situation in which it was an offence without a licence from the Crown to enlist on one side in a civil war, while it was no offence to enlist on the other, would clearly cut across the ordinary obligations of neutrality under international law. These, indeed, do not compel a State to prevent its subjects from enlisting with the forces on either side, but they do require that if a State does prevent its subjects from enlisting in the forces on one side it shall apply the same treatment to the other.

There are, I am told, no decided cases, or at least it has not been possible to find any, in which persons have been prosecuted for enlisting in or giving aid to the forces of the legitimate Government in a civil war. On the other hand, there are plenty of cases of prosecutions for enlisting in or giving aid to insurgent forces in a civil war. This fact, which can probably be explained on extraneous grounds (for instance, in the case of the American Civil War, the sympathies of this country were almost entirely on the Confederate side, to whom aid was in consequence mainly given) does not appear to us to affect the question of the interpretation of the Act.

As you are aware, in cases where it has been decided to recognise the insurgents as belligerents, it has been the custom to issue a proclamation of neutrality, and thereafter to apply the strict rules of neutrality as they would be applied under international law in the case of an ordinary war. The principal obligation is, of course, that of impartiality—to treat both sides alike. In the proclamation which was issued in the case of the American Civil War (copy of which is enclosed), you will observe in the passage marked A that an express warning was given against enlistment with the forces of either side, and this after a reference to the then Foreign Enlistment Act (of 1819, 59 Geo. 3, cap. 69). The relevant section of that Act was similar in substance to Section 4 of the present Act, though somewhat different in its wording, and did not contain the passage about a foreign State at peace with His Majesty. It is clear, however, that the Government, in promulgating the neutrality proclamation in the American Civil War, regarded the then Foreign Enlistment Act as applicable to enlistment with both sides, and it is very difficult to suppose that only a few years after, in 1870, with the experience of the American Civil War fresh in their minds, an Act would have been framed which would place His Majesty's Government in the dilemma that in a civil war they would either not be able to prevent enlistment with either side at all, or that, in so far as they could prevent enlistment on one side, they could only do so by departing from that attitude of neutrality which has been the main feature of British policy in such cases in the past. This, of course, is the dilemma we shall be faced with now, if the Home Secretary's doubts are well founded—a dilemma which will become even more acute if we should decide to recognise the insurgents as having belligerent status, with its attendant obligation of treating both belligerents alike.

I hope I have not wearied you with this long explanation of our views, but the matter is an important one in the circumstances, and we are most anxious to be in a position to issue a warning that persons enlisting with the forces of either side will render themselves liable to penalties under the Act. Our feeling is that if we could only get so far as to issue this warning it would probably have the effect of stopping any large scale enlistment or any attempt at recruiting in this country, so that our main purpose would be achieved without our having to apply the Act at all. We feel, therefore, that if our interpretation of the Act is at all a possible one we should take the risk, if risk there be, of acting upon it in the circumstances.

Yours, &c.
CRANBORNE.

LIST OF PAPERS.

- No. 1.—Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870.
- No. 2.—Foreign Office to Home Office, August 26, 1936 (W 8823/62/41/1936)—Annex A.
- No. 3.—Sir John Simon to Lord Cranborne, September 3, 1936 (W 10515/9549/41/1936)—Annex B.

Report.

Attorney-General to Lord Cranborne.

Dear Cranborne,

I will assume, as you do, that the Government of Spain is at war with the insurgents within the meaning of the Act, and that the latter are a foreign State as defined. The definition is curious, in that the words "part of" appear only to qualify "province" and perhaps people, but the insurgents, in their title at any rate, seem to assume to be the Government of the whole of Spain.

On the other point which you submit to me, while appreciating the Home Secretary's argument, I take your view. I think that if a body of persons is a foreign State within the Act, then they are a foreign State for the purpose of being at peace with His Majesty, whether recognised or not. Put in another way, the words "at peace" mean "not at war with," and may perhaps have been inserted to make it clear that the Act would not make it an offence to enlist with our allies.

Also it seems to me clear that the definition must be read into the words "foreign State" in both places in which they occur in section 4. If "at peace" means at peace with a recognised Government, there are difficulties in that the words of the definition would cover bodies of persons very unlikely to be recognised in the technical sense.

The words of the Act do not seem to me very apt for application to a civil war, but I have come to the conclusion that they would be construed in the way you suggest, and I therefore think you would be justified in issuing the warning.

D. B. SOMERVELL.

Law Officers' Department,
September 14, 1936.

ANNEX A.

(Paper No. 2.)

Foreign Office to the Home Office.

Sir,

Foreign Office, August 26, 1936.

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Eden to inform you that in connexion with the negotiations which the French Government are at present conducting with a view to the conclusion of a joint agreement amongst the Powers chiefly concerned to prohibit the supply of arms to Spain, the French Chargé d'Affaires in London has enquired whether His Majesty's Government for their part would examine the possibility of preventing, under an international agreement, the establishment in this country of recruiting bureaux for volunteers to assist either of the contending parties in Spain.

2. Mr. Eden is advised that His Majesty's Government would be in a position in practice to prevent the establishment of such bureaux by making it clear that under section 4 of the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870, recruiting itself would be an offence, as would also the taking of service in the forces of either side. In this connexion, however, there are a number of points of law on which Mr. Eden would welcome Sir John Simon's observations:—

(1) Does the Foreign Enlistment Act apply to the case of a civil war as well as to the case of a war proper? Mr. Eden is advised that the answer to this question is in the affirmative. The definition of "foreign State" in Section 30 of the Act appears to have the effect of placing an insurgent community of the kind now involved in the Spanish civil war on the same footing, for the purposes of the Act, as a recognised State; and on its true construction Section 4, coupled with this definition, would appear to make it an offence to enter the military service of either side in a civil war (assuming both sides to be "at peace" with His Majesty), or to recruit volunteers for such service. It may be observed in this connexion that the Foreign Enlistment Act in force previous to the present one (59 Geo. 3, cap. 69) was applied and enforced during the American Civil War of 1861-65 (cf., for instance, The Queen versus Rumble, 1864, 4 F. and F. 175, English Reports, vol. 176, p. 519).

(2) Can Section 4 of the Foreign Enlistment Act be made applicable prior to a declaration of neutrality by His Majesty's Government? Mr. Eden is advised that there is nothing in the Foreign Enlistment Act to suggest that Section 4 does not become ipso facto applicable in the event of a war (which by virtue of the definition of "foreign State" in Section 30 appears to include a civil war), or that its application is in any way dependent on the prior issue of a formal proclamation of neutrality. The tenour of the proclamation of neutrality⁽¹⁾ made in the case of the American Civil War, of which a copy is enclosed, confirms this view, since it was framed in the form of a warning that the then Foreign Enlistment Act (59 Geo. 3, cap. 69) (which was similar in this respect to the present Act) was applicable and would be applied, and implied that the position would have been the same even if there had been no proclamation of neutrality. The same may be said as regards the application of the present Act in its relation to the neutrality proclamation⁽²⁾ of 1912 issued during the Balkan wars, of which a copy is also enclosed. This view is supported by such cases as Regina versus Jameson (1896, 2 Q.B. 425). This was a prosecution under Section 11 of the Foreign Enlistment Act in connexion with the Jameson raid, for fitting out an expedition against the territories of a friendly foreign State. It was made clear that as regards cases coming under Section 11, the Act is ipso facto applicable when the case contemplated therein arises, and there is nothing in Section 4 of the Act to suggest that it, too, does not apply ipso facto, given always, in cases coming under Section 4, that there is a "war." In contrast to this, it would seem that sub-section (1) of the proviso to Section 8 may make the application of that Section dependent on the issue of a neutrality proclamation.

(3) Can it be held that in the absence of any declaration of neutrality or recognition by His Majesty's Government of the insurgents as belligerents there is a state of war within the meaning of Section 4 of the Act? The section only applies in the event of service being taken with a State at war with another State, and the question is whether in the absence of any official recognition of the belligerent character of the dispute a court would regard itself as precluded from concluding that a war existed. Mr. Eden is advised that a court would probably not take this view. The definition of "foreign State" in the Act clearly implies that a civil war may be a "war" for the purposes of Section 4 of the Act, and a recognition of belligerency does not create a war where none existed previously; it is merely a recognition that a war exists. No doubt if there had been a formal recognition a court would take judicial notice of it. But in its absence the court would probably allow the existence of a war (i.e., a civil war) to be proved as a fact.

3. There is a further point to which it has been found necessary to give attention, namely, whether the application of the Act would in itself entail any implied recognition of the insurgents as belligerents. This is, of course, largely a political question, and is not one to which Mr. Eden is disposed to attach undue importance. It can, he feels, reasonably be argued that the Act is a purely municipal piece of legislation and not in any sense a document having any international effect such as, for example, a proclamation of neutrality would have. It would be possible to maintain that the fact that His Majesty's Government choose to regard the hostilities as amounting to a war for the purpose of applying a piece of domestic legislation and of preventing persons in this country from taking service with either side could not have any international effect or imply internationally any recognition of the insurgents as belligerents.

4. Subject, therefore, to Sir John Simon's views on the points mentioned in paragraph 2 above, and to any other observations which he may wish to put forward, I am to suggest that it would be advisable to issue in the near future a public warning to the effect that as from a given date (which might be the date of the coming into force of the international non-intervention agreements now being negotiated by the French Government, or such other date as might seem desirable), persons taking military or naval service with either side would render

⁽¹⁾ State Papers, Vol. 51, pp. 165-169.

⁽²⁾ State Papers, Vol. 105, pp. 163-168.

1936

110

SPAIN

themselves liable to proceedings under the Foreign Enlistment Act. If Sir John Simon sees no objection, Mr. Eden proposes to inform the French Government that it will be possible by these means effectively to prevent the enlistment in this country of volunteers in this case.

I am, &c.

H. J. SEYMOUR.

ANNEX B.

(Paper No. 3.)

Sir John Simon to Lord Cranborne.

My dear Cranborne,

Home Office, September 3, 1936.

I MENTIONED to you just now the question put to the Home Office by the Foreign Office as to whether, from the point of view of our criminal law, an announcement could properly be made that it would be a breach of the Foreign Enlistment Act for any British subject to take military or naval service with either side in the Spanish trouble. I appreciate the force of the argument that the language of Section 4 of the Act of 1870, together with the definition of "foreign State" in Section 30, is wide enough to justify this proposition. But for the following reason I have felt enough doubt to think it right to suggest that you should consult the Attorney-General.

I have no doubt that it is an offence under the Act of 1870 for a British subject to enlist with the insurgents against the existing Spanish Government. This arises because the insurgents, oddly enough, for the purposes of the Act are to be regarded as "a foreign State," and there is no doubt that the insurgents are "at war with a foreign State at peace with Her Majesty," viz., the Government of Spain. This point was, in fact, decided by the Privy Council in 1870 under an earlier Act where the provision of a ship for the use of a body of insurgents who were in rebellion against the established Government of Cuba was held to be a criminal offence. But would it have been an offence to give military aid to the existing Government of Cuba against the insurgents? The case in 1870 certainly never so decided, for before this curious result could follow, it would be necessary to hold that the insurgents were not only a foreign State but were a foreign State "at peace with Her Majesty."

It may be that that is the right view of the statute, and I do not say it is not. But it is a very odd view and I hesitate to go out of my way to lay down the law on a point which seems to me doubtful. I ought to add that legal advisers in whom I put great confidence connected with the Home Office think that my doubt is unjustified. Anyhow, I do not think it is for the Home Secretary, because he happens to be a decayed lawyer, to resolve doubtful points of law when the Attorney-General is available.

I realise, of course, that the last thing the Foreign Office would wish to do would be to announce that no one can lawfully help one side in Spain and everybody may help the other. But I am only concerned with making sure that you get a correct legal interpretation. If the Law Officers advise that there is nothing in my fears and that the existing statute makes it equally unlawful to help either side, I can see no possible objection to the announcement being made. But in that case it has been unlawful throughout; therefore do not say that it will be unlawful from a future date.

Yours ever,

JOHN SIMON.

SPAIN

111

[W 11520/9549/41/1936]

No. 3.

[September 15, 1936]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, September 4, 1936.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to state that he has deemed it advisable to give some consideration to the question of the form of the proclamation of neutrality that would be issued in the event of its being decided by His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom to recognise that a state of war exists between the parties to the present civil conflict in Spain.

2. In 1916, at a time when the outbreak of hostilities between the United States of America and the United States of Mexico appeared to be imminent, there were drafted, in consultation with the Lord Chancellor, alternative shorter forms of a neutrality proclamation designed to replace the lengthy form of proclamation up till then used; copies of the relevant correspondence are enclosed herein (Paper A). It will be seen that the views expressed by Sir Edward Grey in his letter of the 27th June, 1916, to the Lord Chancellor received the concurrence of his lordship, who was also disposed to regard the briefer of the two forms of proclamation submitted to him (Annex A in Sir Edward Grey's letter) as sufficient for all immediate purposes.

3. It is thought therefore that this form would serve as a basis in the present case, but it would require some adaptation in view of the fact that the war is a civil war and not one between different countries. For the purpose of such adaptation certain passages in the neutrality proclamation issued during the American Civil War of 1861-1865 could be utilised. A copy of this proclamation is enclosed (Paper B).

4. It would also be necessary in issuing any proclamation to take account of the requirements of the constitutional position at present governing the relations between the United Kingdom and the other members of the British Commonwealth of Nations which has undergone a good deal of development since 1916. Although it has been the accepted view of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom that, in the case of a war proper between contending nations, the neutrality of the Empire must exist or not as a whole, it is perhaps open to question whether a recognition of belligerency accorded by one part of the Empire necessarily involves a similar recognition by other members of the Commonwealth. In any case it seems desirable to avoid the issues which might be raised by retaining in its previous form the reference to all British subjects which used to appear in neutrality proclamations.

5. In the light of the above considerations the Secretary of State has accordingly caused to be prepared a form of proclamation of which I have the honour to transmit the draft herewith (Paper C). I am to explain that the phrase that appears to require modification to bring the wording of the proclamation into accord with present-day intra-imperial relationships is the phrase "All our loving subjects." In the course of semi-official correspondence with this department on this aspect of the question of the form of proclamation the Dominions Office have expressed the following views, which are shared by the Foreign Office. The words "All our loving subjects" might be criticised by His Majesty's Governments in some of the Dominions on the ground that they implied that His Majesty, on the advice of the Privy Council in the United Kingdom, was taking action committing His Governments in the Dominions. On the other hand, a specific exception of British subjects in the Dominions would seem to be undesirable, inasmuch as it might create a false impression as to the position of the Dominions in relation to neutrality. Again, a specific enumeration of the British subjects to whom the proclamation was addressed would be difficult, since it would be necessary to include not only British subjects in all parts of the Empire other than the Dominions and their dependent territories, but also British subjects in foreign countries. In these circumstances it seems to the Dominions Office desirable to omit entirely the reference to "All our loving subjects" and to adopt an alternative phrase.

6. Having regard to the foregoing considerations the phrase "All our loving subjects" has been replaced, in the fourth paragraph of the enclosed draft

[14996]

F

Form of proclamation of neutrality to be issued in event of decision by His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom to recognise that state of war exists between parties to civil conflict in Spain.

1936

proclamation, by the word "everyone," and has been deleted in the last paragraph of the draft. The word "everyone" would appear to have the merit of covering not only British subjects and British-protected persons wherever resident, but also foreign nationals within His Majesty's territories, so far as these may be affected.

7. Two further points require special mention. It is the usual practice in neutrality proclamations between contending States to recite that His Majesty is at peace with both parties. In the case of a civil war it is not possible to refer in this connexion to both parties, since one of them has no recognised international existence; its recognition as a belligerent does not entail its recognition as a separate State or Government capable of having international relations with other countries. In the case of the neutrality proclamation issued in the American Civil War the point was met by first of all reciting that His Majesty was at peace "with all Sovereigns, Powers and States," and then, after the mention of hostilities between the Government of the United States and the Confederate States, reciting that His Majesty was at peace with the Government of the United States. In the present case it seems preferable simply to recite that His Majesty is at peace, without stating with whom these relations subsist, since in point of fact they subsist with all the world.

8. The second point is that although the present proposed form of proclamation does not contain any specific reference to the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870, as neutrality proclamations used to do, and as was contained in the proclamation issued in the case of the American Civil War, the present draft is, nevertheless, intended to include a reference to that Act amongst other acts which may be applicable to the situation. In this connexion I am directed to refer you to the definition of "foreign State" in section 30 of the Foreign Enlistment Act, the effect of which appears to be to make section 4 of the act applicable in the case of a civil contest between parties within the same State.

9. Mr. Eden would be glad to be informed at your earliest convenience whether a proclamation in the terms of the proposed draft (Paper C) would, in your opinion, be a proper one to be issued if required in the present case.

I have, &c.

H. J. SEYMOUR.

LIST OF PAPERS.

PAPER A.—Correspondence with the Lord Chancellor in 1916. (Law Officers' Reports, 1916: Confidential 10828, No. 7.)

PAPER B.—Proclamation by Queen Victoria in 1861 during the American Civil War. (State Papers, Vol. 51, pp. 165-169.)

PAPER C.—Draft Proclamation of Neutrality. (Annex No. I.)

Report.

We approve the form of declaration with the following alterations, which we consider desirable:—

In the first line substitute for the first four words "Whereas unhappily there is war."

Substitute the word "war" for "hostilities" in the second recital and the second operative paragraph.

The word "war" is used in the Foreign Enlistment Act, and as that Act is not being specifically referred to we think it is desirable to use the same language.

We would suggest that in the last line but one of the penultimate paragraph "and" should be substituted for "or."

In the last paragraph we suggest the omission of the words after "provided" and insertion of "therefor." The phrase "penalties . . . denounced by the law of nations" does not seem to us a good one.

We notice that word "charge" is used in the earlier documents, and unless there is some good reason for substituting "enjoin," we suggest using the word "charge."

D. B. SOMERVELL.

T. J. O'CONNOR.

Law Officers' Department,
September 15, 1936.

The Attorney-General to Lord Cranborne.

Dear Cranborne,

September 15, 1936.

This letter is supplementary to our opinion on the Neutrality Proclamation which I send herewith. I saw the Solicitor-General this afternoon and we discussed and agreed the opinion, but he raised a further point which it was not possible to clear up before he left.

I had read paragraphs 5 and 6 of the case as meaning that the document was put forward to us as a document which in the opinion of both the Foreign Office and the Dominions Office would not be read as applicable to British subjects in the Dominions. The Solicitor-General drew my attention to the second sentence in paragraph 6, which states that the word "everyone" would cover British subjects wherever resident, and therefore would include those in the Dominions. If this were right, it would seem that it in no way met the objection raised and admitted to "all our loving subjects."

Whether a proclamation issued on the advice of the Privy Council does or does not prima facie apply to the Dominions seemed to me a question which turned largely on constitutional usage, and as I was seeing the Dominions Secretary on another matter I took the opportunity of asking whether he or his advisers could throw any light on the matter. It is not, I think, clear that it does not apply or might not be taken as applying, especially when it deals with such a question as neutrality. It has, as you know, been suggested in South Africa that neutrality is a matter for each Dominion to determine for itself. In view of this and to meet the original objection, I would suggest the substitution of "all those whom it may concern" for "everyone," with the consequent grammatical alterations. The Solicitor-General would, I know, agree with this suggestion.

I do not think any reasonable objection could be taken to the proclamation in this form, but neutrality is a somewhat thorny question in our relations, at any rate with South Africa, and I had felt that it would be desirable to notify the Dominions, if time allowed, before this proclamation was issued. They might reasonably say that they ought to have been consulted before a document was issued which appeared to announce the neutrality of the King of the whole Empire. My concern is, of course, only with the constitutional aspect, but the Dominions Secretary, when I asked him on the other point, also expressed this view.

DONALD SOMERVELL.

Annex No. I.

(Paper C.)

Draft Proclamation of Neutrality.

Whereas hostilities unhappily exist between the Government of the Spanish Republic and certain forces styling themselves the Provisional Military Government of Spain; and

Whereas we, being happily at peace, are firmly purposed and determined to maintain a strict and impartial neutrality in regard to the said hostilities;

We therefore have thought fit, by and with the advice of our Privy Council, to issue this, our Royal Proclamation:—

And we do hereby strictly enjoin and command that everyone shall govern himself accordingly and shall observe a strict neutrality in and during the aforesaid hostilities in accordance with the laws and statutes of the realm in this behalf made or the law of nations in relation thereto;

And we do hereby further give warning that if anyone shall do any act in violation of the said laws and statutes or the law of nations he will in nowise obtain any protection from us, but will be liable to the penalties provided by the said laws and statutes, or denounced by the law of nations in that behalf.

[14996]

F 2

1937

THIS DOCUMENT IS THE PROPERTY OF HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office

CONFIDENTIAL

(15419)

REPORTS BY THE
LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1937

1937

(ii)

LIST OF REPORTS

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked 1^a, &c.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
GENERAL.
1 ^a	Law Officers... [Home Office]	July 14, 1937	Legislation required to implement the Draft Convention for the Prevention and Punishment of Terrorism...	1
SPAIN.
1	Attorney-General ...	April 14, 1937	Application to civil war of Foreign Enlistment Act: Section 8 (building, equipping, commissioning or despatching of vessels for military or naval service of either side)	8
2	Law Officers...	April 15, 1937	Proposed perfection of an emergency landing ground for British military aircraft on the British Neutral Ground at Gibraltar ...	11

(iii)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS)

1937

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.

Cases cited are indicated by italics.

ACT—GIB.

A.

Acts of Parliament—

Extradition Act, 1870; position of fugitive offenders guilty of assassination, 1.

Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870; application to civil war, 2, 8–11.

Ditto; operation of article 8 in absence of declaration of neutrality, 9–11.

Aerodromes—Emergency landing ground for British military aircraft on British Neutral Ground at Gibraltar, 11–13.Aircraft—Emergency landing ground for British military aircraft on British Neutral Ground at Gibraltar, 11–13.

Arms and Ammunition—Supply to insurgents, 2.

B.

Belligerent rights—French blockade during hostilities with China in 1884, without other belligerent rights at sea, 9–10.

Blockade—Exercise of, without declaration of war, 9–10.

E.

Extradition—Position under Extradition Act of fugitive offenders guilty of assassination, 11.

G.

Gibraltar—Emergency landing ground for British military aircraft on British Neutral Ground, 11–13.

INS—WAR.

I.

Insurrection—

Legislation to give effect to draft convention on terrorism: necessity for notification of existence of civil war, 1–2.

Position under Foreign Enlistment Act, 2, 8–11.

Supply of arms to insurgents, 2.

Despatch of vessels to insurgents, 8–11.

Issue of proclamation of neutrality, 9.

N.

Neutrality—

In civil war: issue of proclamation of neutrality, 9.

No proclamations during Franco-Chinese hostilities of 1884; no declaration of war, 9–10.

Operation of article 8 of Foreign Enlistment Act in absence of declaration of neutrality, 9–11.

T.

Terrorism—Draft Convention for the Prevention and Punishment of, 1–8.

Treaties—Draft Convention for the Prevention and Punishment of Terrorism, 1–8.

V.

Vessels—Commissioning, despatch, &c., of vessels to contending parties in civil war, 8–11.

W.

War—

Civil war: see Insurrection.

Hostilities between France and China, 1884, without declaration of war, 9–10.

1937

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office

CONFIDENTIAL

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.: 1937

GENERAL

[W 14821/720/98/1937]

No. 1^A.

[Home Office]

[July 14, 1937]

Report.

THE legislation required to implement the 'Draft Convention for the Prevention and Punishment of Terrorism' raises, in our view, points of considerable difficulty both legal and political. The important departure made by the convention, which would undoubtedly require legislation, is that contained in article 3, which in effect would make it a criminal offence here to conspire to do or to aid and abet or incite the acts set out in article 2.

Legislation required to implement the Draft Convention for the Prevention and Punishment of Terrorism.

2. It is already a criminal offence to conspire here to commit murder abroad, but it is not we think an offence so to conspire to commit the other crimes mentioned in article 2. So far as we know there is little, if any, evidence that any evils in relation either to terrorist or ordinary crimes have resulted from this position. Parliament is usually averse to the creation of new offences unless some specific evil in this country can be pointed to. Though we dare say there is evidence of evils resulting in other countries from the absence of such a provision, the papers before us are not very specific on this head.

3. The convention is directed solely against acts against States, and no doubt the committee were restricted to this by their terms of reference. We think that legislation so restricted would be open to serious legal objections as well as raising political difficulties.

Our first general observation, which was foreshadowed in our earlier letter, is therefore that any legislation should in our view be general in its terms and not confined to acts directed against States. So far as our present law is concerned it regards at any rate some offences, when directed against a State, as entitled to more lenient treatment than when the motive is a private one. Thus section 3 (1) of the Extradition Act, 1870, protects from extradition a fugitive offender who has committed an otherwise extraditable offence, if the offence is one of a political character, and he may apply to the court to have this question determined. We understand that there is no suggestion that the law should be altered in this respect, and although the position of a fugitive offender who has committed the act abroad can be differentiated from that of those who have conspired here, the general policy which is given effect to in section 3 (1) has obviously a very important bearing on this whole question.

4. If the only acts likely to arise were cold-blooded assassinations or isolated incendiarism little objection could be felt, we think, to making it criminal here to plot such acts for commission abroad. The report which precedes the convention states that in the view of the committee a civil war was clearly outside the scope of the convention. The legislation therefore would have to contain provisions which made this exception and made it plainly. Some means would

* Copy annexed.

[17381]

c*

1937

2

GENERAL

have to be found of making it clear to the public when an insurrection or disturbance became a civil war. Presumably there would have to be a Proclamation to this effect. Even, however, in the period before the rising became a civil war the proposed legislation would, we think, make a number of activities criminal the inclusion of which as crimes might be open to political objection. Acts intended to cause death or grievous bodily harm and wilful destruction of or damage to public property are the normal incidents of any revolt or rising even before it has reached the stage of civil war. Under our present law, even after the revolt has reached a stage at which the Foreign Enlistment Act applies, there are acts which can lawfully be done, in co-operation with and by way of assistance to the insurgents. In the period before its provisions become applicable assistance to and indeed an express engagement with the insurgents is, as we understand it, lawful. When its provisions come into play it prohibits certain acts, such as an express engagement, fitting out an expedition, &c., but still leaves a measure of co-operation and assistance perfectly lawful. Speaking as lawyers, recent events have shown that the Foreign Enlistment Act is not a clearly drafted enactment and there is a good deal to be said, apart from the present question, for considering a new Act to deal more clearly with the matter.

It is the drawing of the line between acts which everyone would condemn and political movements attended by violence which may or may not finally result in a civil war which is, we think, the real difficulty in framing legislation on the lines of the convention.

5. Article 2 (4) requires careful consideration. It would make it a criminal offence to supply or manufacture in order to supply arms, &c., to any insurgents prior to the existence of a state of civil war. If such a provision was introduced at the present time one obvious comment would be that, as Germany and Italy would presumably not put themselves under any such restriction, the effect would be to favour Fascist insurgents, while any rising organised against Fascist dictators would find themselves unable to get the arms which they required. It is worth considering the general effects of the convention in the event of a rising being organised in Italy or Germany.

We would also like to comment on the actual words used in article 3. We think there might be difficulty about "incitement." The effect of including this might make statements in speeches in support of a rising in a foreign country, which are at present lawful, criminal offences. The words in article 3 (e) are also very wide words, and it might be considered whether in any event legislation should not be restricted substantially to article 3 (1) (a).

We have nothing to add to the comments by the Director of Public Prosecutions on articles 7, 12 and 13.

6. We have emphasised the difficulties which we think would arise in drafting and carrying through the legislation which would be necessary substantially to carry out the convention in order that these difficulties should get full consideration at this stage. We may have exaggerated them, as it is difficult to forecast the reaction of opinion in the House of Commons on a proposal of this kind. We have, as everybody must have, sympathy with the general aim of the convention, and if it were possible to find a means of defining isolated criminal acts and drawing a distinction between them and the acts of violence which arise out of embryonic and actual civil war many of the difficulties would disappear. We also cannot help thinking that the attitude of the House of Commons would be considerably influenced by the extent to which other European countries were going to ratify and enforce the terms of the convention. As is pointed out by the Director of Public Prosecutions, our present law covers a good deal of the area covered by the convention and we have a strict system of control over the export of arms. To go further is, we think, bound to bring us up against the difficulties which we have tried to point out, namely, the form in which the exclusion of civil war is to be effected and the further question whether the principle which has led the committee to propose the exclusion of civil war might not be felt here to be equally applicable to political risings before they could be said to have reached that stage.

D. B. SOMERVELL.
T. J. O'CONNOR.

Law Officers' Department, July 14, 1937.

GENERAL

3

[W 12328/720/98/1937]

Annex.

Draft Convention for the Prevention and Punishment of Terrorism.

(Translation.)

ARTICLE 1.

ACTS of terrorism within the meaning of the present convention are criminal acts which are directed against a State and which are intended or calculated to create a state of terror among individuals, groups of persons or the general public.

2. The object of the present convention is to ensure co-operation between the high contracting parties for the prevention and punishment of such acts when they are of an international character, it being the duty of States to refrain from any act designed to encourage terrorist activities directed against the safety and public order of another State.

ARTICLE 2.

Each of the high contracting parties should make the following acts committed on its own territory criminal offences if they are directed against another high contracting party and if they constitute acts of terrorism within the meaning of article 1:—

- (1) Any act intended to cause death or grievous bodily harm or loss of liberty to—
 - (a) Heads of States, persons exercising the prerogatives of the head of the State, their hereditary or designated successors;
 - (b) The wives or husbands of the above-mentioned persons;
 - (c) Persons charged with public functions or holding public positions when the act is directed against them in their public capacity.
- (2) Wilful destruction of or damage to public property or property devoted to a public purpose belonging to or subject to the authority of another high contracting party.
- (3) Any wilful act calculated to endanger the lives of members of the public.
- (4) The manufacture, obtaining, or supplying of arms, ammunition, explosives or harmful substances with a view to the commission in any country whatsoever of an offence falling within the present article.
- (5) Any attempt to commit any of the acts falling within the present article.

ARTICLE 3.

1. Each of the high contracting parties should also make the following actions criminal offences when they are committed on his own territory with a view to acts of terrorism directed against another high contracting party, whatever the country in which the acts of terrorism are to be carried into execution:—

- (a) Any agreement to commit any of the acts mentioned in article 2 (Nos. (1) to (4));
- (b) Any direct public incitement, whether successful or not;
- (c) Any successful private incitement;
- (d) Any wilful complicity;
- (e) Any help given towards the commission of such an act.

2. Acts of participation in the offences falling within the present convention shall be treated as separate offences when the persons committing them can only be brought to trial in different countries.

ARTICLE 4.

Without prejudice to the characterisation of offences and to other special provisions of national law relating to the persons and property mentioned in article 2, no high contracting party shall make any distinction as regards the protection afforded by criminal law between acts, falling under articles 2 and 3, directed against the party itself and similar acts directed against another high contracting party.

[17381]

c* 2

GENERAL

ARTICLE 5.

1. In countries where the principle of the international recognition of previous convictions is accepted, foreign convictions for any of the acts mentioned in articles 2 and 3 will, within the conditions prescribed by the domestic law, be taken into account for the purpose of establishing habitual criminality.

2. Such convictions will, further, in the case of high contracting parties whose law recognises foreign convictions, be taken into account, with or without special proceedings, for the purpose of imposing, in the manner provided by that legislation, incapacities, disqualifications or interdictions whether in the sphere of public or of private law.

ARTICLE 6.

In so far as parties civiles are admitted under the domestic law, foreign parties civiles, including, in proper cases, a high contracting party, should be entitled to all rights allowed to nationals by the law of the country in which the case is tried.

ARTICLE 7.

1. Without prejudice to the provisions of paragraph 4 below, the acts set out in articles 2 and 3 shall be deemed to be included as extradition crimes in any extradition treaty which has been, or may hereafter be, concluded between any of the high contracting parties.

2. The high contracting parties who do not make extradition conditional on the existence of a treaty shall henceforward, without prejudice to the provisions of paragraph 4 below and subject to reciprocity, recognise the acts set out in articles 2 and 3 as extradition crimes as between themselves.

3. For the purposes of the present article, any act specified in articles 2 and 3, if committed in the territory of the high contracting party against whom it is directed, shall also be deemed to be an extradition crime.

4. The obligation to grant extradition under the present article shall be subject to any limitations recognised by the law of the country to which application is made.

ARTICLE 8.

1. When the principle of the extradition of nationals is not recognised by a high contracting party, nationals who have returned to the territory of their own country after the commission abroad of an offence mentioned in articles 2 or 3 should be prosecuted and punished in the same manner as if the offence had been committed in their own country, even in a case where the offender has acquired his nationality after the commission of the offence.

2. The provisions of the present article shall not apply if, in similar circumstances, the extradition of a foreigner cannot be granted.

ARTICLE 9.

Foreigners who are on the territory of a high contracting party and who have committed abroad any of the acts set out in articles 2 and 3 should be prosecuted and punished as though the act had been committed in the territory of that high contracting party, if the following conditions are fulfilled, namely, that—

- (a) Extradition has been demanded and could not be granted for a reason not connected with the act itself;
- (b) The law of the country of refuge recognises the jurisdiction of its own courts in respect of offences committed abroad by foreigners;
- (c) The foreigner is a national of a country which recognises the jurisdiction of its own courts in respect of offences committed abroad by foreigners.

ARTICLE 10.

The provisions of articles 8 and 9 shall also apply to acts referred to in articles 2 and 3 which have been committed in the territory of the high contracting party against which they were directed.

As regards the application of articles 8 and 9, the high contracting parties do not undertake to pass a sentence exceeding the maximum sentence prescribed by the law of the country where the offence was committed.

ARTICLE 11.

Each high contracting party should take on his own territory appropriate measures to prevent any activity contrary to the purpose of the present convention.

GENERAL

ARTICLE 12.

1. The carrying, possession and distribution of firearms, other than smooth-bore sporting-guns, and of ammunition and explosives should be subjected to regulation, and it should be a punishable offence to transfer, sell or distribute them to any person who does not hold such licence or make such declaration as may be required by the domestic legislation concerning the possession and carrying of such articles.

2. Manufacturers of firearms, other than smooth-bore sporting-guns, should be required to mark each arm with a serial number and factory mark permitting it to be identified, and to keep a register of the names and addresses of purchasers.

ARTICLE 13.

1. The following acts should be punishable:—

- (a) Any fraudulent manufacture or alteration of passports or other equivalent documents;
- (b) Bringing into the country, obtaining or being in possession of such forged or falsified documents knowing them to be forged or falsified;
- (c) Obtaining such documents by means of false declarations or documents;
- (d) Using any such documents which are forged or falsified or were made out for a person other than the bearer.

2. The wilful issue of passports, other equivalent documents, or visas, by competent officials to persons known not to have the right thereto under the laws or regulations applicable, with the object of assisting any activity contrary to the purpose of the present convention, should also be punishable.

3. The provisions of the present article shall apply irrespective of the national or foreign character of the document.

ARTICLE 14.

1. The results of the investigation of offences provided for in articles 2, 3 and 13 should in each country and within the framework of the law of that country be centralised in an appropriate service.

2. Such service should be in close contact—

- (a) With the police authorities of the country;
- (b) With the corresponding services in other countries.

3. It should furthermore bring together all information calculated to facilitate the prevention and punishment of the acts mentioned in articles 2, 3 and 13 and should, as far as possible, keep in close contact with the judicial authorities of the country.

ARTICLE 15.

Each service, so far as it considers it desirable to do so, should notify to the services of the other countries, giving all necessary particulars—

- (a) Any act mentioned in articles 2 and 3, even if it has not been carried into effect, such notification to be accompanied by descriptions, copies and photographs;
- (b) Any search for, any prosecution, arrest, conviction or expulsion of persons guilty of acts dealt with in the present convention, the movements of such persons and any pertinent information with regard to them, as well as their description, finger-prints and photographs;
- (c) Discovery of documents, arms, appliances or other objects connected with acts mentioned in articles 2, 3, 12 and 13.

ARTICLE 16.

1. The high contracting parties shall be bound to execute letters of request in accordance with their domestic law and practice.

2. The transmission of letters of request relating to offences referred to in the present convention should be effected—

- (a) By direct communication between the judicial authorities; or
- (b) By direct correspondence between the Ministers of Justice of the two countries, or by direct communication from the authority of the country making the request to the Minister of Justice of the country to which the request is made; or

GENERAL

(c) Through the diplomatic or consular representative of the country making the request in the country to which the request is made; this representative shall send the letters of request direct to the competent judicial authority, or to the authority indicated by the Government of the country to which the request is made, and shall receive direct from such authority the papers constituting the execution of the letters of request.

3. In cases (a) and (c), a copy of the letters of request shall always be sent simultaneously to the superior authority of the country to which application is made.

4. Unless otherwise agreed, the letters of request shall be drawn up in the language of the authority making the request, provided always that the country to which the request is made may require a translation in its own language, certified correct by the authority making the request.

5. Each high contracting party shall notify to each of the other high contracting parties the method or methods of transmission mentioned above which he will recognise for the letters of request of the latter high contracting party.

6. Until such notification is made by a high contracting party, his existing procedure in regard to letters of request shall remain in force.

7. Execution of letters of request shall not give rise to a claim for reimbursement of charges or expenses of any nature whatever other than expenses of experts.

8. Nothing in the present article shall be construed as an undertaking on the part of the high contracting parties to adopt in criminal matters any form or methods of proof contrary to their laws.

ARTICLE 17.

The participation of a high contracting party in the present convention shall not be interpreted as affecting that party's attitude on the general question of the limits of criminal jurisdiction as a question of international law.

ARTICLE 18.

The present convention does not affect the principle that, subject to the acts in question not being allowed to escape punishment, the characterisation of the various acts dealt with in the present convention and the determination of the applicable penalties and of the methods of prosecution and trial depend in each country upon the general rules of the domestic law. It, further, does not impair the right of the high contracting parties to make such rules as they consider proper regarding the effect of mitigating circumstances, the right of pardon and the right of amnesty.

ARTICLE 19.

If any dispute should arise between the high contracting parties relating to the interpretation or application of the present convention, and if such dispute has not been satisfactorily solved by diplomatic means, it shall be settled in conformity with the provisions in force between the parties concerning the settlement of international disputes.

If such provisions should not exist between the parties to the dispute, the parties shall refer the dispute to an arbitral or judicial procedure. If no agreement is reached on the choice of another court, the parties shall refer the dispute to the Permanent Court of International Justice, if they are all parties to the protocol of the 16th December, 1920, relating to the statute of that court; and if they are not all parties to that protocol, they shall refer the dispute to a court of arbitration constituted in accordance with the Convention of The Hague of the 18th October, 1907, for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes.

ARTICLE 20.

1. The present convention, of which the French and English texts shall be both authentic, shall bear to-day's date. Until . . . it shall be open for signature on behalf of any member of the League of Nations and on behalf of any non-member State represented at the conference which drew up the present convention or to which a copy thereof is communicated for this purpose by the Council of the League of Nations.

GENERAL

2. The present convention shall be ratified. The instruments of ratification shall be transmitted to the Secretary-General of the League of Nations to be deposited in the archives of the League; the Secretary-General shall notify their deposit to all the members of the League and to the non-member States mentioned in the preceding paragraph.

ARTICLE 21.

1. After the . . . , the present convention shall be open to accession by any member of the League of Nations and any of the non-member States referred to in article 20 on whose behalf the convention has not been signed.

2. The instruments of accession shall be transmitted to the Secretary-General of the League of Nations to be deposited in the archives of the League; the Secretary-General shall notify their receipt to all the members of the League and to the non-member States referred to in article 20.

ARTICLE 22.

Any member of the League of Nations or non-member State which is prepared to ratify the convention under the second paragraph of article 20, or to accede to the convention under article 21, but desires to be allowed to make reservations with regard to the application of the convention, may so inform the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, who shall forthwith communicate such reservations to all the members of the League and non-member States on whose behalf ratifications or accessions have been deposited and enquire whether they have any objection thereto. Should the reservation be formulated within two years from the entry into force of the convention, the same enquiry shall be addressed to members of the League and non-member States whose signature of the convention has not yet been followed by ratification. If, within six months from the date of the Secretary-General's communication, no objection to the reservation has been made, it shall be treated as accepted by the high contracting parties.

ARTICLE 23.

Ratification of or accession to the present convention by any high contracting party implies an assurance by him that his legislation and his administrative organisation are in conformity with the rules contained in the convention.

ARTICLE 24.

1. Any high contracting party may declare, at the time of signature, ratification or accession, that, in accepting the present convention, he is not assuming any obligation in respect of all or any of his colonies, protectorates, overseas territories, territories under his suzerainty or territories in respect of which a mandate has been entrusted to him; the present convention shall, in that case, not be applicable to the territories named in such declaration.

2. Any high contracting party may subsequently notify the Secretary-General of the League of Nations that he desires the present convention to apply to all or any of the territories in respect of which the declaration provided for in the preceding paragraph has been made. The convention shall, in that case, apply to all the territories named in such notification ninety days after the receipt thereof by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations.

3. Any high contracting party may at any time declare that he desires the present convention to cease to apply to all or any of his colonies, protectorates, overseas territories, territories under his suzerainty or territories in respect of which a mandate has been entrusted to him. The convention shall, in that case, cease to apply to the territories named in such declaration one year after the receipt of this declaration by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations.

4. The Secretary-General of the League of Nations shall communicate to all the members of the League of Nations and to the non-member States referred to in article 20 the declarations and notifications received in virtue of the present article.

1937

8

GENERAL

ARTICLE 25.

The present convention shall, in accordance with the provisions of article 18 of the Covenant, be registered by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations on the ninetieth day after the receipt by the Secretary-General of the . . . ratification or accession.

The convention shall come into force on the date of such registration.

ARTICLE 26.

Each ratification or accession taking place after the deposit of the . . . instrument of ratification or accession shall take effect on the ninetieth day following the date on which the instrument of ratification or accession is received by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations.

ARTICLE 27.

A request for the revision of the present convention may be made at any time by any high contracting party by means of a notification to the Secretary-General of the League of Nations. Such notification shall be communicated by the Secretary-General to all the other high contracting parties and, if it is supported by at least a third of those parties, the high contracting parties undertake to hold a conference for the revision of the convention.

ARTICLE 28.

The present convention may be denounced on behalf of any high contracting party by a notification in writing addressed to the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, who shall inform all the members of the League and the non-member States referred to in article 20. Such denunciation shall take effect one year after the date of its receipt by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, and shall be operative only in respect of the high contracting party on whose behalf it was made.

In faith whereof the Plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention.

Done at Geneva, . . . in a single copy, which will be deposited in the archives of the Secretariat of the League of Nations; a certified true copy thereof shall be transmitted to all the members of the League of Nations and all the non-member States referred to in article 20.

SPAIN

[W 7396/7/41/1937]

No. 1.

[April 14, 1937]

Lord Plymouth to the Attorney-General.

My dear Attorney-General,

Foreign Office, April 6, 1937.

Application to civil war of Foreign Enlistment
Act:
Section 8 (building, equipping,
commissioning or despatching of vessels for military or naval service of either side).

YOU will remember that Lord Cranborne wrote to you on the 5th September* last for your views on the question whether or not the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870 (of which a copy is enclosed herewith, Paper A) could be regarded as being applicable to hostilities such as those of the civil war in Spain. The point which he then put to you had especial reference to those sections of the Act which deal with the enlistment of individuals. I now want to put to you a point regarding section 8 of the Act, which forbids the building, equipping, commissioning or despatching of any vessel for the military or naval service of either side; and I hope you will allow me to put it in the same rather informal way that he did his last enquiry.

2. You will recall that on the 11th January last, acting on the strength of your reply of the 14th September to his letter of the 5th September, we issued a public warning that the Act was applicable to the state of affairs in Spain. In so doing we proceeded on the assumption that the Act is ipso facto applicable to any hostilities covered by its language, and that its application on any particular occasion is not dependent on the prior issue of a proclamation of neutrality by His Majesty. We have been advised in the past, and we think it is generally accepted, that this assumption is correct as a general proposition governing the application of the Act, but there is some doubt as to how far it holds good with reference to section 8. In this connexion, may I refer you to paragraph 2 (2) of the letter from the Foreign Office to the Home Office of the 26th August last, of which a copy was enclosed as Paper 2 in Lord Cranborne's previous enquiry?

* See Confidential 15053. No. 2.

SPAIN

9

3. The doubt regarding section 8 arises from the reference to a proclamation of neutrality contained in sub-section (1) of the proviso to the section. The proviso reads:—

" . . . Provided that a person building, causing to be built or equipping a ship in any of the cases aforesaid, in pursuance of a contract made before the commencement of such war as aforesaid, shall not be liable to any of the penalties imposed by this section in respect of such building or equipping if he satisfies the conditions following; (that is to say):—

" (1) if forthwith upon a proclamation of neutrality being issued by Her Majesty he gives notice to the Secretary of State that he is so building, causing to be built or equipping such ship and furnishes such particulars of the contract and of any matters relating thereto, or done or being done under the contract as may be required by the Secretary of State:

" (2) if he gives such security, and takes and permits to be taken such other measures, if any, as the Secretary of State may prescribe, for ensuring that such ship shall not be despatched, delivered or removed without the licence of Her Majesty until the termination of such war as aforesaid."

4. The above passage is so worded as apparently to assume that a proclamation of neutrality will, in fact, have been issued, and raises a doubt whether, in the absence of such a proclamation, section 8 is applicable at all. It may be argued that, until the proclamation is issued, the contractor is not in a position to give the required notice, and that, if the section is applied without a proclamation having been issued, the effect is to deprive the contractor of the protection afforded by the proviso.

5. The arguments against this view are: First, that it is very difficult to believe that the framers of the Act, had they really intended to make the application of section 8 as a whole dependent on the prior issue of a proclamation of neutrality, would have chosen to do so, not expressly, but by implication, i.e., by the indirect method of including a reference to a proclamation in the proviso. And if it is accepted that the application of the rest of the Act is not dependent on any proclamation, it becomes all the more unlikely that such a method would have been employed for achieving that object in the case of section 8.

6. Secondly, it seems possible to interpret the proviso in such a way as not to lead to the result indicated at the end of paragraph 4 above. The use of the word "forthwith" in sub-section (1) of the proviso rather suggests that the real object of the reference to a proclamation of neutrality in that sub-section is to ensure that notice shall be given to the Secretary of State so soon as the contractor becomes aware that the Act is operative. It would seem possible to read the reference to a proclamation not as necessarily governing the operation of the exception which the proviso makes in favour of existing contracts, but as meaning no more than that if a proclamation of neutrality has, in fact, been issued, then the exception will only operate if the required notification is forthwith given to the Secretary of State. On this view, the absence of a proclamation would not cause the exception to become inoperative. It would remain operative, and, if dependent upon anything, would be dependent only upon the contractor giving such security, or taking or permitting to be taken "such other measures, if any, as the Secretary of State may prescribe" under sub-section (2) of the proviso. In this connexion it may be noticed, as the following paragraphs will show, that the Secretary of State has independent means of knowledge regarding ship-building, &c., and that the absence of a notice under sub-section (1) would not necessarily prevent him from being able to take steps under sub-section (2).

7. We have not been able to find any decided case on this question, but the events of 1884 in connexion with the hostilities then in existence between France and China furnish material which may be of some use. There had on this occasion been no declaration of war, no notification by either party to the other Powers that a state of war existed, and no proclamation of neutrality by any of the other Powers. At a certain stage the French Government notified the Powers that they intended to blockade part of the coast of Formosa (then under Chinese rule), but that they did not, for the time being, propose to exercise any of the

[17381]

D*

1937

10

SPAIN

other rights of a belligerent at sea. In the course of subsequent correspondence with the French Government, Her Majesty's Government stated that, although there had been no declaration of war, they were ready to regard the situation as in fact constituting a war, and on this basis to recognise the validity of the blockade as against British shipping. On any other basis than the existence of a war, the blockade would have been a "pacific blockade" and illegal in its application to vessels other than Chinese vessels. Her Majesty's Government added, moreover, that for their own part, in order not to exacerbate the situation, they would not issue any proclamation of neutrality, but "would confine themselves to the strict enforcement of the Foreign Enlistment Act."

8. In pursuance of this policy, the Customs were instructed to notify to the Foreign Office any cases that came to their notice of shipbuilding in this country for either France or China, and in due course a case was notified of some steam cutters being built for the order of the French Government. The Foreign Office, who clearly assumed that (there being what was regarded as a war) section 8 of the Foreign Enlistment Act was applicable, although no proclamation of neutrality had been issued, wrote to the Law Officers of the Crown on the 9th December, 1884 (copy enclosed herewith, Paper B), asking whether, in their opinion, it would be desirable for an official enquiry to be addressed to the French Government as to the purposes for which the cutters were intended, this suggestion being derived from an opinion of the Law Officers of the 30th March, 1881 (copy enclosed, Paper C), to the effect that in cases of suspected illegal shipbuilding Her Majesty's Government should find out from the foreign belligerent Power concerned whether the vessels in question were intended for its military or naval service or not.

9. In their reply of the 11th December, 1884 (copy enclosed, Paper D), the Law Officers, noting that there had been no proclamation of neutrality, but that the Foreign Enlistment Act was to be strictly enforced, stated that, in their view, an enquiry should be addressed to the French Government as suggested. This was done, but the eventual outcome of the matter does not appear from our records.

10. It seems clear from the above that the Law Officers as well as the Foreign Office assumed that section 8 was operative, notwithstanding the absence of a proclamation of neutrality; and it seems reasonable to infer that such was, in fact, their view, although the question was not in terms put to, or answered by, them.

11. In spite of this precedent, if such it can be called, and of the arguments set forth in paragraphs 5 and 6 above, the point remains a doubtful one, though, in view of the fact that a proclamation of neutrality will almost certainly not be issued in the present (Spanish) case, we should be very reluctant to have to conclude that section 8 is inoperative without one.

12. We have no knowledge at present of any undertakings which would contravene section 8, if applicable, although I understand that a firm who specialise in the construction of fast motor boats have recently received enquiries from the Spanish Government which, if they materialise, may make an immediate decision necessary. We therefore feel that we ought to know what the legal position is, and I should be most grateful for your views as soon as you can conveniently let me have them.

Yours, &c.
PLYMOUTH.

List of Papers.

- (A) Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870.
(B) Foreign Office letter to the Law Officers, 9th December, 1884. (See W 6340/7/41/1937.)

Enclosures—

- (i) Treasury letter of 5th December, 1884.
(ii) Correspondence with M. Waddington (see Confidential 5045, Nos. 558, 579, 585, 616, 631, 657, 718 and 739).
(iii) Foreign Office to Treasury, 27th November, 1884.
(iv) Draft letter to M. Waddington (see annex to Paper D).
(C) Law Officers' Report of 30th March, 1881. (See Confidential 4637, No. 46.)
(D) Law Officers' Report of 11th December, 1884. (See Confidential 5121, No. 35.)

SPAIN

11

Report.

Attorney-General to Lord Plymouth.

Dear Ivor,

The application of the Foreign Enlistment Act to any civil war presents certain difficulties both of construction and of proof. Its application to the civil war in Spain presents special difficulties. I agree with the view stated in paragraph 2 of your letter that, as a matter of law, a proclamation of neutrality is not a condition precedent to the application of the Act generally. I, however, take the view that, in applying it to a civil war, some warning by the Government, which would not, of course, necessarily bind the courts, that insurgents are in the Government's opinion a foreign State within the definition clause is clearly called for as a matter of policy and fairness. Such a warning has now been given with particular reference to sections 4 and 5.

There are those who disagree with the opinion I gave in my letter to Lord Cranborne, namely, that, assuming a body of insurgents satisfied the definition clause of a foreign State, they could be said to be "at peace with" His Majesty, although their belligerent rights had not been recognised. I adhere to my opinion, although there is scope for legal argument.

On section 8 there is perhaps even more scope for legal argument, but I think that the reference to a proclamation of neutrality in the proviso does not make such a proclamation a condition precedent to the commission of the offences specified in the earlier parts of the section. It is to be noted that under those sections it is necessary to prove "intent" or "knowledge" or "reasonable cause to believe." The fact that an event has not happened which would make the proviso operative does not, in my view, prevent the section coming into operation.

If there had to be a prosecution under this section, I would not like to state dogmatically that a court might not take a different view. There are also difficulties which might arise as to proof of the necessary facts to bring the insurgents within the definition of a foreign State. The Government are, however, in my view, justified in proceeding on the basis that the section is operative with regard to events in Spain. If a case had to be taken to the courts, I think that some regard should be paid by the courts to the fact that, although there has been no proclamation of neutrality, the Non-Intervention Agreement and the legislation based on it clearly recognise the existence of a state of civil war.

I have had a word with the Lord Advocate on this matter, as Scotland may also be affected, and he agrees generally with the view expressed above.

D. B. SOMERVELL.

Law Officers' Department,
April 14, 1937.

SPAIN

[W 8314/G/1937]

No. 2.

[April 27, 1937]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

(Secret.)
Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, April 15, 1937.

I AM directed by Mr. Secretary Eden to refer to your letter of the 20th October, 1936, on the subject of the proposed reclamation of land from the sea in the vicinity of Gibraltar for the purpose of a military aerodrome.

2. As a result of the opinion which you expressed in that letter regarding the rights of His Majesty's Government over the territory in question, the proposal to reclaim land for the purpose of the aerodrome has now been temporarily abandoned. In view, however, of the urgent importance of providing some form of landing ground for military aircraft at Gibraltar, the Air Ministry have prepared an alternative proposal for the perfection of an emergency landing ground on the area of the existing British Neutral Ground. This proposal involves the construction of an east-west runway on the area shown Proposed perfection of an emergency landing ground for British military aircraft on the British Neutral Ground at Gibraltar.

1937

12

SPAIN

in the sketch which forms the enclosure in this letter. The British Neutral Ground itself has already been prepared in such a way that it can serve for an emergency landing ground for fleet air arm aircraft, but, in order for the landing area to be suitable for use by modern land-based aircraft, a runway of at least 1,100 yards in length is necessary, and it is consequently necessary to include in the strip the entire width of the isthmus. The western fringe of this area at present contains a number of temporary and some permanent obstructions, including a number of army and civil buildings. These obstructions will have to be removed, and it will be necessary to rebuild certain structures for army accommodation in the area marked on the map north of the landing strip and immediately east of the main road to Spain.

3. It may be argued, in connexion with the present scheme, that the mere act of clearing away obstructions from a strip of the British Neutral Ground could not be regarded as a valid subject of complaint by the Spanish Government. In view, moreover, of the fact that aircraft have, as explained in Mr. Roberts's letter† of the 18th September last, landed and taken off from this zone in the past without protest from the Spanish Government, it may also be argued that no complaint could be based on the fact that a landing ground of a more or less permanent nature is now to be established. An objection to the proposed scheme might be raised on account of the proposed rebuilding of certain buildings for accommodation on the northern boundary of the British Neutral Zone. Although it would be possible to provide this accommodation without constructing any permanent buildings on this area, a greatly improved lay-out could be obtained if it were possible to build permanent two-storey buildings. In view, however, of the fact that permanent structures have been built in the zone in the past without serious objection by the Spanish authorities, it would be possible to argue that their construction does not constitute putting the zone to any "new work or fresh use" for which, as suggested in your letter, the Spanish Government might require to give their consent.

4. The advantage of the present scheme over the original scheme for reclaiming land to the west of the area is, of course, that it would be less likely to attract attention, and would not appear to be such a radical alteration in the territorial position at Gibraltar. On the other hand, it may be said that the changes made show an intention to use the zone to a greater extent for the purposes of aircraft landing and taking off than the occasional landings of military aircraft which have hitherto taken place. Mr. Eden would be glad to receive your views on this proposal.

5. There is, however, another aspect of the question which it has been necessary for His Majesty's Government to examine. The Air Ministry are considering the possibility of facilitating the use of the proposed landing strip by aircraft in cross winds by the erection of a windbreak screen. An experimental section of such a screen is now under construction and, subject to satisfactory results being obtained, the Air Ministry would propose to seek authority to erect a complete screen down the centre line of the landing strip. This screen would not be solid, but would be an iron or steel framework covered by slats, approximately 1,100 yards long, 50 feet high and 12 feet broad, but it is clear that this construction would attract a great deal of attention.

6. I am, therefore, to request your opinion whether, in view of all the circumstances, His Majesty's Government could successfully resist before an international court a claim by the Spanish Government that the alternative scheme is in excess of British rights or a violation of Spanish rights in the British Neutral Zone, (a) on the basis that no windbreak screen is erected, (b) on the basis that a windbreak screen is erected. Mr. Eden would also be grateful for any general observations which you may be good enough to offer.

7. It is of great importance that work on the landing ground at Gibraltar should be started at the earliest possible date, and I am accordingly requested to express the hope that you will be so good as to regard this matter as one of urgency.

I am, &c.

D. F. HOWARD

SPAIN

13

Enclosure.⁽¹⁾Plan of proposed Landing Strip (Map Section, Air Ministry, No. 1541).Report.

The present proposal differs from that which we were previously asked to consider in that (1) no land is to be reclaimed; (2) the works now under consideration are described as the perfection of an emergency landing ground, and not as the establishment of an air base.

We summarised in our previous opinion the arguments which would, in our view, be available to each party on the assumption that the then proposed air base were established on existing ground without the addition of reclaimed land. Our summary was as follows:—

"Having considered the documents before us, we think that each side might put its case in two ways.

"The Spanish Government might claim, firstly, that the land, although in British occupation for ordinary administrative purposes, remained neutral, and that, although they had conceded or acquiesced in its use for certain defensive purposes connected with the fortress in the past, they had a right to give or withhold their consent for any new work or fresh use.

"Alternatively, if they must be taken to have conceded its use for any defensive purpose immediately connected with the fortress, the present proposal, they would say, went beyond such a concession.

"The British Government would claim, firstly, that the area had passed under full British sovereignty. They would point to the de facto position and rely particularly on events during and since the war.

"Alternatively, they might put forward a claim that the air base was primarily for the defence of the fortress as a Mediterranean fortress, and could again rely under this head on the past facts as to aeroplanes using the land and the letter already referred to."

We gave reasons for thinking that the reclamation proposal would considerably reinforce the Spanish Government case. It is clear that the limitations now proposed strengthen very much the case of the British Government and weaken that of the Spanish Government should they raise objections. It is not possible to say that the Spanish Government would have no legal basis for an objection. They could claim that this was a "new work or fresh use," and that their consent, express or tacit, was therefore required. On the other hand, the British Government could rely with force on the letter of the 25th August, 1915, to which we referred. They could further say that they were merely adapting the ground for a use already acquiesced in, a use which in modern conditions was necessary for the needs of the fortress.

Prediction in these matters is difficult, but we think that an objection to the present proposal would probably be successfully resisted before an international court.

In our view, the main issue involved would be the question whether the conversion of the site from an emergency landing ground for fleet air arm aircraft into a landing area suitable for use by modern land-based aircraft was "a new work or fresh use." We do not think the windbreak screen involves any new point of principle, but difficulties might well be avoided if the erection of the screen could be, at any rate, postponed. It is obviously desirable that there should not be an international case on the subject.

If this scheme is proceeded with, we do not think any difficulties to be encountered would be appreciably increased by the proposed erection of permanent buildings in place of the temporary and permanent buildings which are to be removed.

D. B. SOMERVELL.

T. J. O'CONNOR.

*Law Officers' Department,
April (?) 27, 1937.*

(1) Not reproduced.

1938

THIS DOCUMENT IS THE PROPERTY OF HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office

CONFIDENTIAL

(15717)

REPORTS BY THE
LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1938

1938

(ii)

LIST OF REPORTS

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked 1^A, &c.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
GENERAL.
1A	Law Officers... [Treasury Solicitor]	May 30, 1938	Imposition of an Embargo in times of strained relations between Great Britain and a foreign Power	1
1B	Law Officers for Scotland [Treasury Solicitor]	July 19, 1938	Ditto	7
1C	Law Officers... [Treasury Solicitor]	June 2, 1938	Treatment of Civil Aircraft, enemy and neutral, in Time of War	8
1D	Law Officers... [Treasury Solicitor]	Dec. 20, 1938	Issue of Documents to enable the High Court in England to exercise jurisdiction in prize	12

(iii)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS)

1938

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.

Cases cited are indicated by italics.

ACT—LAW.

A.

Acts of Parliament—
Naval Prize Act, 1864 (Section 3); interpretation, 14–15.
Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1891 (Section 4); interpretation, 14.
Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (Section 23); interpretation, 13.
Aircraft and Aerial Navigation—Treatment of civil and enemy aircraft on outbreak of war; jurisdiction of Prize Court, 8–12.

B.

Beale v. Thompson, 2–3.
Boedes Lust, 2–3.
Buchan v. Officers of State, 7.

C.

Cargoes—Found in enemy and neutral civil aircraft in British territory on outbreak of war, 8–12.
Compensation—Payment in connexion with laying of an embargo, 4.
Courts of Law—Summoning of the Crown: position in Scots Law, 7–8.
High Court of Justice; establishment as a Prize Court, 12–15.

E.

Embargoes—Imposition at time when war is in contemplation: position under British and International Law: kinds of embargo, 1–8.

G.

Grieve v. Edinburgh Corporation, 7.

L.

Law—Prerogative of laying an embargo on shipping: position under Laws of England and Scotland, 6–8.

M.

Manners and Miller v. King's Printer, 7.
Marie Leonhardt, 2.
Monypenny v. The Admiralty, 7.

PRE—ZAM.

P.

Prerogative—see "Law," "War."
Prize and Prize Courts—
Amendment of Prize Act to enable aircraft and cargo captured in aircraft to be dealt with by Prize Courts, 8–12.
Authority for Court of Admiralty, or its successor, the High Court of Justice, to exercise jurisdiction in prize: documents to be issued at outbreak of war, 12–15.
Treatment as prize of ships and cargo detained under embargo before outbreak of war, 4–5.

R.

Reprisal—Embargo, 1, 4.
Rotch v. Edie, 2–3.
Roumanian, 14.

S.

Sands v. Child, 2–3.
Scotland—Public Law and the prerogative, 7–8.
Somerville v. Lord Advocate, 7.
Südmark, 14.

T.

Touteng v. Hubbard, 2.

V.

Vessels—Imposition of an embargo in anticipation of war, 1–8.

W.

War—Royal Prerogative in matter of conduct of war: comparison between Laws of England and Scotland, 7–8.
West Rand Central Gold Mining Company v. Rex, 5.

Z.

Zamora, 13.

1938

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office

CONFIDENTIALREPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.: 1938

GENERAL

[W 7040/G/1938]

No. 1A.

[Treasury Solicitor]

[May 30, 1938]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers.

Accompanying this Case is a Memorandum by the Solicitor to the Board of Trade (Annex A).

THE Committee of Imperial Defence having been advised that from the aspect of international law there is no objection to the adoption in future of the old practice of laying before the outbreak of war a general embargo on the merchant shipping of a prospective enemy, desire the advice of the Law Officers on the question whether authority exists under municipal law for such action.

The old practice well appears from the instances of such an embargo given on pp. 20 and 21 of Rothery's Report on Prize Droits. The most interesting of these is in some ways the first, namely, the embargo on Russian, Danish and Swedish property imposed in January 1801, as a consequence of the second armed neutrality. As Rothery says, no "war" with these countries followed, but it may be noted that the break up of the hostile alliance was largely facilitated by the attack of the British Fleet (with Nelson Second-in-Command) on Copenhagen and the destruction of the Danish Fleet on the 2nd April, 1801.

Earlier instances of embargoes are to be found, e.g., the order for general reprisals against Spain the 10th July, 1739, followed by declaration of war, the 19th October (Law and Custom of the Sea, vol. II, p. 296).

The Common Law, in its early days at least, would seem to have found no difficulty in recognising the validity of these embargoes, made as a necessary measure to ensure the security of the State in view of the evident hostility of a foreign Power. What it did not recognise as valid on the authority of the Sovereign alone without the sanction of an Act of Parliament, was an embargo made in the interests of this country alone, and unrelated to the question of peace or war, such as that of 1767 referred to in the Memorandum of the Solicitor to the Board of Trade laying in a time of internal scarcity an embargo on ships and vessels engaged in the export of grain to foreign parts. Such an embargo infringes the Common Law right of merchants to trade freely in times of peace, and may—as in the instance of 1767—contravene express statutory rights to export, or the general rights conferred on foreign merchants for freedom of trade by Magna Charta and the various Statutes of Staple. The proceedings of 1767 were, however, regularised by the Indemnity Act of 7, Geo. III, chap. 7.

A hostile embargo directed against a foreign Power, that is to say, an embargo which, though not necessarily an act of war on the part of this country, may be so treated by the foreign State, has been imposed as already shown many times by this country and has been considered as lawful. This legality was recognised in the famous speech of Lord Erskine on the 8th March, 1808, attacking the Orders in Council made by way of retaliation to Napoleon's Moscow Imposition of an Embargo in times of strained relations between Great Britain and a foreign Power.

[19701]

c*2

decrees (see Parliamentary Debates, vol. 10, column 961). Erskine referred to the treatise of Lord Hale, De Portibus Maris, which (see Hargrave's Law Tracts, vol. 1, p. 91) states that at common law in a time of public danger and pro hac vice there might be a general inhibition by proclamation restraining any from going beyond the sea without licence, and (p. 96) that prohibitions by proclamations in the time of hostilities or public danger or common scarcity might have a temporary effect and use. But Hale's statement is certainly too wide nowadays in so far as it refers to common scarcity as a justification for an embargo. In the case of Sands v. Child (4 Modern Reports, 176; 1 Carthew's Report, 294; 3 Levinz, 351; 1 Skinner, 334), it would seem to have been agreed in argument that the King by his prerogative may stop the ship of any subject and shut up the ports of England at his pleasure, especially where the safety of the nation is concerned, namely, in time of imminent danger (see 4 Modern Reports at pp. 177 and 179). Carthew, p. 297, says: "It was agreed that the King may grant embargoes on ships in time of war or may employ the ships of the subjects in time of danger for the service and defence of the nation."

Having regard to the number of instances in which an embargo in anticipation of war has been imposed by this country, it might reasonably be expected that if there were any doubt as to its legality that doubt would have made its appearance in the Law Courts. The search which has been made has, however, failed to find any reported doubt. On the other hand, the reports of cases in which the existence of an embargo was a material fact, without any such doubt being expressed, suggest that the force and validity of the embargo was beyond question—see, for instance, the judgment of Lord Kenyon, C.J., in Rotch v. Edie (6 Term Reports), p. 422, where he said: "In determining this case, however, I desire not to say any one word, though perhaps there will not be much difficulty in it when it comes to be considered, relative to the effect of an embargo laid on by this country on a ship insured in a port here." Compare, also the reports of Beale v. Thompson (4 East's Reports, 546; 3 Bos and P's Reports, 405) and Touteng v. Hubbard (3 Bos and P's Reports, 291). If an embargo was unusual or illegal, the point would surely have been raised in some connexion in such cases.

That the Prize Court recognises the validity of embargoes imposed by this country is sufficiently clear from the leading case of the Boedes Lust, where Sir William Scott said (5 C. Rob. at p. 245): "This property was seized provisionally . . . If [the conduct of the Government of Holland] had been such as to re-establish the relations of peace, then the seizure . . . would have proved in the event a mere embargo, or temporary sequestration. The property would have been restored, as is usual at the conclusion of embargoes; a process often resorted to in the practice of nations, for various causes not immediately connected with any expectations of hostility. During the period which this embargo lasted, it is said, that the courts might have restored, but I cannot assent to that observation; because on due notice of embargoes this court is bound to enforce them. It would be a high misprision in this court, to break them, by redelivery of possession to the foreign owner of that property, which the Crown has directed to be seized and detained for further orders. The court, acting in pursuance of the general orders of the State, and bound by those general orders, would be guilty of no denial of justice in refusing to decree restitution in such a case, for it has not the power to restore. Its functions are suspended by a binding authority, and if any injustice is done that is an account to be settled between the States."

The latest instances of embargoes levied on foreign ships in time of peace by this country appear to be those of the reprisals taken against the kingdom of the Two Sicilies in 1840 and against Greece in 1850 (Phillimore's International Law, vol. 3, at p. 27 et seq., and p. 36 et seq.).

Although the tendency in practice of the last century was, so far from imposing embargoes before the outbreak of hostilities, rather to grant days of grace after the outbreak of war within which enemy shipping in our ports might leave, yet there seems no ground for holding that this generous practice has in effect changed the law. (Cf. the judgment of Sir Henry Duke in the case of the Marie Leonhardt, 1921, P., at p. 10.)

On the position at common law, general reference may perhaps also be made to the following authorities: Blackstone's Commentaries, vol. 1, pp. 270, 271; Beaumes' Lex Mercatoria, 6th Edition, 1813, by Joseph Chitty, vol. 1, pp. 392, 393;

Jacobs' Law Dictionary, 3rd Edition, 1820, by Sir T. E. Tomlins, vol. 1, Title "Imbargo"; Chitty on the Prerogative, pp. 164, 165; the Encyclopædia of the Laws of England, vol. 4, p. 477, article by T. Barclay (who states that embargoes in anticipation of war have, in our own times, fallen into disuse); and Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. 6, pp. 530 and 548, article by Sir W. Holdsworth and F. H. Lawson. (The article says "in time of war," but it is suggested that this must mean in time of apprehended war, for in war embargo merges in the general right of seizure in prize.) Reference may also be made generally to the article by Sir W. Holdsworth on the power of the Crown to requisition British ships in a national emergency, in 35 L.Q.R. at p. 12.

With regard to the question whether compensation is payable in respect of vessels detained under an embargo, it is submitted the imposition of an embargo is the act of the sovereign Power in the exercise of its right to defend the realm and as such, is a lawful act and does not give rise to any legal right to compensation on the part of those whose interests may be adversely affected. No reported case can be found in which any question of a right to compensation from the Crown or its officers by reason of an embargo has been discussed; such reports as exist suggest that, generally speaking, no such compensation was ever received, since if compensation were paid there would have been no need for disputes on the question whether owners, charterers or underwriters were to bear the actual losses, and such disputes seem to have been the main subject matter of the reported cases. If compensation were paid, it would have been paid as an act of grace, and it seems from the report of Beale v. Thompson (see 3 Bos and P's Reports at pp. 409, 410), that in the case of the Russian embargo of 1801 the Emperor of Russia did declare his intention of compensating all British subjects who had suffered thereunder. Whether or not this intention was fulfilled is left in doubt by the report, and, in any event, no similar intention would seem to have been expressed by the British Government (see the Collection of Documents relating to the History of the Armed Neutralities of 1780 and 1800, edited by Piggott and Omond).

The Law Officers will observe that this case is concerned only with the validity of an embargo and of claims for compensation therefor in municipal law. If it is the position that municipal law does not afford the right to compensation it may well be that the impossibility of obtaining redress in the courts would lead to the presentation through diplomatic channels of claims for compensation, which it might be difficult to resist.

As against the validity of such an embargo as is in question the following contentions may be urged:—

(1) The absence of authority on the point may to a large extent be accounted for by the fact that in most cases hostilities broke out within a short period of the imposition of the embargo, of which complaint might have been expected to be made (see Rothery's Prize Droits, p. 21). The effect of the subsequent outbreak of war is, it seems, that property detained under an embargo falls to be treated as prize (see Boedes Lust, ubi supra, at p. 245):—

"Now, with respect to the first of these pleas (i.e., that the property was taken in a state of peace), it must be admitted that alone would not protect them, because the court has, without any exception, condemned all other property of Dutchmen taken before the war—and upon what ground?—That the declaration had a retroactive effect applying to all property previously detained, and rendered it liable to be considered as the property of enemies taken in time of war"; and at p. 246:—

"This was the state of the first seizure. It was at first equivocal, and if the matter in dispute had terminated in reconciliation, the seizure would have been converted into a mere civil embargo so terminated. That would have been the retroactive effect of that course of circumstances. On the contrary, if the transactions end in hostility, the retroactive effect is directly the other way. It impresses the direct hostile character upon the original seizure. It is declared to be no embargo. It is no longer an equivocal act subject to two interpretations; there is a declaration of the animus by which it was done that it was done hostili animo, and is to be considered as an hostile measure ab initio."

[19701]

D*

Moreover, matters of prize are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the prize court, and in cases in which was followed, therefore, the complaints which might have been expected to be made of the invalidity of the embargo could not be entertained by the municipal courts of this country (see Lecaux v. Eden, 2 Douglas 594 at pp. 609 and 611, and Lindo v. Rodney, 2 Douglas 613 (n)).

(2) If, as is submitted, the Boedes Lust is good authority for the proposition that ships and cargo detained under an embargo fall to be dealt with as prize if war subsequently breaks out, this case has only any practical application if war does not break out before the determination of proceedings brought to challenge the validity of the embargo. But such proceedings could only be brought before the municipal courts of this country, and it is difficult to understand how their jurisdiction could be ousted when peace is yet unbroken. Accordingly it is submitted that the dicta in the Boedes Lust, that during the period the embargo lasted the court could not restore, "because on due notice of embargoes this court is bound to enforce them. It would be a high misprision in this court to break them by redelivery of possession to the foreign owner of the property" are ill-founded, for, ex hypothesi, no jurisdiction in prize could yet have vested in the court.

(3) The passage cited from the judgment in Rotch v. Edie (6 Term Reports, 413) is concerned only with the liability of an insurer upon a policy covering the risk of arrests of princes, peoples, &c. It may be admitted that an embargo would be such a risk; but there was no expression of view in Rotch v. Edie as to the legality of such an arrest, nor was there any occasion for it. The only real authority in favour of the validity of an embargo is the case of Sands v. Child, the various reports of which report only the arguments, and do not clearly disclose the views of the judges, and a decision on the point here in question was not in any event material to the issue in that case.

(4) A long period of desuetude has led to the lapse of any right which the Crown may at one time have purported to exercise in this regard, and the alleged right of embargo is contrary to the modern doctrine in regard to acts of state.

Although it is not intended in this case to raise any question of international law, it must be said that there seems no reason whatever to doubt the advice given to the Committee of Imperial Defence, that by that law the procedure by way of embargo is valid (Hall's International Law, 8th edition, pp. 435-443; Moore's International Law Digest, vol. 7, pp. 120 and 453; and all other standard works on international law).

The Law Officers are accordingly asked to advise:—

- (1) Whether in English law the laying of an embargo is justifiable in time of strained relations with a foreign Power, but before hostilities have broken out, upon the shipping of that Power in British waters.
- (2) If the answer to (1) is in the affirmative, whether compensation is payable in respect of such embargo (a) if hostilities follow the embargo, and (b) if hostilities do not follow.
- (3) Generally.

Opinion.

The laying of an embargo upon the ships of a foreign Power could be justified in English law as an act of mitigated hostility if imposed at a time when war with that Power was in contemplation.

2. So far as English law is concerned, the laying of such an embargo would give no right to compensation, whether hostilities followed or not.

3. We add some general observations on the form of our answer to 1, and also on the position under international law.

Embargo may be of two kinds, civil and belligerent. The latter class may further be sub-divided into (a) embargo by way of reprisal, and (b) embargo in anticipation of war. Most of the references and instances which appear in the case relate either to civil embargoes or embargoes by way of reprisal. We have looked into most of these cases and they none of them, in our view, afford a clear example of the form of embargo dealt with in the case.

But our attention has also been called to the embargo laid on Dutch shipping in 1832 with the object of forcing the Dutch Government to carry out the treaty of the 15th November, 1831, and evacuate the territories assigned by that treaty to Belgium. This embargo was attacked by Sir Robert Peel and others on the ground that no state of war or of hostility existed between England and Holland. In the debate which followed (Hansard, vol. 15, p. 382 and pp. 770-830), it was conceded by the critics of the Government that the embargo would have been justified if imposed "in the bona fide contemplation of hostilities with the Power against which it was directed" (col. 778), and was defended by Dr. Lushington, the Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General of the day, on the ground that there was, in fact, a "probability or fair expectancy of war." Dr. Lushington admitted that embargo would be indefensible "without the probability of hostilities" (col. 792).

In our opinion, the discussion of the embargo of 1832 confirms the view that, in certain circumstances, an embargo laid in anticipation of war would be a legitimate exercise of the prerogative right, and that the maxim nullum tempus occurrit regi applies to protect it from loss by desuetude. It is justified in principle on the ground that, as the Crown has power to declare war, it has power, if such declaration is in contemplation, to impose a measure of coercion short of war in the hope that this will induce the Power against which it is directed to accede to the Crown's demands without a resort to war.

There remains to be considered the more difficult question of whether such an embargo could be justified in international law. Although we are invited to assume that this is the case, we feel that it must be closely examined, because (a) it would be clearly undesirable to do an act which could be impugned as a breach of international law; (b) consideration of international law would arise if subsequent condemnation of embargoed ships as prize were sought. It might be said that the embargo amounted to force majeure, and an argument could be advanced on somewhat similar lines to that used in The Turul (B. & C.P.C., vol. 3, p. 356); (c) claims for compensation to be settled by some international arbitration tribunal might result from the embargo.

We feel great doubt whether an anticipatory embargo not by way of reprisal would be to-day recognised by international law.

"There is an essential difference as to certainty and definiteness between municipal law and a system or body of rules in regard to international conduct, which, so far as it exists at all (and its existence is assumed by the phrase 'international law'), rests upon a consensus of civilised States, not expressed in any code or pact, nor possessing in case of dispute any authorised or authoritative interpreter, and incapable, indeed, of proof in the absence of any express international agreement, only by evidence of usage to be obtained from the action of nations in similar cases in the course of their history." (Lord Alverstone in West Rand Central Gold Mining Company v. Rex (1905, 2 K.B. 401).) Many of the text-books treat the anticipatory embargo as obsolete (e.g., Hall, p. 442; Moore, p. 453). Although Great Britain has since the war renounced The Hague Convention, it is not illegitimate to observe that it represented for many years a "consensus of civilised States" as to the desirability of permitting merchant ships belonging to belligerent Powers to depart from enemy ports freely or after days of grace after the commencement of hostilities (article 1). Although the argument is not conclusive, we think articles 1 and 2 of the convention are framed on the basis that anticipatory embargoes are no longer recognised. It is noteworthy that Dr. Pearce Higgins, in an exhaustive examination of the status of enemy ships in port at the outbreak of war (British Year Book of International Law, 1922-23, vol. III), does not refer to any case of embargo imposed before the outbreak of the Great War. The Brazilian seizure of German ships lying in her ports in October 1917 before Brazil declared war on Germany is not completely in point, since these ships were sheltering in Brazilian harbours to escape capture, and were not either prior to or at the time of the seizure detained by an embargo.

The general acceptance since, at any rate, the Crimean war of the principle of days of grace seems to us to place difficulties in the way of saying that an anticipatory embargo would not be considered to be a wrongful act by international law.

For these reasons, we think that the assumption which we are invited to make that "from the aspect of international law there is no objection to the adoption in future of the old practice of laying before the outbreak of war a general embargo on the merchant shipping of a prospective enemy" requires reconsideration.

We would only add that, both internationally and municipally, the terms of any treaty existing with the prospective foreign enemy would be material.

D. B. SOMERVELL.
T. J. O'CONNOR.

Law Officers' Department,
May 30, 1938.

Annex A.

MEMORANDUM BY THE SOLICITOR TO THE BOARD OF TRADE.

(Secret.)

Prerogative of Laying Embargo on Shipping.

His prerogative of War enables The King either by proclamation or by Order in Council to enforce the execution of such laws as are already in being in such manner as he shall judge necessary, and this he may do not only whilst the state of war actually exists but also during a precautionary prelude to war.

Magna Charta, c. xxx, which confers upon foreign merchants and their merchandise the like freedom of trade as was then enjoyed by the English (unless prohibited in peace-time by Act of Parliament)—5 Bac. Ab (7th Edn.) 381, 382 and footnotes (b) and (c)—only applies to the persons and goods of the merchants. It ordains certain restrictions upon them on the outbreak of war.

"It seems agreed, from the fundamental principles of our Government, that The King cannot regularly prohibit trade, . . . but that every man may use the sea, and trade with other nations, as freely as he may use the air."

* * * * *

"But, notwithstanding this freedom of trade, yet it seems agreed, that The King may in time of war, and for the public service and safety, lay an embargo on ships, and employ the ships of his subjects on the public service; but this, say my Lord Chief Justice Holt, ought to be upon great emergencies, and for the public benefit, and not for the private interest of any person or society" (5 Bac. Ab (7th Edn.), 381, 382).

"His Majesty may during war, or threatened hostilities, and on occasions of emergency, lay an embargo on all shipping; and thereby prevent anyone from leaving the kingdom." (Chitty on the Prerogative (1820), p. 48.)

"The King may lay on a general embargo, and may do various acts growing out of sudden emergencies; but in all these cases the emergency is the avowed cause, and the act done is as temporary as the occasion. The King cannot change, by his prerogative of war, either the law of nations, or the law of the land, by general and unlimited regulations." Ibid. p. 50 (quoted from Lord Erskine, 10 Gobbert's Parliamentary Debates, 961).

In 1767 an Order in Council was made laying an embargo on all ships and vessels laden with wheat or wheat flour to be exported to foreign parts, which order was put into execution. It was then found that the order was contrary to law, and particularly to the 22 Car. II, c. 13 (since repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1863), whereupon an Indemnity Act, 7 Geo. III, c. 7 was passed, of which the following is the preamble:—

"Whereas His Majesty, by an Order in Council bearing date the twenty-sixth day of September last, was pleased to order, that an embargo should be laid upon all ships and vessels laden, or to be laden, in the ports of Great Britain, with wheat or wheat flour to be exported to foreign parts, from the date thereof, until the fourteenth day of November following: which order could not be justified by law, but was so much for the service of the public, and so necessary for the safety and preservation of His Majesty's subjects, that it ought to be justified by Act of Parliament; and all persons advising or acting under, or in obedience to the same, indemnified."

It was no doubt in consequence of this mistake that, when by the 33 Geo. III, c. 67, s. 1, it was made a misdemeanour for any person to hinder, or obstruct, the loading, or unloading, or the sailing, or navigating, or any ship, keel or other vessel, a saving of the prerogative was included. Section 4 is as follows:—

"Provided always . . . that none of the pains, penalties, or punishments hereinbefore inflicted or authorized to be inflicted, shall be deemed, construed, or taken, to extend to any act, deed, matter, or thing whatsoever, committed, done or suffered, in the service or under or by virtue of, the authority of His said Majesty or his successors, anything herein contained to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding."

[W 9839/G/1938]

No. 1B.

[Treasury Solicitor]

[July 19, 1938]

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown for Scotland.*

(Secret.)

IN our opinion there is now no difference between the Law of England and the Law of Scotland as to the nature, extent and incidents of the Royal Prerogative in relation to such matters as the conduct of war and warlike operations.

The development of modern Scots Law took place after the Union of the Crowns. With the exception of Sir George Mackenzie, who on this matter would not be treated as authoritative, none of the Scottish institutional writers or other early authorities treats of the Prerogative powers of the Crown as part of the public law of the land; and their refusal to embark on the topic has been judicially noticed (His Majesty's Advocate v. Lord Dunglass, 15 Sh. 314, per Lord Medwyn at p. 324). In the first Parliament of Charles II, the Scottish Parliament by the Act of 1661, cap. 13, expressly reasserted and confirmed the Royal Prerogative of the "power of armes and makeing of peace and war"; and the XVIIIth Article of the Treaty of Union inferentially affirmed the actual or prospective assimilation of the laws of the two countries in regard to "public right, policy and civil government," preserving only the difference (which still persists) in private law. In the few cases which have since arisen in which questions of the Prerogative have been raised, free use has been made in the Scottish Courts of English authorities and precedents; see, e.g., Manners and Miller v. King's Printer; and Buchan v. Officers of State, 1828 3 W. and Sh. 268; Somerville v. Lord Advocate, 1893 20 R. 1050; Grieve v. Edinburgh Corporation, 1918 S.C. 700; and Monypenny v. The Admiralty, 1922 S.C. 706.

Accordingly, while such cases as Manners and Miller v. King's Printer (cit. supra) indicate that the limits of the Prerogative are not necessarily identical on both sides of the Border, it is clear that such differences as may still exist are few and unimportant, and we see no cause to doubt that, as regards the class of prerogative power in question in this instance, there is no difference in the law, and that the Scottish Courts would determine the matter by reference to the same precedents and doctrines as would be invoked by the Courts of England.

We are accordingly in general agreement with the views expressed by our English colleagues.

There is, however, one practical difficulty to which we think it right to advert. By Scots Law the Crown can be directly convened as a defender in the Court of Session without resort to a Petition of Right. If the Prerogative were exercised in the circumstances figured, to the prejudice of, say, a British charterer of an arrested ship or a British owner of the cargo on such a ship—the aggrieved party could bring a direct action in Scotland challenging the validity of the Order in Council imposing the embargo. In such an action the Court would not only insist on being satisfied as to the theoretical existence of the prerogative power, but might also insist on being satisfied of the "state of emergency" and the "bona fide contemplation of hostilities" which justified the invocation of the Prerogative. In our view there is a risk that, on the latter point, the Court would not rest content with a bare certificate by the appropriate department of government; and, if independent proof were required, the furnishing of the necessary evidence might well be a source of embarrassment in the case of an anticipatory embargo not followed by a state of war. We recognise that the contingencies which we have envisaged are remote, and that it is very difficult to forecast the precise conditions under which the problem might present itself; but we feel bound to indicate the possibility of risk and difficulty which might arise.

* For the case submitted, see No. 1A.

Imposition of an embargo in times of strained relations between Great Britain and a foreign Power.

T. M. COOPER.
J. S. C. REID.

*Lord Advocate's Chambers,
London, July 19, 1938.*

[W 7258/G/1938]

No. 1c.

[Treasury Solicitor]

[June 2, 1938]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

Treatment of Civil Aircraft, enemy and neutral, in Time of War.

A SUB-COMMITTEE of the Committee of Imperial Defence was recently set up to report upon the political and legal aspects of the questions raised in the Air Ministry paper on the treatment of civil aircraft, enemy and neutral, in war (C.I.D. Paper No. 1231-B) with a view to the submission of the question to the Law Officers of the Crown. That paper, a copy of which is sent herewith (Paper A) advocated broadly that civil aircraft should be assimilated to merchant vessels in regard to liability to capture and that civil aircraft so captured should be subjected to Prize procedure. The Admiralty, however, found itself unable to adopt in their entirety the suggestions made in the Air Ministry paper having regard to the fact that no policy had yet been agreed upon which would enable any effective control to be exercised over air traffic passing over these Islands or over the high seas, and accordingly the Committee confined itself to the following questions which relate solely to civil aircraft found in British territory at the outbreak of war:—

1. The treatment of enemy civil aircraft in British territory on the outbreak of war.
2. The treatment of any cargo found in neutral or enemy civil aircraft in British territory on the outbreak of war.
3. The question of the amendment of the Prize Act to enable aircraft and cargo captured in aircraft to be dealt with by the Prize Courts.

As will be seen from the copy of its report (Paper B), the Sub-Committee suggested certain rules dealing with these questions which the Committee of Imperial Defence have adopted subject to the Law Officers' opinion being obtained upon the question whether they are justifiable in international law (see Paper C), and the Law Officers are requested to advise accordingly.

It will be observed that the recommendations of the Sub-Committee involve the application of the law of prize to subject matter to which it has never hitherto been applied. In the past the subject matter of prize jurisdiction has always been more or less closely connected with the sea. From the judgment in Lindo v. Rodney (2 Douglas 613 (n)) it appears that the jurisdiction of the Prize Court has from the earliest times been "to proceed upon all and all manner of captures, seizures, prizes and reprisals of all ships and goods that are or shall be taken; and to hear and determine according to the course of the Admiralty and the law of nations." In the Black Book of the Admiralty, vol. I, p. 29, the course of the Admiralty is described as follows:—

"Item.—If any of our ships or vessels do meet upon the sea or in port any other vessels which do make any resistance or defence against those of our ships or vessels then it is lawful for our men to assail the others as enemies and by force to seize and bring them before the admiral entirely as they have taken them without pillaging or in damaging them and there to receive what the law and custom of the sea wills and requires."

It must be admitted at the outset that no precedent can be found for the proposition that aircraft are subject in international law to those rights and liabilities which, when applied to ships and their cargoes, may be conveniently described as "the law of prize." That there are no rules of international law relating to the rights and duties of belligerents with regard to enemy and neutral commercial air traffic is, of course, due to the fact that air navigation was, even at the end of the Great War, in its infancy. It is submitted, however, that it may be contended with much force that the nature of international law in its relation to shipping is due only incidentally to the fact that shipping travels upon the surface of the sea and that the real basis of its application is that shipping is a means of transport which differs from transport over land in the essential feature that while the former is at every stage of its journey subject to the municipal jurisdiction of the country through which it is passing the latter is, while on the high seas, subject to no local jurisdiction at all. Each ship is, of course, in certain respects subject to the jurisdiction of the country in which it is registered, but the law which governs the relations upon the high seas of one ship with another of different nationality is not and cannot be municipal. To regulate, therefore, relationships which would otherwise be subject to no regulation at all that body of customs and conventions has grown up which is now called international law. That that body has hitherto related only to shipping is no doubt due to the fact that shipping has in the past been the exclusive possessor of the attribute mentioned above, namely, of passing through a "no man's land" of municipal law. But with the development of aircraft has appeared a second mode of transport which shares with shipping the attribute referred to. Unless, therefore, aircraft flying above the high seas are to be subject to no regulation at all, which would be the negation of international law, it is clear that some body or other of customs or conventions will, sooner or later, grow up to control them. The establishment of such a body depends either on previous international agreement (which is non-existent so far as is material to this case) or on practice accepted by consent ex post facto. Whether a practice is accepted depends on its reasonableness.

It can hardly be supposed that enemy aircraft, found within the jurisdiction either at the outbreak of war or subsequently, are immune from capture (see in re Ferdinand ex-Tsar of Bulgaria [1921] 1 Ch. 107). If, therefore, the treatment of enemy civil aircraft were assimilated to that of enemy private property on land, such aircraft, although liable to forfeiture, would probably merely be sequestered with their cargoes, if enemy, until the end of the war. If enemy aircraft and cargoes were alone involved, it is unlikely that any advantage would arise from treating them as subject to the law of prize. But by reason of the international character of air transport it is inevitable that questions must arise with regard to neutral cargoes carried in enemy aircraft and enemy cargoes carried in neutral aircraft. The Air Convention of 1919, however, recognises the principle that each country has full jurisdiction in the air above its own territory, including its territorial waters. Accordingly, the rights of a belligerent against a neutral aircraft, within the jurisdiction of the belligerent could be regulated by municipal law, but having regard to the fact that questions must inevitably arise with regard to neutral aircraft and their cargoes (whether enemy or neutral) over or on the high seas, which can only be dealt with in accordance with international law, it is submitted that it is reasonable to apply the maritime rule in all cases. From the point of view of the belligerent, whose interests as well as those of the neutral are entitled to consideration, the practice is clearly convenient. Moreover, it is not without its advantages to the neutral. It has the two-fold merit of being comparatively well-established and of providing a procedure for the judicial determination of disputes. If the maritime rule is not adopted it does not follow that neutrals will be allowed by belligerents to carry on trade with the enemy unhampered by any restrictions. The rights of neutrals must in the case of conflict give way to the supreme urgency of military necessity (see the Stigstad, 1919, A.C. 279 at p. 288):—

"They (contraband, blockade and unneutral service), may also be treated, as in fact they are, as illustrations of the broad rule that belligerency and neutrality are states so related to one another that the latter must accept some abatement of the full benefits of peace in order that the former may not be thwarted in war in the assertion and defence of what is the most precious of all the rights of nations, the right to security and independence. The categories of such cases are not closed."

If, therefore, the body of rules, which has already been built up in connexion with maritime transport, is not adapted in one piece to air transport, it must be supposed that another body of rules will, sooner or later, arise, and in so far as they have to deal with the same problems they may be expected to take the same form as those relating to maritime matters. It is submitted that it is in every respect more reasonable to adopt prize procedure at the outset than, refusing to take advantage of the benefits which that procedure provides, laboriously and with much friction to work out an independent body of regulations.

For these reasons it is submitted that the reasonable course, and, therefore, the course justifiable in international law, is to assimilate the treatment of aircraft, enemy and neutral, found within the jurisdiction or upon or over the high seas to that of shipping. This conclusion appears to be supported by the Code of Air Warfare Rules drafted by a Commission of Jurists appointed by the Governments of the British Empire, the United States of America, France, Italy, Japan and the Netherlands, at The Hague in 1923, to which the Law Officers are referred (Paper D). Those rules were never ratified by the participating States, but it is submitted that they are worthy of attention as expressing the views of enlightened opinion. The Law Officers are particularly referred to article 52 of those rules which subjects enemy civil aircraft to capture in all circumstances; to article 53 which subjects neutral civil aircraft to capture in circumstances similar to those in which neutral shipping may be captured, and article 55 which provides that the capture of an aircraft or goods on board an aircraft shall be made the subject of prize proceedings in order that any neutral claim may be duly heard and determined. Support for the conclusion is also to be found in the following authors:—

Hall's International Law, 8th Edition, p. 633, Wheaton's International Law, 6th Edition, volume II, p. 910, and Spaight, Air Power and War Rights, chapters 17 and 18.

This case has proceeded on the basis that it is reasonable and therefore justifiable to apply to enemy and neutral aircraft, within the limits specified, the whole body of the law of prize. The Law Officers will observe that the rules at present proposed have not so wide a purpose, and it may well be, therefore, that some of the objections which might be urged by neutrals would not be made while they are so limited. But the present limitation of the scope of the rules is due partly to reasons of policy and partly to the fact that it is not at present practicable to apply the rules as to capture or to visit and search to an aircraft whilst in flight. If policy changes and if it becomes practicable to devise rules as to capture and to visit and search of aircraft, it may be desirable to apply the law of prize in its entirety. It is submitted that such a course would be justifiable. If the law of prize is applicable at all it is applicable in toto.

If the Law Officers are of opinion that enemy and neutral aircraft may properly be subject to the law of prize, it remains to consider whether the Naval Prize Acts should be amended so as to confer on the Prize Court jurisdiction with regard to aircraft. It is, of course, clear that British Prize Courts are bound by Acts of the Legislature, and, if the Naval Prize Acts were amended in the sense mentioned, it seems clear that the Prize Court would, upon an application to it in that behalf, be obliged to deal with aircraft in accordance with the jurisdiction thereby vested in it. But if the application of prize law to aircraft is not justified in international law, the Prize Court, in dealing with aircraft, would no longer be administering international law (see the Zamora, 1916, 2 A.C. 77 at p. 93).

The Law Officers are accordingly asked to advise—

- (1) Whether the treatment of civil aircraft in accordance with the proposed rules set out in the sub-committee's report is consistent with international law;
- (2) Whether jurisdiction to deal with aircraft may, consistently with international law, be conferred on the Prize Court;

- (3) Whether the terms of the legislation conferring the jurisdiction may subject aircraft to the whole law of prize, or whether the jurisdiction should be limited to dealing with aircraft in accordance with the proposed rules; and
- (4) Generally upon the case.

List of Papers.

Paper A.—Air Ministry memorandum of March 31, 1936—C.I.D. Paper No. 1231-B (T 7669/G/1936).

Paper B.—Report of Sub-Committee of the C.I.D., dated February 11, 1938—C.I.D. Paper No. 1401-B (W 2549/G/1938).

Paper C.—Extract from Minutes of the 312th Meeting of the C.I.D., held on March 4, 1938 (W 3892/G/1938).

Paper D.—Report of Commission of Jurists upon the Revision of the Rules of Warfare, February 1923—Parliamentary Paper, Miscellaneous No. 14 (1924)—Cmd. 2201.

Opinion.

1. As there are admittedly no accepted principles of international law dealing with aircraft in war, this question does not admit of a positive answer. We are, however, of opinion that the application to aircraft of principles similar to those applied to shipping would be consistent with international law, though it is impossible to forecast in detail how a tribunal enforcing international law, unbound by any code with legislative force, would apply these principles in detail. Subject to what is said below under (3) and (4) applying the above test, we answer Yes to this question.

2. Yes. This view is reinforced by section 55 of the report of the Committee of Jurists of 1923.

3. We are not clear what legal issue is intended to be raised by this question. In deciding the form and scope of the legislation, the following points require to be considered:—

(1) The jurisdiction could be conferred on the Prize Court to deal with aircraft on principles of the Law of Nations. The Crown would proceed to act on the rules now before us or others, and would then seek to justify its action or ask for condemnation on the basis that what had been done was in accordance with international law. We are not sure whether this is what is contemplated or whether it is intended to bind the court by a code embodying the principles contained in the rules. If the latter course were followed, the Government could be certain that action under the rules would be upheld, but it would be adopting a wholly different basis from that on which the present law of prize is founded, and it might be desirable to make this clear in the legislation. The code would no doubt purport to embody principles of international law, and there might be some general provision enabling the court to apply international law in cases not expressly covered.

On either of these two bases it would presumably be possible to frame a Bill which limited the jurisdiction to the area covered by the rules. We think there are objections to such a limitation, but it would be easier to determine the answer to this question whether regarded as one of law or policy when the form of the new legislation has been considered.

(2) Is it intended to preserve the distinction between droits of the Crown and droits of the Lord High Admiral, or set up some special Aircraft Prize Fund or pay the whole proceeds of condemned prize into the Exchequer as droits of the Lord High Admiral?

4. We offer the following observations upon the proposed rules themselves. We note that the general description "enemy civil aircraft" does not follow the distinction adopted in the convention between public non-military aircraft and private aircraft (article 2). We presume that it was found impossible to carry out the projected distinction and that it is intended to include within the description "civil aircraft" such machines as are described in article 4 as "public non-military aircraft" employed for customs or police purposes. The importance of this arises in regard to the projected rule I (ii) since presumably, at any rate, some of the customs and police aircraft would normally carry guns, and would therefore ipso facto fall to be condemned if, for example, they were blown out of their course and forced to land in England.

We note also that by rule I (iii) the according of days of grace is to be made expressly dependent upon a previous offer of days of grace by the enemy. We feel it difficult in any circumstances to think that this could accord with international law, since if every nation acted in a similar way, days of grace could never come into being. No doubt the policy underlying this provision has been carefully considered, but we should have thought that this sub-rule might have been framed in such a way as to enable Great Britain to take the initiative if she thought it desirable.

Sub-rule (iv).—The undertaking required of the crew "not to serve in an enemy aircraft while hostilities last" would, we think, be unduly restrictive and might be unacceptable internationally, though a restriction against serving in enemy military aircraft would clearly be unexceptionable. It is not unworthy of note that The Hague Convention XI of 1907 in the case of ships only required an undertaking not to engage while hostilities last in any service connected with the operations of the war, and we think anything wider than this requirement might be difficult to justify.

Sub-rule (v).—It appears to us that in certain circumstances it might be desirable to condemn an aircraft on the ground, for example, that it was "capable of conversion to warlike use" without necessarily detaining the crew as prisoners of war, but the proposed rule would make this impossible.

Rule II A (b).—We feel that in the concluding sentence the words "subject to any export prohibition which may apply to it" should be added. We feel that some saving words should also be added in respect of both Rule II A. and B. which would make it clear that nothing in the rules is to be construed as abrogating or limiting the sovereign right to requisition neutral cargo which may be needed for the use of the State.

D. B. SOMERVELL.
T. J. O'CONNOR.

Law Officers' Department,
June 2, 1938.

[T 2830/2830/370/1939]

No. 1D.

[Treasury Solicitor.]

[December 20, 1938.]

Case for the Opinion of the Law Officers.

Issue of documents to enable the High Court in England to exercise jurisdiction in prize. FOR many years it has been thought necessary, or at least desirable as a matter of precaution, to issue at the outbreak of a war certain documents authorising the Court of Admiralty or its successor, the High Court of Justice, to exercise jurisdiction in prize in connexion with the seizure, during the war recited in the documents, of all ships vessels and goods belonging to the enemy State with which His Majesty is at war. Those documents, of which copies are sent herewith, are three in number:—

- (1) An Order in Council ordering that a Commission in the form of the draft annexed thereto shall issue under the Great Seal authorising the Admiralty to require the High Court to proceed in prize (Paper No. 1);
- (2) The Commission referred to in the Order in Council (Paper No. 2); and
- (3) The Warrant to the Admiralty issued under the authority of the Commission (Paper No. 3).

The Law Officers are asked to advise whether the issue of any of these documents is now necessary.

It is submitted that the answer to this question depends upon the construction of section 23 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which provides as follows:—

"The High Court shall be a Prize Court within the meaning of the Naval Prize Acts, 1864 to 1916, as amended by any subsequent enactment, and shall have all such jurisdiction on the High Seas and throughout His Majesty's dominions and in every place where His Majesty has jurisdiction as under any Act relating to Naval Prize or otherwise the High Court of Admiralty possessed when acting as a Prize Court."

It will be seen from the accompanying memorandum (Paper No. 4), which contains the earlier history of the matter, that at any rate before the Naval Prize Act, 1864, the question was one upon which divergent views were entertained. The Naval Prize Act, 1864, was the first permanent statute dealing with prize. Section 3 of that Act (which is still in force) provides that "the High Court of Admiralty, and every Court of Admiralty or of Vice-Admiralty, or other Court exercising Admiralty jurisdiction in Her Majesty's Dominions, for the time being authorised to take cognisance of or judicially proceed in matters of prize, shall be a Prize Court within the meaning of this Act." It will be observed that in that section a distinction is drawn between the High Court of Admiralty and all other Prize Courts in that to the latter but not to the former the qualification is applied that they must be for the time being authorised to proceed in prize. Accordingly it is submitted that the effect of the Act of 1864 with regard to the High Court of Admiralty, whose successor the High Court of Justice now is, is that the Court is by virtue of that section a permanent Prize Court.

Doubts, however, continued to be expressed after the passing of the Act of 1864 as to the necessity of the issue of the documents in question to the High Court, and section 4 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1891, would seem to have been passed expressly for the purpose of removing those doubts. It provides:—

"Whereas doubts have arisen with respect to the position of the High Court in England and appeals therefrom in cases of prize and it is expedient to remove such doubts: be it therefore enacted as follows:—

"(1) The High Court in England shall be a Prize Court within the meaning of the Naval Prize Act, 1864, and shall have all such jurisdiction on the High Seas and throughout Her Majesty's Dominions and in every place where Her Majesty has jurisdiction as under the Naval Prize Act, 1864, or otherwise, the High Court of Admiralty possessed when acting as a Prize Court . . ."

Nevertheless it appears that doubts continued to be expressed upon the matter, and on the 24th January, 1896, Mr. A. T. Lawrence (as he then was) advised that any special Commission was unnecessary, and again, in 1897, the report of the Committee appointed under Mr. J. B. Aspinall to draft Prize Rules treated the Acts of 1864 and 1891 as providing, in effect, that no documents were necessary to authorise the High Court to sit as a Prize Court. On the other hand, when the Law Officers were asked to advise in 1898, they expressed the view that as regards the High Court it was arguable whether some kind of special authorisation was not necessary to enable it to act as a Prize Court, and accordingly that the present practice (i.e., of issuing a Commission) should be adhered to. A copy of their Opinion is sent herewith (Paper No. 5).

It may well have been in consequence of their doubt that upon the outbreak of war in 1914 the old procedure was followed and a Commission and Warrant were issued to the High Court. It will be appreciated that at that date there had been no occasion for any judicial decision which could throw light upon the question. But since then support (if any support is necessary) has been given to the view that no special authorisation of the Prize Court is necessary. In the Zamora (1916, 2 A.C. 77 at p. 96), Lord Parker said:—

"Under that Act (i.e., the Naval Prize Act, 1864) the Court of Admiralty became a permanent Court of Prize independent of any Commission issued under the Great Seal."

It will be observed that Lord Parker based his view upon the Naval Prize Act, 1864, and that he did not refer to the Supreme Court of Judicature Act of 1891 quoted above. But if Lord Parker's conclusion follows from the Act of 1864, it is submitted that it follows a fortiori from section 4 of the Act of 1891, which was expressed to be for the removal of doubts which had arisen with respect to the position of the High Court in England in cases of prize. Further authority for the proposition is to be found in Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. 26, p. 228. It is necessary, however, to draw the Law Officers' attention to the fact that in the Roumanian (1916, 1 A.C. 124 at p. 137) and in the Südmark (1917, A.C. 620 at p. 623) there are to be found dicta which may be thought to throw some doubt upon this conclusion. But it is submitted that in those cases the Court was having regard merely to the procedure which was actually adopted and was not considering the question whether any such procedure was necessary.

The material provision at present in force, namely, section 23 of the Judicature Act, 1925, quoted above, is substantially a re-enactment of section 4 of the Act of 1891. The view is submitted that upon the true construction of this section no ground for doubt exists that its effect is to render the issue of any authorisation to the Court unnecessary. But if the Law Officers are of opinion that any doubt arises upon the meaning of the words themselves, then it is submitted that the passage from the Zamora, to which reference has been made, establishes that the same conclusion is to be drawn from the Act of 1864.

It will be observed that, at the bottom of p. 4 of his memorandum, Parliamentary Counsel assumed that the Court would not take upon itself to determine judicially whether war had or had not broken out, but would accept without question the statement of some Minister of State on behalf of the Crown. It may have been that in 1898 the Law Officers had in mind that the issue of the documents in question was a convenient way of establishing the existence of a war. It is submitted, however, that this cumbersome procedure is not necessary for that purpose. For all other purposes the proclamation by the Crown that a state of war exists is conclusive and it is thought that there is no reason why the Prize Court, in like manner as all other Courts, should not take judicial notice of the existence of a state of war as made known by that proclamation.

The Law Officers are accordingly requested to advise whether it is necessary, to enable the High Court to exercise jurisdiction in prize, that any of the documents referred to should be issued.

LIST OF PAPERS.

- (1) Order in Council, August 5, 1914.
- (2) Commission issued under the Great Seal, August 6, 1914.
- (3) Warrant issued under the authority of (2), August 6, 1914.
- (4) Memorandum prepared by Parliamentary Counsel in connexion with the Bill of the Prize Courts Act, 1894.
- (5) Law Officers' Opinion, September 10, 1898. (Annex A.)

Opinion.

We share the doubts felt by the Law Officers in 1898 as to whether section 3 of the Naval Prize Act of 1864 justifies the view that the effect of that Act was to constitute a permanent Prize Court. The section has clearly received in the past, and in our view is open to, a contrary construction, and on that construction section 4 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1891, does not we think alter the position. That section seems to us to be designed to remove doubts arising from the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty being exercisable by the High Court and to be unhelpful on the present question. It is, of course, vital that no ambiguity or serious possibility of adverse argument should exist as to the jurisdiction of the Prize Court, and in view of the dicta of Lord Parker in the Roumanian and the Südmark, which conflict with his dictum in the Zamora, we cannot feel that ambiguity does not exist or that the interpretation of the Naval Prize Act of 1864 is by any means certain.

For these reasons we advise that all the documents to which we are referred, namely, the Order in Council, the Commission referred to therein and the Warrant to the Admiralty, should be issued to enable the High Court to exercise jurisdiction in Prize.

D. B. SOMERVELL.
T. J. O'CONNOR.

Law Officers' Department,
December 20, 1938.

Annex A.

(Paper No. 5.)

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown.

WE advise that the proposed change in the form of the Admiralty Patent should not be adopted.

The proposed addition refers to Commissioners "for the time being," whereas the Patent is addressed to specific persons. The language of the addition is obscure and—though its meaning can be made out—the point is not one in which any ambiguity should be even possible.

We further think that the Commission should be under the Great Seal as hitherto.

We advise that the Admiralty Patent should remain in its present form.

A Commission under the Great Seal in the form as far as possible at present used should be issued to enable the Admiralty to deal with Courts under the Act of 1894, Section 2, in time of peace; the operation of that Section is confined to Courts in British Possessions.

As regards the High Court, the present practice should be adhered to. We think it arguable whether authorisation of this kind be not necessary to enable the High Court to act as a Prize Court, notwithstanding the language of the Naval Prize Act, 1864, and the Judicature Act, 1891, and the language of the Prize Courts Act, 1894, Section 2, suggests a possible doubt as to whether the practice of issuing such Commissions only on outbreak of war should be departed from in cases to which that Act does not apply.

RICHARD E. WEBSTER.
ROBERT B. FINLAY.

Law Officers' Department,
September 10, 1898.

1939

THIS DOCUMENT IS THE PROPERTY OF HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office

CONFIDENTIAL

(15938)

REPORTS BY THE
LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.

1939

(ii)

LIST OF REPORTS

NOTE.—The Reports, &c., not addressed to the Foreign Office are marked 1⁴, &c.

No.		Date.	SUBJECT.	Page.
BELGIUM.
1 ⁴	Attorney-General and Mr. Andrewes Uthwatt [Treasury Solicitor]	May 26, 1939	Immunity from legal process of a member of a foreign embassy (and of his wife) in London: question whether right of immunity can be waived without consent of the diplomatic representative or his Government	1
GENERAL.
1	Law Officers...	Mar. 17, 1939	Conclusion of Consular Conventions by His Majesty's Government: question whether obligations regarding consular immunity could be entered into without legislation	11
2	Law Officers for Scotland	Mar. 18, 1939	Conclusion of Consular Conventions by His Majesty's Government: question whether obligations regarding consular immunity could be entered into without legislation	42

(iii)

ALPHABETICAL INDEX

(NAMES AND SUBJECTS)

1939

The figures refer to the numbers of the pages.

Cases cited are indicated by italics.

AMA—EVI.

A.

"Amazone" (yacht), 1-10.
Archives—Inviolability of consular archives, 11-43.

B.

British Linen Bank, 1-10.

C.

Consular Privilege—See Immunity.
Conventions, Consular—See Treaties.

D.

Diplomatic Privilege—
Immunity from legal process of diplomats and their wives and families, 1-10.
Waiving of immunity of members of his staff by diplomatic representative or by his Government, 1-10.
Documents—Production of consular archives as evidence, 11-43.

E.

Evidence—Production of consular archives, 11-43.

HEM—TRE.

H.

Hemeleers, Commandant, 1-10.
Hemeleers-Shenley, Una, 1-10.

I.

Immunity—
From legal process, of diplomats and their wives, 1-10.
Waiving of immunity of members of his staff by diplomatic representative or by his Government, 1-10.
Consular immunity in relation to conclusion by His Majesty's Government of Consular Conventions, 11-43.

L.

Law—Relation between international and municipal law, 14.

S.

Shenley—See Hemeleers-Shenley.

T.

Treaties—Conclusion of Consular Conventions by His Majesty's Government, 11-43.

1939

Printed for the use of the Foreign Office

CONFIDENTIAL

REPORTS BY THE LAW OFFICERS OF THE CROWN, &c.: 1939

BELGIUM

[T 7037/282/373/1939]

No. 1^a.

[Treasury Solicitor]

[May 26, 1939]

Case for the Opinion of the Attorney-General and Mr. Andrewes Uthwatt.

COUNSEL may have seen in the Weekly Notes of last week (1939, p. 206) a report of a case relating to a yacht Amazon (reported also in The Times of the 9th May), in which Mr. Justice Langton allowed a motion on behalf of Commandant Hemeleers to set aside a writ for possession of the yacht and the warrant of arrest issued at the instance of his wife, Mme. Una Hemeleers-Shenley.

The plaintiff alleged that the yacht was hers, bought with her money; the commandant alleged that the yacht was owned by him and in his possession and control, and entered a conditional appearance under protest. In support of the motion he alleged that he was an Assistant Military Attaché on the staff of the Belgian Embassy and was therefore immune from process.

The registrar communicated with the Foreign Office, who gave the following certificate:—

“By direction of His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs I have the honour hereby to certify that Capitaine Commandant Leon Hemeleers was received by His Majesty's Government as Assistant Military Attaché to the Belgian Embassy from the 25th October, 1920, and since that date his name has been included in the list prepared under the statute of 7 Anne, Cap. 12.

“ALEXANDER CADOGAN, “Permanent Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

“May 1939.”

Langton J. held that the commandant enjoyed full diplomatic immunity and had also possession of the yacht, which was registered in his name and was laid up with Messrs. Thorneycroft and Co., of Southampton, who took their orders from him.

After referring to the Cristina (1938 A.C. 485), the judge held that the action did implead the commandant and bring property in his possession into issue, and the writ should be set aside with costs.

The plaintiff has given notice of appeal.

That judgment was delivered on the 8th May, but the first hearing of the motion was on the 24th April.

[21632]

c*

On the 28th April Mme. Hemeleers-Shenley issued a writ against the British Linen Bank claiming bonds and other securities to the value of somewhere in the neighbourhood of £200,000 which were alleged to be held by the bank in trust for the plaintiff absolutely, that the bank should transfer the same to her, an injunction to restrain the bank from parting with them to anyone else, an account of dividends and interest, and further or other relief and costs.

The bank, on the 2nd May, issued a summons asking—

- (1) That, unless the plaintiff obtained an injunction within four days, they should be at liberty to transfer the securities to their customer, the plaintiff's husband.
- (2) That they might be at liberty to issue an interpleader summons so that the issue between the plaintiff and their customer might be decided.
- (3) That they might be at liberty to lodge in court so many of the securities as were in their possession or power.
- (4) That further proceedings might be stayed under Order 57, Rule 6, or the general jurisdiction of the order: and such further or other order, &c.

On that summons Mr. Justice Morton in Chambers, on the same day as Mr. Justice Langton's judgment was delivered, made an order which has not yet been completed, but a copy of the minutes is sent herewith.

He ordered that, if the diplomatic privilege of Commandant Hemeleers was not waived within seven days from the date of the order so as to enable an interpleader summons to be issued by the bank and effectively served on him, or, alternatively, so as to enable the plaintiff to amend her writ by adding him as a defendant, the defendant bank should deposit in court a box containing the securities in the defendant's possession, of which particulars should be given by affidavit; and ordered that the defendant should forthwith give notice of the order to Commandant Hemeleers by sending by post a copy to his solicitors.

An affidavit of Mr. Tucker on behalf of the defendant bank was filed upon this summons, and Counsel is referred to it, with its exhibits, and the correspondence which has taken place between Messrs. Stephenson, Harwood and Tatham on behalf of Commandant Hemeleers, and Messrs. Beckingsales and Naylor on behalf of the bank.

The affidavit, with its exhibits, explains that in February 1937 the plaintiff authorised the bank to transfer to her husband all the securities then held by the bank on her behalf, and her husband, in consideration of the transfer of those securities (to the value of approximately £275,000, including the yacht Amazon and No. 4 Belgrave Square), undertook to leave to her and their child or children, provided that the children behaved to his satisfaction, the whole of his estate, with the exception of £15,000 left to his brother.

Owing to unhappy differences between the husband and wife, on the 29th March this year she gave him notice that she revoked all gifts made since the date of their marriage under the terms of article 1096 of the Code Civil of Belgium.

The affidavit states that at the date of the issue of the writ the defendant bank held nothing on behalf of the plaintiff, and an exhibit shows which of the investments named in the writ the bank held, or did not hold, at that date on behalf of the husband, some having been transferred to the customer beneficially by the plaintiff's direction and others having been deposited by the customer (the husband) alone as beneficial owner so far as the bank was aware. The bank claims no interest in the securities other than charges and costs.

The commandant is advised by his Belgian lawyers that the notice of revocation is not valid, and his solicitors suggest that it is obviously right and proper that any such question which involves Belgian law should be decided by the Belgian courts. The bank refuses to accede to a demand to hand over the securities, even those which may be the commandant's own, without an order of the court.

In the correspondence Counsel will see a reference to the minutes of order mentioning the period of seven days "from the date of this order," and pointing out that this must clearly be seven days from the date of completion of the order—a point which the bank's solicitors say they will bring to the attention of the registrar. In fact, it is suggested that the time should be seven days from service of the order, since the minutes direct notice to be served on the commandant's solicitors.

The difficulty which arises will be appreciated from a reference to the minute by the Foreign Office Second Legal Adviser (Paper No. 6) and the note from the Belgian Ambassador (Paper No. 8).

It seems clear that the commandant and his wife both possess diplomatic immunity from process, and that the right to waive such immunity belongs not to him or his wife, but to the Belgian Ambassador or his Government; and the Belgian Ambassador is not willing that the commandant (or his wife) should waive the privilege.

There are proceedings in Belgium relating to these very securities, and it is thought preferable that the matter should be dealt with by the Belgian courts, not merely from the legal point of view, but also on grounds of policy, since the Belgian Ambassador does not wish to have such undesirable publicity in this country about the matrimonial disputes of a member of his embassy. The proceedings in Belgium are being conducted under a procedure which prevents publicity.

The attitude of the bank will be gathered from the correspondence. It feels that it is being placed in a most awkward position because it cannot effectively interplead.

The commandant has been advised by Mr. Wilfrid Hunt; and the latter agrees that in interpleader proceedings under Order 57 the commandant could not ask for the writ to be set aside for want of jurisdiction, and is also of opinion that, even if, as a party served with Notice of Order under Order 16, Rule 40, he appears under protest under Rule 41, he will similarly not be able to dispose of the action. It seems possible, however, that he might succeed in getting the order discharged or varied; and Counsel is requested to consider whether, having thus become a party to the action, he would not be entitled to go further and ask that the writ should be struck out.

If, however, it is not possible otherwise to stop the proceedings, it is suggested that it might be desirable for the Attorney-General to intervene, with or without counsel representing the Belgian Ambassador, on the ground that Mme. Hemeleers-Shenley is not entitled without the consent of the Belgian Ambassador, or the Belgian Government, to submit to the jurisdiction of the court as plaintiff any more than she would be entitled to do so as defendant.

It seems clear from the authorities referred to in Paper No. 6 that the commandant's wife is entitled to diplomatic immunity and that as defendant she could not waive it without such consent. The position seems to be usefully summed up in the second edition of Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. 6, paragraphs 626 ff.

It is submitted by the Foreign Office that, as regards waiver of diplomatic immunity, there is no difference in principle between submitting to the jurisdiction of the courts as a defendant and submitting to their jurisdiction as a plaintiff, but on that particular point there does not seem to be any definite authority.

The Belgian Ambassador supports the view that diplomatic privileges cannot be waived by members of his staff without his consent, and definitely states that he has not consented to either the commandant or his wife waiving their privileges so as to entitle either of them to submit to the jurisdiction of the English courts, whether in the capacity of a plaintiff or of a defendant; and he requests the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to take such steps as may be deemed advisable to have these matters brought to the notice of the court.

Counsel is requested to advise what, if any, action the Attorney-General should take in the matter and generally on the position.

List of Papers.

1. Writ, dated April 28, 1939.
2. Summons, dated May 2, 1939.
3. Draft Minutes of Order.
4. Affidavit of W. R. Tucker on behalf of defendant with exhibits annexed.
5. Correspondence between Stephenson, Harwood and Tatham, solicitors for Commandant Hemeleers, husband of the plaintiff, and the solicitors for the British Linen Bank (Incorporated).
6. Minute, dated May 11, 1939, by the Second Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office (Annex A).
7. Memorandum, dated May 23, 1939, by Mr. O. J. Hubbert (Annex B).
8. Note, dated May 16, 1939, from the Belgian Ambassador (Annex C).

Opinion.

1. In our opinion, Mrs. Shenley is entitled to maintain her action in the courts of England without obtaining the authority of the ambassador.

There may be a question whether Mrs. Shenley, as regards diplomatic immunity, stands in the same position as her husband, but we are content to assume that she does. We rest our conclusion on wider grounds.

The privilege of diplomatic immunity is directed to secure either that there is accorded to the diplomatic agent all the privileges which would be accorded to his Sovereign or that the diplomatic agent should be enabled to discharge his duties without hindrance. Both these objects require that the diplomatic agent and his staff should not be subjected to legal process against the will of the diplomatic agent; it is not necessary to serve either object that a member of the staff of the diplomatic agent should be precluded from resorting to the courts of this country as and when he pleases.

To accord to the diplomatic agent the right to negative the freedom of a member of his staff to sue in the courts would in truth be to accord to him a right to exercise sovereign power in England.

We would add that there is no authority upon the point, but our view of the matter is borne out by the general lines of the Statute 7, Anne, c. 12.

2. It follows that the case is not one in which the Attorney-General should intervene.

(Initialled) D. B. S(OMERVELL).
A. A. U(THWATT).

Law Officers' Department,
May 26, 1939.

Annex A.

(Paper No. 6.)

[T 6429/282/373]

Minute by the Second Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office.

MR. WITT of Messrs. Stephenson, Harwood and Tatham, solicitors to the Belgian Embassy, came to see me by appointment this morning to discuss questions of diplomatic privilege connected with the litigation between the Assistant Military Attaché of the Belgian Embassy and his wife. The litigation respecting the yacht Amazon (of which the judgment is reported in The Times) resulted in a decision that as the yacht was in the possession of the Assistant Military Attaché and he possessed diplomatic privilege and had not submitted to the jurisdiction the proceedings must be stayed. An appeal has been entered against this judgment.

2. In addition to this, however, there is other litigation. The wife is a lady of great wealth and had at various times in the past made gifts of securities to the value of thousands of pounds to her husband. These securities are deposited with the British Linen Bank in London. The wife now claims that she has revoked the gifts. She has therefore issued a writ against the British Linen Bank claiming the return to her of the securities and damages if they part with possession of them or any of their proceeds to the husband. The British Linen Bank of course possesses no privilege. It has no claim to the securities itself and would in the ordinary way interplead and leave the issue to be fought out as between the husband and wife. It cannot, however, interplead because that means serving the interpleader notice on the husband who has diplomatic immunity. The Belgian Ambassador refuses to allow the husband to waive diplomatic immunity, being of the opinion that if he did so there would be a suit between the husband and wife involving most undesirable publicity about the matrimonial disputes of a member of his embassy. Litigation on the same issues is going on in Belgium where disputes between husband and wife are dealt with under a procedure which prevents publicity and he wishes all the issues to be left to the Belgian courts.

3. The British Linen Bank are no doubt afraid that they will be placed in the same position as Cables and Wireless (Limited) were in a suit brought by Haile Selassie, that is to say they may have judgment given against them in favour of the wife without having any protection against a subsequent claim by the husband. They have therefore combined with the wife to obtain orders from the court, the effect of which practically is to face the husband with the alternatives either of waiving diplomatic immunity (which he cannot do because his ambassador will not let him) or of losing his property. The bank took out a summons and obtained an order from the court under which the bulk of the securities were to be deposited in the court by the bank within seven days unless the husband waived diplomatic immunity. There are a number of securities which the order of the court does not affect, but in the case of them the bank refuses to accept the orders of the husband in relation thereto and takes up the attitude that if he does not like this he can waive his immunity and sue them.

4. The Belgian Ambassador realises that his Military Attaché is, as things stand, being caught on the horns of a dilemma and the solicitors of the Belgian Embassy came to consult me on the question of the possibility of adopting the following line. The wife also possesses diplomatic immunity. The right to waive, however, belongs not to her but to the ambassador or the Belgian Government. She had no right to purport to waive it by bringing these proceedings as plaintiff. The court should be informed that the Belgian Ambassador has not and does not agree to her waiving diplomatic immunity and should therefore stay the proceedings.

5. Mr. Witt and I investigated this suggested line of action from a legal point of view. It will be necessary first to show that the wife of the Military Attaché was a person to whom diplomatic immunity extends. We have of course no doubt that diplomatic immunity does extend to the wives of the diplomatic personnel of an embassy and not merely to the wife of the ambassador, and I think that there are various statements which we have made to foreign missions here or their Governments showing that this is our view. I have found a statement to this effect in one text-book, namely Satow's Guide to Diplomatic Practice, third edition, at the bottom of page 178, but I have not yet actually found either an English or a foreign judicial decision stating this as regards the wife of a member of the diplomatic staff. Apparently in the old case of English v. Caballero, 1823, 3 Dow. and R.Y. 25, the wife of the second secretary of the Spanish Embassy was arrested alone on the bill issued against husband and wife. A rule was obtained but discharged on the ground of insufficient evidence as to the husband's position and nothing appears in the judgments as to the wife's position, but it appears to have been assumed that if the husband could establish privilege the wife could not be arrested. I have not, however, looked at all the text-books. I am asking Mr. Hubbert if he would be good enough to look up the books and give me the references to anything useful⁽¹⁾. In any case I am disposed to think that the English courts would accept the view that the wives of the diplomatic staff were covered by immunity if they were informed by the Attorney-General that that was the view of His Majesty's Government, and also because if you can sue the wife the immunity of the husband may not be a very real one. If the Department can put their hands on any official statement by His Majesty's Government covering this point which is published or publishable it would be useful.

⁽¹⁾ See Paper No. 7, Annex B.

6. As regards the second point, the following passage occurs in Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. 6, p. 509:—

"The privilege may be waived, but since it belongs not to the minister but to the Sovereign by whom he is accredited, only by the direction or with the consent of that Sovereign, or in the case of a subordinate member of the legation of the minister at least. (Re Republic of Bolivia Exploration Syndicate, 1914, 1 Ch. at p. 156, Dickinson v. del Sola, 1930, 1 K.B. 376). Accordingly even if a minister or member of his entourage has entered an appearance or pleaded otherwise than to the jurisdiction it is open to him at a later stage to prove that his Government had not consented to the waiver of his privilege."

In principle therefore it seems that if the waiver of immunity by a subordinate member of the embassy who is sued as defendant is not effective when made without the consent of his ambassador, the waiver involved by such a person when he brings proceedings as plaintiff is also not effective if the ambassador does not consent, and that therefore if the fact that the ambassador does not consent is brought to the knowledge of the court the court should stay the action. The point, however, is a new one.

7. Another point is, supposing that the Belgian Ambassador decides to take this line, how the matter is to be brought before the court. Clearly the plaintiff will not do so. The husband cannot do so because he is not a party to the proceedings and will not be heard unless he becomes a party by submitting to the jurisdiction. I think that if counsel appeared on behalf of the Belgian Ambassador and asked permission to make a statement to the court the court would hear him. An alternative would be that the Attorney-General should inform the court and he could in that event of course submit to the court arguments and information on the two points involved.

8. Mr. Witt of course wanted to know whether the Foreign Office or the Attorney-General would intervene in this way. I said I could not answer this now and was not willing to consult the Attorney-General until we were officially informed that the Belgian Ambassador definitely wished this line to be taken, and if we got a communication from the Belgian Ambassador to this effect we would consider it and then let him know whether we thought he must be represented in court and make his point through counsel appearing for him alone, or whether the Attorney-General would appear together with or in substitution for counsel for the Belgian Ambassador. I expect, however, we shall hear something from the Belgian Embassy very soon.

p.p. W. E. BECKETT.

May 11, 1939.

Annex B.

(Paper No. 7.)

[T 6429/282/373]

Diplomatic Immunity of Wives of the Diplomatic Personnel of an Embassy.

SIR CECIL HURST in "Les immunités diplomatiques" in Recueil des Cours (Academy of International Law at The Hague), 1926, volume II, pp. 152-153 says:—

"On peut distinguer, parmi les membres d'une ambassade ou d'une mission qui ont droit aux immunités diplomatiques trois catégories différentes. . . .

"(1) Le personnel officiel, c'est-à-dire le chef de la mission et ceux qui prennent part à l'œuvre diplomatique de la mission, le conseiller, les secrétaires et les attachés. . . .

"(2) Les femmes et les familles des fonctionnaires compris dans la première catégorie. . . ."

At p. 158, Sir Cecil Hurst says:—

"Tout le monde est d'accord sur ce point que les immunités dont jouit un agent diplomatique s'étendent aussi à sa femme. En 1841, un arrêt de la Cour de Paris a déclaré 'que la femme d'un ministre public jouit des mêmes immunités que son mari.'⁽¹⁾

"Aucune décision dans ce sens n'a été rendue par les tribunaux anglais, mais dans beaucoup d'affaires le droit de la femme de l'agent aux immunités diplomatiques a été regardé comme une chose certaine.

"Tout récemment, le principe fut appliqué par la cour dans une affaire où la femme de l'agent diplomatique n'habitait pas la même maison que son mari, mais séparément un appartement à Londres. Une citation lui avait été signifiée pour le paiement du loyer, mais la Haute Cour de Justice de Londres déclara que la signification devrait être annulée.⁽²⁾ En 1907, le tribunal civil de la Seine a rendu une décision semblable. Un membre du Corps diplomatique de Paris, séparé de sa femme, avait un domicile distinct. Une action en justice fut intentée contre tous deux en paiement d'une somme de 1,949 francs, montant de fournitures d'automobiles. Le mari renonça à son privilège d'exemption, mais sans produire aucune autorisation de son Gouvernement à cet effet. La femme opposa l'incompétence du tribunal en sa qualité de femme d'un agent diplomatique. Le tribunal se déclara incompétent même à l'égard de la femme. La séparation des époux n'est en effet qu'une mesure essentiellement provisoire et ne rompt pas le lien conjugal qui subsiste entièrement. Les immunités diplomatiques de la femme restaient donc intactes.⁽³⁾

"Les tribunaux français ont aussi refusé de reconnaître un autre expédient qui a été employé pour soumettre à la juridiction la femme d'un individu qui jouit des immunités diplomatiques. Selon cet expédient, l'immunité du mari est reconnue, mais la condamnation de la femme pour dette personnelle est demandée.⁽⁴⁾

"Les privilèges sont accordés non seulement à la femme du chef de la mission, mais aussi aux femmes des secrétaires et de tout membre du personnel officiel."

Harvard Research in International Law, volume for 1932 at p. 101 states:—

"The English courts have on numerous occasions affirmed the immunity of the members of missions and their families from jurisdiction, making no distinction between chiefs of missions and members of the official personnel. Taylor v. Best (1854), 14 C.B. 487; Magdalena Steam Navigation Company v. Martin (1859), 2 E. and E. 94; Parkinson v. Potter (1885), 16 Q.B. 152; Macartney v. Garbutt (1890), 24 Q.B. 368; Musurus Bey v. Gadban [1894], 2 Q.B. 352; In re Republic of Bolivia Exploration Syndicate (Limited) [1914], 1 Ch. 138; Assurance Compagnie Excelsior v. Smith (1923), 40 T.L.R. 105; Engelke v. Musmann [1928], A.C. 433; Dickinson v. Del Solar (1929), 45 T.L.R. 637."

I have not been able to look up all these cases, but I doubt whether any of them concerns the wife of an attaché.

A. S. Hershey in Diplomatic Agents and Immunities, Washington, 1919, at p. 138 states:—

"It is generally agreed that the various members of the family and of the official suite of the envoy, together with their families, enjoy the same inviolability and the same immunities that he himself does."

⁽¹⁾ Dalloz, Jur. Gén., Ag. Dip., sect. 1, art. 4, § 5, 157, note 2. Pradier-Fodéré, Cours de Droit diplomatique, t. II, p. 161.

⁽²⁾ Macnaghten v. Coverdiss, Annual Practice, 1923, t. I.

⁽³⁾ Cottenet c. Rafalovitch, J.D.I.P., 1908, p. 153.

⁽⁴⁾ Desus c. Recoy, J.D.I.P., 1907, p. 1086.

Westlake in International Law, Part I, Cambridge, 1904, at p. 270, states:—

"Besides the persons who are on the diplomatic staff of the mission, immunity from the territorial jurisdiction, civil or criminal, is generally enjoyed by those who are living with them as part of their family or household."

Satow's Guide to Diplomatic Practice, 3rd edition, London, 1932, states at p. 178:—

"The jurisdictional immunities of the diplomatic agent extend to the personnel of his mission, viz., the official suite, i.e., counsellors, secretaries and attachés, including naval, air and commercial attachés. . . . Also to the wives(*) and families of the above."

A. Merignhac in Traité de Droit public international, Paris, 1907, volume II at p. 262 says:—

"Egalement encore, les immunités de la suite officielle s'appliquent aux membres de la famille résidant avec les personnages de cette suite."

Jules Valéry in Manuel de Droit international privé, Paris, 1914, at p. 85, says:—

"Le droit des gens étend les conséquences de l'extraterritorialité à la famille de toutes les personnes admises à jouir de l'extraterritorialité diplomatique, peu importe qu'il s'agisse de la famille du ministre étranger lui-même ou bien d'un membre de sa suite."

"*Civ. Seine, 4 avril 1906. Cl. '07, III."

L. Strisower in Recueil des Cours, volume I, 1923, Academy of International Law at The Hague, in L'extraterritorialité et ses principales applications at p. 262 states:—

"Souvent, mais non pas toujours et non pas toujours à tous les égards, l'extraterritorialité des membres de la suite officielle a été comprise par les auteurs comme embrassant aussi leurs habitations et comme s'étendant aussi à leur famille et à leurs domestiques. Ces applications de l'extraterritorialité se trouvent aussi confirmées par la pratique, ainsi, par exemple, à tous les points mentionnés ci-dessus, dans une note du Sénat de la ville de Francfort de 1816, pour l'épouse dans plusieurs jugements français, pour la famille et les domestiques, mais non pour l'habitation, de la part du Département de Justice et de Police de Berne. . . . D'autre part un certain nombre d'auteurs se sont opposés à ces applications de l'extraterritorialité.* Il semble qu'il faut les accepter en tant que l'analogie avec l'extraterritorialité du chef de la mission est pleinement fondée. Il faut donc reconnaître ces immunités, en tant qu'il s'agit du personnel diplomatique, c'est-à-dire des membres de la suite qui gèrent les affaires de la mission comme le ministre lui-même, quoique dépendant de lui. . . ."

*Cf. Van Praag, Juridiction et Droit international public, p. 485, 487 et suiv. Hübler Die Magistraturen des völkerrechtlichen Verkehrs, p. 87. Ozanam, p. 82 et suiv.

Jean Roederer in "De l'application des immunités de l'ambassadeur au personnel de l'ambassade," Thèse, Paris, 1904, states:—

"Les immunités accordées à la famille de l'ambassadeur sont étendues aux familles des personnages officiels de la mission. C'est ainsi que dans son arrêt du 31 juillet 1878 (Clunet, 1878, p. 500) . . . le tribunal de la Seine décide que la femme d'un attaché militaire peut se prévaloir des prérogatives diplomatiques."

"Attendu, dit ce jugement, 'que Mme. de la Jara est protégée par les mêmes immunités.' M. Pradier-Fodéré considère qu'il est excessif d'accorder des immunités à la femme d'un tel personnage, mais nous ne voyons pas, pour notre part, qu'il y ait de différence à établir entre la femme d'un ambassadeur et celle d'un simple attaché militaire. Quelle que soit en effet la préséance que la première peut avoir sur la seconde, le même lien les unit toutes les deux à leurs maris et ceux-ci jouissent pareillement des immunités diplomatiques."

(*) Even if living apart, according to English and French decisions: Cottenet c. Rafalovitch, Clunet (1908), 153; Macnaghten v. Coverdias, Annual Practice, &c. (1923), volume I.

"L'accord d'ailleurs semble régner dans la doctrine comme dans la pratique moderne, pour protéger la famille en ligne directe de l'ambassadeur par des immunités diplomatiques. Seuls les auteurs opposés à toute espèce d'immunités contestent celles de la femme de l'ambassadeur comme ils contestent celles de ce dernier."

Charles Ozanam in L'Immunité civile de Juridiction des Agents diplomatiques, Paris, 1912, at p. 81 states:—

"Il est également certain que la femme et les membres de la famille du chef de mission bénéficient de son immunité. . . ."

"Mais la jurisprudence a étendu l'immunité aux femmes des attachés militaires et des secrétaires de légation et une grande partie de la doctrine a protesté,* avec raison selon nous. Que l'immunité soit étendue au personnel de l'ambassade nous l'admettons fort bien et nous avons vu là une condition essentielle de l'exercice des fonctions du chef de mission. Pour la même raison, il nous paraît logique d'en investir la famille de celui-ci. Mais il ne faudrait cependant pas aller trop loin dans cette voie. Or, il nous semble que, dans le cas présent, cela est étendre le privilège bien au delà des limites où il est nécessaire pour assurer l'indépendance réciproque des États, et le fonctionnement régulier de la légation."

*Notamment Despagne, Cours de Droit int. pub., p. 348 et s.; Laurent, Droit civil international, t. IV, p. 83 et s.; Lehr (R.D.I., 1905, 412); Pradier-Fodéré, Cours de Droit dipl., p. 185.

As regards wives of military attachés and secretaries a note refers to the cases of Trib. Seine, 31 juillet 1878, Dientz [J. Dr. int. pr., 1878, p. 500], Trib. Seine, 4 avril 1906 [Revue de Dr. int. priv., 1907, p. 552], 18 novembre 1907 [Rev. de Dr. int. priv., 1908, p. 615].

L. van Praag in Juridiction et Droit international public, La Haye, 1915, at p. 487, states:—

"L'extraterritorialité des épouses (et respectivement des autres personnes de la famille) des membres de la suite officielle des ministres publics étrangers est souvent admise, surtout dans la jurisprudence française (Note 1293). Cette manière de voir est pourtant attaquée (Note 1294). Et ces attaques ont, à mon avis, de bonnes raisons. . . ."

"NOTE 1293.—Ainsi Trib. de la Seine, jugements 31 juillet 1878, J.D.I., 1878, p. 500, du 25 avril 1907, et du 18 novembre 1907; ces deux derniers [cités aux notes 704 et 792 (these citations quote J.D.I., 1907, p. 1090; R.D.I., Pr. 4, p. 154, and Dalloz, Jurisprudence générale, Recueil périodique, 1908, 5, 49; R.D.I., Pr. 4, p. 616)] ont même admis l'extraterritorialité pour une femme qui vivait séparée de son mari en vertu d'une autorisation judiciaire provisoire. Valéry Manuel de Droit international privé, 1914, et Tobar 'Du conflit international au sujet de compétences pénales'—thèse de Fribourg (Suisse), 1910, p. 359-360, partagent cette opinion. Ozanam p. 84-85, Leven dans R.D.I., Pr. 4, p. 592, et la Rédaction de cette Revue, 5, p. 176-177, sont pourtant, et avec raison selon moi, de l'avis opposé. Cette dernière nie aussi en général l'extraterritorialité des femmes des membres de la légation autres que le ministre public lui-même. Quoique cela soit juste à mon avis, les arguments invoqués à cet effet l.c. me semblent avoir peu de valeur pour le droit des gens positif. Comp. aussi cette même Rédaction l.c. 4, p. 156. En Suisse, le Département de la Justice a admis implicitement en 1895 la doctrine de la sentence du Trib. de la Seine de 1878. Dans le même sens v. Liszt Das Völkerrecht, 10 ed., 1915, p. 133, Piétri "Etude critique sur la fiction d'extraterritorialité," thèse de Paris, 1895, p. 197."

"NOTE 1294.—V., outre la Rédaction de la R.D.I., Pr., citée à ce sujet dans la note 1293, Répertoire D.I. privé et de Droit pénal international 1. 1914, verbo citato No. 192, Despagne Cours de Droit international public, 4 ed., par de Boeck, 1910, No. 250, p. 345, note 2, et Ozanam, p. 82-84. Contrairement à ce dernier Jordan, préface d'Ozanam p. XII, prétend—ce qui est une affirmation exagérée—que l'extraterritorialité des personnes dont il s'agit ici est nécessaire pour que le personnel de la légation ne soit pas troublé dans son repos."

Maurice Travers in Le Droit pénal international, volume II, Paris, 1921, at p. 318 in the section headed "Personnes bénéficiant de l'immunité diplomatique de juridiction en matière pénale," states:—

"L'immunité ne s'étend pas aux membres de la famille de personnes composant la suite officielle de l'agent diplomatique, femme de secrétaire d'ambassade,* femme d'attaché militaire,† &c.

* Contra, rendu en matière civile, trib. Seine, 4 avril 1906. Reichenbach c. Ricoy, Cl. 1907, p. III.

† Contra, rendu en matière civile, trib. Seine, 31 juillet 1878, Dientz c. de la Jara, Cl. 1878, p. 500.

"Les raisons sont celles déjà données supra pour la famille du chef de la légation, de l'ambassade ou de la mission." [The reasons given are that none of the members of the family of the head of the mission has a representative character; none can act or speak in the name of a foreign State; none is invested with an official mission for which any independence is needed; none can say that an act affecting him or her affects the dignity of the foreign sovereign State.]

In the limited time at my disposal I have not been able to look at all the books which may possibly mention the subject. Moreover, even the Fry Library does not possess all the works to which I have found references. The above extracts are, however, sufficient, I think, to show that, although the text writers are not unanimous, the preponderance of opinion and the few recorded cases favour the view that wives of the diplomatic personnel of an embassy do enjoy diplomatic privilege.

May 23, 1939.

O. J. HUBBERT.

Annex C.

(Paper No. 8.)

[T 6451/282/373]

Belgian Embassy,
London, May 16, 1939.

My Lord,

IT has come to my notice that proceedings have been brought in the English courts by Mme. Hemeleers-Shenley against the British Linen Bank regarding securities actually in the name of Commandant Hemeleers-Shenley, Assistant Military Attaché in this embassy, but which she claims as her property.

I am not concerned with the ownership of these securities, a matter which is now submitted to the Belgian courts by both Commandant Hemeleers and his wife.

I wish, however, to point out that I have not given my consent to either Commandant or Mme. Hemeleers-Shenley waiving their diplomatic privileges to entitle either of them to submit to the jurisdiction of the English courts, whether in the capacity of a plaintiff or of a defendant.

I venture to bring this to your Lordship's notice, as I believe it to be recognised that the privileges cannot be waived without official consent, and I should therefore be very much obliged if your Lordship would take such steps as may be deemed advisable to have these matters brought before the notice of the court.

I am informed that Mr. Beckett, the Assistant Legal Adviser to the Foreign Office, has already been informally advised of the position.

I have, &c.

E. DE CARTIER.

GENERAL

[J 1094/118/16]

No. 1.

[March 17, 1939]

Foreign Office to the Law Officers of the Crown.

Gentlemen,

Foreign Office, March 1, 1939.

I HAVE the honour, by direction of His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to request that you will be so good as to favour him with your opinion in the matter indicated below.

2. Hitherto, His Majesty's Government have not concluded consular conventions with foreign countries, although it is the practice of almost every other country to conclude such conventions. In the past when the question of concluding such conventions has been considered the suggestion was abandoned because it was found that, in order to enable His Majesty's Government to accept many of the provisions which foreign countries habitually include in such conventions, somewhat complicated legislation in this country would be necessary. It has been found, however, that the absence of such conventions leads to doubt and difficulty with regard to the rights and status of British consuls abroad and also considerable dissatisfaction on the part of foreign Governments with regard to the position of foreign consuls in this country.

3. Further, owing to the disappearance of the Capitulations in Egypt it has become particularly necessary to conclude a convention with Egypt regulating the position of British consuls in that country. Under the convention for the abolition of the Capitulations in Egypt the status quo as regards most of the matters affecting the position of foreign consuls is maintained for a period of two years from October 1937 in order to permit the matter to be regulated in the interval by bilateral reciprocal arrangements.

4. Under the existing practice the only treaty arrangements concluded by His Majesty's Government with regard to consuls are, speaking generally, one or two articles dealing with particular matters and a general article providing for most-favoured-nation treatment subject to reciprocity. These articles are inserted in commercial treaties. The qualification providing for reciprocity in regard to each particular matter in these general articles, coupled with some uncertainty and misunderstanding as regards the position of foreign consuls in England, has rendered the provisions of this article of very uncertain value for the purposes of British consuls abroad. In the case of Egypt in particular, having in view the predominant British position in that country and the position which British consuls have held there in the past, it has been thought to be particularly undesirable that the position of British consuls in that country in the future should depend upon so uncertain a basis as the general article referred to above.

5. Reconsideration has therefore been given to the question of the conclusion of consular conventions, with Egypt in the first place and later with other countries and a draft consular convention has been prepared which it is hoped may improve the present position without entailing obligations which would require legislation in this country before they could be undertaken. It has been found that by suitable modifications in many provisions usually included in foreign consular conventions they can be adapted so as to render them consistent with the law and practice of this country. It is further hoped that in a consular convention drawn up on these lines, it would be possible to include a general most-favoured-nation provision which would be unconditional (i.e., not subject to reciprocity in detail) save so far as fiscal privileges were concerned. If conventions on these lines can be concluded with foreign countries, the Secretary of State is of the opinion that the position of British consuls abroad will be rendered considerably more satisfactory and further that certain difficulties as regards the position of foreign consuls in this country will be eliminated.

[21632]

E* 2

1939

12

GENERAL

6. Amongst the provisions included in the draft convention which has been referred to above are two articles, articles 9 and 10, and Lord Halifax desires your opinion on the question whether obligations in the terms of these articles could be entered into by His Majesty's Government without legislation. It has been suggested that the answer to this question is in the affirmative because these two articles are merely declaratory of general international law. The question is fully discussed in a memorandum by the Second Legal Adviser of this Department which is enclosed herewith, and the text of the articles appear as annex I to that memorandum. The Lord Chancellor, the Secretary of State for the Home Department and the Secretary of State for Scotland have been consulted with regard to this question and they see no objection to the proposed articles provided that you are of the opinion that they can be accepted without legislation. If you should be of a contrary opinion they would see no objection to the necessary legislation being introduced, but it would seem to be preferable to accept them on the basis that they are merely declaratory of rules of international law which would be recognised by the English courts if you consider that this course is possible. These departments have also been supplied with copies of the enclosed memorandum and, while expressing no opinion on the correctness of the conclusions drawn in that memorandum, have no further material to lay before you in this connexion.

7. The Lord Advocate and the Solicitor-General for Scotland are being consulted simultaneously as regards the position under Scottish law.

8. I am therefore to request your opinion whether you consider that, so far as England and Wales are concerned, in the light of the authorities on international law referred to in the enclosed memorandum, it would be justifiable for His Majesty's Government to enter into obligations in the terms of these articles without legislation. Lord Halifax would also be grateful for any observations of a general character which you may be good enough to make.

I have, &c.

D. V. KELLY.

LIST OF PAPERS.

1. Memorandum by Mr. W. E. Beckett respecting Articles 9 and 10 of the Draft Consular Convention (Confidential 15569): Annex.

Report.

We understand that there is no objection to altering the wording of paragraph 1 of article 10 so as to read as follows:—

“The consular officers of one high contracting party shall not be liable in proceedings in the courts of the territories of the other high contracting party, in respect of acts performed in their official capacity and falling within the functions of consular officers under international law.”

Although these words would cover criminal proceedings, we think the express mention of such proceedings might be regarded as indicating an intention that the paragraph should be given a wider construction than is, we think, intended. It is only in very exceptional circumstances, such as libel, that an official act would be a crime.

In view of the vast number of consuls in the world, it is remarkable that there is little, if any, judicial authority clearly dealing with the point raised. Nor is there any clear rule formulated and accepted by writers of text-books. There would therefore be difficulty in maintaining that the provisions of the proposed convention embodied a rule which nations accept among themselves, to use Lord Atkins's words quoted in the footnote on p. 1 of the case. Professor Brierley summarises the position by stating that consuls are not immune from civil or criminal proceedings, though there is a general sentiment that if possible these should not be allowed to interfere with their official duties or with the inviolability of the archives of the consulate. A general sentiment obviously falls short of an established rule. It is therefore by no means certain that the courts would regard the articles as embodying principles to be applied by English courts. We are, however, of opinion that, subject to the qualifications set out below, the courts would probably grant immunity to archives and protect from liability official acts, i.e., acts done under the express instructions or under the authority of the foreign Government. In spite of the confusion and absence of authority, we feel this is in conformity with the general principles applicable to foreign Governments, and there is at any rate a large body of opinion that some regard should be had in law to the official position occupied by consuls.

GENERAL

13

So far as official archives and papers are concerned, we presume that if the latter related to a contract excluded by paragraph 3 of article 10 from the operation of paragraph 1 of that article it is not suggested that the immunity would apply. We can also imagine official papers relating, for example, to some commercial matter in which the consul had played a part and which had become the subject of litigation. A refusal to produce such papers might be, or might be regarded by the court, as unreasonable, and, in the absence of a clear rule, the court might regard itself as entitled to order their disclosure. So far as official acts are concerned, one can distinguish acts done bona fide and acts which, though done or purporting to be done as consul, had an unofficial and improper motive. Suppose, for example, a libel in a consular report on a commercial firm could be shown to be due to malice or bribery by a competitor. The court might, we think, well hold that in such a case the consul was not protected from liability on the broad ground that the act, though official in form, was in substance personal. Difficult questions of this kind might arise even though the articles were given legislative effect.

We do not feel, therefore, that we can give a definite affirmative answer to the question put. There would be some risk if there was no legislation of the courts declining to give effect to the principles embodied in the articles or giving a more limited freedom from liability, though we agree with the suggestion put to us that the existence of such conventions would assist towards the establishment of the rules therein embodied. We think that it would be difficult to avoid legislation if the Government were pressed either by the foreign States or by persons interested here to remove all doubts. On the other hand, if no such pressure is brought and the Government feel justified in leaving the matter in some uncertainty, we think there are, for the reasons we have given, reasonable grounds for anticipating that the courts would give effect to the general principles embodied in the articles.

D. B. SOMERVELL.
T. O'CONNOR.

Law Officers' Department,
March 17, 1939.

[21632]

F*

ANNEX.

[J 338/118/16]

Memorandum by W. E. Beckett respecting Articles 9 and 10 of the Draft Consular Convention.

THE object of this memorandum is to consider whether the provisions of articles 9 and 10 of the Draft Consular Convention (the texts are given in Annex I) can be accepted by the United Kingdom without legislation.

2. The two relevant rules of English law are:

- (a) That international law is part of the common law and that English law recognises any privilege or immunity which international law requires.⁽¹⁾ This was so stated (inter alia) in the old cases of Barbuit (Cases tempore Talbot 281), and Triquet v. Bath and is still the law.
- (b) That the Crown cannot by treaty create a privilege or immunity not recognised by English law (Parlement belge, 1880, P.D. 197).⁽²⁾

(a) Preliminary Remarks.

3. In the end of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth centuries, the question was debated amongst the publicists and in the courts whether consuls were "public ministers" and as such entitled to all the privileges and immunities of diplomatic representatives, which include complete immunity from process in respect of official or private acts. After some divergence of opinion, the view prevailed everywhere that, as consuls had no "representative character" (i.e., were not intermediaries through whom matters of State were discussed between Government and Government), they were not, and therefore could not claim the general immunity and "extraterritoriality" which attaches to diplomatic representatives, except in eastern countries where extra-territorial jurisdiction prevailed and where consuls have the same immunities from the local law as public ministers.

4. For a short time after this, it seems to have been concluded that since they could not claim privileges as "public ministers," they could not claim any privileges at all. The old English cases of Heathfield v. Chilton, 4 Burr. 2015, and Barbuit's case belong to this stage of development. Then the view prevailed that, though consuls were not "public ministers," they had a status of their own under international law. They were appointed by commissions from their own Sovereigns, and received "exequaturs" from the Sovereigns of the foreign country of their residence to perform important duties as State agents. They

⁽¹⁾ The relation between international law and municipal law is a subject on which authorities differ. It is discussed in Wheaton, sixth edition, pp. 24-27, and in Oppenheim, fifth edition, volume 1, p. 36. Perhaps the best statement is in Wheaton at p. 27, "The true conclusion accordingly appears to be, as Westlake contended, that English Courts in matters within their normal jurisdiction as respects persons and places, must administer international law as well as the law of the land in its narrower sense, subject to the rules of that law which prevent the Crown divesting or modifying private rights by treaty, and forbid courts dealing with acts of State. In dealing with customary international law, the courts must clearly treat it as they do the common law, and must assist in developing its acknowledged principles in the same manner as they assist in developing those of the common law."

Lord Atkin in the recent Hong Kong murder case, Times Law Report, the 9th December, 1938, says: "It must be always remembered that, so far as the courts of this country are concerned, international law has no validity save in so far as its principles are accepted and adopted by our own domestic law. There is no external power that imposes its rules on our own code of law and procedure. The courts acknowledge the existence of a body of rules which nations accept amongst themselves. On any judicial issue they seek to ascertain what the relevant rule is, and having found it they treat it as incorporated into the domestic law so far as it is not inconsistent with rules enacted by statutes or finally declared by their tribunals."

⁽²⁾ McNair, The Law of Treaties, pp. 19-22, says that there exists some indirect and inconclusive authority for the view that an immunity from suit which the Crown agrees to confer upon the representatives of foreign States admitted to this country—including consuls—will be upheld by the court, even if it exceeds the ordinary requirements of international law and, in consequence, British municipal law. He quotes certain old Law Officers' Opinions and Fenton v. Krassin, 1922, 38 T.L.R. 259. As the authority is inconclusive, I have not relied upon this supposed exception to the ordinary rule.

were charged with the protection of the nationals of their country and their interests in the foreign country and the furtherance of trade. They were the representatives of their States with regard to its merchant shipping abroad, charged with important functions with regard to internal discipline on the vessels, and had a special duty with regard to the property in the country of nationals who had died. It was consequently recognised that consuls enjoyed under international law such protection and immunity as is required for the performance of these duties. The United Kingdom has always been justly regarded as the absolute "low water mark" in regard to consular status and privileges as compared with other countries, but the beginning of the view that consuls have some privileges is seen in the judgment of Lord Ellenborough in Viveash v. Becker, 1814 3 M & S 285, where a resident merchant of London who was a consul of a foreign prince was held not to be entitled to immunity from arrest on mesne process in respect of a private trading debt. Lord Ellenborough says the consul enjoys a special protection under the law of nations, including the right to the liberty and safety necessary for the discharge of his functions, and to safe conduct to enter and leave the country. In Clarke v. Cretico, 1 Taun 106, where the issue was the right of a consul to claim immunity from arrest, the court was at pains to decide on the ground that the man was no longer a consul rather than to deny any right for a consul to claim any privilege from arrest.

5. The scope of consular functions has very greatly increased during the last century, and now includes in addition to those mentioned in the preceding paragraph the issue of passports and travel documents to nationals and visas to foreigners; the registration of births, deaths and marriages of nationals and other duties in connexion with the nationality law of their countries; the celebration (in some countries) of marriages; the performance of the functions of a notary or commissioner for oaths; the issue of certificates with regard to merchandise. Their functions have always been such as involve much correspondence, with their Governments and with their diplomatic missions, of a secret and confidential character, and this tendency has increased in recent years owing to the fact that they report regularly and constantly for the information of their Governments on the political conditions in the country where they reside, e.g., movements of public opinion, signs of unrest, &c.

6. Foreign countries, almost with exception, have included consular conventions setting out in some detail the functions of consuls and the privileges and immunities which they should enjoy. The provisions of these conventions are partly declaratory of international law and practice and partly give privileges and immunities exceeding those which are required under general international law. The fact that a given privilege or immunity appears in a convention affords no indication that it is or is not something which rests upon convention only. The most that can be said is that if a given privilege or immunity appears in almost every convention that is concluded this is strong evidence, though not conclusive evidence, that this privilege or immunity is established under international law and practice of nations.⁽³⁾ In addition to various bilateral conventions there have been a number of draft general conventions prepared which purport to be a codification of the general law and practice with regard to consuls. In particular, such drafts were prepared by the Institute of International Law in 1896; by an Inter-American Committee of Jurists in 1927, which resulted in the signature of a pan-American Convention of consular agents at Havana in February 1928; and by the Harvard Law School Department of Research in International Law in 1932 in connexion with the

⁽³⁾ Wheaton says at p. 14: "What has been called the positive or practical law of nations may also be inferred from treaties; for though one or two treaties, varying from the general usage and customs of nations, cannot alter the international law, yet an almost perpetual succession of treaties, establishing a particular rule, will go very far towards proving what that law is on a disputed point." Wheaton then quotes Madison as saying: "Treaties may be considered under several relations to the law of nations, according to the several questions to be decided by them. They may be considered as simply repeating or affirming the general law; they may be considered as making exceptions to the general law, which are to be a particular law between the parties themselves; they may be considered explanatory of the law of nations on points where its meaning is otherwise obscure or unsettled, in which they are, first, a law between the parties themselves, and, next, a sanction to the general law, according to the reasonableness of the explanation, and the number and character of the parties to it; lastly, treaties may be considered a voluntary or positive law of nations."

League of Nations codification work. Except the general convention, signed in 1928 at Havana, which is in force as regards the United States and most of the Latin American countries, these are drafts only. As evidence of what the general rules and practice of international law are, they are perhaps of a little more weight than the bilateral conventions, but it is clear that some of their provisions, at any rate, go beyond the minimum requirements of international law.

(b) Article 9 of the Draft Consular Convention.

ARTICLE 9.

7. Article 9 provides:—

- (a) That consular officers may correspond with their Government by bag, post and cypher and that such correspondence shall be free from detention and examination (paragraphs 2 and 3).
- (b) That their official archives and papers shall be inviolable and they cannot be compelled to produce them in litigation or give evidence with regard to matters coming within their official duties (paragraphs 1 and 4).

8. The first part of these provisions (a) is one which can clearly be implemented without legislation since it only limits the action of the administration and does not affect other persons. It is a right which is enjoyed by foreign consular officers in the United Kingdom at present and it has been drafted with careful reference to the measures with regard to censorship proposed in time of war. In preparing these measures it was recognised that they must not interfere with this right. British consular officers abroad enjoy this right and the Foreign Office attach the greatest importance to their continuing to do so. It does not appear that provisions with regard to this matter are by any means invariably included in consular conventions though the Harvard model draft does so (article 13) and so does the treaty of 1924 between Italy and Czechoslovakia (article 9 (4) and (5)), and a treaty between the United Kingdom and Afghanistan of 1921 (schedule 2, paragraph 7). It seems desirable to include them in this draft convention.

9. The right is one which can be claimed under international law. The following authorities refer to it, though many say nothing about it. Hyde, International Law, Volume I, p. 799. Moore, Digest, Volume IV, p. 721, V, p. 98. Pradier-Fodéré, Traité de Droit international, Volume IV, p. 700. Institute of International Law: Annuaire, 1896, p. 307. Foreign Relations of the United States, 1897, pp. 501-2.

10. The inviolability of the consul's archives dealt with in the second of these provisions is justly stated by the Harvard Research Committee (p. 322) to be "the most universally recognised of all consular immunities." It may also be said to be the one most obviously essential for the carrying out of their duties. The necessity for it is hardly less than the necessity for the inviolability of the papers of a diplomatic mission, in view of the fact that consular papers frequently contain material whose secret and confidential character is practically as important as those of a legation. His Majesty's Government claim this right for their consulates abroad, e.g., the British Consular Instructions, 1921, Chapter I, paragraph 4, provide "They (consuls) cannot be compelled to disclose correspondence which has passed between themselves and any Department of His Majesty's Government, Dominion and Colonial Governments and British diplomatic and consular representatives. All such correspondence must be regarded as privileged and consular officers should refuse to disclose it pending the receipt of a reply to a reference home."

Practically every consular convention, bilateral or multilateral, and every draft prepared by research committees provides for this immunity, and, though a few authors do not mention it (e.g., Oppenheim), nearly every author asserts it and no author denies it.^(*) The following authors, inter alia, assert the right:—

Bluntschli: Droit international codifié, 1894, para. 268.

Phillimore: International Law, vol. II, p. 275.

Fiore: Le Droit international codifié, 1911, para. 376.

(*) Brierly (The Law of Nations, pp. 135-36) refers to it in rather uncertain terms as a general sentiment that if possible legal proceedings should not interfere with immunity of archives.

- Stewart: Consular Privileges, p. 35.
 Pradier-Fodéré: Traité de Droit international, 1888, vol. IV, p. 700.
 Hall: International Law, eighth edition, p. 375.
 Fauchille: Traité de Droit international, 1926, vol. I, Part III, p. 129, para. 760, p. 136 in 1935 edition.
 Anson: Law of Constitution, vol. II, Part II, p. 102.
 Hyde: International Law, vol. I, p. 799.
 Guerrero: Dictionnaire diplomatique, vol. I, p. 555.
 Bustamante: Droit international public, vol. I (1934), p. 410.
 Strupp: Eléments de Droit international public (1930), p. 229.
 Verdross: Völkerrecht (1936), p. 15.

The principle is asserted in regulations or official statements emanating from the following Governments:—

- Austria: Decree, April 1928, § 32.
 Belgium: Regulations for the Congo, §§ 3 and 4.
 Bolivia: Regulations of July 1887, Article 98.
 Brazil: Decree of November 1851, Article 19.
 Honduras: Law 1906, Article 35.
 Italy: Memorandum to United States Ambassador, October 1930.
 Japan: Order of Department of Justice, December 1923.
 Mexico: Law 1859, Article 29.
 Salvador: Law 1920, Articles 37 and 41.
 U.S.S.R.: Regulations of January 1927.
 Venezuela: Decree of 1883.

11. Fauchille (see above) says the rule is recognised by every country except England.^(*) This statement as regards England, which is certainly incorrect so far as His Majesty's Government are concerned, seems to rest on (1) a statement by W. B. Lawrence (the United States author) that the consular archives of the United States consular officer at Manchester were in 1850 seized in execution of a private debt of the consul—an incident which Hall's International Law says is fictitious; and (2) a statement in Calvo's Droit international, section 1395, that the archives of a consulate in London were seized as security for payment of taxes—M. Clunet investigated this alleged incident, and, on the authority of the Foreign Office and the Inland Revenue, relegated the story to the domain of fiction (J.D. 1, P. 1888, p. 66).^(*)

12. No case where the point has arisen in any English court has been found. In the case of Kessler v. Best, 121 Fed. Rep. 439 (1903), a Federal court of the United States upheld the right of a German consul to refuse to answer questions about documents in his archives, and on this application (supported by his minister) struck out certain answers to interrogatories which he had already given relating to these documents, on the ground that the privilege against disclosure belonged not to the consul but to the German Government. It would appear that there can be no doubt that consular archives and official papers are inviolable under international law: that the international rule is so clear that the English courts would recognise it, and that, therefore, paragraphs 1 and 4 of article 9 can be implemented in the United Kingdom without legislation. It is obvious that if the archives cannot be produced the consul cannot be compelled to testify orally to their contents or to testify orally to official acts or communications merely because they have not (yet) actually been recorded in writing.^(*)

(*) The same statement "except England" is found in Guerrero's article in the Dictionnaire diplomatique and in Morton, Les privilèges et les immunités diplomatiques (1927), p. 114.

(*) N.B.—Apart from the inviolability of the archives, they were certainly not the private property of the consul, and it is difficult to see how they could be seized to satisfy his personal debts.

(*) The last sentence of paragraph 4 of article 9 has been inserted because it has happened that subpoenas have been served on foreign consular officers to give (under compulsion) expert evidence on the law of their own country—a course which has rightly provoked protest from their Government. It is suggested that it is contrary to the law to subpoena an expert witness, whoever he may be (see Webb v. Page, 1 Carrington and Kirwass 23; a copy of the report is in Annex IV of this memorandum), apart from the fact that it is incorrect in the case of a consul because he only acquires knowledge of the law of his own country in his official capacity as consul.

(c) Article 10 of the draft Consular Convention.

13. Paragraph 1 of this draft article provides for immunity from process in respect of acts performed by a consul in the course of his official duties in the sense that, if a proceeding is brought and the court finds that it is based on an official act "falling within the functions of the consul under international law" this finding negatives liability. The question for consideration is whether there is authority for the existence of a rule of general international law to this effect sufficiently conclusive for His Majesty's Government to be reasonably sure that the English courts would recognise the rule. Paragraphs 2 and 3 merely define or qualify the provisions of paragraph 1; paragraph 2 making an exception to paragraph 1 where the consul's Government assents, and paragraph 3 making it clear that there is no immunity against an action in contract where the consul did not expressly contract as agent for his Government and the other party gave credit to the consul.

14. The authority which has to be considered on the question of the existence of this rule in international law is:—

- (a) official statements by Governments and laws and regulations issued by them: subsidiarily the provisions of conventions concluded by them;
- (b) the decisions of courts in proceedings brought against consuls recognising or denying the international rule;
- (c) the views expressed by the writers, including draft conventions prepared by unofficial bodies of international lawyers.

(a) Official statements by Governments and laws and regulations issued by them: Provisions of Conventions.

15. There are many official statements and regulations issued by Governments, which state generally that consuls cannot claim diplomatic immunity and are subject to the jurisdiction of the local courts and make no special reference to process relating to acts performed in their official capacity.^(*) No statements or regulations have been found which deny the existence of immunity specifically in regard to this class of acts. The immunity from process in respect of official acts is specifically recognised in the following official statements and regulations:—

Denmark.—Resolution of the 25th April, 1821:—

"Foreign consuls (whether of Danish or other nationality) do not come under the jurisdiction of the country so far as their consular affairs are concerned." (Feller and Hudson: Diplomatic and Consular Laws and Regulations, p. 411.)

Italy.—Memorandum from Italian Government to the United States Ambassador of October 1930:—

"As regards the prerogatives of consuls, it is to be noted that they are more restricted than those of diplomats . . . Immunity from the local jurisdiction is limited to acts performed by the consuls in the exercise of their functions, aside from special conventions." (Feller and Hudson, 1, p. 714.)

Sweden.—Memorandum from the Swedish Government to United States of America Legation of April 1930:—

"Through the application of international usage, as well as by virtue of various treaties, according to consuls under the conditions of reciprocity the benefit of the most-favoured-national treatment, the Swedish authorities would probably recognise for them exemption from jurisdiction for all acts attaching to their quality of public agents" (goes on to say that there have been no judicial decisions in Sweden on the point, as the Ministry for Foreign Affairs has been generally able to arrange settlements). Feller and Hudson, 1, p. 1156.

(*) The negative evidence of omissions to mention is never very strong: in this case it may, moreover, be explained in some instances on the ground discussed in paragraph 28 below.

U.S.S.R.—Regulations of the 14th January, 1927:—

"Article 11. The consular representatives of foreign States enjoy on basis of reciprocity the rights and privileges attached to their functions in conformity with the rules of international law. In particular the consular representatives—

- (a)
- (b)

(c) are not subject to the jurisdiction of the judicial institutions of the U.S.S.R. and of the Federated Republics because of offences committed in the discharge of their office." (Feller and Hudson, p. 1220.)

Switzerland.—A letter from the Swiss Federal Political Department to the judge of a court of the Canton of Berne, who had asked whether it was permissible to attach a bond deposited with a foreign consulate, gives the following ruling:—

"In principle consuls are subject to the jurisdiction of the receiving State except with regard to acts done in the exercise of their official duties and within the sphere of their authority. A seizure or attachment of property in the possession of a consul is permissible as in the case of any other third party, unless the property in question is held by the consul in the exercise of his internationally recognised official capacity or unless the consulate as such is the debtor.

This distinction may entail certain difficulties. If, as may be assumed, the bond is in the office of the consulate, the attachment cannot be effected under the provisions of Articles 91–109 of the Federal Execution and Bankruptcy Act. The consular archives enjoy immunity not only under general rules of international law, but also under positive provisions of particular conventions to which Switzerland is a party. For this reason representatives of the authorities of the receiving State are not allowed access to the consular archives without the consent of the principal officer in charge. Accordingly, a writ of execution against a consulate can never be issued in the usual form; in practice it will be couched in the form of a simple notice of the writ of attachment, thus being in substance a request for judicial assistance." (Annual Digest of Public International Law Cases, 1931–32, p. 337.)

United Kingdom.—No official pronouncement by the Government of the United Kingdom has been found, but Stewart (Consular Privileges, p. 151) records that in 1910, when two British seamen brought an action against a British consular officer in Cuba on a set of facts arising out of an official act by the consul, the Government of the United Kingdom took the matter up with the Cuban Government; that the Cuban Government transmitted the British Minister's note to the Cuban Supreme Court and the judgment of the Supreme Court admitted the principle that "in conformity with the principles of international law consular officers are not subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of the countries to which they are accredited in respect of acts performed in the exercise of their official character and in the name of the Government they represent."

In addition the law and regulations of the following countries direct these consuls to claim in foreign countries as essential for the service of their charge . . . "the freedom of those acts appropriate to their consular character." . . . "the freedom of those acts appropriate to their consular character." (Bolivia (article 93 of organic law for diplomatic and consular service); Bolivia (Regs. 1887: article 21); Chile (Regs. 1915, article 113); Costa Rica (Regs. 1888, article 27); Honduras (Law, article 40); Liberia (Regs. article 113); Uruguay (Regs. 1917, article 57); Dominica (Law, 1887, article 18); Ecuador (Regs. 1870, article 17).

16. Nearly all modern consular conventions contain an express provision on the following lines:—

"Consuls shall not be subject to the jurisdiction of the State in which they reside officially as regards the carrying out of their official duties." Article X of the Convention of March 1925, Germany/Estonia; cf. article 4 of Convention of March 1924, Italy/Czechoslovakia; article 5 of Convention of July 1924, U.S.S.R./Poland; article 4 of Convention of December 1925, France/Poland. But there are innumerable other instances.

Modern conventions generally also contain another provision providing for the immunity of consuls from arrest in all civil actions and from preventative detention except for very serious crimes (e.g., article 4 of convention of December 1925, France/Poland, &c.). The old consular conventions generally contain more or less extensive provisions with regard to immunity from arrest, but no provision dealing with immunity in respect of official acts (viz., the convention of 1853 between the United States and France), but nevertheless, the applicability of the rule of immunity for official acts as a rule of general international law has been recognised by the French courts to a United States consul in France (see Zizianoff v. Kahn and Bigelow: Case No. 11 in Annex II to this memorandum).

The Pan-American Convention signed at Havana in February 1928 to which the United States is a party provides in article 16:—

"Consuls are not subject to local jurisdiction for acts done in their official character and within the scope of their authority. In case a private individual deems himself injured by the consul's actions he must submit his complaint to the Government, which, if it considers the claim to be relevant, shall make it valid through the diplomatic channel."

(b) Judicial decisions.

17. There are very many judicial decisions given by courts in several countries in the case of proceedings brought against consuls in respect of private acts, which state that consuls have no immunity from process, and are in the same position as regards process as private persons and make no reference to any special rule as regards official acts.^(*) These are particularly numerous in the United States, where there are many reported cases dealing with proceedings against consuls, because there is a provision in the Constitution and in certain statutes of the United States giving the Federal courts exclusive jurisdiction in respect of all kinds of proceedings against consuls and to the Supreme Court a concurrent original jurisdiction. On the other hand, no reported case has been found in the courts of any country in which the process has been based on an official act, and the rule that there is immunity for official acts has been denied, and there are several cases where this rule has been recognised. Notes of some of these cases will be found in Annex II to this memorandum.

18. It will be seen that in the case of R. v. Ahlers (Case No. 1 in Annex II) the Court of Criminal Appeal in England quashed the conviction of the German consul at Sunderland, a British subject, for high treason for assisting German nationals of military age to return to Germany at the beginning of the war on the ground that the judge should have directed the jury to consider whether Ahlers acted in bona fide belief that it was his duty as consul to assist Germans to return to Germany. Though no doubt this decision is based on the principle that the jury's finding must be directed to the question of mens rea and no reference to any rule of international law was made, this decision is certainly not inconsistent with the recognition—in a very strong case—of the rule of immunity for consular acts and in fact applies this rule. Apart from this case, no reported decision has been found in which a consul has been liable in England for an official act, and no decision where a consul has been sued, pleaded immunity and succeeded. In an unreported case at Manchester Assizes in 1927 a husband brought an action for conspiracy to entice his wife away from him against his wife's parents and the Greek consul at Manchester—part but not the whole of the complaint against the consul was that he had supplied the wife with travel documents—and obtained damages against all the defendants. The consul did not plead immunity under the international law in respect of official acts and it was plain from the judge's summing up, of which a copy is in the Foreign Office, that the case against him was that he had gone far beyond his capacity as consul, and this was explained by the Foreign Office to the Greek Minister who had expressed concern about the case. The Greek Minister did not contest the correctness of the court's action in holding the consul liable in this case, but only expressed anxiety in case the proceedings showed that the English courts would entertain proceedings against foreign consuls in respect of acts which were official and he was assured that for the reasons given above the decision did not show this at all.

19. In the Canadian case of Maass v. Seelheim (Case No. 2), the consul did not plead immunity; he only pleaded qualified privilege in respect of a defamatory statement made in the course of his official duties and succeeded. Similarly, in Campbell v. Cour des Sessions générales de la Paix (Case No. 3), a Quebec case, the consul only pleaded complete immunity from the jurisdiction which was denied and did not plead that he had acted in the course of his official duties—it is doubtful if this could have been sustained on the facts. In the two other Quebec cases (noted in Annex II, Nos. 4 and 5) no question of official duties arose.

(*) Please see footnote to paragraph 15 above.

20. In the United States, no decisions have been found in which, apart from convention, either (1) a consul has pleaded immunity for official acts and the immunity has been denied in principle as opposed to cases where it was held on facts that the acts were not official; or (2) a consul has obtained the dismissal of action on the ground that the case arose out of official duties; but the principle that the court should not accept jurisdiction where the case does arise out of official acts seems to be recognised in Lyders v. Lund (Case No. 6), Patch v. Marshal (Case No. 7), (indirectly), in Castro v. de Uriate (Case No. 8) and in Commonwealth v. de Silvestro (Case No. 9).

21. In the French courts, the rule that under international law and apart from convention a French court has no jurisdiction to entertain proceedings against a foreign consul in respect of official acts seems to be firmly established and regularly applied—see Murphy v. L. Jortin (Case No. 10); Zizianoff v. Bigelow (Case No. 11); Khang v. Guthman (Case No. 12); Faucompré v. Polish Consul-General (Case No. 13) and Wemberg v. Hellevig (Case No. 14).

22. The position seems to be the same in the courts of Italy—see Little v. Riccio and Fischer (Case No. 15) and Mazzuchi v. American Consulate (Case No. 16).

23. The Lalezar case (Case No. 17) is an instance of the rule being recognised by the Persian courts and Case No. 18 a similar instance in Cuba. Case No. 19 may be an instance of the recognition of the rule by the Greek courts—but the ratio decidendi may in that case be the immunity of the consul's State. It is clear from paragraph 15 above that the rule is also recognised by the Swiss courts. In cases Nos. 20 and 21, the rule was recognised by the Egyptian Mixed Courts as regards consuls, who could not claim, as some consuls in Egypt could, the superior immunities of Diplomatic representatives.

24. It will be seen from the preceding paragraphs that on the basis of official Government statements and regulations and judicial decisions alone (and without relying on the opinions of writers), clear evidence for the recognition of the rule of immunity for official consular acts has been produced in the case of 19 countries, viz., Denmark, Italy, Sweden, U.S.S.R., Switzerland, U.S.A., France, Persia, Cuba, Salvador, Chile, Costa Rica, Bolivia, Honduras, Liberia, Uruguay, Dominica, Ecuador and Egypt, and no positive evidence of non-recognition in the case of other countries.

25. Annex III of this memorandum is a note prepared by Mr. Hubbert of the Foreign Office with regard to the opinions on this question expressed by writers on international law, many of whom merely state that consuls unlike diplomatic officers possess no immunity from process and make no reference to any special rule with regard to proceedings relating to their official acts, though (in some cases) stating that consuls have some special immunities. Into this class fall Phillimore (No. 2),⁽¹⁰⁾ F. de Martens (4), Féraud-Giraud (7), Hannis Taylor (10), Oppenheim (24), Moore Digest (25), Hyde (26), Pitt Cobbett (27), Wheaton (29), Strupp (32) and Pallieri (33).⁽¹¹⁾ It is thought that the weight to be attached to the purely negative evidence of omission of any reference to this point must be less than that to be attached to positive statements, especially as in all these works the subject of consuls is treated shortly in a chapter or part of a chapter in a general treatise. Moreover, in so far as the immunity of consuls in respect of official acts is regarded, as clearly some authors and judicial decisions regard it, as flowing from the immunity of their Governments rather than as a consular immunity (see paragraph 28 below), the omission to mention it in connexion with the discussion of consuls has still less significance. One author

⁽¹⁰⁾ The numbers correspond to the paragraph number in Annex III.

⁽¹¹⁾ Brierly (34) refers to a general sentiment that, if possible, proceedings should not be allowed to interfere with official duties.

only—Travers (14)—a writer on international penal law, expresses a definite opinion against the rule, an opinion which he admits to be contrary to French jurisprudence. The following seventeen authors, nationals of different countries, refer to exemption in respect of official duties in terms which imply—though with varying degrees of emphasis and confidence—that they consider it to be established law, viz.:—

Charles de Martens (1), French.
 Fiore (3), Italian.
 Pradier Fodéré (5), French.
 Halleck (6), American.
 Rivier (8), French (in favour of immunity from criminal process only).
 Calvo (9), Argentine.
 von Ullmann (11), German.
 E. C. Stowell (12), American.
 de Louter (13), Dutch.
 Hall (15), English.
 Fenwick (16).
 Fauchille (17), French.
 Stewart (18), American.
 Lapradelle and Niboyet (19), French.
 A. Heyking (20), ? Swedish.
 Irizarry y Puente (23), ? Spanish or Latin American.
 P. de Paepe (28), Belgian.
 François (30), Dutch.
 Fedozzi (31), Italian.
 Verdross (35), Austrian (criminal process only).

In addition, opinions in favour of the existence of this immunity were expressed by the League of Nations Preparatory Codification Committee of 1927 (21 of Annex III); by the Harvard Law School in 1932, Research in International Law, pp. 338-39; inter-American committee of jurists, 1927 (article 18 of draft); Institute of International Law, 1896 (article 5). In effect, every author, or committee of experts, who treat the question of consuls in any detail express views in favour of the existence of the rule.

26. Hall appears to treat the exemption as something almost too obvious to need stating, as he simply says: "For obvious reasons a consul is not liable to the courts for acts done by order of the Government from which he holds his commission." It would seem that routine acts done in the course of his ordinary consular duties must be intended to be covered by these words. The Harvard Law School say that the exemption "is a consequence of the rule of general international law regarding the recognised public acts of one State in the territory of another. The performance of such an act should entail no responsibility, either civil or criminal, on the officer performing such an act." It is further argued (see, for example, Irizarry y Puente, Annex III, No. 23) that the official acts of a consul are to be regarded like the administrative acts of the consul's Government, and that for the local courts to exercise jurisdiction over them is equivalent to their exercising jurisdiction over the governmental acts of a foreign Government. It is further contended that the immunity results by implication from the fact that the consul possesses a commission from his own sovereign to perform consular duties and an exequatur from the sovereign of the country where he resides agreeing to his performing them, and from the fundamental principle that the consul must have such immunities as will enable him to carry out his duties, and the fact that he could not carry them out properly if he was liable to the jurisdiction of the local courts in regard to them.

27. It is, perhaps, desirable to consider whether the immunity of the consul from process in respect of his official acts is covered otherwise than by a specific rule relating to consular acts. It is, of course, true that, as the law of the country where the consul resides does not enjoin upon him the performance of any consular functions, he could not be liable under that law and before the local courts for mere failure to perform them. But this would not cover nearly all the ground, as a person, who is under no pre-existing obligation to perform any service, may become liable for failure to perform it or for performing it negligently or too late, if he undertakes to do so, especially if (as often for consular services) he receives payment for it. Further, a consul would not be exempt on this ground against claims that, in the course of his official duties, he had committed a tort, such as defamation in a consular report, or false imprisonment or malicious prosecution in cases where he had ordered a seaman from one of his ships to be imprisoned on board, as it is part of his duty to do in certain circumstances.

28. It must next be considered whether the immunity of a consul for his official acts is covered by the immunity of his Government from process. It is clear that in some cases the immunity of the foreign State does cover the official acts of its consul, e.g., actions based on a contract which the consul has concluded as agent for his Government and process against consular property which belongs not to the consul but to his Government (vide, for example, Annex II, Cases No. 6, No. 13 and No. 19 and Annex III, No. 25, instances quoted in Moore's Digest). (In cases where the consul has not contracted as agent for his Government and the other party has given credit to the consul, it is proper that there should be no immunity, vide paragraph 3 of article 10 of the draft convention, Annex I.) Further, perhaps the principle that an agent of the Crown is not liable for breach of warranty of authority to conclude a contract (Macbeath v. Haldimand, L.T.R. 172) also applies to the agent of a foreign Government, but no case on this point has been found.

29. But in cases of tort, the usual principle is that the orders of the principal are no defence to the agent, and this principle applies to the servants of the Crown. Is it the case that the orders of a foreign sovereign are in all cases a defence to an action in tort against his agent—whether consul or otherwise? If the immunity of a foreign sovereign extends so far, then no doubt it does cover most, if not all, the cases while the consul could be sued in regard to matters arising out of his official duties, and there is little necessity for any special rule with regard to consuls. Certainly some of the arguments referred to in paragraph 26 above as to the grounds on which the immunity of official consular acts rests, and the reasoning of some of the foreign decisions in Annex II (e.g., Nos. 15 and 16), suggest at first sight such a view as to the scope of the immunity of foreign Governments. The Italian writer Fedozzi (Annex No. III) puts the immunity expressly on this ground. If this view as regards the scope of the immunity of a foreign sovereign is correct, no doubt the English courts will give effect to it and Article 10 of the draft convention can be accepted because it is covered in this way. Moreover, if the ground for the immunity of the consul in respect of his official acts is regarded as a branch of the immunity of his Government (as it is in the minds of some authors), then a failure to mention it in treating of consuls is explained and the omission becomes of no significance as regards the existence or otherwise of the immunity.

30. I am not sure, however, whether in England, at any rate, the immunity of a foreign sovereign does protect his agents of any kind in respect of torts committed by them as agents, and if this is so in case of torts a fortiori in the case of crimes.⁽¹²⁾ There is little authority on the point, but I notice that in the case of Vavasseur v. Krupp 1878, 9 Ch., where an agent of the Emperor of Japan introduced shells into England which violated the plaintiffs' patent rights, there are dicta (at pp. 355 and 358) to the effect that an action for damages will be against the agent, although the shells—the Emperor's property—must be released. I also notice that in an opinion given on the 9th August, 1855, Attorney-General Cushing of the United States stated that violations of United States Foreign Enlistment Acts by foreign consuls would be punishable in the courts. These acts were of course outside consular duties, but done on the orders of their Governments. Moreover, in the arguments referred to in paragraph 26 and in the foreign decisions stress is laid on the words "recognised public acts," "administrative acts," that is to say, that they are acts of a certain character of a foreign Government, and the most solid basis for the rule as regards consular acts is that the consul is received by the country where he resides as a consul to perform consular duties as the officer of the foreign State—considerations which do not apply to any person who acts as agent for a foreign Government—and it must be implied from this that the consul shall enjoy independence from the local jurisdiction as regards the performance of his consular duties. I think it is safer therefore to base the immunity on the narrower ground of an express immunity for official consular acts for which there is so much specific authority rather than on an extension of the immunity of a foreign sovereign which would cover the acts of agents who were not diplomats or consuls and held no official office recognised by the State on whose territory the acts were performed.

⁽¹²⁾ It seems unlikely that many consular acts done in the performance of official duties recognised by international law could be criminal, and in any case most prosecutions are in England Crown prosecutions, where it is open to the Law Officers of the Crown, the Director of Public Prosecutions or the police to prosecute or not to prosecute.

1939

31. I think that it can hardly be contested that it is an immunity essential for the proper discharge of consular duties that a consul should be immune from process in the local courts in respect of them. The instances of possible actions if this principle is not recognised referred to in paragraph 27 above show the dangers to which he would otherwise be subject. No doubt other instances could easily be given. In the interest of the performance of their functions by British consular officers abroad, His Majesty's Government have every reason to uphold the principle. As indicated in 15 above, on one occasion His Majesty's Government invoked the principle to relieve a British consul, and the cases quoted in Annex II show a number of cases where British consuls have benefited by the recognition of this principle by foreign courts. In countries where the local courts are sometimes biased or open to improper influence the position of British consuls would be particularly difficult. Further, if foreign consuls were held liable in this country in respect of consular acts, it seems certain that strong protests from their Governments would follow. The recognition of the immunity in this case does not of course mean that if a British subject is wrongfully injured by the official act of a foreign consul there is no remedy, but merely that the remedy must be sought through the Foreign Office and the diplomatic channel as is the practice in the case of diplomatic officers, and, speaking generally, this remedy is not less efficacious and is certainly cheaper than recourse to the courts. The taking up of a case with the diplomatic mission is itself a strong means of pressure which is generally sufficient, and as a last resort in a flagrant case the exequatur can be withdrawn. Moreover, in some cases waiver of the immunity may be asked for and given. Indeed, in certain cases it may be the consul's own Government which desires that the consul should be punished or made personally liable. Requests have been received for the prosecution of foreign consuls for peculation, and Case No. 3 is another type of case where a request for prosecution might have been made by the consul's Government. It would be for the court to decide whether a given case fell within the scope of consular duties or not, but no doubt it would pay great weight to any views on this point expressed to it by or on behalf of the Law Officers. It is not thought that there is any danger of any undue extension being given to consular duties such as would lead to a consul being held exempt from penalties for driving a motor car contrary to the law because he was on his way to his office and not on the return journey home.

32. The legal authority referred to in the preceding paragraphs in favour of the existence of the rule seems to be no less than that which can be cited in support of most international rules and sufficient to secure the recognition of the rule by the English courts. If the rule were embodied in a convention to which His Majesty's Government were a party, the courts would be even more disposed to recognise it.

W. E. BECKETT.

January 17, 1939.

ANNEX I.

ARTICLE 9.

The archives and all other official documents and papers kept in a consulate shall at all times be inviolable and the local authorities may not under any pretext examine or detain any of these documents or papers. The archives and official papers of a consulate shall always be kept completely separate from all papers, books or correspondence of the consular officers relating to other matters.

2. In the territory of each high contracting party, the consular officers of the other high contracting party may correspond with their Government or with the diplomatic mission under whose superintendence they are, by post and telegraph. In addition, consular officers may send and receive such correspondence by bag and in the case of telegrams use cipher. This right shall also extend, except when the high contracting party in whose territory the consular officers are resident is at war, to correspondence with other Governments of the same high contracting party and colonial protectorate and mandated territory Governments of that high contracting party and with other consulates and diplomatic missions of that high contracting party. Further, if the high contracting party, in whose territory the consular officers are, is at war, such high contracting party may subject the use of cipher in telegrams to such conditions as are necessary in the interests of national security.

3. The consular correspondence referred to in the preceding paragraph shall be inviolable and the local authorities shall not examine or detain it. In special cases they may, however, request that a bag should be opened by the consular officer in their presence in order to satisfy themselves that the bag does not contain anything except correspondence.

4. Consular officers and their employees shall be entitled to refuse requests from the courts or local authorities of the country where they reside to produce documents from their archives or other official papers or to give evidence relating to matters within the scope of their official duties. Such requests shall, however, be complied with in the interests of justice if it is possible to do so without prejudicing the interests of the high contracting party appointing them. Consular officers are also entitled to decline to give evidence as expert witnesses with regard to the law of the territories of the high contracting party by whom they are appointed.

ARTICLE 10.

1. The consular officers of one high contracting party shall not be liable, in criminal or civil proceedings, in respect of acts performed in their official capacity and falling within the functions of consular officers under international law.

2. The provisions of paragraph 1 of this article do not apply if the high contracting party by whom the consular officers were appointed requests or assents through his diplomatic representative to the proceedings.

3. It is understood that the provisions of paragraph 1 of this article do not preclude consular officers from being held liable in civil actions arising out of contracts concluded by the consular officer, in which the officer did not expressly contract as agent for his Government and in which the other party looked to the consul personally for performance.

ANNEX II.

CASE NO. 1.

R. v. Ahlers 1915 1 K.B. 616 (England).

Ahlers was a British subject by naturalisation and German consul at Sunderland. He was prosecuted for high treason, viz., aiding King's enemies in that he assisted German subjects of military age to return to Germany after the declaration of war, and convicted.

Held by the Court of Criminal Appeal who quashed the conviction that jury should have been directed that they must consider whether Ahlers acted with intention of assisting King's enemies or in bona fide belief that it was his duty as consul to assist Germans to return to Germany (see p. 625).

CASE No. 2.

Maass v. Seelheim, 1936, 4 D.L.R. 267.

The plaintiff brought an action for libel and slander in the Dominions courts in Manitoba against the German consul in respect of a report written by the defendant about the plaintiff, a German national, to the plaintiff's superior officer in a German shipping line. The statements were prima facie defamatory, but the defendant pleaded qualified privilege on the ground that the words were written by him bona fide and without malice in the course of his official duties as consul, and the action was dismissed on this ground.

The defendant did not apparently plead immunity from the jurisdiction because the matter arose out of his official duties and there is no pronouncement by the court on this point.

CASE No. 3.

Campbell v. Cour des Sessions générales de la Paix, 49 Quebec Law Reports, King's Bench 65.

In this case Campbell appealed to the Court of King's Bench in Quebec against a judgment of an inferior court refusing to dismiss a prosecution against him for taking money for assisting certain persons to enter the United States by means of false nationality declarations. He claimed that it should be dismissed because he was a consul and as such possessed immunity. The report merely records that the Court of King's Bench dismissed the appeal because "under the English doctrine applied in Canada, consuls are not diplomatic representatives and do not enjoy personal immunity." The report does not state of what country he was a consul, whether he was de carrière or not and whether his Government had acquiesced in or even asked for the prosecution. He may have been a United States Consul, and, in view of the facts, the United States Government may well have requested the prosecution. The question whether the facts complained of could be said to be within his official duties was not raised.

CASE No. 4.

Maluquer v. R., 1924, Quebec Reports, King's Bench 1.

Maluquer, Spanish Consul at Montreal, was convicted of conspiracy with two other persons to defraud the revenue by importing into Canada goods on false documents to avoid payment of customs duty and for importing narcotic drugs. The house where his consulate was situated was searched under a warrant issued by the court and a number of letters and papers seized. Maluquer pleaded not guilty and opted for speedy trial before a magistrate. Maluquer appealed from his conviction on various grounds, including the ground that the search and seizure of papers at the consulate was illegal under international law.

Held, that even if search was illegal it would not render trial void; that consul possessed no personal immunity from suit;⁽¹³⁾ that his official residence enjoys no inviolability from search except as regards the archives and official papers (citing Hall's International Law).

CASE No. 5.

Leonard v. Premio Real, 1885, 11 Quebec Law Reports 128.

Action for a private debt against Spanish Consul. Immunity claimed on the ground that he was not only Spanish Consul, but the only representative of Spain in Canada. Rejected because he had not proved he was entrusted with more than consular duties. Foelix cited, to the effect that consuls are justiciable by tribunals "quant à leurs affaires privées."

⁽¹³⁾ N.B.—No question of the act being done in the course of official duties was or could have been raised here.

CASE No. 6.

Lyders v. Lund, Consul. United States, District Court, N.D. California.
April 12, 1929 (Kerrigan, District Judge).

The Facts.—This was an action in equity brought by an American citizen against Lund, "as consul of Denmark at San Francisco," seeking an accounting for disbursements and fees as attorney to the consulate and a sale of certain assets assigned to plaintiff as security. The defendant appeared specially, "as consul," and moved to dismiss the action on the ground that it was a suit against the consul of Denmark in his official capacity. It was contended that this amounted to an action against the Government which he represented. Upon the motion,

Held, that the motion to dismiss should be denied. The suit was not against the Government. The court said: "In actions against the officials of a foreign State not clothed with diplomatic immunity, it can be said that suits based upon official authorised acts performed within the scope of their duties on behalf of the foreign State, and for which the foreign State will have to respond directly or indirectly in the event of a judgment, are actions against the foreign State. Acts of such officials, beyond the scope of their authority and in connexion with their private business, cannot be regarded as acts of the foreign State, and the official may be sued on account of any such acts. . . . The Kingdom of Denmark is not joined as a defendant in the suit, nor has it been made clear that, as between that kingdom and the defendant consul, such transactions as those sued upon are not considered as the personal acts and liabilities of the consul in the event of suits by third parties."

CASE No. 7.

Patch v. Marshall, 1853, 1 Curt 452 (U.S.A.).

Action for damages by member of crew, a United States citizen, against captain of British ship, a British subject domiciled in United States, arising out of events connected with voyage from Boston to Cuba and back. District Court decided in favour of plaintiff. Defendant appealed. British consul intervened and contended the United States had no jurisdiction because the investigation of claim would call in question official acts and conduct of consul in regard to British subjects. The intervention was dismissed on grounds:—

- (1) If intervention was successful appeal would be dismissed and decision against captain of District Court would stand;
- (2) It would be a denial of justice to plaintiff for United States courts to hold that they had no jurisdiction against this British captain who was domiciled in the United States;
- (3) "It is true that this court should not call in question a British Consul for his official acts respecting crew of British vessel in a foreign port."⁽¹⁴⁾ It is correctly stated in the protest that he is responsible solely to his own Government or if to individuals such responsibility arises out of the law of his own country, which this court would not undertake to administer. But it does not follow that the conduct of the master of the vessel in procuring official intervention of an American citizen by imprisonment in a foreign jail is not here investigated.

CASE No. 8.

Castro v. De Uriate, 16 Fed. Rep. 93, 1883.

Action against defendant, Consul-General for Spain, for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution in connexion with extradition proceedings for extradition of plaintiff which consul had instituted in official capacity. Dismissed, but on finding no malice and that probable cause must be presumed.

⁽¹⁴⁾ Cf. Chester v. Benner Fed. Cases 2 660, where it was stated that in suits between master and crew an imprisonment by order of a consul must be assumed to have been necessary.

CASE No. 9.

Commonwealth v. di Silvestro, 31 Pa. Supr. Ct. 537.

United States courts have no concern in alleged abuses by foreign consuls in charging fees or in expending money entrusted to them by foreign Governments.

CASE No. 10.

Murphy v. Lee Jortin, Clunet, 1900, p. 130 and 958.

The defendant, British Vice-Consul at Dieppe, was summoned before the "tribunal correctionnel" at Dieppe for defamation because he told the plaintiff in the office of the vice-consulate, before three witnesses, that he was a drunkard. The remark was made because the plaintiff complained that the defendant had not assisted the plaintiff in connexion with the latter's arrest by the local authorities.

Held that (1) the remarks were made by the defendant in the performance of his official functions;

(2) That consuls, though they do not possess the extritoriality and exemption from jurisdiction of diplomats, and are subject in France to the criminal law and the jurisdiction of the courts, are "public officers of a foreign sovereign" invested with the function of defending the interests of their nationals; and consequently possess a personal immunity "tant qu'ils restent dans les limites de leurs fonctions officielles et que l'ordre public n'est pas compromis." This is not an exemption from jurisdiction, but an essential immunity resulting from the institution of consulates and required by rules of international comity; consuls could not perform their functions with the necessary independence if they could be proceeded against by their nationals in respect of matters coming within the sphere of their official functions;

(3) That for the reasons given above the court must declare itself incompetent to decide whether the statements made by the defendant were defamatory or not. The editorial note in Clunet approves the decision and refers to V. Lehr: Agents diplomatiques et consulaires, n. 128, 64 et seq. The above decision was confirmed by the Court of Appeal at Rouen on precisely the same grounds (Clunet 1900, p. 858). Murphy brought a further action against Lee-Jortin for defamation because the latter had written a letter to The Times (reproduced in a local Dieppe paper), in which he defended his action in refusing to assist Murphy, and stated inter alia that Murphy had claimed untruly to be an officer of the army; had been arrested for breaking a street lamp and brandishing a revolver, and had falsely stated that his wife was a sister of the wife of the British Ambassador at Paris.

Held by Dieppe tribunal (1) that this letter was not written by defendant in his official capacity, and therefore the tribunal was competent;

(2) That statements were made without malice and with intention to serve public interest and to defend his reputation. This judgment was confirmed by the Court of Appeal at Rouen.

CASE No. 11.

Zizianoff v. Kahn and Bigelow, Annual Digest, 1927-28, p. 384.

Prosecution for defamation against director of passport section of United States consulate at Paris, because he, after refusing a visa to Zizianoff, issued to journalists information defamatory of Zizianoff. Bigelow claimed no jurisdiction on two alternative grounds: (1) on basis of consular treaty (not relevant); (2) on ground that the act was done in the course of official duties and under rule of international law there is no jurisdiction.

Courts held as to (2), that the rule is admitted, but the act complained of was distinct from the official act of refusing a visa, and not in course of official duties.

CASE No. 12.

Khanghi v. Guthman. Justice de Paix mixte at Damascus: Clunet 34, p. 980.

Action against Austrian Consul for damage to a car which he had hired. Held by the tribunal:

(1) That as a matter of general international law and apart from convention, members of the consular corps enjoy like members of the diplomatic corps immunity from the jurisdiction in civil matters if obligations contracted by them in their official capacity and in the limits of their powers are in question.

(2) That this immunity rests on the basis that consular and diplomatic agents represent in the exercise of their functions the sovereign authority of the country which has appointed them and that to exercise jurisdiction over these acts would be to exercise jurisdiction over a foreign sovereign authority (a decision of the Cour de Cassation of the 30th June, 1884, is cited in support of this proposition).

(3) That in the course of the 19th century the immunity of a diplomatic agent has been extended to cases which he has dealt with in a purely private capacity and relating to purely civil matters having no connexion with his official duties, matters relating to real property and commercial matters when the agent engages in commerce excepted.

(4) The above states the position under international law in an ordinary western country, but Christian consuls in non-Christian countries enjoy privileges more extensive than those enjoyed by consuls in Christian countries. In particular, they enjoy full diplomatic immunity as regards the jurisdiction civil and criminal.

(5) For this reason the action against the Austrian Consul must be dismissed.

CASE No. 13.

Faucompré v. Polish Consul-General. France, Civil Tribunal of Lille, May 7, 1932.

The Facts.—An action was brought before the "Président des référés" (15) against the Polish Consul-General, in his capacity as representative of the Polish Government, with regard to the lease of the consular premises. The consul invoked jurisdictional immunity.

Held: that the French courts had no jurisdiction. "A foreign State is in general immune from the jurisdiction of another State." The Président des référés had no competence to hear the action brought against the consul. "The inclusion in the lease of a clause providing for the submission to the jurisdiction of the place of domicile is without effect in view of article 4 of the Franco-Polish Consular Convention of 30th December, 1925, which provides that the courts will refrain from jurisdiction when an agent invokes diplomatic [sic] immunity."

NOTE.—This decision conforms with other French decisions on the subject. Before 1840 the French Courts refused to grant immunity from jurisdiction to consular agents, but from 1840 onwards this attitude has been reversed (see the decisions mentioned in Challine, Le droit international public dans la jurisprudence française de 1789 à 1848 (1934), pp. 208-222). Contemporary jurisprudence has confirmed this change: see the decision of the Conseil d'État of the 22nd March, 1929, in Ministre des finances v. Héritiers X (Annual Digest, 1929-1930, Case No. 213); and the decision of the Civil Tribunal of the Seine of the 30th October, 1929 (Dalloz hebdomadaire, 1930, p. 15). It will be noted that the immunity granted to consuls applies only to their official activities, as distinguished from purely personal acts.

CASE No. 14.

Wemberg v. Hellevig. Civil Tribunal of Marseilles, December 28, 1912.

The plaintiffs sued the defendant, the German Consul at Marseilles, because they had been dismissed from employment at the German Seamen's Mission at Marseilles without notice. The consul acted as president and manager of the mission on the orders of the German Government and in his official capacity.

(15) This is a summary jurisdiction concerned mainly with decreeing conservatory measures.

The tribunal held that it had no jurisdiction, because, although the consul possessed no complete immunity from the jurisdiction of a French court, the act complained of was one performed by the consul in the course of his official duties, and the French courts cannot assume jurisdiction over acts done by consuls on the orders of their Government.⁽¹⁶⁾

In a case in March 1913 brought against the consul of Colombia at Marseilles, the same tribunal accepted jurisdiction expressly stating as the ground of its doing so that the cause of action had nothing to do with his official functions.

CASE No. 15.

Little v. Riccio and Fischer 1934, Clunet, p. 1071, Court of Appeal at Naples.

The Court of Appeal declared itself incompetent to entertain an action arising out of a contract of employment relating to a cemetery maintained for the burial of British subjects at Naples and owned by His Majesty's Government, against the British Consul-General on the ground that the consul-general represented his country in concluding this contract, and in the arrangements made for the maintenance of the cemetery His Majesty's Government were exercising "un droit public."⁽¹⁷⁾

CASE No. 16.

Mazzucchi v. American Consulate. Italy, Court of Appeal of Naples, April 7, 1931.

The Facts.—Mazzucchi, who had been employed at the American Consulate at Naples, was dismissed in August 1930. The nature of his duties is stated below. On the 30th October he brought an action before the Court of Naples asking for compensation for wrongful dismissal. The court dismissed the action on account of lack of jurisdiction. On appeal, Held: that the court had no jurisdiction. "Consuls do not possess the true and proper quality of representing the State in its international political relations; neither are they diplomatic agents. Nevertheless, in fulfilling their mission and in exercising the powers belonging to them they must be considered as official agents of the Governments by whom they are appointed. It follows that, if consuls enter into relations with private persons in order to carry out duties which appertain to the political activity of the State which they represent, no action in respect of such relations can be brought before the courts since a foreign State cannot, in the exercise of its political functions, be subjected to the jurisdiction of another State without suffering a denial of its sovereignty. If, on the other hand, consuls engage in private activities, then they assume the character of foreign private persons, and as such are admitted to the enjoyment of the civil rights which the law confers upon citizens. In such a case consuls are subject to the jurisdiction of the Italian courts.

"In the dispute in question the plaintiff maintains that this court can hear his claim having regard to the fact that the modest duties entrusted to him were not of a consular character. In fact, he asserts that he had first the task of disinfecting emigrants, and then that of stamping the papers issued by the American Consul so as to make it possible to ascertain, at the moment of embarkation, that the emigrants had been medically examined by the sanitary officer of the consulate. He does not appreciate that, although his duties were simple, they were nevertheless still relative to a service of a political nature which the American State carries on in Italian territory by means of its consuls.

"In order to be able to declare whether Mazzucchi should have a right to compensation, the Labour Court would have to ascertain, as a preliminary step, whether the cause of the dismissal was just. It would have to submit to examination the motives which led the consul to dismiss a person employed in a service of a political nature. It would have to give judgment on a step taken by the consul with regard to the execution of a duty which has its origin in the sovereignty of a foreign State. Such examination and judgment lie outside the jurisdiction of the Italian courts."

⁽¹⁶⁾ N.B.—No consular treaty was relied upon in this case.

⁽¹⁷⁾ N.B.—In Italy the immunity of foreign States from the jurisdiction is only recognised as regards their "public acts" as opposed to acts performed by States which are considered not to be of an essentially public character, viz., commercial contracts, &c.

CASE No. 17.

Lalezar v. His Britannic Majesty's Consul at Kermanshah, 1933 (Persia).

This was an action against the consul for damages for delay in refunding a sum of money paid.

Held that no action lies against consul in respect of measure taken in discharge of official duties and the matter must be taken up with consul's Government through the diplomatic channel.

CASE No. 18.

Extract from judgment of Supreme Court of Court of Cuba in 1910—action by two British seamen against consul in respect of acts performed in his official capacity.

"Notwithstanding all this, there is no objection to admitting, with a view to avoiding future difficulties, the claim that charges made against foreign consuls should not be recognised by the judges when it is evident that the matter in complaint is an act performed by the consul in his official character for which he is responsible to his Government alone, since in conformity with the principles of international law consular officers are not subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of the countries to which they are accredited in respect of acts performed in the exercise of their official character and in the name of the Government that they represent, as the British Minister states in his note as the basis of the claim.

It is agreed therefore to advise the judges . . . that they should not recognise charges that are made before them against foreign consular officers when it is evident that the matter which is the object of the complaint does not come within the jurisdiction of the Cuban courts because the act performed by the consul was done in his official character for which he is responsible to his Government alone."

(The decision is published in No. 128 of the Gaceta Oficial, p. 5623.) Quoted from Stewart, 1. c. p. 151.

CASE No. 19.

Consular Premises (Greece) Case. Greece, Court of Athens, 1931.

The Facts.—This was a case of distress levied for rent of the premises occupied by the British Consul-General in Athens. The consul appealed on the ground of immunity from jurisdiction.

Held (by a majority), that the distress was invalid. Although a foreign State did not enjoy jurisdictional immunities with regard to acts of a private law nature, such as contracts of sale, relations of landlord and tenant, lending of money, &c., the renting of premises for the purposes of consular service was an act of a public character having reference to the exercise of sovereign rights of the foreign State. Such acts were covered by the privilege of immunity from jurisdiction.

The court also pointed out: (a) that diplomatic representatives, including consuls performing diplomatic functions, enjoyed immunity with regard to all acts whatsoever, including acts in the field of private law. This was so in order to safeguard the inviolability of diplomatic envoys and the unhampered exercise of their duties; (b) that it was not necessary to go into the question whether execution was admissible with regard to such acts of foreign States as were of a private law nature seeing that "one must assume that a foreign State will voluntarily submit to execution."

CASE No. 20.

Immunité.—Le décret du 1^{er} mars 1901 réglant la situation juridique des fonctionnaires diplomatiques et consulaires étrangers consacre deux principes distincts, celui de l'immunité de juridiction lorsqu'ils agissent dans l'exercice de leurs fonctions, et celui de la compétence de la juridiction mixte lorsqu'ils n'agissent pas dans l'exercice de leurs fonctions.

Aux termes du traité d'amitié conclu le 28 novembre 1928 entre l'Égypte et la Perse, les sujets persans sont justiciables des tribunaux indigènes, sauf le cas où, comme représentants diplomatiques ou consulaires de leurs pays et dans l'exercice de leurs fonctions officielles, ils bénéficient du privilège d'extraterritorialité.

Égypte, Cour d'Appel mixte, 7.3.'35.—Ahmed Bey El Saadani/El Sayed Mohamed Dessouki.—B. de J. et L. ég., 1934/35, p. 192. (Bulletin de l'Institut juridique international. Vol. 33, p. 309.)

CASE No. 21.

Immunité.—L'immunité juridictionnelle absolue prévue au décret du 1^{er} mars 1920 ne vise que les fonctionnaires diplomatiques ou consulaires missi et leurs familles, soit pour les affaires concernant leurs fonctions officielles soit pour les affaires d'ordre privé, à moins qu'ils ne s'occupent de commerce ou d'industrie ou possèdent ou exploitent des immeubles en Égypte, auquel cas ils sont soumis, pour ce qui concerne les susdites affaires, à la juridiction mixte, tandis que les fonctionnaires diplomatiques ou consulaires qui ne sont pas missi et leurs familles ne jouissent d'aucune immunité juridictionnelle, sauf pour les affaires concernant leurs fonctions officielles.

Alexandrie, Tribunal sommaire mixte, 3.4.'34.—Curt Boehme/Laura Stross.—G. d. T. M., 1936, p. 221. (Bulletin de l'Institut juridique international, Vol. 36, p. 273.)

ANNEX III.

Statements in Text-Books on International Law relating to the Liability of Consuls for Acts performed in the Course of their Official Duties.

The fifth edition (1937) of Oppenheim's International Law, Volume I, edited by H. Lauterpacht, gives a number of references at the top of the chapter headed "Position and Privileges of Consuls." Most of these have been looked up and extracts from them are given below. The first extract, however, is from a book in the Printed Library, not mentioned in Oppenheim.—

(1) The fifth edition of the Guide diplomatique, by Baron Charles de Martens, revised by M. F. H. Geffcken, Leipzig, 1866, states on p. 234 of Volume I: "Il est de droit que les consuls ne puissent être poursuivis par les tribunaux du pays de leur résidence pour des actes qu'ils y auraient exercés par ordre de leur Gouvernement dans les limites de leurs attributions et sous l'autorisation tacite du Souverain territorial."

This is preceded by a paragraph which commences: "En principe, les consuls ne peuvent prétendre, comme les agents diplomatiques, à être indépendants de la juridiction du pays. Toutefois, ceux qui ne sont pas nés ou reconnus sujets de l'État qui les reçoit, qui y ont été envoyés, n'y exercent aucune profession industrielle et n'y acquièrent point d'immeubles, quoique soumis à la juridiction civile et criminelle du pays où ils résident, ne peuvent cependant être arrêtés et incarcérés à moins de crime. Quant à ceux qui sont sujets du Souverain territorial, l'usage, conformément aux convenances, veut, s'ils se rendent coupables de crime, qu'on leur retire l'exequatur avant de les mettre en jugement."

(2) Commentaries upon International Law, third edition, Volume II (1882) by Phillimore, says nothing in regard to acts done by consuls in the course of their duties. At p. 270 there is the following: "Consuls in Christian countries are not, legally speaking, public ministers of the State to which they belong, though having a public character, they are under a more special protection of International Law than uncommissioned individuals. This protection they have a right to claim both from the State which sends and from the State which admits them. But they are not representatives of their State, nor entitled to any of the privileges and immunities accorded to such representatives. . . . As a general rule, they are amenable to the civil and criminal jurisdiction of the country in which they reside. Vattel's position, that they are exempted from the latter is wholly unsupported by the requisite proof." On p. 275 he says: "The privileges of consuls, so far as they are derived from the country to which they are sent, are . . . as a general rule, the muniments and papers of the consulate are inviolable and under no pretext to be seized or examined by the local authorities."

(3) Pasquale Fiore, in Trattato di Diritto Internazionale Pubblico, Turin, 1882, says at p. 447 of Volume II, when enumerating the principles of international law which should govern the exercise of the duties of consuls, "I consoli sono soggetti alle leggi e alla giurisdizione del paese di loro residenza per tutti gli atti che sono fuori dell'esercizio delle loro funzioni . . ." ("Consuls are subject to the laws and jurisdiction of the country where they reside in respect of all acts which are outside the exercise of their duties . . .").

(4) Friedrich von Martens in Völkerrecht, German edition, Berlin, 1883-86, Volume II, when discussing in paragraph 22 the rights and privileges of consuls, says nothing in regard to the liability of consuls for acts done in the course of their duties. As regards the liability of consuls generally he says: "Sie sind principiell nicht nur in civil und handelsrechtlichen sondern auch in strafrechtlichen Sachen durchaus den Justizbehörden des Aufenthaltsstaats unterworfen. Übrigens gewähren die Staaten neuerdings den fremden Consulen, namentlich den Berufsconsulen, einige Freiheiten bezüglich der Gerichtsunterthänigkeit, wodurch ihr moralisches Ansehen in den Augen sowohl der örtlichen Obrigkeiten, als auch der Privatpersonen, die mit ihnen zu thun haben, nur erhöht werden kann." (Translation.—"They are in principle completely subject to the judicial authorities of the State where they reside, not only in civil and commercial matters, but also in criminal matters. States are, however, of late, according to foreign consuls, particularly career consuls, some privileges as regards subjection to the courts whereby their dignity in the eyes both of the local authorities and private persons who have to deal with them can only be increased.")

(5) P. Pradier-Fodéré in Traité de Droit international public, Paris, 1888, Volume IV, at p. 701 says: "Les consuls ont droit à toutes les immunités . . . qui sont indispensables à l'accomplissement de leurs fonctions . . . ils doivent personnellement jouir d'une entière immunité de juridiction pour les faits accomplis par eux en leur qualité de consuls."

"Mais l'accomplissement des fonctions consulaires n'a rien de commun avec les délits ou crimes que les consuls peuvent commettre, et dans un cas pareil . . . je refuserais au consul délinquant le droit de s'abriter sous l'immunité de la juridiction criminelle."

(6) Halleck's International Law, third edition, by Sir Sherstone Baker, Bart., 1893, states at p. 372, Volume I: "Consuls are amenable, generally, to the civil and criminal jurisdiction of the country in which they reside, and their property and effects are subject to the recourse of execution and process of the local courts. It was at one time contended that they should be exempt from criminal jurisdiction, but the position was neither sustained in practice nor in the doctrine of text-writers. They, therefore, may either be punished for their offences by the laws of the State where they reside, or be sent back to their own country at the discretion of the Government which they have offended. A distinction, however, is made between personal offences and official acts done under the authority and direction of their own Government. The latter are matters for diplomatic arrangement between the respective States, and are not properly justiciable by the local courts."

(7) L. J. D. Féraud-Giraud in Etats et Souverains, personnel diplomatique et consulaire . . . devant les tribunaux étrangers, Paris, 1895, states at p. 54, Volume II:—

"Les consuls sont plus que de simples citoyens étrangers, et, au point de vue où nous devons les considérer, ils sont moins que des agents diplomatiques; mais quelle place doit-il leur être faite entre le plus et moins, c'est ce qu'il est difficile à déterminer. Le consul n'est pas un agent diplomatique, parce que c'est un agent consulaire, ne représentant pas un Gouvernement étranger. Ce n'est pas un simple citoyen, parce qu'il personnifie ses nationaux dans la circonscription territoriale étrangère pour laquelle il a été agréé par le Souverain du pays. Il doit dès lors avoir droit aux immunités, sans lesquelles il ne pourrait remplir les fonctions dont il est chargé par son Gouvernement, et dont l'autorité territoriale lui a permis l'exercice."

(8) Rivier in Principes du Droit des Gens, Volume I, Paris, 1896, at p. 538 says: "N'ayant pas le caractère représentatif, le consul ne saurait prétendre aux immunités des diplomates. Il ne jouit donc pas de l'extraterritorialité, ni même, en règle générale, de l'inviolabilité. Cependant, ces privilèges lui sont accordés dans plusieurs pays, par convention, au moins partiellement et ceci paraît devoir se généraliser" At p. 539 he writes: "Plusieurs auteurs anciens reconnaissent aux consuls l'inviolabilité. Ainsi Borel, Miruss; Heffter aussi, tout en la montrant plus ou moins étendue d'après les traités, et sans distinguer d'ailleurs entre les consuls de carrière et les consuls non de carrière." On p. 540 Rivier mentions that Engelhardt is a partisan of the personal immunity of consuls de carrière. He quotes from Engelhardt: "Considérée dans son application aux consuls missi, l'immunité personnelle que stipulent la plupart des conventions modernes, répond tout d'abord à la notion d'inviolabilité, telle que la définit le droit des gens dans son acception générale, c'est-à-dire qu'elle est une qualité, un caractère qui assure à l'envoyé étranger respect et liberté dans l'accomplissement de son mandat public. . . . La souveraineté même des États que les consuls effectifs représentent, entraîne pour eux, tout aussi bien que pour les diplomates, l'irresponsabilité personnelle, je veux dire l'immunité de juridiction, dans le domaine de leur compétence officielle. C'est au nom de cette souveraineté et en vertu d'une entente positive, que des exceptions peuvent être faites à cette loi incontestée. Pour les actes étrangers à leurs fonctions, les consuls envoyés ne devraient point relever des tribunaux locaux en matière criminelle, toute procédure pénale impliquant voie de fait, c'est-à-dire atteinte à l'indépendance qui est l'essence même des délégations internationales. Le même fondement rationnel n'existant pas pour la juridiction civile, les consuls seraient soumis au droit commun, sous réserve de l'intervention diplomatique en cas de nécessité."

(9) Calvo in Le Droit international, théorique et pratique, fifth edition Paris 1896, Volume III, states at p. 233:—

"Lorsque l'autorité territoriale se croit en droit de prendre des mesures de rigueur contre un consul étranger, les convenances aussi bien que la prudence lui font un devoir de distinguer si le délit qui lui est imputé est personnel, ou s'il a été commis dans l'exercice et à l'occasion de ses fonctions, c'est-à-dire en vertu d'ordres ou d'instructions de son Gouvernement; dans cette seconde hypothèse, le délit échappe à l'appréciation de la juridiction territoriale et donne lieu à des transactions et à des arrangements diplomatiques.

"C'est sans doute à ce point de vue qu'il faut envisager le différend survenu entre l'Angleterre et la France à propos du missionnaire Pritchard, consul anglais à Taïti, et le mode dont il a été réglé."

At page 235 there is the following:—

"La France, sauf stipulation contraire dans les traités, attribue à ses consuls et reconnaît, par réciprocité, aux agents étrangers, un caractère public, qui tend à élargir le cercle de leurs immunités.

"De cette attribution, elle fait résulter pour eux le droit à l'immunité personnelle, excepté dans le cas de crime. . . .

"Ils ne peuvent être poursuivis devant les tribunaux pour les actes qu'ils font par ordre de leur Gouvernement et avec l'autorisation du Gouvernement du pays où ils résident. Ils ont le droit de décliner la compétence des tribunaux dans les questions où leur qualité d'agents publics de leur Gouvernement est mise en cause, à moins qu'ils n'appartiennent aux pays qui refusent le même avantage aux consuls de France."

(10) Hannis Taylor in A Treatise on International Public Law, London, 1902, cuts down consular immunities to the minimum and makes no mention of any exemption from liability for acts done in the course of a consul's official duties. After stating that a consul cannot be arrested for political reasons and cannot be burdened with local obligations as might conflict with the discharge of his duties, he states at p. 358: "Such privileges conceded to consuls with the view of enabling them efficiently and safely to discharge their official duties, do not withdraw them either from the civil or criminal jurisdiction of the courts of the country in which they officiate. Leaving such privileges out of view, even consuls who owe no allegiance to the State in which they reside, and the sole object of whose residence is the discharge of their consular functions, possess only the ordinary personal exemptions and disabilities incident to aliens who are mere sojourners."

A footnote is added to the effect that a foreign consul in the United States possesses the privilege of being sued only in a Federal court, a privilege which belongs not to him personally, but to the sovereign he represents.

(11) Dr. E. von Ullman in Völkerrecht, Volume III, Tübingen, 1908, paragraph 62, at p. 222, says: "Im übrigen dürften jene Handlungen der Konsulen, die sie in Ausübung ihres Amtes innerhalb der Grenzen ihrer Kompetenz vornehmen, im Interesse der freien Ausübung ihres Berufes von der Jurisdiktion des Amtssitzes schlechthin zu eximieren sein." ("Moreover, those acts which consuls perform in the exercise of their office and within the sphere of their competence, should, in the interest of the free exercise of their calling, be absolutely exempt from the jurisdiction of their official place of residence.")

(12) E. C. Stowell in Le Consul: Fonctions, Immunités, Organisation, Exequatur, Paris, 1909, says at p. 141:—

"Les immunités que l'État étranger accorde au consul doivent être conçues de façon à lui permettre de remplir efficacement ses fonctions. Chaque fois qu'il remplit une fonction qui lui est reconnue comme propre, les privilèges nécessaires à son accomplissement s'y trouvent attachés. Aussi est-il difficile de séparer exactement ses fonctions et ses immunités."

At p. 148 Stowell writes:—

"Le consul ne doit avoir rien à redouter dans l'exécution des instructions de son Gouvernement et dans l'accomplissement de sa fonction: les autorités locales ne peuvent pas discuter ses actes et il appartient à son Gouvernement seul de le punir s'il a dépassé ses droits. Ce principe qui est aujourd'hui universellement reconnu paraît le seul praticable dans les conditions actuelles des relations internationales."

In a footnote on p. 149 there is the following:—

"Dans l'opinion unanime des auteurs européens le consul qui exécute les ordres de son Gouvernement n'a de comptes à rendre ni à l'État étranger, ni à aucun de ses citoyens. La réparation des injustices ou des dommages que cet État ou ses citoyens peuvent avoir éprouvés de son fait, doit être poursuivie par la voie diplomatique. Nous acceptons, à notre corps défendant, cette opinion parce que nous estimons que la responsabilité personnelle de l'agent est la base des libertés individuelles et la garantie d'un Gouvernement libre. . . . Si un agent consulaire vient aux États-Unis et réussit à obtenir, au moyen de papiers frauduleux, l'extradition d'un citoyen ou d'un étranger domicilié dans le pays, les garanties que nous possédons ne nous protègent plus contre ses agissements. Est-il, en vérité, admissible qu'un État étranger dispose de plus de privilèges pour agir comme il l'entend dans le territoire des États-Unis, qu'un service quelconque de notre administration publique. . . .

A cela on peut répondre qu'un État ne peut avoir la prétention de contrôler les actes d'un autre État."

(13) J. de Louter in Le Droit international public positif, Volume II, Oxford (1920), at p. 75 says:—

"Il est établi par une jurisprudence constante et l'opinion presque unanime de la doctrine, que les consuls sont, tout comme les personnes privées, soumis à la juridiction territoriale en matière civile et pénale: ils courent donc le risque d'être emprisonnés quant à leur personne et saisis quant à leurs biens; l'exercice de leurs fonctions est rendu impossible par la réalisation de l'une ou l'autre de ces possibilités. C'est la raison pour laquelle plusieurs États ont, les uns de leur propre mouvement, d'autres dans des traités d'État, adopté des stipulations, plus ou moins détaillées par lesquelles des garanties suffisantes sont accordées aux fonctionnaires consulaires, pour que ceux-ci puissent exercer librement leurs fonctions. . . . Jusqu'à présent ce droit consulaire n'est pas encore devenu une institution de droit international universellement reconnue."

Further on he quotes Camille Jordan:—

"En somme, en dépit de quelques hésitations dans la jurisprudence française . . . la doctrine, comme la jurisprudence du continent européen, ne voient pas dans les clauses des traités et conventions consulaires de titre pour les consuls étrangers à l'immunité de la juridiction territoriale." De Louter adds: "Par contre, les tribunaux se déclarent généralement incompétents, même sans stipulation formelle, pour connaître des actes commis par les consuls étrangers dans l'exercice de leurs fonctions officielles, parce que, en cette matière, les consuls ne doivent de comptes qu'à leur propre Gouvernement. Ceci est seulement vrai pour les consuls de carrière, car les consuls élus sont entièrement soumis à la législation et à la juridiction territoriales."

(14) Travers in Le Droit pénal international, Paris, 1921, Volume II, at p. 256 says:—

"Le principe est, pour les pays de chrétienté ou assimilés, qu'aucune immunité de juridiction n'appartient, en matière répressive, aux consuls, vice-consuls, agents consulaires."

"Peu importe que le fait, en raison duquel consuls ou agents consulaires seraient incriminés, se rapporte, de façon plus ou moins directe, à leurs fonctions."

Reference is made to the case where an action was brought against the British Vice-Consul at Dieppe for defamation. Travers does not approve of the reasons given by the court for acquitting the vice-consul. He says: "Rien ne serait plus dangereux que de vouloir distinguer selon que l'acte incriminé aurait ou n'aurait pas de rapport avec les fonctions du consul ou les instructions de son Gouvernement; pareille recherche serait une cause féconde de froissements et de conflits."

"Enfin, les consuls n'ont, même lorsqu'ils agissent dans l'exercice de leurs fonctions, aucun caractère représentatif."

(15) Hall's International Law (eighth edition, 1924) says at p. 375, speaking of the position of a consul: "It is agreed . . . that he must be conceded whatever privileges are necessary to enable him to fulfil the duties of his office except such as would withdraw him from the civil and criminal jurisdiction of the courts." To this there is a footnote: "For obvious reasons a consul is not liable to the courts for acts done by order of the Government from whom he holds his commission."

(16) International Law, by C. G. Fenwick, 1924, says at p. 377: "The subject of consular immunities received constructive treatment at the hands of the Institute of International Law at its session at Vienna⁽¹⁸⁾ in 1896, when a series of rules, arranged in codified form, was adopted. The rules distinguish between professional consuls and consular agents, specify the conditions under which consuls shall enjoy a large measure of personal immunity, and restrict the immunities to be enjoyed by consular agents. While consuls are left amenable in general to the local civil and criminal jurisdiction, an exception is made in the case of acts performed in their official capacity and within the limits of their powers."

The "Projet de Règlement," to which reference is made above, contained the following under Titre I—Des Consuls:—

"Art. 3. Ils ne sont justiciables des tribunaux locaux pour les actes qu'ils accomplissent en leur qualité officielle et dans les limites de leur compétence. Les exceptions qui sont faites à cette règle doivent être prévues et définies par traité."

"Si un particulier se croit lésé du fait d'un consul agissant dans la sphère de ses attributions, il adressera sa plainte au Gouvernement territorial, qui y donnera suite, s'il y a lieu, par la voie diplomatique."

M. Ed. Engelhardt, in a report, printed before the règlement quoted above, at p. 132 of the Annuaire de l'Institut de Droit international, 1896, says in regard to the legal position of consuls:—

"La jurisprudence en cette matière est singulièrement variable; car on observe des différences non seulement dans les usages et dans les traités qui président aux relations d'Etat à Etat, mais encore dans les décisions des tribunaux d'un même Etat."

(18) Vienna is a mistake. The place of meeting was Venice.

"Trois principaux systèmes sont ici en présence et ils ont chacun leurs partisans."

"Le premier consiste à exempter les consuls de la juridiction indigène, tant au civil qu'au criminel, comme les diplomates."

"Le second rend les consuls justiciables des tribunaux locaux sauf pour leurs actes officiels."

"Le troisième est la consécration du second, mais avec cette clause que les consuls ne peuvent être poursuivis sans que leur Gouvernement ne soit préalablement appelé à intervenir."

"Il y a même un quatrième système mixte, d'après lequel les consuls, soustraits à la juridiction pénale, sauf en cas de crime, seraient soumis à la juridiction civile, à l'exclusion de la contrainte par corps et de la saisie."

(17) P. Fauchille in Traité de Droit international public, eighth edition, revised by H. Bonfils, Paris, 1926, Volume I, at p. 126 says:—

"Immunités.—Si les consuls n'ont pas le caractère représentatif et diplomatique, ne faut-il pas leur attribuer quelques immunités sans lesquelles il leur serait très difficile de remplir leur mandat? Les publicistes ne s'accordent pas sur cette concession."

"Les uns pensent, avec Engelhardt, qu'il n'est pas possible de refuser aux consuls de carrière la plénitude du bénéfice de l'inviolabilité personnelle. Les consuls sont des fonctionnaires étrangers, investis par une délégation émanée de leur propre Souverain, délégation dont le Gouvernement territorial a reconnu l'autorité et la valeur par l'exequatur accordé. Bynkershoek, Calvo, de Garden, Geffcken, Holtzendorff, Hyde, Klüber, G. F. de Martens, Moore, Oppenheim, Vattel, Wicquefort délient en principe aux consuls les immunités diplomatiques et notamment l'immunité de juridiction."

"En droit positif, les exemptions, immunités, prérogatives des consuls sont déterminées par les législations intérieures des Etats ou par les conventions consulaires."

"L'inviolabilité personnelle reconnue aux consuls doit s'entendre en ce sens que les consuls doivent être respectés dans leur personne."

"Mais l'inviolabilité personnelle n'entraîne pas l'exemption de la juridiction répressive. Les tribunaux locaux peuvent connaître des crimes, délits ou contraventions commis par les consuls étrangers. Telle est la doctrine générale des criminalistes français, Faustin Hélie, Morin, Ortolan, Garraud, Le Sellyer, &c. . . . en France, en Allemagne, en Autriche, en Angleterre, en Belgique, en Danemark, en Espagne, aux Etats-Unis, en Portugal, dans l'Amérique du Sud, &c., les consuls étrangers sont soumis à la juridiction répressive des tribunaux locaux. Il en est toutefois autrement si le consul a agi dans sa qualité officielle."

"Les consuls sont-ils aussi subordonnés à la juridiction des tribunaux civils ou commerciaux de leur résidence? Sans l'ombre d'un doute, le consul ne peut être cité devant la juridiction civile locale à l'occasion des actes accomplis par lui en sa qualité officielle et dans les limites de ses pouvoirs. Ces actes sont la manifestation publique de la volonté de son Gouvernement et celui-ci ne saurait être soumis à un pouvoir étranger (Cass., 30 juin 1884). Quant aux actes non officiels du consul, nul traité (à notre connaissance) ne fixe la limite exacte du pouvoir juridictionnel des tribunaux civils ou de commerce. Pour la France il n'existe que de simples instructions ministérielles. En principe, dans le droit actuel, le consul est justiciable de la juridiction civile locale pour les actes de sa vie non officielle."

(18) Irvin Stewart in Consular Privileges and Immunities, New York, 1926, says at p. 147: "To-day there can be no doubt about a consul's liability to suit. . . . However, a distinction must be made between the cases involving action of the consul in his official capacity and those which concern the consul personally. In the first type of cases, some courts hold that a consul may not be sued. Thus the French courts refused to entertain a suit against an English consul for slander when the consul defended himself on the grounds that the remarks complained of were made by him in his official capacity and in the conduct of the consular business."

"The reason given by the French courts in making the distinction is this: the consul in performing his official acts is proceeding under the authority of his Government and the court in permitting a suit against the consul would in fact be allowing a suit against the Government which appointed the consul. Furthermore, inasmuch as the consul in receiving his exequatur is authorized by the Government which receives him to perform his functions, the official act is one done with the authorization of the receiving as well as the appointing Government. No record has been found to indicate that the Government of the United States has recognized this distinction. . . .

"One result of the consul's residence is that the territorial court is the one to pass upon the character of the act which is being challenged. Where consuls are not liable to suits for their official acts, there remains the problem of determining what acts are official. In the first instance, the determination of the question rests with the court in which the suit is filed. This determination, however, is subject to a review in diplomatic negotiations which will arise if the court's decision is believed to be incorrect."

(19) Répertoire de Droit international by A. de Lapradelle and J. P. Niboyet, Paris, 1929, Volume V, at p. 46, states:—

"Actes de la fonction. Même en l'absence de traités, il convient aussi de reconnaître aux consuls étrangers l'immunité pour les actes de leurs fonctions dont ils ne doivent compte qu'au Gouvernement qui les a nommés."

"En l'absence de conventions, les consuls anglais ne peuvent élever en France aucune prétention à l'immunité de juridiction. Cass. crim. 23 décembre 1854, Featherstonhaugh, consul britannique au Havre (S. 1854, 1.811)."

There follows a mention of a case at Dieppe, where an action was brought against a British vice-consul, Lee Jortin, for defamation (Clunet, 1900, p. 130).

Further on there is the following:—

"Il existe une certaine analogie entre la théorie des actes de la fonction et la théorie de l'acte administratif, des actes de Puissance publique dont les tribunaux n'ont pas à connaître."

"Mais les consuls étrangers ne peuvent être assimilés aux fonctionnaires publics français. Il y a analogie, et non assimilation."

(20) Baron A. Heyking in a study, La Théorie et la Pratique des Services consulaires, published in the 1930 volume of Recueil des Cours of the Académie de Droit international, says (pp. 859-860):—

"Les privilèges consulaires vis-à-vis de la juridiction locale ont trait . . . à l'exemption de toute poursuite judiciaire pour les actes que les consuls étrangers accomplissent dans l'exercice de leurs fonctions officielles. Les traités internationaux ne contiennent pas de dispositions à ce propos, pour la simple raison que cette exemption découle de la nomination même du consul et de l'exequatur qu'il a obtenu du pouvoir territorial. En conséquence, si une action officielle du consul était considérée par les autorités locales comme incompatible avec les lois du pays, on ne pourrait protester contre elle que par la voie diplomatique."

A footnote refers to Irvin Stewart's Consular Privileges and Immunities, p. 149.

(21) A sub-committee (J. Gustavo Guerrero, rapporteur, and A. Mastny) of the League of Nations Committee of Experts for the Progressive Codification of International Law reported in 1927 on the question of the possibility of establishing by way of a general convention provisions as to the legal position and functions of consuls. The sub-committee's report contained the following:—

"Immunity from civil jurisdiction.—This immunity, and indeed all immunity from jurisdiction, depends on the fiction of extra-territoriality which can really only apply to diplomatic agents. Consuls, accordingly, are subject to local jurisdiction, and, indeed, a civil action could hardly prevent a consul from carrying on his duties."

"Immunity from criminal jurisdiction.—It would seem that, as a consul could not carry out his duties if he were placed under arrest, he should be allowed immunity in criminal matters. Against this, it may be argued that, as the consul and the consulate are not the same thing, the arrest of the consul would not mean the discontinuance of the work of his country's consular service."

"Such cases have often arisen in various countries and judicial decisions have answered the question in the sense of disallowing any immunity, either civil or criminal, for consuls

"The foregoing observations may be modified by bilateral treaties."

The conclusions of the sub-committee as amended as a result of discussion in the committee were:—

"Immunity from civil jurisdiction.—The immunity from civil jurisdiction which is accorded to diplomatic agents cannot be applicable in a general manner to consuls, who should only enjoy such immunity in connexion with the exercise of their functions."

"Immunity from criminal jurisdiction.—Consuls do not "possess this immunity."

(22) The Faculty of the Harvard Law School decided in 1927 to organise a research in international law for the purpose of preparing drafts of international conventions dealing with various subjects, one being the legal position and functions of consuls. The draft convention on this subject contained the following article (21):—

"A receiving State shall exempt a person from liability and from its judicial and administrative jurisdiction for an act done by him while he was consul in the performance of consular functions which he was entitled to exercise: the receiving State decides, subject to diplomatic recourse by the sending State, whether the act was done in the performance of such functions."

(23) J. Irizarry y Puente, in his book Traité sur les Fonctions internationales des Consuls, Paris, 1937, devotes chapter II to the "Situation juridique des Consuls." This chapter contains a section of twenty pages headed "Irresponsabilité pour les Actes officiels." He begins as follows:—

"Les actes officiels d'un consul étranger, nous le savons, sont 'sous la sauvegarde du droit international et ne peuvent faire l'objet d'enquête de la part des autorités de l'Etat.'⁽¹⁾ Cela signifie, selon les termes affirmatifs de l'Acuerdo sobre Consules du Congrès de Caracas de 1911, que les consuls 'en tout ce qui est relatif à l'exercice de leurs fonctions, devront être entièrement indépendants de l'Etat dans le territoire duquel ils résident.' De ces déclarations nous déduisons le principe, universellement reproduit dans l'usage et dans la pratique internationale, même en l'absence de traité ou de mesures législatives formelles, qu'un consul ne peut pas, pendant ou après l'occupation de sa charge, être poursuivi personnellement, en matière civile ou criminelle, par ses propres nationaux ou par les nationaux ou les fonctionnaires de l'Etat d'admission ou d'un Etat tiers, devant les tribunaux de l'Etat d'admission, pour les actes officiels, de quelque caractère que ce soit, faits par lui dans l'exercice des obligations de sa charge et dans les limites de ses fonctions consulaires. L'admission du consul, en vertu d'un exequatur exécutif, à accomplir ses fonctions consulaires pour le compte d'un Etat étranger, entraîne avec elle cette limitation sous-entendue de l'action des autorités de l'Etat d'admission; et les lois territoriales, en matière civile ou pénale, ne sont pas destinées à réglementer et contrôler les actes faits par des agents étrangers en leur qualité officielle. Cette règle est basée sur des arguments puissants, juridiques et politiques. Permettre les poursuites contre les consuls en raison de leurs actes officiels équivaldrait à poursuivre l'Etat d'origine dont le consul n'est qu'un agent sans son consentement, à une infraction à sa souveraineté et à son indépendance et à un affront à son Gouvernement. Ce serait aussi contraire à la politique publique qui cherche toujours à éviter toute intervention hors de propos dans l'exercice des fonctions gouvernementales. Ces raisons juridiques et politiques sont particulièrement puissantes en ce qui concerne les agents gouvernementaux étrangers travaillant dans l'Etat d'admission avec son consentement tacite ou exprès. La réparation de torts éprouvés en raison d'actes officiels d'un consul étranger doit être plutôt obtenue par les voies diplomatiques que par l'action privée. Les actes officiels présupposent la sanction et la responsabilité gouvernementale, et cette responsabilité ne peut être jugée et déterminée par les tribunaux locaux sans le consentement du Gouvernement proprement responsable."

Subsequently when discussing "délits fonctionnels" the author states "les jugements rendus soutiennent uniformément que le consul n'est pas responsable civilement et criminellement devant les tribunaux de l'Etat d'admission pour les délits engageant sa responsabilité officielle, mais qu'il est responsable des délits commis par lui au delà des limites des fonctions consulaires et qui engagent seulement sa responsabilité personnelle."

⁽¹⁾ Reference to a Honduran decree of 1906 and a Salvadorean law of 1901.

(24) Oppenheim's International Law, Volume I, "Peace," 5th edition, edited by H. Lauterpacht, London, 1937, states at p. 656: "From the undoubted official position of consuls no universally recognised privileges of importance have as yet been evolved. Apart from the special protection due to consuls according to international law, there is neither a custom nor a universal agreement between the Powers to grant them important privileges. Such privileges as consuls actually enjoy are granted to them either by courtesy or in compliance with special stipulations in a commercial or consular treaty between the sending and the admitting State."

The question whether consuls are liable for acts performed in the course of their official duties is not discussed.

(25) J. B. Moore, in A Digest of International Law, Washington, 1906, when dealing with consuls in Volume 5, has a section at p. 61 headed: "Amenability to Local Jurisdiction." He does not discuss the point whether consuls can be sued for official acts, but says: "Consular privilege cannot protect a consul as to mercantile matters engaged in by him independent of his official business." Reference is made to the case of Caldwell v. Barclay et al., 1788, 1 Dallas 305. Moore continues: "In a suit brought against a consul-general of France, for transactions of a public nature, in which he acted as the commercial agent of his country, the President has no constitutional right to interfere, but must leave the matter to the tribunals of justice, Lee, At.-Gen., 1797, 1 op. 77, but he goes on to say that he did not think the right to sue the consul in this case could be maintained, since the contract was made on the credit of the French Republic. At.-Gen. Lee, in another opinion of the same year, stated: "It is well settled in the United States, as in Great Britain, that person acting under a commission from the Sovereign of a foreign nation is not amenable for what he does in pursuance of his commission to any judiciary tribunal of the United States."

"A consul cannot be held personally liable on a contract which he enters into on account of his Government, the credit being given to that Government. Jones v. Le Tombe (1798), 3 Dallas, 384."

(26) C. C. Hyde, in International Law chiefly as Interpreted and Applied by the United States, Boston, 1922, says at p. 806: "A foreign consular officer is not, according to the law of nations, exempt from local jurisdiction. The territorial sovereign is not obliged to yield to him so great a privilege. He is amenable to civil process. Such amenability implies an obligation to submit to an adjudication when he is duly served."

Nothing is said in regard to acts performed in the course of official duties.

(27) Pitt Cobbett's Cases on International Law, Volume 1, "Peace," 5th edition, by F. T. Grey, London, 1931, makes no mention at all of the question of the liability of consuls for acts performed in the course of official duties.

(28) M. P. de Paepe, counsellor at the Court of Cassation of Belgium, in an article in the Journal du Droit international privé of 1895, at p. 44 writes as follows:—

"La distinction entre les actes politiques et les actes civils, que l'on se refuse généralement à admettre pour les agents diplomatiques, est, au contraire, appliquée sans contestation aux consuls étrangers."

"Dans les pays de chrétienté, dans les pays civilisés, ils sont justiciables des tribunaux pour leurs faits personnels, mais non pour les actes qu'ils accomplissent en leur qualité officielle."

(29) Wheaton, International Law, 5th edition, pp. 352-3, quotes Phillimore as set out in (2) above, and says:—

(1) Consuls are not entitled to the peculiar immunities of ambassadors whatever special privileges they may have.

(2) In civil and criminal cases they are subject to the local law in the same manner as other foreign residents, but, none the less, have some privileges and immunities not enjoyed by private persons.

(30) François, Handboek van het Volkenrecht, Vol. II, Zwolle (Netherlands), 1933, p. 34:—

"They (consuls) are entitled, however, to immunity from the jurisdiction of the courts in matters of civil and penal law in respect of acts performed in the exercise of their public functions and within the strict limits of their competence."

(N.B.—François is an official of the Dutch Foreign Office.)

(31) Fedozzi, Introduzione al Diritto internazionale, 3rd edition (1938), p. 459:—

Translation.—"The consul has no immunity from civil jurisdiction. If the contrary may have appeared to be the case in practice, it is due to the fact that the consul was brought before the court for matters done on behalf of or against his country and hence as the representative of it; where the jurisdictional immunity of foreign States is admitted, the declaration of the lack of jurisdiction on the part of the local judicial authorities has regard to the State and not to the person of its representative."

(32) Strupp, Éléments de Droit international public, Vol. 1 (1938), p. 229:—

"Les consuls ne jouissent pas d'exterritorialité, mais leurs papiers et leurs archives sont inviolables. En général et dans la mesure où les traités consulaires le reconnaissent, ils ne peuvent être ni arrêtés, ni emprisonnés et ne sont pas obligés de déposer comme témoins."

(33) Balladore Pallieri, Diritto internazionale pubblico (1937), p. 381, affirms the immunity of consular archives and says:—

Translation.—"According to general international law no immunity is vested in consular officers, who are subject to the ordinary rules in force for foreigners in and for all matters. The immunities which they sometimes enjoy are either accorded to them by way of courtesy or find their basis in consular conventions and in particular legal obligations which the States have undertaken in that manner."

(34) Brierly, The Law of Nations, pp. 135-6: "Consuls are not diplomatic agents; they perform various services for a State or its subjects in another State, without, however, representing the former in the full sense. They may be nationals of either State, and generally they are made subject to the authority of the diplomatic representatives of the State for which they act. They watch over commercial interests of the State for which they act; collect information for it; help its nationals with advice, administer their property if they die abroad, and register their births, deaths, and marriages; they authenticate documents for legal purposes, take depositions from witnesses, and the like. They also have important functions concerned with shipping, sending home, for instance, shipwrecked or destitute persons, and settling disputes between master and crew. Their immunities are indefinite, and exist by courtesy or by special conventions between particular States rather than by rules of law. They are generally exempted from direct taxation and from service on juries; but they are not immune from civil or criminal proceedings, though there is a general sentiment that, if possible, these should not be allowed to interfere with their official duties, or with the inviolability of the archives of the consulate."

(35) Verdross, Völkerrecht (1936), p. 15, has no doubt as to the immunity of consular archives, and says that consuls are, in principle, liable to jurisdiction but that they are not liable to criminal jurisdiction in respect of their official acts.

O. J. HUBBERT.

November 18, 1938.

ANNEX IV.

CARRINGTON AND KIRWAN'S REPORTS, VOL. I, P. 23.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Sitting in London in Easter Term, 1843.

Before Mr. Justice Maule.

WEBB v. PAGE.

CASE for negligence in carrying goods.

A witness was called for the plaintiff, to speak to the nature of the damage sustained by the goods (which consisted of cabinet work), and the expense that would be necessary to restore or replace the injured articles. Before being sworn, the witness applied for compensation for his loss of time.

Maule, J.—There is a distinction between the case of a man who sees a fact and is called to prove it in a court of justice, and that of a man who is selected by a party to give his opinion on a matter with which he is peculiarly conversant from the nature of his employment in life. The former is bound, as a matter of public duty, to speak to a fact which happens to have fallen within his knowledge—without such testimony, the course of justice must be stopped. The latter is under no such obligation. There is no such necessity for his evidence, and the party who selects him must pay him.

Mr. Wyche, the plaintiff's attorney, gave his undertaking to pay the witness, who was then examined.

Dowling, Serjt., and Petersdorff, for the plaintiff.
Bompas, Serjt., and Kennedy, for the defendant.

[J 1110/118/16/1939]

No. 2.

[March 18, 1939]

*Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown for Scotland.

1. Article 9.

THE question which falls to be answered with regard to this article is whether the Scottish courts would refuse to order "consular officers and their employees" to produce "documents from their archives or other official papers." The rule of practice in Scotland as regards the confidentiality attaching to British Government documents is that written communications passing between public officials in their official capacity are normally immune from disclosure; but that it is for the court to determine, according to the nature of the communication and the circumstances under which it was made, whether a communication passing between an official or department and a third party is entitled to protection. The recent tendency has been in the direction of weakening the plea of confidentiality, even when stated by the Lord Advocate on behalf of a public department on the ground of public interest. While great weight attaches to the plea of confidentiality when so stated, it is impossible to affirm that the court will not decline to sustain it.

If, therefore, the suggested claim for the inviolability of consular archives and other official papers is well founded, the consular officers and their employees are entitled to a higher degree of protection than the Scottish courts are in use to extend to the British Government; and the basis of the claim must be a rule of international law accepted by, or acceptable to, the Scottish courts. Is there such a rule?

In examining this question, we apply the rule laid down by Lord Macmillan in the S.S. Cristina (1938, A.C. 485, at 497), that "it is manifestly of the highest importance that the courts of this country, before they give the force of law within this realm to any doctrine of international law, should be satisfied that it has the hall-marks of general assent and reciprocity."

Having studied the authorities cited in the Foreign Office memorandum (to which we would add references to Anson, II, 136; Ridges, Const. Law, 303; Halsbury, Dict., VI, 519; and Encycl. of Scots Law, VIII, 374), we conclude that the general result reached by British writers is accurately stated by Brierly, Law of Nations, 135-6, in the proposition that there is a "general sentiment that, if possible, legal proceedings should not interfere with immunity of archives."

In our opinion, this is a slender basis on which to rest the claim for the very high degree of confidentiality suggested by the draft article, especially in view of the vagueness of the expression "other official papers." We think it highly probable that the Scottish courts would attach the greatest weight to a claim made to the inviolability of "archives" or "muniments," in the strict sense of these terms, and would be very unlikely to force production; but we think that in certain cases the courts might well require a consul to produce a letter or other document received by him from some source other than his own Government. We are, therefore, unable to affirm that the proposition formulated at the beginning of this answer would be accepted in its full sense as a rule of Scots law.

[* The case submitted was identical with that to the Law Officers of the Crown in England—J 1094/118/16/1939.]

We desire to add that no difficulty need be apprehended under Scots law and practice in regard to the giving of expert evidence with reference to foreign law; but that it is impossible to be confident that a consul might not be required to give evidence as to matters of fact "within the scope of official duties."

2. Article 10.

In view of the general principles of the law of agency, and the express provisions of article 10 (3), we do not consider that any serious difficulty need be apprehended so far as contractual liability is concerned. But as regards liability for a crime, offence or wrong (tort, delict, quasi-delict, &c.), everything appears to us to depend on the precise scope to be assigned to the language of article 10 (1). If the acts in question are performed in bona fide and without malice or other oblique motive, and are performed by a consular officer (a) in his official capacity, and (b) within the functions of consular officers under international law, we have difficulty in imagining many instances of possible crimes or torts which could conceivably be committed under such conditions. In the case of libel, which is probably the likeliest instance, the consul would be protected in a civil action by the law of privilege; and criminal libel is unknown to Scots law. Upon this view the immunity claimed by the article would be indistinguishable from that enjoyed under domestic law by such public functionaries as a town clerk or a permanent secretary. If, on the other hand, it is desired by article 10 (1) to confer on foreign consuls in this country (and to secure for British consuls abroad) that much wider degree of immunity which would protect them from the possibility of having their bona fides investigated by a court, and which would secure them against the consequences of any wrong or criminal offence committed in the course of the general performance of official duties, we are unable to regard the authorities cited by the Foreign Office as sufficient evidence of "the hall-marks of general assent and reciprocity," least of all in view of the fact that, against the footnote in Hall's International Law, it is possible to set not only the qualified or contradictory statements quoted in the Foreign Office memorandum, but also the statements of British writers in such works as Halsbury, loc. cit.; Encycl. of Scots Law, loc. cit.; Anson, loc. cit.; Hood Philips, Const. Law (1939), 436; and Gibb, Intern. Law of Jurisd., 12.

In the result, if the protection sought to be afforded by article 10 is intended to be confined to strictly official acts performed in bona fide by a consular officer, we consider that the risk of this immunity being impaired is small, though it is manifestly not feasible to figure all the possible cases which might well arise in practice. If, on the other hand, a more comprehensive degree of immunity is intended to be conferred, we are unable to advise that the Scottish courts would be likely to afford it.

T. M. COOPER.

(Also approved, although not signed,* by the Solicitor-General for Scotland.)

Lord Advocate's Chambers,
March 18, 1939.

PROPRIETARY STATEMENT

This film cannot be reproduced in whole or in any substantial part by use of film or microfiche either commercially or for gift without the consent of the publisher, Trans-Media Publishing Company of Dobbs Ferry, New York. Users are free to make reproductions of the decisions for reference use.

Copies of this film may be purchased from Trans-Media Publishing Co.

Trans-Media Publishing Co.
Dobbs Ferry, New York 10522

END